Brandstein's blocking and spiking dominated play and intimidated the Jeffs, as Williams took the game 15-6. "There was a sequence when Vince blocked four balls in a row, and I think that really took the wind out of Amherst's sails," said senior co-captain Paul Sabbah. "We started slow in that game, but Vince's blocking and Mark Koenig's serving did them in."

Game three was even more lopsided, as Williams took it 15-5 to close out the 3-0 win. Along with Brandstein and Koenig, strong performances were turned in by seniors Bill Best and Bob Alcasabas, juniors Steve Brewster and Marc Hummon, and freshman Chris Clarey.

The best

"This team is definitely the best in the program's short history," said Sabbah. "It's a great feeling to end a season in such a convincing way."

Sunday's tournament saw Williams outclassing a field of six other teams at the NASC gym. Among Williams' victims were Berkshire Community College and, once again, Amherst.

Next up for the squad is the New England's next Sunday, the event in which Williams placed sixth of 26 New England squads last year.

The season ends April 10 with the New England Division I championships.

Williams still has an excellent base. Pidorano and Walsh are an exciting and explosive guard team, and Schmidt complements them with consistency. Krupski and McCarthy, though short, can do the job at center. McNicholas has played well at forward, and Russ Howard '84, Mike Meadows '86, and Tim Rives '85 are also talented.

The search for a coach to lead the team next year continues.

Parker fifth

Bo Parker '84 sprinted the final half-mile in 2:02.0, but his strong finish wasn't enough to compensate for a lackluster opening pace and he had to settle for fifth place among eight runners at the ICAA Championship Indoor Track Meet held this weekend at Princeton.

Parker was disappointed with his 4:12.4 time at the meet, which featured all of the best runners in the east, but his coach wasn't. "The effort was unquestionably there," pointed out Dick Farley, "but against runners like those he couldn't get any momentum. He fell ten yards behind the field too early and never had a chance to catch up because you can't just bolt past great runners, like Bo had done in every other meet."

Alum rows on

Janet Harmon '81 placed 45th in recent testing for the 1983 U.S. Rowing team. The number of candidates for the team has been cut from 120 to 60. Final selections will be made this summer for the team that will compete in the World Championships August 28-September 4 in Duisberg, West Germany.

Last summer Harmon was selected for the 1982 U.S. Development team and participated in the National Sports Festival at Indianapolis.

Harmon was a two-year varsity oarswoman at Williams.

Jeffs nip Ephs in overtime

The basketball team (12-10) ended its season in dire frustration Saturday night with a one-point overtime loss to archrival Amherst, 74-73.

The season concluded with an off-balance jumper by senior Andy Goodwin, and, following a scramble under the net, a final lay-up which rolled off the rim as the buzzer sounded.

Williams faced near-certain elimination at the end of regulation time, but a one-handed jump-shot over two defenders by freshman Tim Walsh knotted the score at the buzzer. Walsh tallied 20 points for the Ephs and came up with the clutch baskets when the team needed them most.

Amherst outscored the Ephs 7-6 in the overtime, taking advantage of numerous missed free throws by the Ephmen.

The Lord Jeffs were paced by senior center Dana King's 15 points. All five Amherst starters scored in double figures and ended the game with four fouls. Only six points were scored off the Amherst bench.

Junior guard Art Pidorianno led the Ephmen with 25 points, but a 7 for 16 day at the free throw line kept Pidorianno from breaking the game open for Williams. The 45 points from the Eph backcourt could not offset the strong front line scoring of King and Amherst's Leo White and Paul Molter (14 points each).

Williams led through most of the first half, but the Eph offense sputtered for the last four minutes of the half, and Amherst took a 38-34 halftime lead. The Ephmen closed the lead early in the second half and the game continued as a see-saw battle to the end.

The game also marked the end of Williams Head Coach Curt Tong's career at Williams. He racked up a 104-92 won-loss record in his nine years at the helm of the Ephmen. He moves on to Pomona Pitzer in California next year where he will take the Athletic Director position.

Season recap

This year's team started out slowly, losing four of their five games before the Christmas break. They lost the North Adams Mohawk Classic tournament for the first time in three years.

But the team's special experience—their two-week educational and athletic trip to Cuba—brought them together as a team. Although they lost all three games against the equivalent of Cuba's number one national team, Tong felt that those games helped the Ephmen define their roles on the court.

After returning and losing three games to tough teams—Dartmouth, Trinity, and Springfield—Williams went on an awesome seven game winning streak.

The Ephmen could seemingly do no wrong during the streak, finding a new way to an exciting win each game. Highly-ranked Bowdoin and Middlebury were among the teams upset during the streak.

After beating Wesleyan, the streak ended with exactly the wrong team—Amherst. The Lord Jeffs rode superior outside shooting to their victory over Williams.

After a home loss to Wesleyan, it looked like the season would end on a down-note, similar to its beginning. But the Ephmen beat Tufts, ninth-ranked in New England Div. III, to assure a winning season record.

The loss of co-captains Olesen and O'Day, and Goodwin and Ormsbee to graduation will take size and maturity away from the team. But Williams

Women ranked in Nationals

by Mark Averitt

"This is the greatest day ever for Williams College women's squash," beamed Coach Renzi Lamb after his sixth-ranked team had qualified two players, Barbara Riefler and Cassie Fisher, for the top 16 in the country.

The Ephwomen have never placed two women in the best 16 before this week. Williams' number one player Barbara Riefler '83, 10-13 for 1983 from number one singles spot, was cited as the 14th best player in the country, and teammate Cassie Fisher '84, with a 15-10 record due mostly to an unbelievable tournament winning streak, was rated 15th.

Riefler, Fisher, number three Hilary Thomas '85 and number four Lisa Buckley '85 all went to the National Individual Championships at UPenn this weekend. Buckley was the first Eph eliminated from the double-elimination competition.

National draw

Riefler, after splitting her first two matches, was shutout by Yale's Phoebe Trubowitz and bowed out of the tournament in the first consolation round, but Thomas and Fisher both advanced. Thomas was eliminated by Allison Dalmont, the number one player at the University of California at Berkeley, in the bracket of eight, but Fisher survived against Wesleyan's best player Karen Adair.

A victory over California's Allison Dalmont moved Fisher into the consolation finals where she topped Phoebe Trubowitz, 3-1, to win the consolation with a 6-1 record.

Women hoopsters fall to Amherst

A last-minute rally fell short as the women's basketball team fell to Amherst 54-49 to close out their season last Wednesday.

"Amherst outmuscled us, but we played a quick, smart game and never let up," said Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin. "I was very happy with the way the whole team played."

Late rally

Amherst led by as many as ten points in the second half before Williams put on a late rush. The Ephs moved to within three points with the ball in the final minute but could get no closer.

Thalia Meehan '83 and Tracy Burrows '84 paced the Ephwomen with 16 and 14 points respectively.

Squash fifth in nation

The men's squash team placed fifth in this weekend's National Intercollegiate Championships at Princeton.

The Ephmen accomplished their goal of beating out Trinity for the fifth position, but trailed winner Harvard, Princeton, a Canadian team, and Yale.

Zaff leads team

Number one Greg Zaff '84 lost in the quarterfinals of the A tournament to David Boyun of Harvard, but came back to win the consolation by beating a top-ranked Canadian.

Number two Tom Harrity '84 made it to the quarterfinals of the consolation, where he lost to Zaff. His biggest win was over Bill Doyle.

Nau wins conso

Number three Jeff Sultar '84 lost his first two games in the B tournament, but number four Bill Nau made it to the quarterfinals of the main draw, where he lost to Tom Shepherd of Princeton, and then won the consolation.

Number five Jamie King '84 lost in the 16th-finals, but played well in the consolations. Number six Doug Robie '86 also lost in the 16s of the main draw of the C tourney, but played well to make it to the semi-finals of the consolation tourney, beating Trinity's Jerome Kaplus to avenge an earlier loss.

One and two seeds from across the country play in the A tournament, while three and four players are in the B and numbers five and six play in the C tourney. Individual players' points are then added to make a team total.

Swimmers win New England championship

by Chris Harned

Taking six individual firsts and a relay victory, the men's swim team beat Tufts for the New England championship 528-303.5 this weekend.

The swim team quickly established themselves as the dominant team in the New England area as they opened their campaign to capture a fifth consecutive New England Swimming and Diving Championships title by bursting to a 91-74 first-day lead over second place University of Rhode Island. Freshman William Couch set a school record in winning the 400 individual medley in a time of 4:11.63. Williams Head Coach Carl Samuelson said, "Bill swam well enough to win the event, but we expect him to go faster at Nationals."

In the 1650 freestyle, senior Rob Bowman battled to third with a time of 16:42.13 while All-American Ben Aronson finished fifth in 16:48.92.

The 800 freestyle relay team of Will Andrew '86, Bowman, Aronson and Jeff Mook '83 battled with quartets from Tufts and Rhode Island for the top spot throughout the race but had to settle for third (7:05.7).

Solidify lead

Williams jumped to a 344-207 point lead over MIT after the second of three days of competition. The Ephs boasted four individual first place performances and were represented in the finals (top 6 places) in all eight of the day's events.

Co-captain Aronson won the second event of the day, the 200 butterfly, in a school record time of 1:53.03. All-American Rob Sommer '84 was victorious in the 200 backstroke, swimming to a time of 1:55.36.

In the 200 IM, Sommer, the New England record holder and two-time defending champion, saw both of these marks fall to teammate Bill Couch '86. He eclipsed Sommer's mark of 1:56.8 with a first place time of 1:56.05 to set a pool school and

New England record. Sommer settled for second (1:57.65) while Aronson captured fourth at 1:58.65.

The Ephs final event winner of the day was All-American diver Jim Stockton '83, who out-pointed New England's best on the one meter board, collecting an impressive 446.9 points.

Williams also got solid point production out of the tandem of Bob Kirkpatrick (fourth at 2:12.74) and senior Dave Johnson (tenth at 2:14.85) in the 200 breaststroke.

Jeff Mills '84 splashed to a close third in the 200 freestyle, clocking in at 1:45.17.

The Ephs closed the day on a down note, as they could only manage second place in the 400 medley relay. The foursome of Andrew, Johnson, Peter Orphanos '85 and Mills covered the distance in an impressive 3:33.46.

Final-day blowout

Williams broke the meet open on the final day on the strength of Rob Sommer's backstroke victory and the freestyle relay team's win.

Sommer's victory time of 53.34 in the 100 backstroke makes him a favorite to win the event two weeks from now at Nationals. Andrew took third at 53.98 and sophomore John Peloso placed seventh, winning the consolation heat in 55.49.

The 400 freestyle relay team of Andrew, Mark Weeks '83, Mills and Sommer set school and New England records, winning the event in a quick 3:06.60. Samuelson said, "They swam a fantastic race, and could go even faster at Nationals."

Couch added to his collection of school records with a second place finish in the 500 freestyle (4:45.43).

Grammy awards

Carl Johnson nominated

by Sara R. Gross

Work by College jazz scholar Carl Johnson was nominated for 1983 Grammy Awards in two categories last month. Johnson is the associate curator of the Paul Whiteman Collection here on campus.

"An Experiment in Modern Music, Paul Whiteman at Aeolian Hall," released in 1982, was nominated for Best Historical Album of 1982 and Best Liner Notes of 1982. Although the record did not make it to the finals, Johnson said that he is "honored to have been nominated in two categories."

Johnson and the Paul Whiteman Collection are acknowledged on the record by Thornton Hagert, who compiled the recording and liner notes for the Smithsonian Institute in 1981.

The liner notes of the record are ten pages long and include photographs, some of which were reproduced from the College's Whiteman Collection. Although Johnson did not write the liner notes, he said that "they couldn't have been written without the full cooperation of the collection."

1924 re-creation

The record is a recreation of the 1924 Whiteman concert in Aeolian Hall which was the first American pops concert offering "a mixture of serious and non-serious music," a combination of jazz and symphonic music to a "broad cosmopolitan audience", pointed out Johnson. The climax of this was George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," commissioned by Whiteman for this concert.

Hagert spent three days at Williams doing research for the record and discussing the project with Johnson. This is not the only project to come out of the collection. Johnson pointed out that "the materials have been studied by scholars, and have indirectly resulted in the writing of books and many articles and papers." The scores and parts in the collection have also been used for concerts by professionals and students.

"Trail blazer"

In 1934 Whiteman was the "trail blazer of the Swing Era" and he had "the most versatile orchestra in America," playing dance music one night, popular music the next, and classical another night, Johnson said. Whiteman also played Broadway music and at Yale and West Point proms. Johnson said the orchestra never played at Williams's proms because the College could not afford the Orchestra's high fees.

All of this means that Carl Johnson will be kept busy with inquiries on Whiteman, a biography in progress, and a possible all-Whiteman concert in Carnegie Hall.

140 million

Students force divestment at other colleges

by Ned Ladd

Divestment has been, and continues to be, an important issue on other college campuses. Over the past six years, student and faculty activism has forced the divestment of over $140 million from college endowment funds. This sum is approximately equal to the entire endowment of Williams College.

The largest divestment so far occurred at Harvard University, where its trustees voted to withdraw $51 million from Citibank Corporation in February 1981. Sources at Harvard explained that the university was protesting a $250 million loan that Citibank extended to the government of South Africa.

Harvard established its divestment policy in 1978 following student protests. The Harvard Corporation, the school's governing body, declared it would review all corporations in the Harvard portfolio which had operations in South Africa on a case-by-case basis. In addition, all funds in banks which extend loans to the South African government would be withdrawn.

Other northeastern schools involved in divestment include Amherst, Wesleyan and Columbia. A total of $1.3 million has been divested by Amherst, while Wesleyan has sold $350,000 in stocks. In 1979, Columbia withdrew $2.7 million from three banks involved in South Africa.

Mass schools sell

The University of Massachusetts began to investigate companies in its portfolio as early as 1977. After a student rally, the university decided to sell all stocks from companies dealing in South Africa. The decision affected approximately $600,000 of its $2 million holdings.

In 1979, Boston University adopted a policy of "selective divestment." More than $6.6 million dollars in bank deposits and bonds was removed immediately and the Trustees began an investigation of the rest of BU's $78 million portfolio. The Trustees reported that companies making "no progress in advancing the lot of black South Africans," would be divested according to The New York Times.

The largest scale divestment occurred in Michigan where legislation passed last December requires all state schools to divest immediately. This affects approximately $60 million.

Colby College divested $750,000 worth of stock in 1980, including stock in Dresser Industries. Dresser is currently under investigation by the Williams Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility for noncompliance with the Sullivan Principles.

Williams itself has divested from one company, Newmont Mining in 1981. It did so after Newmont refused to answer

Switch-hitters lead college

by Dan Keating

The teacher administrator at Williams uses the experience of the classroom while running the school. While the people in these positions acknowledge the advantages, the increasing complexity of running the school puts burdens on the people and the system.

The college has teacher administrators in the positions of Dean of the College, Associate Dean of the College, Dean of Faculty, Provost, Associate Provost and Director of the Computer Center. The roles of Dean of the College, Dean of the Faculty and Provost are all rotating positions which are taken for temporary terms by senior members of the faculty.

"As a faculty member, I prefer to have academic administrators who return to the faculty full-time," says Francis Oakley, Professor of History and Dean of the Faculty. "The two advantages are that the people running the system have a sensitivity to academic values, and people return to teaching with a feeling about the college as a whole."

No quality lost

"The disadvantage of our system is the dislocation," notes Chandler. "It is not quality that is lost, it is continuity. I also worry about the volume of work that these people have."

Director of the Computer Center Larry Wright has felt that volume. "There was a period a couple years ago when I was teaching and handling both student and administrative computing. I was swamped. It just about killed me."

"The problem can be the sheer burden of the jobs," says Oakley. "Williams tries to keep the administration small and lean, but we're near the limit. We might have to add. Some people might not like that."

Chemistry Professor and College Provost J. Hodge Markgraf, more than any other, feels the pinch of the combined workload. "I'm forgiven eight hours of lab a week and I pick up 50 hours of provostwork," he says.

Monster workload

His job as provost includes oversight and control of virtually everything related to the academic nature of the school. He handles long-range financial planning for the college and sets the budgets for every department, office, project and facility on campus—then monitors them.

The list of committees on which he serves is so long that he must write them down while listing them to keep track. He is on the CAP, CCPC, ACSR, FATF, various construction committees and others.

While not in committee, he oversees the personnel and policy of the Admissions Office, Financial Aid Office, the libraries, Bronfman Science Center, Athletics Department, the Center for Environmental Studies and others.

"Kill for those things"

He also assigns faculty offices. "Who gets the corner office in Stetson?" he asks. "People kill for those things."

Although aided by Associate Provost David Booth, Markgraf thinks the provost job has Credit due

Baxter Hall was enlivened last Sunday by a group of women brandishing bright yellow t-shirts proclaiming, "Once is not enough." It certainly wasn't: the women's swim team, hot on the heels of last year's Division III national title, did it again last week.

Swimmers rarely get the recognition they deserve. Swimming is not a heavily-attended spectator sport at Williams, and women swimmers are further saddled with the lack of attention to women's sports in general. But they train hard—Winter Study 6:00 a.m. workouts were only the first of two each day—and they succeed. For two years they have not lost a single meet.

Ironically, the team's consistent success has made it more difficult for them to receive credit. Headlines like "Swim team wins again" are as surprising as the rising of the sun, so because we expect stellar performances from the team, we rarely congratulate them when they deliver. Hopefully a national title will bring the recognition they merit.

The men's team, having just won their fifth straight New England title, will seek their first national championship this week, and they deserve the best of luck.

One way to recognize these teams' contribution to the College would be to provide them with adequate space. Apparently the College agrees, and is moving to upgrade its indoor athletic facilities, including the construction of a larger pool. This would not only benefit the swim teams, but encourage spectators and recreational swimming.

LETTERS

Pigeon hole

To the editor:

Jeff Calkins' letter about the recent GPU-Op-ed piece begs response. Apparently, he finds it unethical for the Record to print manifestos written anonymously.

On one hand, Calkins has a valid objection. It would be irresponsible for the paper to make a habit of running unsigned submissions for the Op-ed page. On the other hand, his argument overlooks the fact that at Williams many individuals run the risk of being stereotyped. Who wants to be known as the Campus Fag?

When someone publically reveals his or her homosexuality, that person's character is quickly deflated to one dimension, and people come to identify him or her on that basis alone.

In a way, the desire to see individuals' names attached to the GPU statement resembles not so much the determination to get the facts as the eagerness to pigeonhole others.

Something amiss

To the editor:

I have recently written in another forum my reflections on the nature and origins of the Residential House transfer policy problems that are currently churning the campus, as well as certain suggestions for a broad scale effort to resolve the underlying issue. Since then, your February 8 issue has come to hand, and its content ("CC, HOUSING COMMITTEE CLASH") emphasizes the sense of something seriously amiss in Billsville, correction of which will require sustained effort, coupled with an ability to take some heat.

The current campus debate on transfer policy supports the observation that those who neglect the study of the past are destined to relive the mistakes of the past. The root of the transfer problem is certainly not the limitation of transfer groups to two. Thinking so means that increase of that number to, say, three instead of two, or four instead of three, runs the risk of being greeted as a great victory of principle, whereas all that has really been accomplished is to shift the rub to a different digit.

Surely the core issue is the degree of power students should have in setting their own social and living arrangements, relative to the Administration's role in the process. Prior to 1962 the Administration, always the ultimate authority, wisely confined itself to oversight, while the students held the primary role. They chose fraternities at the time, by a vast majority. Their contentment was reflected in the fact that the fraternity houses, while showing remarkable capacity for change to meet evolving values and campus needs, were nonetheless highly stable social structures, requiring neither policy pronouncements of the Trustees nor labor of the Deans "to maintain... stability."

Nonetheless, in clear violation of student preference and Alumni sentiment this system was overturned in 1962 by vote of the Trustees at the prodding of the Administration, and replaced by a centrally directed system. Poppa knows best... Thus the present system is one where, despite the paraphernalia of democracy designed to make the results more palatable to the student body (including committees with participation of the governed, albeit carefully calibrated to ensure impotence), real control is tightly held by the Administration, who exercises it in its own self-interest and in the interests of advancing its own monochromatic social theories, regardless of student desires. In this setting the Administration's purpose is to prevent campus sentiment from coalescing around soul-satisfying principles, such as free association on the one hand and diversity of social structures on the other, as they would be likely to do left to their own devices, since most students are themselves products of a free and diverse society.

Until this central issue is addressed and openly discussed, preferably with participation of all Williams communities—Trustees, Administration/Faculty, Students, and Alumni—debate of transfer policy will have roughly the relevance to the real problem as did rearranging the chairs of the deck of the Titanic. If campus authorities elect to stonewall such discussion and continue to rely, as they have to date,

Who needs South Africa's $ anyway?

by Ken Irvine

Opponents of divestment have claimed that such action would hurt the College financially and thereby interfere with the College's primary role—education. While the possibility of financial loss should not automatically preclude divestment, some misconceptions on this campus about the supposed costs of divestment need to be cleared up.

They point out that a significant percentage of the largest American firms are involved in South Africa. But this fact does not prove that portfolio risk would be significantly increased by divestment. The proper way to assess the financial costs of divestment is to do a scientific analysis using techniques of modern portfolio theory. Such an analysis contrasted it with the risk of a portfolio comprised of the S & P 500 less those companies involved in South Africa. He concluded that "the effect on portfolio risk of excluding the companies operating in South Africa, the 150 to 200 major corporations, is, contrary to intuition, not particularly important." Professor Rudd undertook his study not because of particular ideological bias but simply because "the problem makes an interesting case study of the tools and techniques of modern portfolio theory."

Robert Zervin, Chief Economist and Vice President of U.S. Trust, conducted a study on behalf of the State of Connecticut in which he compared for the period 1972-1981, the performance of the S & P 500 versus that of the S & P 500 less 143 companies involved in South Africa. He found that the "sanitized" portfolio actually outperformed the complete S & P 500, although by a statistically insignificant amount. This study is of particular interest to the Williams community because U.S. Trust is one of the college's two investment firms. Before Zervin completed his study, he was unsure as to whether total divestment could be accomplished without any financial risk; but after completing the study he concluded that "the diversification achieved by owning only the sanitized portfolio eliminates, for all practical purposes, all of the risk which diversification can extinguish."

Divestment is not "moral masturbation," but is rather an action which can help bring about change in South Africa.

Other organizations and individuals in the business world have studied the "costs" of divestment as well. Chemical Bank analysts decided that "... one can do as well in a portfolio with no involvement in South Africa." Lawrence Litwak of Community Economics Inc. determined that the financial costs of divestment are insignificant. He conducted his study by examining whether divestment would allow for sufficient diversification, achievement of the desired risk level, selection of above average stocks and bonds, and minimization of transaction and management costs.

Of the numerous schools, churches, states, cities, unions, and other institutions which have divested, none have reported any financial loss; in fact, some have reported a financial gain due to divestment.

The administration has also claimed that the college's financial health would be jeopardized by divestment because the college would then, in order to be consistent, have to refuse gifts from corporations involved in South Africa. Such logic is faulty primarily because it fails to realize that divestment is not "moral masturbation," but is rather an action which can help bring about change in South Africa. By divesting, Williams can register its moral opposition to apartheid and take a practical step towards ending apartheid without incurring financial loss.

Eds. note: R. G. Schwartz, Vice-President of Shearson American Express, has been involved in investments since the 1960's. Mr. Schwartz will lecture at Williams on the economics of divestment on Wednesday, March 16.

Incorrect

To the editor:

I am sorry to have to report that two of the statements in your brief article (Record, February 15, 1983, page 4) on textbook prices were incorrect, and that others need additional interpretation. In particular, it is not true that "textbooks will be priced at no more than 27 percent over the invoice price," or that "Dewey's prices are 'at the low end of the national norms for college bookstores.'"

In fact, the prices are 7 percent over the "list price," which is the price at which almost all bookstores sell textbooks. The 27 percent cited is at least in part the rate of the discount from the list price, rather than a markup. To give an example with round numbers, textbooks are almost always billed to bookstores at a 20 percent "discount" from the list price. That is, a book whose list price is $25 is billed at $20. But to get back from the invoice price of $20 to the list price of $25, one must add $5, which is 25 percent of the invoice price of $20. Thus a 20 percent discount corresponds to a 25 percent markup.

It is my understanding that the bookstore is selling at 7 percent above list. Thus a book whose list price is $25 is selling for $26.75. This is a 33.7 percent markup from the invoice price of $20.

Now the bookstore must pay all kinds of expenses out of this markup, including transportation costs. But it must be remembered that their share is a percentage of the cost of the book, so that their share has been rising as the prices of books have risen. If the average price of a textbook has risen from $20 to $25 over the last couple of years, then the bookstore share has risen by the same percentage.

The 7 percent rise above list apparently was chosen because a survey has shown that the average costs of a bookstore are 27 percent of gross sales. But it should be remembered that textbooks are sold for limited periods of time, and professors specify in advance what books are needed and about how many. So many of the uncertainties of the trade book business are lessened. Further, the need to buy textbooks brings students into the bookstore, where they often purchase other items. Few other bookstores try to recapture the same 27 percent on textbooks. And though the local bookstore is asking to cover the 27 percent on textbooks, they are not offering to cut their prices on other books so that they have the equivalent of a 27 percent discount there too. Remember: whenever there is an average of numbers that are not all the same, some amounts must be under the average while others are over.

As for the comparison with other schools, I am advised that only a small percentage of other bookstores charge above the list price. At Harvard, indeed, the Coop gives a patronage rebate that was 9.7 percent this year, giving Harvard students books for 9.7 percent under list, while students here buy books for 7 percent over list. One year I ordered the books for a course from the North Adams State bookstore, which was glad to sell them for the list price, whereas they would have been 7 percent more in Williamstown. I know that the last thing that

Williams wants is to go into the bookstore business, and I understand that some colleges either run bookstores or subsidize bookstores. But nevertheless, it is important that everybody understands the finances involved rather than merely accepting prices for textbooks that are above national norms.

As for the final paragraph of your article, it is certainly dangerous to give the impression that Williams College condones copying of copyrighted material at a time when a major suit against NYU is pending on a similar charge. Neither is routine copying "only parts of books" legally acceptable, without specific permission of the publishers.

As for the "completely copied textbook" for Physics 202, it is an out-of-print text published in 1967. Though a 1967 text may be appropriate for some courses, I am sure that students would not want to learn all their material from books from 16 years ago. Further, the professor in charge of the course has received permission from the publisher to copy the text, but the publisher has advised him that this would be the last year for which permission is granted.

Official: EPA a circus

by Chris Howlett

Two days before last Wednesday's resignation of Anne Gorsuch Burford as administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, former EPA employee Toby Clark described the state of environmental policy under the Reagan administration as "a classical Washington circus."

The circus began, said Clark, who was a member of EPA's office of pesticides and toxic substances for 17 years, with the firing of Rita Lavelle several weeks ago for apparent conflict of interest in toxic waste cleanup programs.

At the same time, Congress demanded certain documents relevant to toxic waste which Burford refused to turn over. Burford was held in contempt and several of the documents unaccountably found their way to the agency's paper shredder.

At present no fewer than six congressional committees are investigating the EPA. Their prime suspicion is that the agency has been favoring industry to the detriment of waste cleanup.

Clark himself said in the 1982 State of the Environment report published by The Conservation Foundation, "it appears as if industry is becoming the prime client of the administration." A memo to the same effect found recently at EPA caused extreme uproar.

However, stressed Clark, "all these things that are going on now are irrelevant to the basic issues." In particular the personnel changes that weakened and undermined the agency.

"The people that came to EPA were astoundingly incompetent. They didn't know the laws, they'd never managed anything—they weren't competent to manage a third-grade baseball team," he complained. Many had no experience in dealing with Congress, he added, and no idea of ethics or compromise.

In addition the EPA, as well as the departments of Interior and Energy, is being seriously damaged by budget cuts, Clark said. The number of agency employees diminishes as paperwork increases, he explained.

He claimed that scientific and policy analysis as well as enforcement has been reduced tremendously. Meanwhile, "the states are getting all the responsibility, but their grants are getting cut by 50 percent or more," he said.

Clark warned that the two areas most likely to feel the effects of personnel and budget reductions are pesticides and hazardous wastes. With fewer resources for scientific analysis, these division are, according to Clark, basically using a rubber stamp, approving any substance which comes along, often on industry evaluations alone.

However, "the people in the country still want environmental policy; all the polls are coming up with this," he said. For this reason the environment has been a non-partisan issue which remained steady throughout the past three administrations. "Until the present one, that is," he said.

Clark expressed pessimism about the future of the EPA and of environmental policy, predicting that if anyone wants to get sound programs going again it will be extremely difficult.

its inquiries concerning Newmont's operations in South Africa, not because of those operations per se. The total value of the stock sold was $700,000.

The vast majority of private colleges who have divested have adopted policies calling for reviews of corporations on a case-by-case basis. Many use the Sullivan Principles as a guideline.

Student protests have been common on many northeastern campuses but very few have been effective in gaining total divestment. Most college administrations have responded by investigating their portfolios and divesting only as a last resort.

become too much for a teacher administrator. "The complexity of this office is such that I would suggest that consideration be given to having no teaching assignments while service as provost," he says.

"But I still want faculty brought into these positions rather than a professional administrator," he adds, "because, having worked here, you know the people and can judge the situation better."

"Critical roots" "Another advantage is that teaching helps keep administrators alive intellectually," adds Associate Dean and Mathematics lecturer Cris Roosenraad.

"Without teaching, you lose critical roots into the academic process," says Dave Booth, who teaches political science and directs administrative computing as well as serving as associate provost.

"The opportunity to teach makes me a more effective administrator," maintains Mathematics Professor Neil Grabois, the closest thing the faculty has to a utility infielder.

Utility man

Grabois has served as Dean of the College, Dean of the Faculty and Provost. He is returning to Provost this summer when Markgraf steps down.

Williams uses the teacher administrator system in contrast to having professional administrators, the policy of many large schools and even some small ones such as Amherst. Amherst's only teacher administrator position is Dean of Freshmen, which is rotated among senior faculty.

Current Amherst Dean of Freshmen John Petropoulos works with all professional administrators. "They are pros in a way that I am not," he says. "But we are not as different as one might imagine."

People at Williams do not seem interested in changing, however. "Some people think an adversary relationship sharpens the roles of faculty and administrators, but that's too theoretical for me. I haven't seen it work well at other schools," explains Oakley. "I would hope that Williams does not change."

As Markgraf says when discussing his provost work, two independent studies students, two senior thesis students and regular teaching: "It's running me ragged and I love it."

Red scare

Prof tests academic freedom

by Amy Doherty

During the Communist witch-hunts in the middle of this century, academic fashion was severely threatened in institutions all over the country. Williams was deeply involved in the struggle to maintain academic freedom, and many educators believe that Williams set a precedent for the rest of the nation in forcefully asserting the necessity to preserve the faculty's right to express opinions freely.

Senator Joe McCarthy had recently captured the nation's attention with his dramatic claims of Communist infiltration of the government when Williams Political Science professor Fred Schuman's name appeared in the headlines on the front page of the March 15, 1950 New York Times. The occasion marked one of several times that McCarthy accused Schuman of involvement with Communist-front organizations.

Back in Williamstown, the professor was not overly disturbed. During his Political Science class he dismissed the allegations as "the lowest level of imbecility" and he issued a denial to the New York Times. By this time he had already weathered a series of investigations by the House Appropriations Committee, the House Un-American Activities, the U.S. Civil Service Commission, and the FBI.

Antagonistic Alumni

Professor Schuman continued to express his controversial views and to actively participate in politics, much to the consternation of many of the alumni of the College. These alumni exerted enormous pressure during the obsessive anti-Communist decades of the '40's and '50's on President James Phinney Baxter to get rid of Schuman. Baxter referred to Schuman as his "hair shirt" but he stoutly protected the professor's rights to express his opinions.

"I am sorry he says these things," he told the alumni who requested Schuman's dismissal, "but I have to defend his right to say them." It was reported that at one point an alumnus offered to give the college $1 million if Baxter would get rid of Schuman. Baxter refused. The loss of academic freedom, he explained, was too great a price to pay.

"Red" Fred

This "hair shirt" of Baxter's was teasingly nicknamed "Red" Fred by the students. He was an extremely popular professor who interspersed his "fantastic" lectures with quotes from Alice in Wonderland. Ralph Renzi, who was Schuman's student in the early forties, considers the "Psychology of Modern Politics" class he took from Schuman as one of his most fascinating courses at the college.

One of Schuman's most vocal accusers was Williams graduate William Loeb, the ultra-conservative owner of the influential and equally conservative New Hampshire paper, Long-time political science professor Fred Schuman escaped the wrath of Senator Joseph McCarthy in the 50's.

the Manchester Daily Union. Loeb wrote a letter to the Alumni Review in 1956 in which he revived earlier imputations that Schuman was involved in Communist organizations. Loeb would not contribute any more money to the college, he wrote, because of Schuman's presence on the Williams Faculty.

Although there were alumni who agreed wholeheartedly with Loeb's sentiments, there were others who did not. The next few Alumni Reviews published a number of letters from alumni who pointed out the errors in Loeb's argument. (In his letter, Loeb had misquoted Schuman), and who reaffirmed the importance of allowing the "faculty to arrive at truths which differ from and even conflict with the 'revealed truth' of rich alumni."

Academic Freedom

A particularly sore point with many alumni was Schuman's endorsement in the late '40's of former Vice-President Henry Wallace's campaign for the Presidency. Wallace ran on an independent ticket, and Schuman was attracted by his left-of-center position and his foreign policy stand, and particularly by his call for a workable U.N.

Schuman's active support of Wallace put President Baxter on the spot once again. His situation was epitomized by an incident in Pittsfield at the Hotel Sheraton, where the President valiantly defended Schuman's academic freedom before a group of alumni who were calling for the professor's removal. "Academic freedom is the principle difference between the Russian educational system and our own," he told the angry crowd. While Baxter spoke, faint rumblings came from the adjacent ballroom. Schuman was giving a campaign speech on the other side of the wall in support of Wallace.

Schuman continued to teach at Williams until 1968, when he retired. He proved to be sometimes just as prickly for President Sawyer to handle as he had been for Baxter, who had left Williams in 1961. Schuman was highly critical of the Johnson Administration and of the Vietnam War. He believed that "the official line that Americans were killing and being killed for 'peace' and 'freedom' was a myth," and that "LBJ's war was without precedent since Hitler's Reich."

President Johnson

When Mrs. Lyndon Johnson was invited to the opening ceremonies of the Center for Environmental Studies and presented with an honorary degree, Schuman boycotted the event and in an open letter to President Sawyer he declared that President Johnson was "a pathological liar . . . a dishonest demagogue, a megalomaniac militarist, a lawless aggressor and a mass murderer."

The college quickly issued a statement claiming that Schuman's views did not "represent the college, its trustees, or its faculty." A college spokesman also carefully noted that Professor Schuman had dissented "from the last four administrations."

Schuman died in 1981. What he would think of the current administration in Washington can only be guessed, although it is certain that he would have voiced those opinions loud and clear.

Avant garde art envelopes viewer

by Kristen Engberg

An audience of approximately 30 students and faculty entered a designated room in Goodrich Hall last Thursday and were immediately encircled by and pressed against various components of a unusual kind of art: "performance art."

Nada Velimirovic '83 has included Williams in her exploration of this new medium of expression through her work "The Build-up of a Silent Scream."

The walls were ringed by one charcoal line, smudged vertically at varying points, almost like blips on an electrocardiograph readout. This sensation was heightened by a cassette playing as the audience entered: a mesmerizing rhythm of an ever-changing heart beat.

Scattered on the floor were seed-like forms or pods, some, made of earthtone clay, were arranged in a wave-like pattern; others, made of red papier-mache, were more solidly grouped at the peak of the wave. All of these shapes were open, seemingly having given birth, some violent in their explosion of several layers of tissue, others carefully and cleanly split open.

A slide machine had been set up at knee level, projecting small images onto a door covered with electric blue drapery, which gently waved as the performance progressed. The eye most immediately was drawn to the corner of the space, however, where a large hammock-like shape was suspended close to the ceiling by two stony hooks. The shape was wrapped in netting and copper wire and moved almost unperceptibly, implying that someone was encased inside.

As the introduction "ORIGINAL" flashed onto the screen, the tape began, backed by the ever-present heartbeat. The verbal and visual images recounted a journey, a landscape dreamed of in childhood but only now practically experienced for the first time: The darkly paneled plush railroad cars of the past provided a secure vehicle from which the traveller shifted and lurched into the semi-conscious state of broken understanding. Her reactions to the events during the journey are static.

As the tape shut off, the story seemed suspended, unresolved; the audience waited breathless, in silence. Attention was fixed on the suspended shape, which now could be seen as the railroad car, the womb, the shapes on the floor. The audience became increasingly involved in the scene as no visible action arrived; people began to shift and cough. Several stood up decisively and left, banging doors behind them.

Others looked at one another uneasily and the skittish whispering grew into a distinct buzz. "Do you think she's still breathing in there?" "When is she going to burst out?" She did not. The journey, the progressive excitement of expectation. The build-up of a silent scream.

The new Student League for the Arts and the art department have shown interest in developing of performance art and are considering bringing in guest "artists" for workshops and performances in the future.

Ennis-Dwyer delights crowd

by Greg Capaldini

An SRO crowd packed into Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall Friday night to hear pianist Paula Ennis-Dwyer's solo recital.

Featured on this weekend's program was the premiere of Dear Christina by Daniel Gutwein, one of Ennis-Dwyer's colleagues at the College Music Department. The work was completed a year ago, and written especially for Ennis-Dwyer, who occasionally provided suggestions on keyboard writing.

Dear Christina is a powerfully expressionistic work combining abstract and traditional elements. It is intended to depict the emotions of a woman reading a hasty abandonment note from her husband.

Ennis-Dwyer responded fully to both the musical and theatrical demands of the score. At one point she seemed to portray Christina.

The rest of the program contained more conventional fare. Chopin's Ballade in F minor was visceral and yet well-shaped, with sudden contrasts meticulously juxtaposed. In contrast, Rachmaninoff's Preludes in G minor and in G-sharp minor were given an urbane nuance which, though appropriate, worked better with the second, less familiar selection.

Brahms' Paganini Variations (Book 2) were written in 1866, the complex rhythms and pungent counterpoint make them sound considerably more modern. Flendishly awkward, as is much of Brahms, they nonetheless inspired Ennis-Dwyer to deliver her strongest interpretation of the evening.

Ennis-Dwyer threw herself a curve at the beginning of the evening with Beethoven's Sbagatelles, Op. 126. These pieces are simply impossible to ingratiate to a general audience. As with many of Beethoven's late works, the stark, moody atmosphere is initially quite forbidding. One must appreciate the vagaries of the Ninth Symphony, the late string quartets, and the last few piano sonatas in order to like these miniatures. Otherwise, the sudden improvisatory elements, unplanistic textures, and fleeting moods seem merely baroque. Some people thought Ennis-Dwyer was underplaying Beethoven's lushness. If anything, her interpretation was a bit too voluptuous; these pieces can use a more detached, deadpan rendering.

An article which appeared in the January 28 edition of The Boston Globe described the government of South Africa as "the largest single spender on lobbying in Massachusetts last year" and pointed to documents filed in the Massachusetts secretary of state's office which indicated that $300,000 had been

"WAAC fact" disputed

by Lucy Lytle

In a "fact sheet" distributed to students last week, the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition cited the Boston Globe in reporting that $300,000 was spent in Massachusetts last year in an unsuccessful attempt by the government of South Africa to defeat divestiture legislation. But the law firm that lobbied against the bill claimed it spent only $1500.

A misunderstanding about the correct way to fill out a lobbyist's expenditure form has been cited as the cause of the controversy.

James W. Symington of Smathers, Symington, and Herlong, explained that "a misunderstanding on the firm's part about how to fill out a lobbyist's expenditure form and its failure to return reporters' calls led to the confusion about the amount." He maintained that lobbyist Stephen F. Riley, an attorney with the firm, did no more than fifteen hours of lobbying against the bill.

The following day, however, another article in the Globe reported that the Washington law firm representing the government of South Africa insisted that only $1500 was actually spent on lobbying in Massachusetts.

According to the Globe, Riley explained that he listed the $300,000 figure because "it was not proper for us to say what percentage [of the retainer] was allocated for Massachusetts.

Fencers qualify for championship

Gordon Leeds '86 and Chris Howlett '85 have qualified for the North Atlantic Sectional Championships in fencing to be held at RPI in Troy, N.Y., in May. Davide Cervone '84 is also eligible to compete in the sectionals as first alternate in his classification.

All three fencers competed last weekend in the sectional qualifiers of the Hudson-Berkshire Division of the U.S. Fencing Association, held at Columbia-Greene Community College near Hudson, N.Y. The division includes fencers of all ages and covers most of Western Massachusetts and Eastern New York State.

Leeds finished third overall in the men's foil classification, while Cervone placed twelfth and was designated first alternate. Howlett took sixth place in the women's foil. Epee and sabre rounds were also held at the qualifiers although no Williams fencers competed.

In the sectional championships, the fencers will face competition from all over New England, including very strong clubs from Boston and New York City.

evening, night, and next morning by totaling 235 miles to place second among Williams teams. The Striders of the Purple Valley, the College faculty team, pulled in 215 miles, but were not scored officially.

Unofficial teams (those with more than ten runners competing, often including guest milers) were Spencer-Brooks (216), the Berkshire Quad Squad (212), Dodd and Pratt houses (209), the Retreads (204), the Christian Fellowship (198), the Theater group (197), and the BSU (150) representatives.

There were several different levels of pain and dedication involved in participation for these teams. The organizers often ran more than 20 miles—the spectator-participants, as few as one or two. "I enjoyed playing basketball, frisbee, and just hanging out more than running," noted a fifth grader.

Spectator Jane Pepko commented, "It's gratifying just to see all the kids down here with their sleeping beds pitched for the night." Music blared, the college rock band "Visible Means" provided the evening's entertainment and the gala spectacle finally sprinted to its finish to the loudspeaker tunes of "Charlots of Fire" and "Rocky."

The runners' reactions to the race varied after an entire day of motion. "It's great to see track clubs, campus and community groups all doing something together for the common cause," mentioned a South Shore strider as his team raced ahead. Yet one of the back of the pack runners was not so enthusiastic. "I've just run 26 miles and I'm tired," was his comment.

office, asserted that "We met with Mr. Riley several times. He was aware that a portion or percentage of that money spent here could have been reported."

Despite the controversy over the figures involved, K. Lyman Casey '83 of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, chose to cite the $300,000 figure in the WAAC fact sheet.

In an interview last Sunday, Casey said he got his information from the January 29 issue of The Washington Post and referred to conversations he held with Massachusetts State Senator Jack Backman and representatives for the American Committee on Africa (ACOA) to support his belief in the validity of the $300,000 figure.

According to the Post, the South African Embassy paid $300,000 to Smathers, Symington and Herlong to lobby "against a Massachusetts stock divestiture law that cuts into trade with South Africa," but Symington again maintained that only "about $1500 was spent working on the Massachusetts measure."

"The people I spoke with stressed that the retaining fee argument was a technicality because the law firm had been paid $300,000 for the purpose of lobbying against divestiture, and the Massachusetts divestiture bill was a prime piece of legislation of this type at the time it was passed," Casey explained.

Casey noted that there did seem to be controversy surrounding the fact but noted that neither the Globe or the Post printed a retraction of the original story, only news articles describing the law firm's response.

"I made the decision to go ahead with the fact and I take responsibility for that. This should not be confused with an acceptance of the $1500 figure," he concluded. "I believe that to be a hasty retreat on the part of the firm."

CUSTOMER INFORMATION FROM GENERAL MOTORS

HOW TO STOP DRUNK DRIVING.

TOUGH LAWS MAY HELP, BUT WE ALSO NEED TO CHANGE OUR ATTITUDES.

Do you know anyone who's in favor of drunk driving? Not likely. And yet many people have driven when under the influence of alcohol, or will do it at least once.

Take a look at some chilling statistics. One out of every two of us will be involved in an alcohol-related accident sometime during our lives. Last year alone, more than 25,000 people died in such accidents; an additional 1.5 million were injured. A disproportionate number of those killed were under 25 years old.

The cost of drunk-driving accidents amounts to over $24 billion every year in property damage, loss of wages, medical and legal fees. Not to mention the emotional pain to the victims' families and friends.

What is being done about it? Over the years, many different approaches have been tried: mandatory jail sentences, stiff fines, license suspensions, alcohol-rehabilitation programs, and higher drinking-age laws.

No single countermeasure seems to do the job by itself. Tough laws, unless they are supported by equally tough enforcement and the certainty of punishment, don't seem to work over the long run. Even with all three, probably the most effective single thing we could do is to examine our own attitudes about drinking and driving.

How much do you really know about the effects of alcohol? The facts may surprise you. For example, a lot of people believe that beer and wine are less intoxicating than other drinks. In fact, a can of beer, a glass of wine, or a 1½-ounce drink of 86-proof liquor are all about equally intoxicating.

A lot of factors determine how quickly you'll get drunk. Your body weight, how much you've had to eat, and the number of drinks you have over a specified time all make a difference. That's why it's so hard to know when you've had too much.

A common legal definition of intoxication is .10 percent blood-alcohol level. For a 160 lb. person, it takes about four or five drinks in the first two hours on an empty stomach to reach the legal limit, compared with three or four drinks in the first two hours for someone who weighs 120 lbs. Of course, your judgment and reaction time will be impaired well before you reach the legal limit.

At General Motors, we're very concerned about the effects of drinking on driving. Over a decade ago, we developed a device that tests a driver's reflexes and motor responses before starting the car. The Department of Transportation is now field-testing that device.

We also strongly favor all efforts that focus attention on the problem such as the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving. Make sure your friends and family know the facts about mixing alcohol and driving. Drunk driving will only stop when we all decide it isn't socially acceptable. Be self-confident enough to admit when you've had too much to drink to drive safely.

Meanwhile, seat belts are still your best protection against drunk drivers. They can't prevent an accident, but they will help save your life during a serious crash—whatever the cause.

Second straight Swimmers win National Title

Led by triple winners Kim Eckrich '85 and Liz Jex '83 (who had a part in five national records), the women's swim team outdistanced second place Hamline College of St. Paul, Minnesota by a score of 330.5 to 286 for their second consecutive National Championship. Williams also accomplished the feat of winning all five relays in National record time.

The Ephs jumped to an early lead, as the 200 medley relay quartet Peg Thoman '85, Eckrich, Kathy Kirmayer '86, and Katie Hudner '83 left the field behind and won the event in a National Record 1:51.67.

Eckrich followed that win with her 50 breaststroke win: her time of 31.14 was just short of the National Record (30.97) which she established last year.

Dominant 50

The Ephs placed three swimmers in the top twelve in the 50 freestyle. Jex won the event in a time of 24.44 (tied with Catherine Lyons of Ithaca College) which was good enough to break her own National Record (24.60). Co-captain Hudner splashed to a close seventh (24.81) while Kirmayer coasted to a disappointing twelfth.

Eckrich followed up her two opening day firsts with a second in the 200 individual medley. Her time of 2:11.63 was fast enough to eclipse the National Record she set last year, but was not enough for first.

Lead shrinks

Dina Esposito '83, this year's New England Champion on the one meter board was able to capture tenth in the event Nationally, as she tallied 319.7 points.

The Ephs concluded the day as they started; with a relay victory. The foursome of Jex, Hudner Sue Knapp '85 and Rachel Stauffer '85 won the 800 freestyle relay (7:54.68).

Friday's action featured six NCAA Division III Records in seven events. The Ephs, however, were only able to capture two, with victories in the 200 freestyle relay and the 400 medley relay.

Williams saw their 21 point first day lead shrink to a closer 216.5 to 206 over Hamline College of St. Paul, Minnesota.

Mentor Carl Samuelson congratulates co-captain Katie Hudner '83. The women's swim team won the Division III Nationals Saturday. (Lane)

The 200 freestyle relay team of Knapp, Hudner, Jex and Kirmayer built on the Ephs first day lead by winning the first event of the day in a Record 1:38.32.

The Ephs lost points because they didn't score in the 50 butterfly or 400 individual medley. Kirmayer broke the scoring drought with a seventh place finish in the 100 backstroke.

Eckrich added her second individual victory of the meet, winning the 100 breaststroke in a time of 1:08.7. She failed, however, to break her own record of 1:06.9 established last year.

Co-captain Jex, winner of the 200 freestyle at last year's meet, was only able to salvage third in the event, clocking in at 1:56.53.

Maintain lead

The Ephs were able to maintain their lead on the strength of a victory in the final event of the day. The quartet of Kirmayer, Eckrich, Jex, and Hudner took the 400 medley relay in a National record time of 4:04.89.

The 100 freestyle tandem of Jex and Hudner opened the third day's competition by rolling to first and third place finishes respectively. Jex's time of 52.98 was quick enough to smash her own National Record, and Hudner was not far behind at 53.82.

Break away on third day

Kirmayer picked up important points with a third place showing in the 50 backstroke with her time of 28.25.

Eckrich concluded her domination of the breaststroking events by winning the 200 breaststroke in 2:27.36. She won all three events last year also.

Jex ended her incredible Williams swimming career by outracing Eckrich in the 100 individual medley. Her time of 1:01.16 was merely .16 seconds off the National record established by Eckrich last year.

The 400 freestyle relay team of Sue Knapp, Rachel Stauffer, Hudner and Kirmayer ended the Meet in commanding style, blazing to a fifth Williams College relay victory, covering the distance in a time of 3:37.61.

Skiers race to tenth

by John Clayton

Placing four Ephs on the All-American second team, the men's and women's ski teams raced to an overall tenth place finish in the NCAA Championships held at Montana State last week.

"I was very pleased," said Head Coach Bud Fisher. "I thought we were successful. Without a men's cross-country team, we knew we couldn't do better than ninth; and we feared UNH and St. Lawrence. We beat St. Lawrence to finish tenth.

"We were ninth until the last day, when the UNH relay team collected enough points to pass us, as we had no X-C relay team," said Fisher.

Crawford Lyons '84, seventh in the slalom, Heidi Knight '86, sixth in the giant slalom, John Pier '85, eighth in the GS, and Ellen Chandler '83, ninth in the cross-country, all made the All-American second team.

Sacrifice body

The men's giant slalom was the Ephs' most successful event, as Williams finished in sixth place.

"Crawford made a big mistake and finished 25th in the first run," said Fisher. "Pier was 15th, Tim Hill was 28th, and Tuck Collins nearly fell. "But the second run was incredible. John sacrificed his body to finish fourth. He was beating on himself, the way poles were flying across his body. Crawford also had an excellent run to take 15th overall, and Hill finished 28th."

Knight first

In the women's GS, Knight tied for first on the first run, but made one mistake on the second run that lowered her to sixth place overall, but first among Eastern skiers. Kate Knopp '85 placed 20th.

In the men's slalom, Lyons took seventh while Pier was 18th. "I was very pleased with the way Crawford skied," Fisher said, "and John did pretty well also." Although Knight fell, Knopp took 25th in the women's slalom.

Chandler finished ninth in the cross country individuals, while Sarah Bates '85 was 32nd.

The women were ninth overall, while the men were tenth. Utah won the 18-team event, followed by Vermont and Wyoming. Williams finished fifth out of the Eastern teams.

Sunday Night League

Black Magic wins

by Dave Woodworth

Black Magic won the Sunday Night League basketball championship with a 79-72 win over Optional Heartbeat in the finals.

The victors blew out to a 17-point halftime lead and never looked back, although the Heartbeat closed the gap from the free-throw line to make a game of it.

The inside play of Seth Toney '84 (26 points) was the key to the contest for Black Magic, off-setting the torrid shooting of Heartbeat's John Hayes '85.

Black Magic advanced to the Championship game by the narrowest of margins, eking out a 39-38 win over Short and Slow. Short and Slow had a 15 point lead at one point in the first half, behind the shooting of Rob Coakley '86, but had difficulty dealing with Magic's extended zone and saw the margin evaporate.

Optional Heartbeat ousted Comfortably Numb in their semifinal by a 61-54 count. Depth proved to be a factor in this game, as Numb had been forced to play a preliminary round game earlier in the evening (a 32-28 victory over the Slackers) and had just run out of steam.

Hayes and Lee Berinstein '85 led Heartbeat to the victory, while Mike Morris '85 and Dennis Dunne '86 were high men for Comfortably Numb.

Ten teams competed in the league, which started at the beginning of Winter Study. Each team paid an entry fee, which went to paying the referees and buying pizza and beer at the Log for the winners.

Competition for the four playoff spots was intense, as Magic and Heartbeat tied for first, Heartbeat winning because they beat Magic during the regular season.

24 Hours for charity

by Mark Averitt

Constant motion—that was the story of the 1983 version of the Williams College Community Chest Fund 24-Hour Relay.

"The thing that made this race different from others," commented Freshman Chuck Goforth, a "guest miler" who ran his stint for the theater team, "is that the batons were always in motion, even if all the athletes weren't. There was a continual flow of motion and energy."

With an estimated 400 runners and those who barely passed for runners participating, there would have had to be an electric air in town's Field House this weekend.

The 24-Hour Relay, whose proceeds earned from pledges go to Williamstown area charities through the Williams College Chest Fund as well as to benefit spring sports teams at Williams, was an event which truly fused many diverse elements—the community and the college, the experienced, able athlete (like Bo Parker, the school mile record holder who ran for the Spencer-Brooks team) among them and the weekend jogger, the young (one local sixth grade class sponsored a team of small tykes who raced past taller runners for the first half of the relay) and the old-enough-to-know-betters. As one competitor summarized the event, "You have to have a sense of humor to run the 24-Hour Relay."

The teams with the least capacity for joviality were probably the "official" squads which competed with ten runners or fewer. The South Shore Striders, a track club from the Boston area, won the event by logging the most miles but Williamstown's own Roadrunners club was close behind with 256 miles. The Roadrunners were bolstered by many Williams track and cross-country stars as well as their coach, Peter Farwell. The Back of the Pack team, modestly named due to the humble performances of its runners in Williams track competition, stayed at the front most of the morning,

Trustees divest Dresser on ACSR recommendation

by Christian Howlett

Last week the Trustee Finance Committee decided to sell the College's 15,000 shares in Dresser Industries, a company doing business in South Africa which has consistently refused to sign the Sullivan Principles supporting racially equal work practices.

The divestment, totaling nearly $274,000, came after a unanimous recommendation from the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR).

The ACSR became dissatisfied with Dresser following a recent phone conversation between College Treasurer William Reed and Dresser executive Edward Luter. Luter told Reed that although his company has not signed the Sullivan Principles, it has made them corporate policy; however, it objects to the external auditing required by the principles.

He added that Dresser has a worldwide policy of not letting outside groups interfere with its operations, and that recent proxy votes have shown that less than two percent of stockholders favor their signing the Sullivan Principles.

Resting our case

According to Reed, Luter agreed to have Dresser representatives meet with the committee, but firmly stated that corporate policy would not be changed.

"I don't think they're doing what we want," Reed remarked, adding that as long as Dresser refused outside audits, there would be no way to monitor their practices in South Africa.

He concluded that in order to be consistent with its support of the Sullivan Principles, the ACSR had to recommend divestment.

"They've rested their case," Provost Hodge Markgraf stated, "and it seems to me we should rest ours."

Markgraf added that the Trustee Finance Committee will not buy stock in Dresser in the future unless a significant change in policy occurs. "They (the Finance Committee) have orders to cease and desist," he explained.

Two others sold

In related business, the ACSR reported that the Finance Committee has sold its shares in International Flavors and Fragrances, Inc. and Stauffer Chemical Company, two corporations under investigation by the committee for their South African practices. The sales came as part of routine financial business.

Four other companies in the College's portfolio are currently being investigated by the ACSR for their compliance with the Sullivan Principles. The Arthur D. Little Corporation rated Eli Lilly and Company and National Cash Register Corporation unfavorably, while Standard Oil of Ohio and National Technologies received a mixed rating, indicating they have signed the principles but have not reported back about their practices.

Swelling tuition nears $12,000

by Melissa Matthes

Tuition and fees for the 1983-84 school year will rise to $11,615, an increase of 8.2 percent over this year's $10,731, President Chandler announced March 18.

Tuition will increase by $750, room and telephone by $65, and board by $65, said Chandler in his letter to students and their parents. He cited three factors—reductions in federal financial aid grants and loans, the need to restore the purchasing power of faculty salaries and the cost of computer and word processor expansion—as contributing to the increase.

The higher-than-normal percentage increase this year is in part attributable to the substantial loss of Federal financial aid, explained Reed. Two years ago the College applied $500,000 of its operating budget to financial aid. Now, with federal cutbacks the College will have to supplement financial aid by nearly $1.1 million.

Treasurer William Reed said the College tries to raise faculty salaries at a rate one or two percentage points above the inflation rate of the previous year, which for 1982-83 was 4.5 percent.

Maintaining faculty salaries

"As one of the leading schools in the country, it is Williams' responsibility to maintain attractive faculty salaries," added Reed. "Williams is competing with the Ivies for both faculty and students," he said, "and it is important for us to be a leader."

Many faculty members, particularly economists and computer scientists, could double, or even triple their salaries in industry positions, Reed said. "Industry complains that students are ill-prepared for corporate responsibilities but industry is eating the seed corn by enticing some of the best professors from certain disciplines." Nevertheless, Reed

Space shuffle finally lands

After a little controversy, and a lot of confusion, it seems the space shuffle has finally landed. As a result, the College's language departments will be located in—Surprise—Weston Language Center.

Instead of moving to Weston, the Jesup Hall offices (Alumni, Development and Public Information) will move to Mears.

"We're pleased," said German Professor Edson Chick. "All's well that ends well."

The college had originally intended to relocate the languages to the basement of Stetson Hall so that the Jesup Hall offices could move to Weston. The college's computer facilities will soon be consolidated in Jesup.

Because language professors protested the lack of space, as well as prestige, of their new location, the administration had decided to give them their own building, Mears House. The Office of Career Counseling, currently in Mears, will be taking over the empty Stetson space.

Avoid expensive renovation

However, the administration recently realized that things were unnecessarily complicated. Instead of making two moves (Jesup to Weston and Weston to Mears) and an expensive renovation of Weston, they decided to simplify matters. By moving the Jesup offices to Mears House, Weston will be left alone.

The Public Information office is eagerly awaiting the upcoming move, as is Director of Development John Prtichard. "We are gaining a very nice location, more space—we're delighted," he said.

Meanwhile, the language departments will only retain the top two floors of Weston. The College's Personnel and Conferences Offices will be occupying the first floor. Both are now located in the lower level of Stetson.

In a related move, several of the language departments' senior professors will have their offices moved from Stetson to Weston.

BSU gets a house

However, this is fine with Chick, one of the professors likely to be moved. "Under the circumstances, we're quite willing to take this into the bargain," he said. "We're lucky to end up so well, considering we started in the basement of Stetson."

Finally, the Black Student Union, now in the basement of Mears, will be given Jenness House. If you've never heard of it, don't worry. Located behind the physics building, it currently serves as a faculty residence.

Dean Cris Roosenraad

Roosenraad, Allen seek greener pastures

by Dan Keating

Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad and Assistant to the President Judith Allen will leave Williams this summer for other positions. Roosenraad will be Dean of Students at Carleton College in Minnesota, and Allen will be the regional director for the College Board in New England.

Roosenraad has been teaching mathematics at Williams since 1969. In 1973 he was named assistant dean, and was promoted to Associate Dean in 1975. During the 1979-1980 academic year he served as Acting Dean of the College. Roosenraad currently serves as the Dean of Freshmen.

"Cris has performed three of the four roles in the Dean's Office, all with great distinction," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. "If we had a 'most valuable player' award, he would win it in a walk. We will miss him."

Roosenraad will begin his work at Carleton, a liberal arts college of 1700 students in Northfield, Minnesota, on July 1. He will head the Dean of Students Office which includes three other deans and support staff. His position includes serving on the President's Administrative Executive Committee and counseling students on personal and academic matters. He will also work in the mathematics department.

Roosenraad's move includes career opportunities for his wife Susan who teaches mathematics at Pine Cobble School and recently received an M.S. in Computer Science from Union College in New York. The couple lives in Williamstown with their ten-year-old son, Christopher.

The Williams Record

Following through

The College's divestment last week from Dresser Industries, a significant historical event, is cause for celebration. Unfortunately, positive action of that kind seems only to come after campus unrest. Although the College has had a policy of divesting from nonadherents to the Sullivan Principles since 1978, it has taken that action but twice. Both times these bursts of activity followed hunger strikes.

Given that precedent, it should be clear to everyone that radical action works, like it or not. The College can avoid this pattern by acting on its stated policy without the impetus of student coercion.

The College took a significant step in this ongoing debate last week with the publication of a Williams Reports devoted entirely to investor responsibility. Although one-sided, it dealt rationally and persuasively with a broad spectrum of divestiture topics. While we are not convinced by the main thrust of its arguments, namely, that divestment is not a viable option, its authors have raised several noteworthy points.

First, they demonstrate that, as Carl Cohen notes in his article, "rational persons may differ on the most fundamental matters." More importantly, although we may disagree about the best way to bring change to South Africa, we should not, and cannot, condemn the Trustees' actions as inherently immoral. This is a debate over political effectiveness, not a confrontation between Moral and Immoral.

The Reports also makes clear that the students' voice is only one of several—that the College, as a permanent entity, is responsible not only to its current community, but to those alumni who have preceded us. Soon, we too will be alumni, and we should hope that our input will be considered valuable, then as well as now.

It is now incumbent on divestiture's advocates to pool their intellectual efforts and to formulate a response. We recognize that the recent Williams Reports represents an expenditure of labor, money, and institutional resources which the student community cannot possibly muster in the midst of their academic pursuits. But should the College's statement go unanswered, the College will have had the decisive word in a conflict which has now become a battle of persuasion. On the other hand, persuasiveness is not necessarily a function of institutional resources, and a cooperative effort could produce an impressive alternative.

The campus has two opportunities to express its opinions this week. Tonight, until midnight, the student body is voting on the question of investment policy. We must speak loudly as a group if we are to show the interest that the Trustees and the College now expect of us.

Friday's open meeting with the Trustees will allow direct communication. This is the best opportunity thus far to hear both sides at their finest.

Ashamed

To the editor:

We were embarrassed and ashamed to have been part of an audience which showed a complete lack of consideration for the performers at Friday's Jazz Cabaret at Driscoll. While a portion of the audience was genuinely attentive and enthusiastic, the performers had to ask repeatedly for quiet. Though the relaxed atmosphere lent itself to conversation, the musicians made it clear that they wanted to share their music with us. Turning the performance into background entertainment showed great insensitivity. We did not live up to the standards of this College. Respect and compassion should be valued highly as part of the Williams experience.

Power

To the editor:

As a result of the events in January, the Trustees invited several members of WAAC to New York City to continue the process of "rational discourse." It was also an opportunity to meet on a fairly informal basis, to engender a spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding between WAAC and the Trustees. As part of the ongoing process of bridging the distance between the college community and the Trustees, WAAC agreed to send a delegation to the City.

The meeting, unfortunately, did not prove to be mutually productive. It was an opportunity for the Trustees to pour forth a barrage of rhetoric concerning their position on the issue of divestment, and their reactions to the demands and tactics of WAAC. They were most emphatic in stating that as far as they were concerned, there was no possibility of Williams ever divesting itself completely of stocks in businesses that have operations in South Africa.

As a constructive suggestion, they offered to set up meetings between WAAC and Congressmen in Washington to discuss US foreign policy in South Africa. We commend this idea as a constructive stand and look forward to its implementation. However, lobbying by individuals sidesteps the issue of Williams acting as an institution. WAAC has always asked that Williams take a stand, as an institution, to change US foreign policy in South Africa. There are precedents for this type of institutional activism. For example, during the bombing of Cambodia, Amherst College, under the admirable leadership of its president, went on record as opposing US foreign policy at the time.

On the whole, the meeting served as a metaphor for Student-Trustee relations here at Williams in the sense that the Trustees are the locus of power in the decision-making process of the College. They control what the school's position is on political issues, and they are not about to let anyone else influence that power. This is not meant to criticize the Trustees themselves, but, rather, it is a statement about the structure and exclusivity of power here at Williams.

While we do not question the sincerity of the Trustees' desire to communicate with the students on this issue, we doques-

The Nuclear Alternative: A Modest Proposal

by Ned Weed

The sense of futility which most people feel when they contemplate the nuclear dilemma is understandable. The problem is clear. It cannot be doubted that if nuclear weapons continue to be built, they will inevitably be used; man has never invented a weapon which he has not employed in combat. The most likely result of a full-scale nuclear war would be the utter extinction of the human race. The problem is clear, but no satisfactory solution has yet been proposed.

Perhaps this is because the issue is never considered objectively, but is always (when considered at all) softened and obscured by humanitarian concerns and romantic optimism. It is natural to shrink from the prospect of certain oblivion. But for those with the courage to face apons. This proposal is based on the naive and over-simplified assumption that there is some hope for our civilization. We can not unlearn the knowledge of how to split the atom, and we have no means to prevent the production of more weapons. The single way to prevent the apocalypse, to lose the fateful knowledge that must necessarily destroy us, is to have a carefully managed holocaust. We need a limited nuclear war.

Apart from the purely practical, aspects of my solution to the nuclear dilemma, there are added benefits. Not least of these is the swift resolution of the overpopulation problem, which threatens to make extinction an almost desirable outcome if it is ignored much longer. Not only would a limited nuclear war reduce population levels to easily manageable proportions, but the sterilizing rent Administration has shown much promise, talking of winnable nuclear wars and eagerly advocating civil defense plans. These plans reveal a touching naivete on the part of our government, as they imply a faith that society as we know it could survive even the most limited nuclear exchange.

Of course, the President may be subtler than he appears. Indeed, the chief reason for my previous reluctance to reveal this plan was a suspicion that the Administration has been consciously implementing it. I still dare to entertain this wonderful hope, but on reflection I have decided that these issues are too important to be left to the government. President Reagan's heart is in the right place, and he represents our best chance in many years. But as he seems to believe seriously in achieving victory through missiles, it is unlikely that any conflict occurring during his term could be controlled. Other means must be examined.

objective is to quickly initiate nuclear hostilities, and there can be no guarantee of survivors. But the best opportunity for sparking a small conflagration lies in terrorist activity. Only a small amount of plutonium is required to make a nuclear bomb, and many extremist organizations possess the will and means to do whatever is necessary to manufacture such a weapon. While I admit that it may be difficult for the concerned citizen to actually join the PLO, the IRA, the Red Brigades, or Libya, he can learn from these organizations and take action on his own. If he is good with his hands and possesses some knowledge of particle physics, he can make a small bomb in the privacy of his home. The individual is not entirely powerless.

I admit that it may be difficult for the concerned citizen to actually join the PLO, the Red Brigades, or Libya.

Even as Mr. Everyman does his utmost to help bring about the conflict, he can take steps to survive it. He can move to a remote area of the planet and there hope to escape the full fury of the assault. He will probably die a slow, horrible death. Even if not, he will be badly scarred and perhaps blinded, and he will eventually run short on his hoarded supplies. Then he will have to learn to forage for food. We must assume that most will perish from inability to cope with their new savage environment. But those who are most fit and adaptable will survive to breed a new human race. And if they have any memory of us and of this plan, they will thank our generation for having offered ourselves as a perfect sacrifice for mankind.

The average person must be wondering at this point, "What can I do to help cause a nuclear war?"

It, I propose a final solution, which many, for reasons of petty self-interest and cowardice, will disapprove of. What they refuse to recognize is that the nuclear holocaust is inescapable. Since it must come sooner or later, far better to have it sooner, when there will be a chance for some remnants of our species to survive. That chance will be greatly increased if the conflagration is deliberately instigated and controlled by a few who, while deploring the agony and death that will be suffered, nevertheless have the best interests of humanity at heart.

The solution

In the last few years, many Americans have come to realize the gravity of our situation and have called for the freezing and gradual elimination of nuclear weapons.

effects of lingering radiation would prevent any significant increases for generations. But this is merely a secondary gain. Most importantly, nuclear war is the only safe and final method of eliminating nuclear weapons. Only by contracting a limited amount of the disease is the patient immunized against it.

If we are to have a nuclear conflict which succeeds in our goal of destroying all urban civilization and technology (and, we must unhappily acknowledge, almost all human life) but does not entirely extinguish the race, it must happen in the very near future. Soon, levels of armaments will be so high that the detonation of the tiniest fraction of them will wipe out completely all organisms more complex than bacteria.

Reagan's Hidden Strategy?

It may be that the necessary buttons will be pushed soon. Certainly the cur-

by Gene H. Bell-Villada

The 1982 Nobel Prize for Literature went to Gabriel Garcia Marquez, a Columbian whose novels are bought and sold by the millions throughout Latin America.

One of the great writers of our time, Garcia Marquez also happens to be a committed leftist, a highly vocal defender of the Cuban and Nicaraguan revolutions, and a close personal friend of Fidel Castro.

This set of facts should present both our foreign-policy experts and many ordinary Americans with some hard but inescapable larger truths. Garcia Marquez isn't the only Latin American intellectual whose political opinions are staunchly leftist. If anything, he is fairly typical in that regard, his views being more or less shared by a majority of writers, students, teachers, editors, and other intellectuals in Latin America. Garcia Marquez may be the most famous Latino yarn-spinner of them all; but while his countless down-home readers get infinite enjoyment out of those yarns, they also generally agree with his political outlook.

Most Americans, even those who admire Garcia Marquez's books, find it odd that a man so sensitive and intelligent can entertain leftist thoughts. Americans, after all, like to see themselves as moderate centrists opposed to the extremes of left and right. It's no secret that, mostly through unregulated private enterprise, we've achieved a level of prosperity virtually unmatched until recently on the earth. Except for brief episodes in the 1910's and 1930's, our political life has been generally impervious to ideas from the socialist left. The views of Karl Marx in particular have had very little to say to most Americans. And so (we ask) why are there all those Latin leftists? Why can't they think more like us?

The reasons for Latino leftism are to be found within Latin America itself. Many Latin American nations have already attempted U.S.-style middle-of-the-road courses. Their constitutions are modeled after ours; their economic policies aim for U.S.-style prosperity; and their election campaigns, when they have them, drum up the same sort of high hopes familiar to American voters.

But the results have been overwhelmingly negative. Rather than sustained growth, democratization, and jobs for all, Latin America has seen economic stagnation, dictatorial government, and routine joblessness rates of 30 percent. The wealth of most every Latin American country remains in the hands of a few hundred local dynasties and multinational firms while vast urban slums proliferate and children forage in garbage cans for food.

This situation is propped up by some of the most brutal military regimes in the world. The bleak and brutal London of Marx and Engels was, by comparison to the Guatemalas of today, a civilized and hopeful place.

The logical question is: Why don't those Latins just do something about it? Why not pursue reforms like FDR did?

The answer is that they have tried. Latin America's history is strewn with the dashed hopes and mangled corpses of idealistic men and women who tried working through the system. They have tried elections, laws, middle-of-the-road unions, a little redistribution here, a little education there.

But time and again the reformers have been toppled by the military, too often with help from U.S. businesses or the C.I.A. In the worst cases, the reformers have been liquidated. In Guatemala, for instance, there is no longer a moderate opposition—its activists completely wiped out by the Army and the death squads. What remains now is pitched battle between right-wing generals and angry radical leftists. It is impossible to yearn for a responsible middle-of-the-road in Guatemala because the middle-of-the-roads are all dead. It really is that simple.

Many Americans remember the Great Depression, with its soup kitchens and "Hoovervilles" and other standard horrors. In Latin America the Depression is almost 100 years of age, and there aren't even soup kitchens to relieve the hunger pangs. Latino "Hoovervilles" are an everyday part of a worsening landscape. Still, when Hoover's policies failed, Americans could expect FDR to try something else. But what hopes would moderate Americans have had if the Joint Chiefs of Staff had seized power, exiled FDR to England, jailed or executed his top aides, and rolled back his "dangerous" New Deal?

Given this dead end, it is no surprise that most Latin American intellectuals have come to embrace Marxism as a common way of thinking. Both as an analytical tool and as food for the imagination, Marxist ideas are now a routine matter, an essential component of the Latin American mind. Not that those Latin writers go wading through all of Das Kapital; the ideas are picked up in popularized form, through summaries, leaflets, or casual conversation.

Proof aplenty is furnished by the societies these writers live in. Words like "exploitation," "imperialism," "class struggle," and "ruling class" aren't just windy slogans. For Latin Americans, they are terms of objective description.

And so one now finds Marxist notions in such unlikely places as official Mexican government speeches, or in the Catholic Church hierarchy, with its "Liberation Theologians" and activist priests. The great Mexican poet Octavio Paz—a conservative man and a Nobel nominee—once noted that "in some way or other, without realizing it, we're all Marxists. Marxism is now part of our intellectual lifeblood and moral sensibility."

Not only Garcia Marquez, but many of Latin America's left-wing artists and intellectuals have gained love and loyalty from their millions of readers. As long as Latin America continues with its system of astronomical wealth for the rich, degrading poverty for the poor, and vicious reprisals against anybody who attempts significant change, its writers will incline to leftism and Marxism. In the fact of a deteriorating world economy, and as Latin American generals show no limit to their cruelty, those left-wing ideas are inciting mass action.

These are facts Americans will have to learn and live with. Fighting on the side of the generals will only make the situation worse. To play at King Canute desperately ordering back the ocean tides will make the U.S. look self-deluded and ridiculous. It will cost many lives as well.

The names of the fifty-two students who will be next year's junior advisors were released before Spring Break. This year's selection process was unique in that the JA selection committee interviewed each candidate individually.

Dean of Freshmen Cris Roosenraad said he will meet with the Committee to discuss the effectiveness of the interview format.

The JAs are:

Turnovers sap Econ. Dept.

by Mark Averitt

Their names won't appear in next year's course catalog, but there are nonetheless four new full-time members of the Williams economics department. Roberto Ifill, Brian Levy, Dave Ross and Dave Faeris will replace Juliet Schor, Gerald Epstein, Tim Fries and Michael Fortunato after a year of the largest turnover in recent memory.

Schor and Epstein resigned to take positions at the newly-formed "radical think tank" of the New School in New York City. Fortunato and Fries are leaving for personal reasons. "But don't forget that we're always the department with the highest turnover rate," pointed out economics chairman Gordon Winston, who was responsible for most of the interviews with the new candidates. "Last year we had no turnover at all, so the two-year average is about normal."

The arrivals and departures do create a problem in assigning next year's classes. The hiring has been so fast and furious that Winston isn't yet sure which professor will teach which class, and will not know in time for the new college catalog, either.

Courses should work out
"We have good course offerings and all of our new people, as well as the visiting professors whom we are still hiring, are good, so choosing classes shouldn't be a dilemma for students," Winston said. All four of the newcomers arrive with admirable credentials. Roberto Ifill, a Yale graduate student who is due to receive his Ph.D. soon, is a specialist in industrial organization and regulation. "He's going to be one of the most popular professors on campus,"

Faculty promote S. African awareness

by Ned Ladd

The Faculty Committee for Divestment has presented three lectures this spring designed to enlighten the student body to the fundamental issues surrounding South Africa and divestment. All three speakers were in favor of divestment and attempted to present their reasons for both the viability and the effectiveness of divestment.

The lectures addressed two basic issues of contention in the South African controversy, the impact of divestment on the college financially and the effect of American divestment on South African affairs.

Dr. Robert J. Schwartz, vice-president of Shearson-American Express spoke to a small audience on March 16 about the perils of "Socially Responsible Investment." He explained that the college's portfolio would not lose earnings if a policy of divestment was followed.

Schwartz has managed "socially responsible" portfolios, which specifically exclude companies doing business in countries cited for human rights violations, or companies engaged in morally-controversial industries.

Clean stocks outperform

He said those portfolios had "maintained good performance" and consistently "outperformed the average." He pointed to several accounts which he has managed for five years and explained that his investors have been satisfied with his management techniques.

Schwartz also addressed the question of the effectiveness of divestment on influencing corporate pullout of South Africa. He stated that large scale divestment will force the price of stock down. "I know of no company which isn't interested in the price of its stock," he noted.

Dumasani Kumalo, Projects Director for the American Committee on Africa, explained the South African view of American divestment at the second lecture last Wednesday.

He spoke of conditions in South Africa and the complete division between blacks and whites. According to Kumalo, the law requires this separation. For corporations in South Africa to fight apartheid, they would have to break the law.

Foreign support crucial

For this reason he favors blanket divestment from all companies dealing with South Africa. "Divestment is the only way out," he said. "The South African government owes its existence to foreign investment, which provides a lot of economic support."

He freely admits that "divestment will hurt" blacks. However, he noted that it will hurt whites as well.

The pressure of divestment, according to Kumalo, "will force the whites to the negotiating table." Unlike the whites in other African countries, the whites in South Africa have been there for 300 years.

"The whites in South Africa have nowhere to go," he noted. "In the long run, we have a much better chance of forcing them into reasonable change."

Peaceful change possible

Kumalo said he does not believe that divestment will force a violent revolution in South Africa. "There is a chance for peaceful change," he emphasized. He admitted that the "violence will escalate... there is no way to stop it" but he believes that change can be brought about with "minimal violence."

Representative Howard Wolpe wrapped up the series last Sunday night by speaking on the role of divestment as a part of US foreign policy. He noted that the divestment issue is a national concern and that economic relations with South Africa have been debated in Congress for some time.

He called South Africa a "police state—pure and simple." In relating his experiences there as part of a Congressional delegation, he spoke of the predominance of the police in all aspects of civil life.

He labeled two issues in foreign policy with regard to South Africa as critical. First, he called for a policy that would "facilitate internal change." This would include government sanctions as well as popular divestment from corporations dealing in South Africa.

He explained that corporations cannot force change because they don't have any input into the political power structure. "Power-sharing is the central question of apartheid," he concluded.

The Faculty Committee has publicly advocated divestment of all college funds from all corporations and banks doing business in South Africa.

NEWS BRIEFS

"PM Magazine" to quiz students

The producers of "PM Magazine," the nationally-syndicated television show, have announced their intention to send a camera crew to the Williams campus this Thursday.

The dramatic focus of this high-tech media equivalent of "Man-on-the-Quad" will reportedly be the following question for students: "Which movie star do you think you most resemble?" Be prepared.

Pitchers return to the Log

The Log is again serving beer in pitchers, due to a unanimous Log Committee vote in favor of the measure last week.

The Committee agreed that the lack of pitchers was hurting the Log's ability to function as a social gathering place for all students.

According to Dean Daniel O'Connor, the measure may reverse the trend towards parties in dormitories, where "an unhealthy atmosphere conducive to excessive drinking exists." The atmosphere at the Log is more "controlled," he said.

Dean Cris Roosenraad also noted that students are now sufficiently aware of the state law forbidding both minors from being served and students of age from buying for them.

In other Log issues, the Log may offer a dark beer this spring, depending on the availability of taps at the bar.

And the Log Committee is now accepting resumes from seniors for the position of next year's Log manager, a one-year position.

Maids are back... at a price

For those rooms that haven't seen a vacuum cleaner since last September, there's help not far away. "Quality Maid Service," a professional cleaning organization, has received permission to offer their services on campus. Costs for this service are not yet known, but will depend on room size and type of work desired.

Payment is required in advance, and appointments will be set for the cleaning service. According to the organization, the service is "bonded and insured for your protection."

Steaks for blood

In another attempt to enlist student support, the American Red Cross is running a bloodmobile today and tomorrow at the First Congregational Church.

There will be an inter-dorm competition, again entitled the "Vampire Sweepstakes," with every member of the winning house receiving Kansas City sirloin steaks. These steaks were donated by Astro Beef.

But "the real reward for giving blood is the knowledge that one has given of himself to help meet an acute need," said Bloodmobile coordinator

Carolyn Behr. "The donated pint of blood will probably be in another person's veins within a week."

Today the bloodmobile was here from 10 to 4 and tomorrow it will be here from noon to 6.

Burns honored with Christopher Award

James MacGregor Burns, Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government, received a 1983 Christopher Award for his latest book, "The Vineyard of Liberty."

The award is given annually to writers, producers and directors in recognition of "the highest values of the human spirit," and "artistic and technical excellence."

This year's other recipients include Charles Schulz of Peanuts cartoon fame; Jonathan Schell, author of "The Fate of the Earth;" Richard Attenborough, producer of the new film "Gandhi;" and Lawrence E. Spivak, panelist and producer of "Meet the Press."

Burns has been at Williams for 42 years and in that time has accumulated many prestigious awards for his writing, including in 1956 a Tarniment Prize and Woodrow Wilson Prize and in 1970 a National Book Award and Pulitzer Prize.

He is former president of the American Political Science Association and is current president of the International Society of Political Psychology.

Winter Study '84

Winter Study registration has changed. This year, students should submit WSP 99's during the regular registration period for fall courses, April 18-25, along with all other WSP choices. Approved choices will be posted in May.

However, 99's can also be submitted in October as first choices. These will either be approved or denied by October 15, when all course assignments will be made.

Next year's freshmen will choose from six special interdisciplinary seminars. These courses will meet for about six hours a week in groups of 25 students.

There will also be a new group of senior seminars.

Graduate fellowships

Eleven seniors have received various fellowships for graduate work and independent study.

Susan Bragdon, Bryan Cannon and Cecilia Danks were awarded Watson Foundation Fellowships of $10,000 each for one year of travel and study. The three were selected from 170 nominees from 50 colleges. Bragdon, a biology major, will study predator-prey relationships by observing jackals in South Africa, timber wolves in Canada and red foxes in Germany.

English major Cannon will travel to India to study religious shrines and temples and the culture surrounding them. Danks will combine her biology and environmental studies majors by examining the problems of agriculture and tropical rainforest preservation in Costa Rica, Brazil and Peru.

Peter Graffagnino and Diane Owen have been given Herchel Smith fellowships for two years of study at Cambridge University. Vanessa Laird received a similar grant to attend Oxford.

Hubbard Hutchinson fellowships, given by Williams to seniors gifted in music, arts, writing or performance, went to Kimberly Carpenter, John Graham, Inigo Mangano and Mari- anne O'Connor for two years of graduate work.

Thomas Dennis was awarded the Horace F. Clark fellowship, given to a senior, "chosen on the basis of superior scholarship, general ability and interest in scholarly research."

Military uses of nuclear waste

Speaking before a group of concerned students Thursday, chemistry professor and environmental studies director William Moomaw explained the little-known connection "between the civilian use of nuclear power and military nuclear power."

"We're planning in the next ten years to make 14,000 nuclear weapons," he maintained. Although the U.S. can not make enough plutonium for the weapons in that time using existing methods, the technology exists to upgrade plutonium found in conventional nuclear reactor waste to weapons-grade material.

Around 1979 the US government conducted an experiment using conventional spent fuel rods from a nuclear power plant to make a bomb. The experiment was successful, definitively proving that "that connection did exist," Moomaw said.

"It's very clear that's how India got the material for their weapon," he continued, adding that South Africa is generally believed to have obtained a bomb the same way.

France and West Germany are currently selling plutonium reprocessing technology "to anyone who will buy it, basically," Moomaw claimed. In recent years South Korea, Pakistan and Brazil have all tried to buy the technology. Although the first two sales were effectively killed by US pressure, he said, the Brazil sale went through, although the country had not signed the international non-proliferation treaty.

What is the scope of the danger? According to Moomaw, a conventional nuclear power plant makes enough plutonium yearly for about 50 one-megaton sized weapons.

Carr, Rouse retire

Two long-time professors, Arthur J. Carr of the English department and Richard O. Rouse of the Psychology department, have retired from the faculty.

Carr, who is Edward Dorr Griffin Professor of English, came to Williams in 1967 from the University of Michigan to become chairman of the department.

He is a specialist in Victorian literature and has co-edited several college texts, including "Masterpieces of the Drama," now in its fourth edition, and the "Norton Anthology of Poetry."

Rouse came to Williams in 1948 when the Psychology department was only two years old and served 12 years as its chairman. Before coming to Williams he graduated from Harvard and later taught at the University of Connecticut.

Rouse's specialty is cognitive psychology with an emphasis on visual perception and the role of attention in short-term memory. In the past he has served as a consultant to the National Science Foundation.

Chess team places second

The Williams Chess Team took a strong second place in the New York City Open Intercollegiate Championships over Spring Break. About ten teams competed, with Hunter College finishing first and Middlebury College third.

Individually, Arthur Xanthos '86 took fourth place, Crescent Varone '85 seventh, and Mark Gutscher '86 eighth out of nearly 50 competitors.

Government postpones Registration proof

by Lucy Lytle

For the next two academic years, college males will not need to show proof of registration with the Selective Service to qualify for federal financial aid, according to new Education Department guidelines which reverse its original decision on how to implement the Solomon Amendment. But the College is already considering ways to help non-registrants in the future.

Beginning in 1985 students will have to produce the actual draft registration acknowledgment letter. Until then they need only sign a statement saying that they have registered.

The Solomon amendment is scheduled to go into effect July 1, pending the determination of its constitutionality. The debate centers on a Minnesota judge's recent ruling that the amendment is illegal, a decision which the United States government is expected to appeal.

The Williams Ad Hoc Advisory Committee on Financial Aid Policy for Non-Registrants presented four alternatives Thursday night for dealing with students who have forfeited federal aid by refusing to register for the draft, as stipulated by the Solomon Amendment.

Loans or grants

Dean Cris Roosenraad explained that Williams could either choose to provide no supplementary funding, provide direct loans to students at commercially available bank rates, provide subsidized loans below the commercially available rate or provide a combination of grants and subsidized loans.

Committee members declined to speculate about the cost of implementing any of the alternatives and confessed that at present they were unable to give a reliable estimate of the number of non-registered students who would be affected.

Committee members also questioned the equity of expecting the College to subsidize students' "acts of conscience," and thereby divert financial resources away from activities and concerns more central to the majority of students.

No recommendations yet

The committee will be meeting with representatives of the Trustees next week but Roosenraad stressed that "we are not in a position to offer even tentative conclusions." He expects the Trustees to decide by June and to notify students of the aid policy by mail this summer.

A petition requesting Williams to provide some type of financial aid for non-registrants was circulated last week and garnered nearly 1100 student and more than 100 faculty signatures.

Panel questions divestment

by Tim Johnson

Three faculty members and one student debated the obligation of the Williams community to take official stances on political issues, including divestment from companies doing business in South Africa, in a panel discussion last Thursday entitled "Perspectives on Divestiture."

Political science professor Vincent Barnett asserted that the College should encourage debate among student groups, but should not take stands as an institution.

"I do not want to see this College debating whether or not we should sever corporate ties with England until they get out of Ireland or with Israel until they get out of Lebanon," he said. "It would be self-defeating and self-destructive."

"A political role"

Economics Professor Juliet Schor disagreed strongly. She argued that the traditional separation of the private business sector and the public educational system by liberal political theory has been proven wrong by history.

"As a community we cannot escape a political role," she said. "We can either actively support movements for change in South Africa or we can actively reproach them. We do not have any other choice."

Stephen Sowle '83, the only student on the panel, agreed with Professor Barnett that the college cannot afford to take stands on every political issue.

But "it is a very different situation when the college becomes directly involved in a political issue by actions such as investment," he said.

"Whether or not it intends to, the College is already taking a stand."

Effectiveness questioned

Economics Professor Stephen Lewis questioned the wisdom of divestment itself. He cited a case in which Chrysler sold one of its factories to the Anglo-American Corporation, a South African-owned company.

"Chrysler has the money and Anglo-American has the factory. The same workers are being employed and the same cars are being made. I just don't see how anything has changed," he said.

Lewis urged activists to put pressure on the corporations to implement the progressive reforms of the Sullivan Principles. He cited the recent legalization of black labor unions and a split within the Dutch Reformed Church as evidence that the South African government is yielding to pressure.

Schor shared none of his optimism. She interpreted the splits within the church and other political parties as a hardening of attitudes among right-wing factions.

Sullivan Principles useless
Schor dismissed the Sullivan Principles as useless. "They do not even mention apartheid, the destruction of which is indispensable for progress."

Schor argued that American withdrawal would deprive the South African regime of American technology. She delineated IBM's usefulness to the regime, saying the government can enforce its pass laws more efficiently with a computerized system and thus can more effectively regulate concentrations of black populations throughout the country.

said he was pleased that "faculty compensation here is above the guidelines set for the 1980's."

The third factor Chandler cited for the tuition increase was the cost of computer and word processor expansion. Reed explained that Jesup Hall is being developed into a computer center and a faculty committee is presently selecting a new academic computer system. He added that the potential for computer use in course work is limitless.

Gift income strong

Williams consistently ranks at or near the top of liberal arts colleges in annual gift income, reported Chandler. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1982, total gifts amounted to more than $8.7 million.

Williams' endowment now stands at $150 million. A combination of favorable market conditions, successful management and new endowment gifts raised the endowment's market value. With approximately $78,000 of endowment per student, Williams is one of the nation's best endowed institutions.

Despite the relief provided by gift and endowment income, it would be "unconscionable to raise tuition without increasing aid," asserted Reed. In the past few years, the College has developed two plans designed to help families carry the burden of a rising tuition. The Parent Loan Program helps students pay for their education in regular installments, over an extended period of time, at a lower than usual interest rate. Additional borrowing increases only the number of payments, not the amount of the monthly payment.

The second plan, the Williams Installment Plan, allows parents to pay equal installments for ten months. The plan is intended to be a budget payment service and no interest costs are charged.

Finally, President Chandler pointed out that compared to competing institutions Williams is on the lower end of the scale for fixed charges in 1983-84. "The cost of a Williams education is a real bargain," remarked Reed. "We are trying to be as conservative as we can."

Lawson Quintet ignites audience

by Marc Mazzone

Fire is perhaps the principal ingredient in any jazz medium. Without the fire, nothing happens, the music dies. The life goes out of it. But give the music fire, and you give it motion, life's blood coursing through its veins. The Janet Lawson Quintet has fire.

She has, for openers, some very fine musicians working with her. Katzo Harris handled the bass lines, while Bill O'Connell hammered out a piano accompaniment that ran the gamut from sharp percussive commentary on the other solos to the flowing yet technical melodic lines of his own.

Alex Foster's assertive and often convoluted passages on the reeds and flute won him much applause from the audience.

Outstanding drums

But the most outstanding performance was certainly by Jimmy Madison on the drums. He managed to curb the desire epidemic in so many young drummers to attack the set with the mindless ferocity of a Celtic warrior in battle lust. Instead he played with enough rhythmic variation to keep it interesting, yet with enough sensitivity and professionalism to remain simple when simplicity was best.

One has a tendency, hearing something for the first time, to make comparisons. In her rich lower register, Janet Lawson has the same tonal quality distinctive of the voice of Ella Fitzgerald, while the heavy soprano of her upper range is reminiscent of Gayle Moran.

But the more one listens to her, the further one becomes convinced that she really has, in her sheer modal variety, a peculiar quality that is all her own. Within the space of a single continuous phrase, she ascends from the growling low tones of a bebop tenor sax to a series of high-pitched glissando shouts that sound like passages on a Mini Moog synthesizer.

Grammy nominee Janet Lawson sang at the Jazz cabaret last Friday night.

Pro House works to improve its image

by Vernon Squires

"Prospect House is definitely on the rise."

So says Michael Morriss, current house president of Prospect.

"I'm very optimistic concerning improvements at Prospect. I'm certain that some good things will be happening."

So says Wendy Hopkins, Director of Student Housing.

"Prospect House could develop the reputation to get students to go over there."

So says Mary Kenyatta, Dean of Housing. Prospect House in the Berkshire Quad is currently in a state of change.

"Already there is improvement in Prospect. Our social calendar is growing, house revenues are up, meetings are well-attended and social activities are open to a much wider array of people," claims president Morriss.

The improvement in social atmosphere and plans for physical improvement all form the foundation for a "new" Prospect House which may shed the poor image that "Pro-House" acquired in the past.

According to President Morriss, Prospect's reputation has reached its nadir and is now turning around. At a recent information session for freshman concerning upperclass housing, Morriss described Prospect's image in the past, "I told some friends that I would up in Prospect, and they quietly told me 'sorry!'" he related.

Parties

Attendance at Prospect parties is up, due in great part to Morriss' creative and widely distributed announcements. Also, more students within the house have become interested in its activities.

Things are looking up for Prospect, but the current stir up has not escaped controversy. Former house president David Heinlein notes that the rigorous new leadership has created some tension in the house.

"There are some problems between the Morriss administration and the house social committee," reveals Heinlein. "Not everyone agrees with Mike's methods."

CONCERT REVIEW

Flutist Khalsa first-rate

by Greg Capadlini

Such a tastefully done recital as Friday night's, by flutist Akal Dev K. Khalsa and pianist John Newell, is always welcome. The program had plenty of variety and each performance demonstrated skill and sincere commitment both to the composer's intention and to sheer beauty of sound.

Khalsa commands a first-rate flute technique. Her low notes are unusually full and secure; her large melodic leaps are practically seamless. The beginnings of her notes are pure, and the continuum of her range is free from segmentation. These qualities made the unaccompanied works on the program a real treat.

Khalsa, in her rendering of Density 21.5 by Varese, pushed to the limits of loud and soft and made this rather abstract composition sound quite organic. Bozza's more conventional Image (Op. 35) was equally strong, though sweetly lyrical and not as imaginative.

In the works with keyboard, Newell proved himself a capable and responsive accompanist. His greatest task was to keep his part in balance in Brahms' Sonata in E-flat (Op. 120). The crashing sonorities, in the typically overwritten piano part make this difficult, and Newell acquitted himself admirably. He was less successful in the Sonata in F Minor (BWV 1034) by Bach, where in an apparent effort to break to comparative monotony, he occasionally made his part a bit too discernable.

Khalsa was responsible for the transcription of Seven Spanish Folksongs by Manuel de Falla and so required herself to play in the low register. Many flutists would stay away from such a challenge but Khalsa had no difficulty whatsoever.

Newell began each song with a lengthy solo passage, and thus convincingly set the pace and mood each time.

While the smoothness of Khalsa's style is attractive, it sometimes precludes the kind of pointed articulations and inflections that can give a melodic line distinctive shape. But this is easily forgiven when the rest of the playing is so perfect. Her Bach is incredibly focused and intense; it's as though her playing begins deep inside and just happens to go through a flute on the way out.

enthusiastic leadership, but sometimes he comes on too strong. Furthermore, the improvements in Prospect are largely rooted in work that took place prior to his election," says Heinlein.

An example of a discrepancy in the perception of the new administration is the increase in house revenue. While Morriss claims more dues were collected as a result of his policies and canvassing, Heinlein counters that most revenue was already guaranteed prior to Morriss taking over, and that only some new dues were collected. Heinlein noted, ironically, that Morriss himself was markedly tardy in paying his own dues.

"I wouldn't stress the importance of Mike Morriss too much in the changes in Prospect," suggests Heinlein. "It's a combination of new enthusiasm and an old base. What's important is the house has improved as a social place."

Never bored

The overwhelming problem at Prospect is noise. The house suffers from terribly thin walls. The problem is the product of both design and later renovation.

University of Arizona

Over the last five years, Sigma Nu fraternity members had done everything from driving golf balls off the roof of their frat house—occasionally hitting cars, windows and bystanders—to dumping trash on parked cars, to throwing oranges and other objects at the campus police.

But then officials at the University of Arizona hospital discovered bullet holes in an office window and a .22 caliber bullet lodged inches from where a hospital worker normally sat. Police traced the angle for fire to a third floor window of the Sigma Nu house.

"That was the straw that broke the camel's back," recalled Dean of Students Robert Svob. "We finally had to get tough." The frat house was closed indefinitely.

University of California—Santa Barbara

A letter to the student newspaper from someone claiming to have caught herpes in a hot tub caused "a pretty significant decline" in business at the Shi-buki Gardens Spa and Sauna and almost culminated in a libel suit against the newspaper.

"It's total malarkey," said Spa owner Richard Weiss. "There's no way you're going to catch herpes sitting in a body of chlorinated water."

The Daily News, the student newspaper, discovered that the letter was eventually traced to "this 43 year-old dropout who lives across the street from the spa, and was apparently bothered by the people coming in and out and the music and everything," said Weiss.

University of Nebraska—Lincoln

Bogus researchers have called University of Nebraska students asking for information regarding their sex lives. It seems that some pranksters have assumed the guise of university professors and graduate students to get confidential information. Only after several students called the university's psychology department asking for information on the researchers did the administration find out. Students were then warned about the prank calls.

predicted Roger Platt '83 of the Student Hiring Committee.

Brian Levy did not receive as enthusiastic a student recommendation as Ifill, although the Harvard graduate student's thesis on multinational corporations and technology is "a first-rate piece of work" in Winston's view. Levy is a South African citizen who, like all of the new arrivals, is expecting to receive his Ph.D. this spring or summer.

Levy and Dave Ross, a 1977 graduate of Williams and a former editor of the Record, are both mainstream economists. Ross's specialty is micro theory; Levy's is development and industrial organization.

One radical prof

There is one radical economist among the four, however. Dave Faeris enters the department from Duke University to replace departing radicals Schor and Epstein. Faeris received rave reviews from the Student Hiring Committee, a group responsible for finding out whether candidates are "friendly and interesting," said Platt.

"It's a sociable type of thing," he explained. "We're seeing the candidates after they've just been grilled in the Econ department offices, so they're casual about it. I think it's important to know whether students can become friends with a prospective professor or not, and we decided that Dave Faeris is the kind of guy who is personable outside of the classroom."

Faeris was not hired just because his specialty is in demand, claimed Winston. "We try to achieve a balance of specialties, but we won't pay a high price for it," he said. "We wouldn't hire a second-rate teacher to get balance."

No conservative prof

The department proved this by failing to hire a conservative economist this year despite student pressure and Winston's admission that Williams is "light" in that area.

Although Winston feels the new crop of Williams economists is "extremely desirable," he agrees that the departing faculty members will be missed. However, Winston notes that Williams will have one of the best economics department of any American liberal arts college next year.

"We're hardly out of the academic mainstream," he says, "except for the fact that we don't have a graduate school. And Williams must be appealing to professors when we can hire people like Robert Aliber and Stephano Fenaltea as visiting professors."

Aliber, the author of several books and the father of Williams sophomore Michael, and Fenaltea, one of the leading economic historians in Italy, are the only visiting professors whom Winston is sure will be teaching here next year.

"The hiring process was successful," he summarized. "We interviewed over 250 people, chose nine for campus interviews, selected four, and all of them agreed to a contract. What's unusual is not the number of people leaving our department—all good departments are comprised of teachers who are desirable to other institutions—but the fact that they all left this year instead of last."

Roosenraad, Allen leave

A native of Michigan, Roosenraad received his B.S. and M.S. degrees from the University of Michigan, and his Ph.D. from the University of Wisconsin in 1969.

Oversees affirmative action

Allen came here as Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations when the position was created in 1979. She evaluates, coordinates and oversees the College's affirmative action policies and acts as the primary liaison officer with government agencies.

She also monitors federal and state legislation, assists faculty members in finding federal funding and acts as an advisor to faculty and staff in grievance procedures.

"Judy has served the College's needs in a critically important area with outstanding dedication and effectiveness," said President John Chandler in a memo announcing Allen's decision to leave Williams.

As regional director, Allen will handle general administration and staff provision for College Board association affairs and for its programs and services in New England. She begins July 1 at the regional office in Waltham which includes six professionals and four secretaries.

Graduate of BU

Allen came to Williams from Regis College where she worked for nine years, the last three as Director of Admissions and Financial Aid. During that time she was elected president of the Massachusetts Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators.

Allen is a 1970 graduate of Boston University where she served as Assistant Director of Financial Aid for three years following graduation. She also holds a Master of Education in Community Counseling degree from Salem State College.

The College is currently looking for a new Dean of Freshmen for next year among the senior faculty. It will accept applications only from on-campus personnel to fill Allen's position.

tion whether communication is the issue. We have been communicating with the Trustees since 1978, and the opposing standpoints have long been made clear to all sides. Our position is that the issue is not communication, but the Trustees' unchecked and unbalanced power over the operation of this educational institution. We ask, is this consistent with the democratic ideals of our society?

A clear example of this power distribution is the upcoming "Open Meeting" this Friday afternoon at which the Trustees will present their case to the campus on the issue of divestment. Regrettably, despite the efforts of WAAC to get equal representation on stage, theirs will be the only position formally presented (as of April 10).

WAAC's primary demand still stands as follows: Total and complete divestment of stocks, bonds and bank deposits in all companies and banks involved in South Africa.

Furthermore, WAAC suggests that the decision-making apparatus of the College be democratized.

Softball drops opener

The women's softball club lost their first game of the season to Trinity 10-5 on Saturday. However, the team is much stronger this year and expects to improve its record over previous years.

Two-thirds of the starting lineup is made up of returning players, including seniors Heldt Halleck, Lix Jex and Thalia Meehan. According to Halleck, the new freshmen and sophomore players will add depth to the club.

Strong defense

Saturday's game gave the women, who began practicing together only last week, the opportunity to assess their strengths and weaknesses.

While the women had difficulty at the plate, they showed strong performances in the field. Catcher Meehan had a number of fine plays behind the plate, including a double play in the fifth inning.

The team expects a close contest in Thursday's match against cross-town rival North Adams State.

Rain cancels baseball

Rain caused the cancellation of the baseball team's first three games this season—two against Union on Sunday and one at R.P.I. last Thursday.

Coach Jim Briggs' team went 2-7 on their spring break trip to Florida.

Junior John Hennigan was the Ephmen's strongest pitcher in Florida. "He had an excellent nine innings in our 4-1 win over Trinity," said Briggs. "He had eight strikeouts, three walks, and one unearned run. He also pitched well, although he didn't get the win, against Hillsdale."

Senior shortstop David Nasser, whom Briggs calls a possible pro prospect, hit .395 for Williams down South.

"We are going to hit, and well. That I know," Briggs said. "And our defense should be improved. How well we do all comes down to how consistent our pitching is."

Purple Valley Classic

Despite heavy rains, winds, and cold temperatures, 150 hardy roadrunners turned out to race the Purple Valley Classic 10-miler Sunday afternoon. Drawn by the lure of a warm Towne Field House for the finish, many competitors recorded their best times.

The winner, Steve Bratt of Boston, representing Cambridge Sports Union, defeated last year's winner Bill Slocombe of Amherst by 21 seconds and established a new course record of 52:16.4. Ellen Chandler, a Williams senior and national-caliber skier, won the women's division in 65:48.

In the 18 and under category Steve Roberts of Lenox outdueled Adam Filson of Williamstown 58:22 to 59:03. Peggy Dyer of Williamstown was the top junior woman in 74:34. Men's over 40 winner was Dick Shook of Pittsfield in 61:36, over 50 was 67:09, Manny Mateodo of Pittsfield. Women over 35 champ Beverly Smith of Wayland, Mass. ran 82:10, while over 50 Susan Haupt of South Egremont clocked a great 84:08.

Special prizes donated by Williamstown merchants went to Williamstown, Williams College faculty and student winners, and youngest (Bannon Corbett from Bennington, age 11 who ran 66:23!) and oldest (Jane Nordstrom of Peru, Mass. 90:39 at age 62!). Women's crew swamped

The women's varsity, JV, and novice crews lost to Rutgers last Saturday. The previous week against Navy, the novice and JV teams won, but the varsity lost by one length.

"We've got a young squad this year," said Coach George Marcus. "We were rowing low in the water because it was so early in the year—we've only been rowing for three weeks, while Rutgers and Navy have been in the water for much longer."

"I'm confident that the varsity and novice boats should become quite good boats as the season progresses," Marcus said.

The women face Connecticut College, W.P.I. and Smith at Worcester on Saturday.

going down in two sets and Rives retiring during his second set due to a muscle pull. Rives is expected to be ready for the Ephs' next match on Thursday against Clark in Worcester.

Sopher's second singles match was the only one to last three sets, with Sopher triumphing for the Ephs.

Scrimmage loss

At Boston College, Hammond, Burbank, and the Larmer-Sopher team were the Williams winners.

Hammond, playing the number one spot, went to three sets for the win. "Craig is playing very well," said co-captain Burbank. "Last year he didn't even play singles, but this year he's moved all the way up to number one in Zaff's absence."

Burbank also won in three sets at number six, while Larmer-Sopher took the number two doubles to remain the only undefeated Williams team.

Highly-rated B.C. had just come off a win over Dartmouth. The match was called a scrimmage because Williams already has its allotment of games on the schedule.

"You are never bored at Prospect," joked Morriss at the house meeting. "Whenever there is nothing to do, you can always listen to what the people down the hall are up to."

A committee of seven students proposed structural improvements to Wendy Hopkins, Housing Director. According to Morriss, she was "very receptive."

"I have a genuine interest in the house," acknowledges Hopkins. "We had a good discussion concerning improvement, but there are some financial constraints. I can guarantee some improvement, especially of aesthetic nature, but a study must be completed before any structural changes can be considered."

Pipe sleeves

Among the changes that might solve the noise problem are pipe sleeves, acoustical paneling and carpeting. According to Winthrop Wassenar, Director of Buildings and Grounds, the latter solution is probably the most reasonable. Again, a study will ascertain which solution is actually the most viable.

The effort to change Prospect House is not unnoticed by college authorities, who see student initiative as a starting point for improvement.

"If I get student involvement I'm much more apt to do something," reveals Hopkins. "Prospect could be made more comfortable with proper student input."

Lacrosse drops home opener

by Paul Meeks

Men's varsity lacrosse fell to the University of New Haven, 8-4, in its home opener Saturday at Cole Field. The Ephs evened their record at single wins and losses since an initial victory Tuesday against a weak U.Mass. Boston team, 14-2.

Coaches Renzie Lamb and Erv Chambliss recently brought the squad back from the Suncoast Lacrosse Tournament in Tampa, Florida, where the team went 2-2 during the preseason spring break.

The 1983 team is inexperienced and lacks stickhandling depth but relies on a few key players and stringent conditioning to remain competitive in Division III play.

Eph leaders

Tom Davies '84 has been the Eph's scoring threat early on with nine goals in the first two games; he is the firepower behind the Williams attack. Reese Hughes '85 and Mark Payton '84 also anchor the attack with three and two scores respectively. Chris Toli '86 is a promising freshman whose quickness and scoring is evident around the net and at midfield. Toli scored unassisted off a face-off, cruising in alone from the midline, in second half play vs. U.N.H.

Co-captain Tim Curran '83, Kelth Haynes '84, and Matt Dunn '86, all have been stellar performers as middles. Haynes has been a regular since freshman year and is an exciting player, the catalyst. Curran, a football defensive standout, is the leader who is counted on to pump the net.

Sperry hurt

A vicious check during the third period of Saturday's U.N.H. loss led to the injury, a possible shoulder separation, of co-captain and defensive star Bill Sperry '84. His absence is a crucial loss to a squad few in number and inexperienced. John Graham '83, Rick Haylon '84, hard-hitting Matt Kennedy '84 and Dick Wilde '85 anchor the defense.

A welcome addition to Williams lacrosse has been goalie Brad DuPont '86. DuPont has excelled at tending net and saved eleven in Saturday's losing effort. He is a demon to score against and clears the ball well. Dave Flynn '85, last season's proven goalie, is more than an adequate backup. Newcomer Ted Thomas '85 is a defensive and face-off specialist at middle.

The team is off for a week preparing for Saturday's home match-up with Tufts, which is fresh from upsetting Amherst. The game begins at 2:00 P.M.

Men swim to third in nationals

The men's swim team finished third with 183 points in the Division III Nationals in Canton, Ohio over spring break. Kenyon won the championship with 334.5 points, while Claremont (194 points) was second.

The men broke one National, two New England and two other school records on their way to the third place finish.

After a third-place finish on the first day, the Ephs overtook Claremont for second on the second day of competition, while Kenyon pulled out to an unsurmountable lead. On the third and final day, however, Claremont pulled ahead to edge Williams by 11 points.

Record-breakers

Freshman Bill Couch broke a national record in the 400 individual medley on the second day, but had to settle for second behind a Claremont swimmer.

Ben Aronson '83, with a time of 1:52.47, broke a New England record in the 200 butterfly on the third day. Also on that day the 400 yard freestyle relay team of Mark Weeks '83, Will Andrew '86, Rob Sommer '84 and Jeff Mills '84 broke a New England record with a time of 3:06.40, finishing third in the race.

Sommer also set two new school records, with a 1:55.83 in the 200 individual medley (second place), and a 1:54.19 in the 200 backstroke (also a second place finish).

Other top finishers

Senior diver Jim Stockton finished fourth in the one-meter and third in the three meter diving events.

Other top finishers for Williams included a second in the 800 meter freestyle relay, a second for Sommer in the 100 meter backstroke, and a fourth in the 400 medley relay.

The tennis team topped MIT in Cambridge on Saturday for their second straight road victory to open the season. The varsity prevailed by a 7-2 score, while the freshmen team opened up its season with a 7-4 victory. The varsity also beat Middlebury 7-2 on Wednesday, but lost a scrimmage Sunday at Boston College 6-3.

Playing without junior Greg Zaff, who is currently competing in amateur squash tournaments and plans to join the team later in the season, the varsity rolled past MIT.

Quick victories

Two-set wins by first singles player Craig Hammond '85, third singles player Brook Larmer '84, sixth singles player Tom Harrity '84 and the doubles teams of Hammond-Tim Rives '85, Larmer-Mark Sopher '83, and Kelton Burbank '83-Tim Petersen '86 led the Ephs.

Yale rugby edges Williams

by Bert Salisbury

The Williams ruggers hosted Yale RFC last Saturday and finished the day with a close A-side loss 12-10, a B-side win 25-7, and a C-side loss 14-6.

In the first match, A-side dominated most of the game but two quick Yale scores late in the second half led to the defeat. The first Williams score came on a long run involving many players with Dave Park '83 finally touching the ball down. Park's conversion gave Williams an early 6-0 lead.

John Frese '84 scored the second Williams try after he picked up a pop kick by Mike Brownrigg '83 and forced his way to the score. Vince Durnan '83 did a great job capturing balls in lineouts while John Donovan '83 controlled the ball in the scrumdowns. Jim Steggall '83 and Mike Fortunato added to the Williams punch. Though the match was a tough defeat, the A-side showed much promise for the rest of the season.

B's get win

B-side fared better in a 25-7 win. Rob Kusel '83 had a fine game, scoring a try and 5 points in 'kicks. Collin Moseley '83 added power to the line with his fine running and a score of his own. Both the line and the scrum played well together keeping the Yale side on the defensive most of the game.

Additional scores came from scrumline Joe Carey '83 and linemen Mark Evans '85 and John Conion '85. The fine scrum work was backed by the great play of Mike Koister '85. This decisive win over Yale is just the start of a fine season for the B's.

Enthusiastic C's

In the last match of the day the C-side lost a tough game to an experienced Yale side. Drew Klein '84 was the backbone of the side with his fine play and leadership. The only Williams score came on a nice run by Aytac Apaydin '83 with the conversion made by Klein. Most players on the side were playing in their first game, and their effort and enthusiasm were just not enough to overcome the experience of the Yale side, although the play of Blake Martin '84 and Eddie O'Toole '86 showed great potential.

Crew sweeps regatta with string of firsts

by Lee Farbman

The men's crews swept a regatta held April 2nd in Philadelphia. The varsity, novice lightweights, and novice heavyweights all took first place in races against Villanova, St. Johns, Mercyhurst and LaSalle colleges. The crews stopped in Philadelphia on the way back from the spring training trip to Washington, D.C.

The varsity eight, on the strength of a strong start, passed the LaSalle boat in the first 500 meters and never looked back. A determined Peter Detwiler '83, rowing in the stroke seat, kept the rating at 32 strokes per minute for the entire race. Williams finished in 6:19, 7 seconds ahead of LaSalle. St. Johns was never in the race; the Redmen finished 43 seconds back.

Novices move up

As only one novice race was held, the Eph novice heavyweight eight was promoted to junior varsity status. The team proved themselves more than worthy of the move, as they recovered from a poor start to move through the field and take the race by 30 seconds.

Stroke Josh Swift '86 kept the rating at 30 down the 2000 meter course. Coxswain Pam Tabari's hand was in the air, signifying the boat was not ready, when the "Row!" command was given. Nevertheless, the Ephs were able to come from behind to win in 6:07. LaSalle edged Mercyhurst for second, and St. Johns brought up the rear.

Lightweights come from behind

In perhaps the most exciting race of the day, the Williams novice lightweights came from behind to edge Villanova in the last 200 meters. Rowing an astounding 33 strokes per minute; stroke Mark Rothstein and the lights stayed with Villanova, matching their final burst of speed stroke for stroke. In the last few strokes the Ephs broke free to beat Villanova by 1.6 seconds in 6:31. LaSalle was third, never in the race.

The Ephs will travel to Worcester on Saturday to race W.P.I. and Connecticut College.

Trustees confront divestment issue in first open forum

by Ned Ladd

After six years of sporadic communication between the Trustees and the student body, the College held an open forum to deal with the question of divestment last Friday at Chapin Hall.

The meeting, run by Chairman of the Trustees' Executive Committee Preston Parish '41, featured presentations by five Trustees, one student and one faculty member.

The Trustees explained that the present investment policy is based on the principle of "institutional neutrality." President John Chandler said that the College is a "center of inquiry" that has a "limited and defined purpose—learning."

He conceded that "it is easy to construe institutional neutrality as moral indifference," but maintained that it was the responsibility of individuals and interest groups within the College to "respond to the wide range of human needs."

Abandonment of "institutional neutrality," according to Chandler, could lead to the establishment of an "orthodox body [of political statements] that would limit open examination and inquiry."

Trustees' tasks

Parish outlined the obligations of the Trustees in his remarks. He explained that he was entrusted with "not only the assets but the intentions of benefactors" of the endowment.

Parish said the Trustees must "provide for the well-being of Williams" as an educational institution. He added that the Trustees must both insure that the educational purposes of the College are advanced and insure the financial security of the institution.

Chairman of the Trustees Finance Committee Charles Mott '53 echoed Parish's statements, saying that the Trustees are "personally liable for loss or mismanagement of funds."

He also stressed "maintaining an open and healthy intellectual climate while also maintaining a healthy financial climate."

Proxy votes

Another Trustee, Francis Vincent '60, questioned whether divestment is an effective way to force change in South Africa. He claimed that Williams could force change in corporations operating in South Africa by participating in proxies and shareholder resolutions. "It represents the most reasonable way of being responsible," he said.

Economics professor Steven Lewis also challenged the effectiveness of divestment. "The most effective means to effect change is through shareholder proxies," Lewis argued. He went on to explain that "much could be done by American business in South Africa."

Isolation

The only pro-divestment speaker, Steven Sowie '83, a member of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC), stated that institutional neutrality "isolates Williams from the outside world." He maintained that by investing in corporations dealing in South Africa, "the College is already taking a stand."

House transfers drop by half, Frosh spurn Mission Park

by Jack Mayher

A sharp decline in the number of transfers, from 312 last year to 125, and a shift in popularity in freshman inclusion were cited as the most significant developments of this year's housing process at the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) meeting last Tuesday.

Dean Cris Roosenraad, chairman of the committee, claimed a "direct correlation" between CUL action and this year's results. Shrinking the group size permitted for transfers, and putting freshman inclusion before it appeared to make people "afraid to risk it."

The lower number of applicants this year made it easier to place those who did apply, the result being that 64.8 percent got either their first or second choice and no one received lower than their twelfth (out of 15 possible residential houses.)

The CUL felt this year's inclusion requests gave a much truer indication of what people really wanted. "People seemed to realize that they would be spending three years in that building," one member said. This meant that Mission Park moved from the most common second choice to fifth, and the Berkshire quad shot up in popularity.

Here are the results of the 1983 freshman inclusion process as compared to 1982 figures. The bracketed numbers in the chart indicate the number of students who applied to the house, versus the number actually admitted.

College admits Class of 1987, minorities down, New Yorkers up

by Christian K. Howlett

Besides being tax day, last Friday was also D-Day for high school seniors waiting to hear from colleges. Williams mailed 1060 acceptance letters to approximately 26 percent of the total applicant pool for the Class of 1987.

Relatively more Southerners, foreigners and city residents than in previous years will be freshmen next year, according to Admissions Director Phil Smith.

Assuming that about 50 percent of those accepted will come, the College is aiming for a freshman class of 510, and a sex ratio of 55 percent male and 45 percent female.

The students who were accepted represent 47 states, though applicants came from all 50, with New York, Massachusetts and California leading the way. Two traditionally strong states, New Jersey and Connecticut, declined this year.

More local residents

There have been a number of other demographic shifts this year, Smith noted. The number

The Williams Record

Fear of Fleeing

Figures released this week reveal that housing transfers are down 60 percent this year. The Housing Committee has acknowledged the obvious correlation between that reduction and the Committee on Undergraduate Life's (CUL) new transfer policies. The Committee for the 80's report called for greater house unity. Since then, the CUL has been striving to discourage transfers to reach that goal.

Transfers are down. We've achieved that. But what have we gained? We suspect that fear, not unity, may be the force at work. Dean Cris Roosenraad has conceded that transfers are down because people are "afraid to risk it." In seeking ethos we got apprehension.

The policies which limit transfer groups to two people and place freshmen in houses before transfers slant the system too harshly.

House unity is fostered by improved houses, more activities, living with friends, and other positive inducements. Confining people to a house through fear, when they might be happier elsewhere, stimulates apathy.

These latest statistics are not good news. House unity is a good goal. But the current methods are taking us down the wrong path.

Errors

To the editor:

Your article on Economics Department turnover in the April 12 issue contains a number of errors. Most of them are contained in the second paragraph. We are sorry you did not take the trouble to contact us, but we will set the record straight: Juliet B. Schlor has accepted a position at Barnard College, Columbia University; Timothy Fries, for a combination of personal and professional reasons, has taken a position at the University of Florida; Gerald Epstein will be joining the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research in the Economics Department.

In addition, Reghbendra Jha has resigned, which your article neglected to mention.

Resentment

To the editor:

As one of the campus' non-activists, I have observed the activities of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition sometimes with approval, sometimes with interest, and sometimes with irritation. I am sorry to say that WAAC's appearance at the PM Magazine taping session of April 14 left me with a deep sense of resentment. I understand that WAAC feels it fights for a worthy cause; few intelligent, sane people condone apartheid. But does a demonstration, complete with chanting and posters, belong at a taping for PM Magazine? Are demonstrations justified at any and all affairs if one's cause is of sufficient merit? I hope not.

I viewed the advent of the PM Magazine taping as a treat for Williams College—an opportunity for harmless fun. I did not appreciate the arrival of WAAC demonstrators, nor could I understand what provoked or justified their demonstration. Does any special event now present sufficient criteria to invite a WAAC demonstration? Again, I hope not.

I would be hard pressed to state guidelines for "appropriate" situations for WAAC demonstrations, but I feel very strongly that WAAC demonstrations do not belong always and everywhere. I respect WAAC's right to voice its opinions, but I feel that PM Magazine's taping session did not offer an appropriate forum for protest. I found WAAC's presence unfortunate and unnecessary.

Response

To the editor:

Your editorial of April 12th asserts that "It is now incumbent upon divestiture's advocates to pool their intellectual efforts and to formulate a response (to the recent Williams Reports)."

This is to point out that we have done that. Two weeks before the Administration promulgated their position, we issued a booklet, Papers on Divestment. This booklet provided our analyses of the divestment question along with supporting documents. Next to the professionally prepared Williams Reports, our booklet looks like a poor cousin. It is photocopied and bound by mere staples. Further, we had the resources to distribute it only to faculty, while the Administration's position was impressively presented to students and alums as well. We simply are no match for them in terms of resources, although we feel we have made the most persuasive arguments through our poor booklet and through the lecture series we organized and sponsored.

Hopkins speaks

To the editor:

While doing research recently, I came across the following letter which struck me as pertinent to a certain campus issue. I am not convinced that its author is who it purports to be, but I am sure that, were Hopkins alive today, he would not hesitate to sign his name to this letter. The ideals are his. (Cf. Frederick Rudolph, Mark Hopkins and the Log (New Haven, 1956). In any case, perhaps the letter's authorship is not what is important.

My dear Successor,

What are you doing to my College? What are you teaching my students? While I usually prefer to approach subjects dealing with slavery cautiously, in this case I cannot remain quiet. My definition of the ideal college is at stake.

You say that the preeminent purpose of Williams is to serve the educational needs of current and future generations of students? And that the College's educational effectiveness requires that its policies and practices be morally grounded? Certainly I am no enemy of property and wealth; and I know the difficulties of money-raising. But are the College's investment policies and practices morally grounded? I am not convinced.

I do not think that we share a common definition of education. It sounds to me as if you are subordinating morals to "education," as if the outcome—pure knowledge—were most important than its basis—morals. What good is a man who has mastered subject matter but not cultivated his character? Our preeminent purpose should be to promote the social and moral welfare of our students.

I am

Political debate leaves colleges 'vulnerable'

Former President voices concern

by John E. Sawyer

My distress over the prospect of deep and lasting divisions within the Williams community is such that I wish to express my views about the place of external issues in the on-going life of a college. Regarding the current divestiture issue, two things seem apparent, one much less so. First, there is clearly no division over continuing opposition to the premises, policies, and apparatus of apartheid, nor over support of the goals of economic opportunity, social dignity, and timely, effective political participation for the Black majority in South Africa.

It is less clear whether divestiture best serves those goals, or whether the presence of American companies that offer better opportunities, incomes, and working conditions for Blacks—in line with the Sullivan Principles—improves their lives and perhaps acts as a slow solvent in intractable circumstances where head-on collision promises little more than bloodshed and repression. I do not pretend to know enough to assess this equation. In the fall of 1981, I heard The Study Commission on U.S. Policy toward Southern Africa present its findings. A fresh reading of its recommendations confirms that it urged implementation of the Sullivan Principles and other corporate social contributions, but concluded that "Divestment and other major economic sanctions are not recommended under current circumstances." Given the able, fair-minded, and public spirited Americans who served on the Commission, and given the extent of their investigation, I read this as a measured, pragmatic judgment under extremely difficult conditions in which absolutes are scarce.

By contrast with the inherent uncertainties in that complex and painful scene, I believe there can be no doubt about the fearful destructive costs of putting an institution as fragile as an independent New England college through a series of divisive battles over events and issues external to its essential tasks of teaching, learning, and research. Such an institution depends on the cooperative efforts and joint support of the several constituencies that sustain it and make up its essential qualities—faculty, students, trustees, alumni, parents, and friends. Strains and scars within and among these constituencies can severely lessen its operating effectiveness in fulfilling its purpose; and politicization of an institution of higher education can leave it vulnerable to intervention by forces far more powerful than anything on campus. Individuals should be free to express such views or take such positions as they wish, but should not be free to tear the institution apart to serve even their deeply-held personal opinions.

Let this response be read as reflecting insensitivity to the immediate issue, let me note that I've previously addressed this institutional question in quite different (and no less passionate) contexts in the 1950's, 1960's, and 1970's, speaking to its most recently at Mount Holyoke College in October 1978:

"Nor does it seem wise or necessary for colleges and universities—as institutions—to have to go through the struggles of Laocoon over every external issue this troubled world presents. Let individuals or groups get involved as they wish, but should we not reflect more carefully on how far the institution should be drawn into conflict or deflected from its own most important purpose? And must we not recognize at what cost it is so deflected?

It is this cost, and this perspective, that I feel deserves careful weighing. As in the Vietnam years, institutions of higher education are close at hand, open, and vulnerable. Yet they are hardly the source of the problem. The last 30 years have produced too many intense issues about which good people have felt strongly, and differently. The future promises too many more to make it seem wise to sacrifice the cohesion and independence of colleges and universities—in their educational purposes and as fora for open inquiry and discussion—to exact whatever marginal contributions they might be able to make, as institutions, to resolving successive external issues.

Alum's 'real world' perspective: divest

by Robert A. Stackpole

As this article goes to print, the faculty debates its own stance on divestment while students hold vigils and hunger strikes, and a steady stream of lecturers appear on campus offering their viewpoints. Every segment of the college community seems embroiled in the controversy save one: the alumni. Ironically, it is the fate of funds donated by alumni which are largely in question, and it is the unique perspective of the alumni, "living in the world," which is missing from the debate.

My perspective on this issue comes not only from personal research, but from the unique opportunity I had to live with and question a remarkable individual from South Africa. The Reverend Zephaniah Malachi, pastor of a small Black Reformed Church outside of Cape Town, came to stay with our family last summer in preparation for several guest sermons which he gave at our parish. Hardly a political radical or travelling agitator, Rev. Malachi nevertheless delivered a powerful message, both by his words and personality. I shall never forget a private lecture that he gave to several students, using as his only text the official Yearbook of the Republic of South Africa. The statistics he related were staggering.

Rev. Malachi calmly told us that Blacks make up 72 percent of the population but may legally dwell on only 13 percent of the land. On these segregated rural lands (called "homelands" by the government), the infant mortality rate for Blacks is 28.2 percent; for Whites nationwide, it is 1.2 percent. There is only one doctor for every 40,000 rural Blacks. Moreover, the White government has forcibly relocated over two million Blacks from White areas into these Black areas and homelands over the last few decades.

"Why does the Black population not band together and demand justice?" we asked him.

He replied that it was not so easy. Blacks may not legally vote or hold elected office. The press is censored by the government, and internal security laws allow the police to arrest, imprison, and banish Black spokesmen without trial. Torture and murder by police occur all too often. In short, a Black who speaks out for change takes his life in his hands.

Secondly, Rev. Malachi explained, one has to understand the degree of government control over the lives of Blacks in South Africa. Most are poorly educated and can therefore hold only the low-paying industrial and agricultural jobs available in the White areas. Since these workers may legally dwell only in Black areas, they are considered migrant laborers and hence must live in special Black worker compounds where they are kept under close government surveillance. Moreover, if labelled "trouble-makers" they are often fired and sent back to the homelands. With wives and children in the homelands dependent on their husband's paychecks, few Blacks can risk losing their jobs over political principle.

Perhaps the most startling aspect of Rev. Malachi's whole talk, however, was the complete lack of hatred and bitterness for the Whites who cripple, demean, and impoverish his people. "I cannot hate them," he said with sadness. "I have to feel sorry for them. They have to live every day with a burden of guilt and hatred on their souls which no one can lift for them." One Sunday, Rev. Malachi delivered a sermon entitled "The Salt of the Earth." "You Christians are the salt of the earth," he said, "Although salt disappears in the food, you can tell it is there by its taste. Even so, you must by your love and witness be salt for the world." I understood that the witness of Rev. Malachi and Black Christians in his land consisted in living a daily, suffering message of faith.

Subsequent research into South Africa simply proved to me that the United States, with extensive investments in the apartheid economy, only contributes to that suffering. American companies provide South Africa with resources which are essential to its oppressive system, and that few other countries could supply: oil (in violation of an international embargo) and advanced energy technology, computers (for police surveillance), military vehicles, and advanced weapons technology. Many of these items, if not supplied by the U.S. directly, are purchased from other nations with loans from U.S. banks. "The net effect of American investment," reported the Senate Subcommittee on Africa, "has been to strengthen the economic and military self-sufficiency of the apartheid regime."

American business efforts to gain reforms for Blacks have been weak and completely ineffective. The Sullivan Principles have been signed by about half of the U.S. companies in South Africa. However, even if all the U.S. companies signed the principles (and truly abided by them) their impact would be miniscule; while U.S. investment in dollar terms is great, U.S. firms actually employ only one percent of all workers in South Africa. As a result, only a handful of Black workers would be affected. Furthermore, the Sullivan Principles say nothing about the complete denial of two of the Black's basic civil rights: disenfranchisement, and the brutal homelands policy of forced resettlement.

The London Times has called South Africa "a time bomb of discontent and revolution fodder;" the prospect of the Cape Sea route and South Africa's strategic resources falling into Communist hands can hardly be attractive to the West. Yet it seems unlikely that the White government will act to head off disaster by establishing social justice. For example, economic growth logically calls for more educated Black workers, but only as a last resort are Blacks being trained for and given high-skill positions. The growth of Black trade unions is a positive sign; the recent crack-down on the South African Council of Churches is not. Time for non-violent solutions grows short.

As our days together came to a close, I asked Rev.

Malachi what Americans could do to help South Africa find justice and peace. "The only peaceful solution that I see," he said, "would be for foreign companies to withdraw their money, to leave the country."

Would not Black workers themselves suffer the most from divestment?

"Yes, but you must understand," he replied, "We are suffering so much already. At least this time our suffering would be mixed with hope. Perhaps if our White brothers begin to suffer economically along with us, they will see that we are brothers in Christ, and that we need each other in South Africa. Perhaps then there will be change."

Time for non-violent solutions grows short.

These words reminded me of the talk given by Bishop Tutu of South Africa here in the United States. He said: "Clearly we can't survive on crumbs of concession that fall from the master's table ... What we really want is to be able to sit at the table and decide the menu with you."

If Williams College divested from companies doing business in South Africa, its impact alone would be small. But Williams would join a growing number of universities, churches, and state and local governments that have already divested and whose combined impact is great indeed. In fact, the White regime in South Africa is so concerned about the removal of investments that it has made it illegal (punishable by at least five years in prison) to publicly call for divestment.

One also has to place confidence in the trustees of Williams College: as skilled businessmen they will surely be able to find other avenues of investment—which would be equally profitable for the college—as many other institutions have already done.

I write in the firm belief that it is time the Williams alumni, "the silent majority" of the college community, makes itself heard on this issue. President Chandler has expressed the fear that many alumni would be offended by divestment and might respond by ending their generous giving to the alumni fund drive. I believe that he underestimated the moral integrity of Williams graduates. In fact, I trust that many Williams men and women would increase their giving out of respect for a courageous stand on this issue.

As the debate comes to a climax this spring on the Williams campus, alumni letters and communications could have a major impact. I urge the alumni to speak out now on this issue, as Williams decides its relationship to apartheid, and as my brother in Christ, Rev. Malachi, returns to that troubled, embittered, divided land.

Referendum Results

The following are some results of last Tuesday's College Council investment referendum. College Council President Tom Paper '84 noted that the turnout of 697 students was low but not inconsistent with other referendums and elections this year.

He added that the general trend seems to be that a majority of students favor divestment but realize that economic factors are important. He also said, however, that many measures the students supported cannot realistically occur in the near future, particularly immediate full divestment from all civil rights-violating countries.

In a recent meeting the College Council supported sections b and d of the second question listed here.

larity as a first choice. This led to the discussion of whether or not Mission Park is a problem, with 16 percent of the class receiving it as a fourth or fifth choice. Mission's being 45 percent sophomores was seen as a problem but one without a good solution. However, with the new transfer system affecting the Class of 1986, those who got Mission as fourth or fifth choice should be able to get out. In other business, the CUL decided to turn the corner suites in East and Fayerweather into two room triples to accommodate next year's larger freshman class.

Racism

To the editor:

According to President Chandler and other trustees, education is an "unambiguous social good" (from the Williams Report and repeated during the April 15 open meeting) which stands above and beyond society in its "institutional neutrality."

What the trustees have managed to expose is their sad misunderstanding of politics, education, and even Williams itself. An institution which invests in corporations that do business in South Africa has lost sight of what is a "social good." These investments include a philosophical/political stand: one can put one's $ wherever one pleases. This does not mean that the college is somehow neutral and apolitical; it means it keeps its money in South Africa, and this has political significance because we live in the political world.

What good is a socially good education at an institution which will not allow social change? How can we remain silent while millions are starved beaten isolated dehumanized ignored because they are black, because they have "no bearing on college operations"?

The trustees managed to avoid talking about what is the main concern of students for divestment here: the minority white population viciously controls the majority black population, and that's institutionalized

Trustee tells tales of life in Russia

N.Y. Times correspondent 'drunk under the table'

by Mark Averitt

Williams Trustee and chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Times Hedrick Smith '55 returned to campus Friday to delight audiences with tales of how he dealt with life in the Soviet Union as a correspondent. Some of his stories came from his recent best-selling book, The Russians. Smith described his three-and-one-half years in Moscow, saying he lived in a "ghetto," as do all foreign correspondents in the Soviet Union, surrounded by a nine foot wall with spikes and glass on the top. A KGB man guarded the entrance to the compound "so nobody could get at us and harm us," Smith laughed. "We had a nicely supervised, kindergarten situation."

He said it was difficult to get to know the people because "foreign correspondents, and even Russian journalists, are taken as spies." His first conversations with Russians were about family matters, often occurring over vodka on trains. "Russians like to drink foreigners under the table," commented Smith. "I should know. I've been under the table."

racism. Institutional neutrality means institutional racism here when we support it there, when we are silent, when we attempt to claim ourselves apolitical beings in an apolitical institution.

If our investment policy is based solely on economics, or if it is simply morally haphazard, then we are dehumanized, we are racists, we should be afraid of ourselves.

And everyone who wasn't in Chapin Hall at 4 on Friday because s/he's simply tired of the subject, remember you're racist. And WCFM which thinks it's apolitical when it announces the trustees meeting at 4 but won't announce the students meeting/rally at 3:30 (our side is political but their side is somehow apolitical?), which doesn't think to broadcast the meeting so people can hear what's happening at this intellectual institution of ours, remember you're racist.

We don't take things seriously here, we ignore them, how much affect can we really have, hey we're tired and busy... Yes, we're all busy with important things and there are plenty of political/ethnic/moral fights to join, but that is no reason to ignore this current national fight against apartheid.

This is not a call for white guilt. Going to Friday's meeting does not soothe anyone's guilt, but it allows us, I hope, to confront some of our racism and world racism.

And this confrontation makes us angry. Because we're getting tired/cynical/hopeless (welcome to the club) and that's a funny unambiguous social good which this education provides. That's what I heard Friday: anger and cynicism and a desire to pin down the trustees and verbally slap them.

Still, I respect the trustees for being there. I respect the audience for being there. I respect the Williams Record for taking an editorial stance on divestment and Germinal for producing an issue on the subject. You see, I'm not entirely cynical. Williams' education has got two more years of work before I'm all good and ready for the apolitical racist world and the unambiguous good of government, of business, of science and technology...

Isolationist neutrality is a frightening political stance. Too many people have to crawl forward slowly, trying for progress, social change, a little bit of freedom for ourselves and others; there's not one of us wouldn't rather run, but couldn't you at least not apolitically step on our hands?

Funnymen bring New York style to night club

by Mark Dursztman

Comprising a bill that would make even the seasoned club-goer salivate, the four comedians featured at last Thursday's "Evening of Comedy" were responsible for more smiling faces than a truckload of Phil Smith acceptance letters.

Bill McCarty's style is rooted in his cynical, sarcastic wit. Thursday night he was especially sharp, bouncing through his routine which featured hilarious bits about abusing rental cars, Catholic school and mathematics.

McCarty "worked the crowd" skillfully; in fact, he drew some of his most inspired moments directly from the audience. Upon soliciting the name of Arunas Gudaitis '84, McCarty shot back, "Hey, this is America, buddy. From now on, you're Arnie!"

Many people told me after the show that they felt that McCarty was the most entertaining comedian of the evening, and it is that type of response that has made him a mainstay of the New York, as well as of the national club scene for several years.

Distinctive style

Comedian Frankie Pace entertained an enthusiastic crowd in Driscoll Lounge this week. (Schell)

impressions such as a baby being born and a police car. One could call Pace "a comedian's comedian." In fact, at one point, he had to stop his routine when Bill Scheft's uncontrolled laughter became too distracting.

WCFM polishes image

by Mark Averitt

Because of pressure from record producers, the WCFM Board of Directors has mandated that all regular shows contain at least 25 percent newly-released music. The Board may make it more difficult for students to get certified to go on the air as well. Many of the station's 70 disc jockeys are unhappy with the new rules.

"I would like to tell you everything that I think about the direction the Board is taking this station," commented one DJ who wished to remain anonymous, "but for all I know, I could end up on the 2-4 AM slot on Wednesdays."

"A lot of DJ's see the radio as their own personal jukebox," explained Lee Farberman, general manager of WCFM. "But we're getting a lot of criticism and I want us to sound better. I don't want people to joke about us on campus."

Penalties

After continued violations the DJ could lose air time.

A number of DJ's feel that these rules curtail their freedom, although music director Bill Wright '84 disagrees. "The 25 percent policy really doesn't affect the quality of a show very much," explained Wright, "and if we prove to the record producers that we're playing their new stuff, then they send us albums for free."

High quality?

The Board is also attempting to increase professionalism by providing high quality, consistent programming at WCFM. Program director Jay Ward '84 said the issue of program consistency arose out of a meeting with personnel from WJW, the North Adams State College radio station.

"We asked them 'How does the outside world view WCFM?' and they told us, 'Your listeners don't know what to expect. There's no continuity in your programming!'" Ward said.

Referendum Results

The following are some results of last Tuesday's College Council investment referendum. College Council President Tom Paper '84 noted that the turnout of 697 students was low but not inconsistent with other referendums and elections this year.

He added that the general trend seems to be that a majority of students favor divestment but realize that economic factors are important. He also said, however, that many measures the students supported cannot realistically occur in the near future, particularly immediate full divestment from all civil rights-violating countries.

In a recent meeting the College Council supported sections b and d of the second question listed here.

Would you support full divestment if it were proven that Williams' endowment, tuition, and services would not suffer?

larity as a first choice.

This led to the discussion of whether or not Mission Park is a problem, with 16 percent of the class receiving it as a fourth or fifth choice. Mission's being 45 percent sophomore was seen as a problem but one without a good solution. However, with the new transfer system affecting the Class of 1986, those who got Mission as fourth or fifth choice should be able to get out. In other business, the CUL decided to turn the corner suites in East and Fayerweather into two room triples to accommodate next year's larger freshman class.

N.Y. Times correspondent 'drunk under the table'

by Mark Averitt

Williams Trustee and chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Times Hedrick Smith '55 returned to campus Friday to delight audiences with tales of how he dealt with life in the Soviet Union as a correspondent. Some of his stories came from his recent best-selling book, The Russians. Smith described his three-and-one-half years in Moscow, saying he lived in a "ghetto," as do all foreign correspondents in the Soviet Union, surrounded by a nine foot wall with spikes and glass on the top. A KGB man guarded the entrance to the compound "so nobody could get at us and harm us," Smith laughed. "We had a nicely supervised, kindergarten situation."

He said it was difficult to get to know the people because "foreign correspondents, and even Russian journalists, are taken as spies." His first conversations with Russians were about family matters, often occurring over vodka on trains.

"Russians like to drink foreigners under the table," commented Smith. "I should know. I've been under the table."

LETTERS

Funnymen bring New York style to night club

by Mark Dursztman

Comprising a bill that would make even the seasoned club-goer salivate, the four comedians featured at last Thursday's "Evening of Comedy" were responsible for more smiling faces than a truckload of Phil Smith acceptance letters.

Bill McCarty's style is rooted in his cynical, sarcastic wit. Thursday night he was especially sharp, bouncing through his routine which featured hilarious bits about abusing rental cars, Catholic school and mathematics.

McCarty "worked the crowd" skillfully; in fact, he drew some of his most inspired moments directly from the audience. Upon soliciting the name of Arunas Gudaitis '84, McCarty shot back, "Hey, this is America, buddy. From now on, you're Arnie!"

Many people told me after the show that they felt that McCarty was the most entertaining comedian of the evening, and it is that type of response that has made him a mainstay of the New York, as well as of the national club scene for several years.

Distinctive style

Gilbert Gottfried is a difficult comedian to describe, since the most distinctive aspect of his act is his style, which sets him above most other comedians. While rarely, if ever making eye contact with the audience, Gottfried used a Jewish speaking style, with emphasis on phrase repetition and abrupt transitions, to win the crowd over. He displayed amazing versatility, doing napkin jokes, imitating Jerry Lewis signing the Who, and rendering the world's most economical impressions of Bela Lugosi and Humphrey Bogart.

If one measures a comedian's success by the frequency with which he is quoted or imitated by fans, Gottfried may soon become a cult figure. Since Thursday evening, I have heard 20 to 30 Gilbert Gottfrieds around campus, recreating many of the finer moments of the evening.

impressions such as a baby being born and a police car. One could call Pace "a comedian's comedian." In fact, at one point, he had to stop his routine when Bill Scheft's uncontrolled laughter became too distracting.

Pace's "hit and run" delivery, tightly integrating and segueing bits of humor, was ideally suited to the latter part of the show, when everyone was primed by almost two hours of laughter and drinks. It was a difficult task to top off such a great evening, but Pace's act was a fine culmination to the evening's festivities.

Bill Scheft, the evening's master of ceremonies, is someone who I knew would be a great success at Williams. Educated at Deerfield Academy and Harvard, he is in tune with many things of which we are acutely aware.

In opening the show, Scheft surveyed the audience and proclaimed, "This looks like a clearance sale at L. L. Bean!" Scheft was on target on his routine all evening. Sporting a cigar and a broad smile, he appeared entirely relaxed, contributing to his tremendous appeal. Scheft managed to entertain without overtly performing, which is a rare quality.

Man-not-on-the-quad

In light of this week's visit from PM Magazine in which Williams students were asked what famous personality they thought they resembled, the RECORD decided to ask these celebrities which Williams character they looked like.

Prince Charles and Lady Di with baby William: When we're on campus, we fit right in as David Cohen, Lisa Jayne and Bill Couch.

Daddy Warbucks, star of "Annie": Sometimes I remind myself of R.G.L. Waite.

Warren Zevon: With this beard, I must look like Uncle Jim Hall. I also like to think I look like Tim Bartel, or maybe even Jeff Brainard.

WCFM polishes image

by Mark Averitt

Because of pressure from record producers, the WCFM Board of Directors has mandated that all regular shows contain at least 25 percent newly-released music. The Board may make it more difficult for students to get certified to go on the air as well. Many of the station's 70 disc jockeys are unhappy with the new rules.

"I would like to tell you everything that I think about the direction the Board is taking this station," commented one DJ who wished to remain anonymous, "but for all I know, I could end up on the 2-4 AM slot on Wednesdays."

"A lot of DJ's see the radio as their own personal jukebox," explained Lee Farberman, general manager of WCFM. "But we're getting a lot of criticism and I want us to sound better. I don't want people to joke about us on campus."

Penalties

The penalty for not playing new music is an assignment to an engineering job on a sports or news program, which is generally agreed to be undesirable.

After continued violations the DJ could lose air time.

A number of DJ's feel that these rules curtail their freedom, although music director Bill Wright '84 disagrees. "The 25 percent policy really doesn't affect the quality of a show very much," explained Wright, "and if we prove to the record producers that we're playing their new stuff, then they send us albums for free."

High quality?

The Board is also attempting to increase professionalism by providing high quality, consistent programming at WCFM. Program director Jay Ward '84 said the issue of program consistency arose out of a meeting with personnel from WJW, the North Adams State College radio station.

"We asked them 'How does the outside world view WCFM?' and they told us, 'Your listeners don't know what to expect. There's no continuity in your programming!'" Ward said.

Trio debuts 'Ritual'

by Carl Leafstedt

Last Friday night, the Williams Trio presented their last concert of the season, a concert which, though occasionally tainted by a missed note or run, was very good.

The concert opened with the Piano Trio No. 2 in F minor by a little known turn-of-the-century Russian composer and teacher, Anton Arensky. This trio, a rarity in the concert hall, was presented quite effectively by the members of the Trio, but nonetheless failed to win over the audience, probably due to Arensky's seeming lack of inspiration in the last two movements.

World Premiere

After intermission came the highlight of the evening, the world premiere of "Ritual and Sabotage of the 20th Century." This piece was commissioned by the Williams Trio from American composer Christopher Yavelow.

The composer's own, detailed program notes say that the concept of this new piece was to describe the evolution of a group of 20th century rituals containing a "common thread of negative or destructive properties." This trio was a set of effective miniatures which detailed the composer's idea that history is condemned to repeat itself.

Contemporary clarity Though undeniably modern, "Ritual and Sabotage of the 20th Century" conveyed to the audience the composer's object with a clarity seldom heard in contemporary music. The "ritual rhythm" and "ritual theme" were discernable throughout, especially at the end, when all three instruments pounded out the "ritual rhythm" in unison for a half-minute or so.

The concern ended with a warhorse in trio literature, the Trio in C minor, Op. 101, by Johannes Brahms. This year marks the 150th anniversary of Brahms' birth and perhaps this was the Trio's way of celebrating.

Notwithstanding a slight choppiness in the slow movement, and some curious tempo alterations in the last movement which disrupted the forward motion, the Trio performed this difficult work with a flair that demonstrated a love of Brahms' chamber music.

He also explained that divestment would have "no negative effect" economically.

In the subsequent discussion period with audience participation, most of the questioners who faced the Trustees favored divestment.

Religion professor Nathan Katz challenged Chandler's concept of institutional neutrality, saying "I don't see how investment is apolitical while divestment is political."

Conflict of interest

Laura Hoptman '83 asked Parish, an executive at Upjohn Co., about his employment and possible conflicts of interest concerning possible divestment. Parish explained that he had "refrained from voting" on issues of divestment from Upjohn because, as an employee, he may indeed have some conflicting interests.

Political Science professor Raymond

Baker spoke for divestment, saying "Williams should not profit from an unambiguous evil." He took exception to the principle of institutional neutrality, noting that "the educational mission is not devoid of moral and ethical overtones."

The forum was peaceable and orderly. About 350 persons were present, including about 200 students, some of whom carried signs advocating divestment. Long applause followed and interrupted each pro-divestment speaker, while anti-divestment speakers received only sporadic response.

Gargoyles speak

The Gargoyle Society presented a report to the Trustees last Thursday, advocating full divestment. According to the report, investment in South Africa is not conducive to diversity at Williams and it "implicitly sanction[s] the apartheid regime." Furthermore, says the report, "intellectual advancement cannot be predicated upon the exploitation of other groups in society."

South African defends US investment policy

by Daniel T. Keating

Calling the divestment movement a "campaign devoid of realism," J. Andre Visser advocated American investment in South Africa in a lecture Thursday night. Visser is the Deputy Director for North America of the South Africa Foundation, which he described as a multi-racial private organization representing the entire political spectrum in South Africa.

Visser began by declaring that he has "never personally supported the government in South Africa." He also said that he is opposed to all racial segregation, but that he feels that South Africa is misunderstood and misrepresented around the world.

There is great change taking place now in South Africa, the most important being constitutional reforms bringing Indians and Coloureds, people of mixed descent, into the parliament, said Visser. He also cited desegregation of parks, libraries, sports facilities, hotels, theaters, and other public areas.

"People dismiss all change in South Africa as cosmetic," said Visser, "but that is not true. One black trade union leader said that the change is not cosmetic, it is more like a heart transplant."

Visser said that there is "overwhelming evidence" that blacks in South Africa want American investment to remain. He said that black spokesmen in South Africa, American black leader Vernon Jordan, an NAACP delegation investigating South Africa and others have all called for continued a US presence.

"Divestment is favored by well-meaning, but uninformed people," said Visser. He questioned why so much attention is given to South Africa when there are many other countries which are morally worse.

He also said that American withdrawal would mean the loss of 100,000 black jobs. With an average of four dependents per worker, that would mean one half-million black people would be affected.

American companies are a means of positive change, said Visser. They have assisted black trade unions which are becoming a strong political force, he said. He concluded that the best action for concerned investors is to press American business to continue improving employee conditions and expand black training programs.

"There is tremendous upward mobility for blacks in the South African economy," said Visser. He said that a current shortage of skilled labor is giving blacks the chance for economic advancement.

Visser was speaking in place of John Chettle, the Director for North America of the South Africa Foundation, who was ill. Visser addressed approximately 60 people, many of whom were members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC), a pro-divestment group. Many WAAC people carried signs opposing Visser's position outside the lecture room before the lecture. Visser is an Afrikaaner, a South African of Dutch descent.

Blatt heads Mass. College Republicans

by Tim Johnson

Dan Blatt '85 was elected chairman of the Massachusetts College Republican Union at a convention held April 9 at Harvard University. In addition, he will assume duties as the Massachusetts delegate to the College Republican National Committee.

Blatt ran unopposed after candidates from Harvard, Tufts and Brandeis dropped out in the face of strong support for Blatt on the convention floor.

During his one-year term, Blatt plans to initiate several major programs, including a campaign to publicize what he calls "the facts of the issue of divestment from South Africa."

He said he hopes the Republicans will respond to the "incredible misrepresentations by such organizations as WAAC" on the issue, and that they will explain the ways in which divestiture would harm black South Africans.

Political activism

Blatt said he hopes to proliferate Republican activism on Massachusetts campuses. The state Republicans' efforts in the past included an organized movement to unseat Ted Kennedy. Two years earlier, they campaigned for Ronald Reagan in Massachusetts.

Recently, the College Republican National Committee urged the US government to strengthen protests against Soviet use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia.

Blatt will continue to act as president of the Williams Republican Club despite his new responsibilities.

Admissions

of applicants from the southern states has increased and "there's a stronger and more diverse group from cities," he said. More than 10 percent of accepted students come from very large cities, especially New York.

The number of local applicants has also increased. This year the college accepted 22 students from Berkshire County alone.

Smith also noted that because of the present economy, applicants from such hard-hit midwestern cities as Detroit and Toledo are way down.

However, the number of foreign applicants has increased substantially this year. More than 5 percent of accepted students live overseas. In all, more than 40 countries are represented, a marked increase over past years.

Smith admitted that both minority applications and acceptances have decreased, but said this was "endemic all the way across the country." However, the college accepted more than 50 percent of its Afro-American applicants, a rate twice that of the applicant pool as a whole. Figures for oriental and Hispanic students are consistent with previous years.

Commenting on the minority situation, Smith added "financial aid kids, and particularly black kids, tend to stay nearer to home." For this reason the admissions office is planning to target the Albany-Schenectady-Troy area for particularly heavy recruiting next year.

Not surprisingly, the number of students applying for and receiving financial aid has increased, from 45 percent last year to 51 percent, Smith said. In spite of this increase, and rising tuition costs, Smith is optimistic about continuing the College's aid-blind admissions policy.

He noted that because of financial concerns, this year many students decided which college to attend strictly for monetary reasons. Thus it is in the College's interest to continue to provide widespread and competitive financial aid.

licenses. In addition, Personnel Director Dan Iacovella explained that the Board is considering a "plan to require training DJs to submit a tape of their air style before we give them a show."

Ward believes that a tightening of standards may be in order with regard to training and accrediting DJs. "Some station members are lax in their attitude about the radio and in their professionalism. A lot of people on campus don't listen to WCFM due to the reputation these people give us. My first impulse is to keep the DJ's happy, but I'm all for any measure that would make us a more efficient, technically perfect station."

Having fun

Farbman, however, feels that "there's nothing wrong with a bunch of guys going down to the station and having a little fun on the air."

DJ and former Board member Hernando Garzon claims that the current Board isn't really revolutionary in its quest for strict adherence to the letter of FCC laws. "We were always the most lenient college station around when it came to enforce policies, and so I support the intent of the letter the Board sent out."

As DJ Greg Clapp summarizes the WCFM debate; it's "strict programming versus individual volition, continuity against who-knows-what?"

We're looking to hire 2 or 3 of the best from this year's class...

(MBA or Bachelor's degree)

Are you good enough to be one of them?

MBI, Inc. wants two or three of the top individuals from this year's graduating class. We offer an unusual management opportunity to someone interested in a young and highly successful enterprise in a fast-paced, expanding and competitive industry.

The Industry: Direct marketing is a $100 billion industry. It accounts for more than 15% of all consumer purchases in America and more than 20% of total advertising dollar volume. Well over half of the Fortune 500 companies are engaged in some way in direct marketing, yet the industry remains powerfully entrepreneurial — with the opportunity for well-managed firms to achieve rapid growth.

The Company: MBI, Inc. is a medium-sized ($100 million in sales) privately-owned company engaged exclusively in the creation and marketing of fine collectibles. The business is young; it was launched in 1969 and top division managers are now in their mid-30's and 40's. MBI's track record is one of outstanding growth in a highly competitive field.

The Products: Through its operating divisions, MBI markets fine collectibles of heirloom quality. Products include philatelic items, medallic art, fine china and crystal collector items and leather bound books of unsurpassed quality.

The Structure: Organization is on the Program Group basis, with Program Managers responsible for individual programs. The structure offers a unique opportunity for direct experience in different areas of business management (not available in larger organizations where functions tend to be more specialized).

The Position: Entry to management is at the Assistant or Associate Program Manager level, depending upon experience. Assistants and Associates share in program development and implementation responsibilities as an extension of the Program Manager. Typically, a Program Group is comprised of the Program Manager and 1 or 2 Assistants and/or Associates. MBI is committed to the internal development of managerial talent and our growth provides for unusual advancement opportunities.

The Rewards: Our view is that outstanding achievement should meet with outstanding reward. Our success has been built on the excellent performance of a motivated, well-rewarded management team.

The successful candidate will be intelligent and highly self-motivated with entrepreneurial instincts and a high personal standard of excellence. A high energy level and a willingness to work hard are essential to keep pace with a rapidly growing business. Involvement in the business, keen attention to detail and a sense of managerial overview are crucial success factors. To the individual with proper motivation, we can provide the challenge that permits maximum development of each person's potential.

If you are a top individual who is interested in a truly outstanding career opportunity and would like to learn more about MBI, Inc., send us your resume and a letter of introduction. We'll get back to you.

Track at NESCAC

Fine performances by freshmen Clark Otley and Pete Dawson and sophomore Paul Toland led the track team at the NES-CAC tournament at UMass on Sunday.

NESCAC four matches are not scored by teams, but Coach Dick Farley felt that Williams did not perform as well overall as he had hoped.

"With a combination of people playing other sports and injuries to key runners like Bo Parker," Farley said, "the spring team is not as strong as the winter team."

Otley placed in three events while Toland won the high jump at 6'2", and Dawson placed second in the discus.

Lindsay Rockwood '85 placed in five events and Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 placed in four to lead the women's team. Rockwood's second in the long jump and third in the high jump, as well as the 400 relay team's third place finish, were high points for the Ephs.

At Fitchburg the week before, Tomas Alejandro '83 and Toland led the men to a third place finish out of eleven teams.

The tracksters host Trinity at home at noon on Saturday, a change from the earlier 1:00 starting time.

Crew sinks

The men's novice heavyweight crew continued their winning ways, but the novice lightweight and the varsity lost in Worcester on Saturday at a regatta with W.P.I. and Connecticut College.

The novice heavyweight eight cruised to a four length victory over a mixed heavyweight/lightweight boat from Connecticut College. The novice lightweight were not so fortunate. They were able to stay with Connecticut by rowing at a very high 33 rating, but the Ephs faded at about the 1000 meter mark. Conn finished first, Williams second, and W.P.I. third, 3 or 4 boat lengths back.

Sluggish varsity

The Varsity boat got a late start, and had just begun the pre-race warm-up when the race was called to the starting line. The Ephs rowed a sluggish race, finishing about 25 seconds behind Connecticut and 15 behind W.P.I.

Next Saturday the annual Little Three Regatta will be held at the Williams home course on Lake Onota in Pittsfield.

This will be the first home race for Williams in three years, and thus presents a rare opportunity for Williams fans to see both men's and women's crews in action. The lake is about a 30 minute drive down Route 7.

—Lee Farbman

Ruggers winless

The women's rugby club has yet to win a match but co-captain Cindy Lytton says the team is "looking real strong".

On April 9th in Princeton, New Jersey, the Ephs dominated Harvard, but lost on a chance try 6-0. Later that day, Williams faced an extremely talented Bucknell Squad and held them to one try: 4-0. Co-captain Jane Parker '83 had an outstanding 50 yard scrum run in that match.

Last Saturday, the club played the Boston Women's Rugby Club, whom Lytton classified as "amazons." But, despite Boston's overwhelming size advantage, the Williams scrum held its own. Last year's Williams captain Barb Good '82 led Boston to a 4-0 victory.

Also on Saturday, the women's B-team won by forfeit against Siena of Albany. "There are a lot of new players on the team," says Lytton '83. "We are strong but inexperienced." The club expects to come away with at least one victory this Saturday when they face Amherst, Colgate and Mt. Holyoke at home.

Men's rugby divides squad to split RPI and smash Trinity

by Colin Moseley

The men's rugby club split up last Saturday, with B and D sides heading to RPI and a 16-3 loss and an 18-7 win, while the A side whopped Trinity 50-0.

On the snowy pitch at Troy, B side played RPI's A, thus becoming the "A prime" side.

The A prime game began with some promising runs by the line, but the mud soon put a stop to that. Despite fine scrambling by Jim Bell '84, Dean Morris '84 and Mark Evans '85 most of the line play consisted of tackling and rolling in the mud.

The scrum was led by Bob Kusel '83 who elicited stellar games from Blake Martin '84 and Paul Hogan '86. A definite size disadvantage kept the Eph scrummers from controlling the ball, forcing them to play defense much of the time.

The D side, masquerading as the B side, played phenomenally. The mud seemed to hinder them in the early going and at the half RPI was leading 7 to 4.

Lou Benevento '85 brought his kicking prowess as a fullback to bear in his first game at hooker and won every hook. Crunching tackles by George Clemens '86 and Greg Norton '86 could be heard across the field.

Line play was dazzling. Toss Kurth '85 had two lovely tries, one of which was converted by Kris Strohbehn '83. Another "picture book" try was scored when Steve Troyer '86 touched down a pop-kick from fullback Bob Ause '85. The final score came on a 40 yard ramble by none other than Drew Klein. RPI was held scoreless through the second half.

Meanwhile in faraway Hartford, the A-side pitted its forces against Trinity RFC and won by a wide margin, 50-0. Even the rain couldn't stop John Freese '84, who had an amazing game with four tries.

Fullback Dave Park '83 and lineman Jim Stegall '83 also had two tries apiece. The whole line worked very well together, and looked like a fine tuned rugby machine. Finally, one try was scored by Bert Salisbury '83 from the standoff position. In the scrum the fine play of Mike Kolster '85 was instrumental in winning the ball.

Unfortunately, the Trinity Bantams could not provide a second side to play the eager Williams C-side.

Rambling reminiscences

As to political differences, Smith believes that "being Russian is more important to these people than being Communist."

The influence of the government doesn't preclude status differences in the Soviet Union, either. "The Russians are more rank conscious than any people I've encountered," said Smith, who has worked in thirty countries and has travelled in over fifty. "That's also at odds with Communism."

Corruption, said Smith, is pervasive in the Soviet Union. The black market accounts for ten to twenty percent of all business transactions and "everything is done under the table." Rubrik's Cubes can cost as much as forty dollars (thirty-two more than the expensive government price), and blue jeans, pop albums, etc., are also in demand.

Smith attributed this to the bureaucracy which permeates every aspect of Soviet life. "People spend two-and-a-half hours waiting in line each day," he said. "If they see a long line they get right into it without even knowing what's at the other end—they figure that if everyone wants it, it must be good. If they don't need it, they'll just swap it later for something that they can use."

"People learn to shop for each other—Russians know all of their friends' clothing sizes," he continued. "They also lend each other money to a staggering degree. Some nice human qualities come out under this system, including a sort of frontier generosity. And it creates a new, unlearned quality to finding something."

Smith added that artists don't have the same degree of freedom in the USSR as they do in America. Almost every writer, actor and painter is under surveillance by a KGB agent, who is often cleverly disguised. Poet Josef Brodsky's contact is an aspiring writer who reads his work to the famous poet at every monthly "check-in."

Working in the Soviet Union was one of the greatest experiences of Smith's life, he said. "It made me realize how little we appreciate what we have in this country," he said. "We are so surfeited in America that we often don't appreciate the good things that we have—like Williams."

Baseball edges Union in 10th; blasts Trinity in hitting bonanza

by Andrew Garfield

Sophomore Mike Coakley's 10th inning sacrifice fly scored co-captain David Nasser '83 with the winning run in Williams' 7-6 comeback victory over Union Wednesday.

The Ephs staked starting pitcher Bill Hugo '84 to an early one-run lead. With two out in the first inning, Mark White '84 and Mike Coakley walked and co-captain Bob Brownell '83 singled in White.

Hugo stopped Union cold until the fifth when they manufactured a run from an error, a stolen base, a bunt and one hit. Williams reclaimed the lead in the seventh when shortstop Nasser singled and went to third on freshman Rob Coakley's single. Co-captain White drove in Nasser with a deep fly to right field.

Lusardi homers

Hugo appeared to tire slightly in the eighth as Union scored two runs on a walk, two hits and a sacrifice fly. The junior pitcher hurled a spotless ninth inning, however, to complete a fine performance. Hugo allowed a total of six hits and four walks while striking out three men. Rightfielder Phil Lusardi '85 tied the game at three with his second home run of the year in as many games. It was a solo blast over the left-centerfield fence in the bottom of the eighth inning.

After a scoreless ninth, the game went into extra innings. In the top of the tenth, Union hitters jumped all over Williams ace reliever David Moss '85 to score three runs. John DeLorenzo '84 came on to get the final two outs of the inning, but the prospects for Williams victory seemed dismal.

Bats come alive

Williams, however, exploded in the bottom of the tenth. Lusardi singled and, after one out, pinch hitter Dick Hollington walked. Centerfielder Jeff Lilley '86 reached base on an error by the shortstop which enabled Lusardi to score. Nasser was hit by a pitch to load the bases.

Rob Coakley, who had three hits, then drilled a double to right scoring Hollington and Lilley and re-tying the game. Then the Union pitcher walked White intentionally to load the bases and Mike Coakley followed with the game-winning RBI.

Tuesday slugfest

On Tuesday, Williams came back from early 6-0 and 8-1 deficits to outslug Trinity 17-14. Mark White and the Coakley brothers each had three hits while Brownell and Lusardi hit homers.

Lusardi and White knocked in four runs apiece. Kevin Morris '86 won the game in relief of John Hennigan '84. Moss registered a save as he relieved Morris in the ninth.

A doubleheader against Tufts on Saturday was rained out. Snow permitting, the team plays Wesleyan at 3:00 at Weston field on Friday and W.P.I. away on Sunday in a makeup of an earlier rain out.

Ramblings of a retired Little Leaguer

by John Clayton

For a minute I couldn't remember what sport I was covering.

"We won 17-14," said Coach Briggs.

The last sport I'd covered was basketball, but this was no basketball score. I'd also done soccer, but that didn't sound good either. It sounded like a football score, but this was springtime. Had the USFL invaded Williams College?

"We kicked a field goal in the ninth inning," Briggs explained.

Oh year, now I remember. Baseball. But 17-14?

In a preseason interview, while talking about the Ephs' inconsistent pitching, Briggs had said, "We'll hit well—that I know."

Chalk one up for Coach Briggs.

17-14. The score brought back memories of my Little League AA ball. This was one level above the one where batters hit the ball off tees.

One might suppose that since the batter had to face pitching instead of a tee, the games would be low-scoring.

One might also suppose that pitchers could get the ball over the plate.

The typical batter in AA ball would walk, steal second, steal third and then stay there until he was forced in. Catchers had trouble throwing back to the pitcher, much less throwing out a runner at second.

Once I decided to try to confuse the other team by not stealing second on the first pitch after I walked. Everyone on the field thought I was crazy.

"Let me give you some offensive highlights," Briggs said. That sounded like a good idea. A paragraph or two I could put in the middle of the article: "Offensive stars for Williams included..."

"Phil Lusardi, Bob Brownell and Mark White all had homers," began Briggs.

Homers. I remembered my AA homer. It was a grounder past the first baseman. Nothing remarkable—except that it had to be fielded by the right fielder.

Our right fielders were just like those all over America. The least athletic person on the team. (Our team, it was the five least athletic players on the team, taking turns out there, while the good players played all games long in the infield. Our coach wanted to win.) The right fielder was the guy picking his nose. Or watching the birds. Or, horrors of horrors, the girl on the team.

No Coach!

But he was out there in right, trying to find the ball, while I scampered around the bases. Rounding second, I knew he was finding the ball. I would get a triple, but no more. I didn't mind—at least I'd score in three walks.

But I got to third and there was Coach waving me on. Coach, don't do that! He'll get the ball into the infield, and they'll be able to do something with it! They'll throw me out for sure! Coach?

He was waving me on because I was the last batter. Darkness was cancelling the game as soon as I stopped running. If I didn't score, we would tie the Ty Cobbs (don't ask me why AA teams are named after old baseball players). So I kept running.

I think I slid into home. It didn't matter—the catcher was behind the backstop trying to find the overthrown ball. We beat the Ty Cobbs.

"Kevin Morris got the win," said Briggs. "He only had one bad inning—the seventh, when he nearly walked the whole slide."

I wondered if Kevin Morris had played AA ball.

I mentioned the score the next time I called home: "Sounds like AA, doesn't it? Remember when I hit that homer?"

Mom didn't remember. Neither did Dad.

"Sure you do—it was a grounder to right field... the game was being called for darkness..."

"Oh, I remember that," Dad said. "But the catcher caught the ball. You were out by 30 feet."

John Clayton covers baseball for the Williams News Office. He never got the knack of hitting when the ball isn't on a tee.

Tennis undefeated after Tufts win

by Chris Clarey

The tennis team maintained their undefeated status last week, running their record to 4-0, with a solid 6-3 win over ECAC rival Tufts Saturday and an 8-1 win at Clark on Thursday.

Williams' top four players were the key ingredients in the victory. Last year's All-American number one player Greg Zaff '84, playing in his first match of the season, led the Williams charge with a 6-3, 6-2 win over Tufts number one, Bill Friend. Number two player, Craig Hammond '85, downed Bruce Grossman 6-3, 3-6, 6-4. Number three, junior Brook Larmer, defeated Jon Niceforo 6-4, 6-2 and number four, senior co-captain Marc Sopher, beat Dave Kleiner 7-6, 6-2.

Tufts fight back

Tufts fought back to 4-3 with wins by Scott Beardsley at number five (6-4 in the third) over Tim Rives '85, number six John Dumbe (6-4, 6-4) over Tom Harritty '84 and the third doubles team of Alan Levenson and Phil Maloney (6-2, 6-0) over senior co-captain Kelton Burbank and freshman Tim Petersen.

However, Tufts attempted comeback was short-lived as Williams' number 2 tandem, Zaff and Hammond, sealed the overall match with an overpowering 6-2, 6-3 win over Friend and Grossman. Larmer and Sopher widened the gap further with a tight 6-4, 4-6, 6-4 victory over Dumke and Steve Eisenstein in the day's last match.

Superior depth

The key to the Clark win was again the superior depth of Williams' top six singles players, who all won in straight sets, and the tenacious play of the top two doubles teams: Hammond/Rives and Larmer/Sopher, both of which maintained their undefeated status.

LACROSSE

Men drowned by Tufts

by Paul Meeks

The men's varsity lacrosse team was edged, 12-9, by Tufts in a see-saw game during a steady downpour Saturday at Cole Field.

Tufts scored off the opening face-off and continued with three more unanswered tallies before Williams closed within two at 4-2 at the end of the first period. At the half, Tufts led, 8-3; and then 11-6 at the end of the third quarter.

Williams was in the game from start to finish and closed the gap to within two goals several times, but defensive lapses and a failure to consistently control the ball halted a comeback. As the final whistle sounded, it was too little too late, and Williams was defeated by a Tufts squad that was no better skilled nor dominant.

Sperry out for season

Williams failed to consistently harass attackmen behind the net and Tufts' middies, left unguarded, were open for easy feeds. Brad DuPont '86 turned away 20 shots in the mud.

On clears and transition from defense to offense, Williams sorely missed the stick-handling of co-captain Bill Sperry '84, out for the season with a shoulder injury. Weak midfield defense also hampered Williams as Tufts' middies were allowed to penetrate too far at times.

Through the rain, wind, and mud, the women's lacrosse team beat Tufts 8-7 on Saturday.

Williams led 8-3 at the half, and weathered a tough Tufts second-half comeback to come out with the win.

Freshman Laura Rogers led the team with four goals, the second game in a row she has scored four. Carrie Cento '86 added a goal and three assists.

Coach Peel Hawthorne attributed the win to a great team effort, and commended goalie

At the offensive end, Tom Davies '84 led all scorers from Williams; he had four spectacular goals playing against an inferior Tufts defenseman.

Freshman Chris Toll scored twice, with three goals in the past two games as an effective backup player. Co-captain Tim Curran '83, Reese Hughes '85, and goalie-turned-middie, Dave Flynn '85 all had a goal apiece on Saturday.

Williams faults

Inconsistency has hurt Williams at both ends of the field so far, as the men's record drops to 1-2.

The Ephs often control the ball around an opponent's restraining line without effectively penetrating to the pipes. Forced shots from too far out are easily turned away by mediocre collegiate goalies.

On defense, both middies and attackmen are left alone at times with one-on-one situations with goalie DuPont. However, Williams has many bright moments, as evinced in the turning of the tide in Saturday's heartbreaking roller-coaster loss to Tufts.

The team must eliminate these lapses at both ends and iron out inconsistency to beat the teams on its schedule in which they are competitive.

Williams is matched against a tough squad at Dartmouth tomorrow.

Anne Williams '86, who was brought up from the JV's just for this game.

Find the ball

"We just never gave up on the ball," said Hawthorne, "even when it was so muddy you could hardly find it."

"We anticipated better than they did on shots and passes and generally dominated the game," Hawthorne said.

The women travel to Union tomorrow, and then face Smith at home at 2:00 on Saturday.

Laxwomen outlast Tufts

Through the rain, wind, and mud, the women's lacrosse team beat Tufts 8-7 on Saturday.

Williams led 8-3 at the half, and weathered a tough Tufts second-half comeback to come out with the win.

Freshman Laura Rogers led the team with four goals, the second game in a row she has scored four. Carrie Cento '86 added a goal and three assists.

Coach Peel Hawthorne attributed the win to a great team effort, and commended goalie

Faculty urges ACSR past Sullivan Principles

by Daniel T. Keating

The faculty endorsed the College's policy on selective divestment in South Africa and urged the College to expand beyond the Sullivan Principles in evaluating companies' performance at last Wednesday's faculty meeting. The meeting stretched over 2½ hours.

The faculty expressed a range of opinions, including that the College should not take any stand and the claim that anything less than total divestment is "sheer illusion."

The original resolution passed the meeting, despite an alternative resolution and proposed amendments.

The resolution, sponsored by Professors Robert G. L. Waite, Raymond W. Baker, and Stephen R. Lewis, passed by a vote of 56 to 32 with two abstentions.

Outside the workplace

Waite began the debate by saying that the faculty must come to some resolution on the issue of responsible investment. Full divestment from South Africa by the College has been a constant topic of debate on campus since a January hunger strike to force the College to divest.

He outlined the resolution's three parts. The first section formally sets forth opposition to racism in all forms. The second supports the College's position of selective divestment and morally responsible investment.

The third part calls for the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) to move beyond the Sullivan Principles in evaluating companies in South Africa. Specifically, the resolution says the ACSR should look at areas other than the workplace in considering whether a company is working to change apartheid.

Lewis noted that the resolution was a compromise, saying it was done "by committee." He also stressed the expansion beyond the Sullivan Principles as the key aspect of the document.

Professor Russel H. Bostert criticized the Waite/Baker/Lewis resolution for holding com-

College outbids all for rare 1776 document

The Chapin Library made the purchase of the century, or of two centuries, last Friday when it obtained one of the finest original copies of the Declaration of Independence for $375,000 at an auction at Christie's in New York City.

The document is one of 13 existing copies from the first run printing in 1776, and is one of only three copies considered by experts to be in "pristine condition."

In addition, the copy purchased by the College is one of only three privately-owned copies. One of those has been promised to Princeton, so only this and a private copy in New York were ever likely to be sold.

Chapin librarian Robert Volz, College President John Chandler and the College Development office to organDevelopment office organized a fund-raising campaign of interested alumni to buy the document. The final purchase was financed by 20 alumni and friends.

Outbids Tokyo

Volz and Laurence Witten '48, who has extensive experience with international auctions and volunteered his services, handled the bidding. The College outbid several private individuals and a Japanese representative for the University of Tokyo.

According to Volz, the College's fund-raising continued up to the last minute. The Declaration of Independence was the last of 76 items to be auctioned and Volz was on the phone with the development office through item 74, soliciting more funds and determining exactly how much the College could bid.

Volz said the rare copy of the Declaration will complete the College's collection of early American government documents. The Chapin Library already possesses a copy from the original 1789 printing of the Bill of Rights and a "spectacular" 1777 copy of the Articles of Confederation.

In addition, Chapin houses a 1787 draft printing of the US Constitution which is considered the most important copy of the document since its owner, Virginia delegate George Mason, wrote on the back his objections, which served as the basis for the Bill of Rights.

"This is not just history," said Volz. "These are the four foundations of our country. They're not just records, they mean something to us today."

This particular copy of the Declaration of Independence is unique because it was owned by the descendants of signer Joseph Hewes of North Carolina. Hewes wrote the words "declaration of independence" on the back and, according to assistant librarian Wayne Hammond, this handwriting enhances the document's market value.

Some of the information in this article was reprinted from The Berkshire Eagle.

The Language Department will be housed in Weston; the computers will be moved to Jessup; but in the midst of the space shuffle, no provisions were made for Kurt Tauber's political science class.

New frosh deans announced

David C. Colby, assistant professor of political science, will serve as Dean of Freshmen and Assistant Dean of the College for the 1983-84 academic year. Robert D. Kavanaugh, assistant professor of psychology, who will be on sabbatical for 1983-84, will assume the position in 1984 and serve for an indefinite period.

Cris T. Roosenraad is leaving that position this summer to become Dean of Students at Carleton College in Minnesota.

The appointments were confirmed by the Trustees of the College and announced by President John W. Chandler at last week's faculty meeting.

Major qualifications for the position of Dean of Freshman included "psychological insight and maturity," according to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. "We were looking for someone who would be sensitive to student concerns," he said.

O'Connor noted that Colby's chairmanship of the Colby Committee on sexual harassment last year was an important consideration in his appointment. The Colby Committee examined the College's disciplinary proceedings in light of the sexual harassment issue and made recommendations to improve the system.

Colby began teaching here in 1977 and was reappointed to the faculty for four years in 1980. He has published a number of papers on social welfare and minority issues and spoken at various conventions. He will assume the new position effective July 1.

Colby earned his B.A. degree from Ohio Wesleyan University, his M.A. from Ohio University, and his Ph.D. from the University of Illinois in 1975. He taught as an Assistant Professor of Political Science at State University College at Buffalo for two years before coming to Williams.

Series of appointments

Kavanaugh came to Williams in 1976 as a specialist in developmental psychology and has published numerous articles in that field. Following next year's sabbatical, he will serve as Dean of Freshmen and Assistant Dean of the College for a series of one-year appointments beginning July 1, 1984. Kavanaugh was awarded tenure at Williams last year. He will become an Assistant Professor of Psychology with tenure this summer.

Kavanaugh graduated from Holy Cross in 1967 and received his Ph.D. from Boston University in 1974. He joined the Williams faculty after two years as a Research Associate at the Fels Research Institute in Ohio.

Neither Colby nor Kavanaugh were available for comment this week.

CC concedes Housing Committee

by Christian Howlett and Jim Peak

After meeting with members of the Student Housing Committee, the College Council voted 22-0-2 last Thursday to give up most of its control of the Committee, as outlined in the Council's constitution.

College Council officers explained that the 15 house presidents who make up half of the Housing Committee no longer want the Council to control selection of the Committee's co-chairmen.

In reality, however, the Committee has not reported to the Council for some time. Last year the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) made the Housing Committee its sub-committee, inaugurating bitter controversy between the two groups.

Earlier this week CUL Chairman Cris Roosenraad complained that the Council "fundamentally misunderstands the nature of student-faculty committees at Williams."

Traditionally the Council has elected the two Housing Committee chairmen, but under its new rules the College Council will only recommend candidates while final selection will be made by the Committee's members.

The Williams Record College patriotism

At Williams, we traditionally emphasize our people as well as our possessions. By contrast, some tour guides at Harvard or Princeton glowingly point to "firsts", "oldests", and "only knows". They have to use prestige to compete with each other for students and gifts. Ironically, that sort of attitude sometimes makes students seem less important.

But at Williams, the things we brag about are a library designed to be comfortable, our lack of fraternities, our strong academics, and our student/faculty relations. Our tradition is defined by our students—not the other way around.

We therefore have some misgivings about our recent purchase of the Declaration of Independence, although not about the article itself. This purchase is an important symbol for Williams. The Chapin Library is becoming a leader in rare documents, and we applaud this latest addition, which will add to an already considerable collection of Americana. We realize that donors gave $75,000 dollars for its purchase that would not have been given otherwise. That kind of spontaneous interest in the school is reassuring.

We have no quibble with so important a purchase, but we hope the school will maintain its current perspective. Right now, Williams seems more concerned with its academic and social reputation than its less tangible institutional prestige. That is the way it should be.

LETTERS

Confused

To the editor:

I think of myself as fairly liberal, but I have never been certain that I am. I once read that no one is as liberal as he thinks he is. Because of this, I am always trying to clarify my feelings, and the recent debate over divestment seemed a good opportunity to see if I was a racist or not.

In particular, Beth Byron's letter of last week could have cleared everything up. She wrote that anyone who was not at the panel discussion because s/he was tired of the issue was a racist. That should have removed my doubts.

Unfortunately, her statement only confused me more. I went to the discussion, but I left in the middle because I felt like I had heard it all before. Does this mean I am half a racist? Am I only one on even numbered days? Only between noon and midnight? I hope someone can clear this up for me. I'm pretty confused right now.

Progress

To the editor:

On April 20, the Faculty voted 52-36-2 to urge the Trustees to move beyond the Sullivan Principles in its South African investments. The resolution said that not only should the companies in which the College holds stock oppose all apartheid practices in employment, but they should demonstrate opposition to other aspects of the apartheid system as well. This vote represents a clear victory for the divestiture movement at Williams; it is a rejection of the Trustees' present policies and an affirmation of one of WAAC's basic principles: no companies in the College's portfolio should support apartheid.

However, this is not enough. The divestiture movement at Williams cannot be satisfied with half-measures. The contradictions in the resolution make it unacceptable for guiding Williams College in socially responsible investment. How can a profit-seeking corporation reasonably be expected to work for democracy in South Africa? And how can it operate there without giving support to the apartheid system? The mere act of paying taxes to the government constitutes support. When a company is in the business of selling strategic materials (e.g., oil or computers) in South Africa, how can it not support apartheid? What support does an American company give to apartheid just by setting up shop there? When Coca-Cola sells to white South African consumers, isn't it saying that their Rands (sic) are clean? The faculty vote represents progress but because it leaves these important questions unanswered, our work must go on.

Finally, the student divestiture movement deserves a great deal of credit for this faculty vote. Students were the ones who initiated discussion of this issue six years ago; we are the ones who have fought for a moral investment policy ever since; we are the ones who have educated the Williams community on the issue; and we are the ones who, by our actions last January, sparked the 'rational discourse' which led to this faculty vote. "The struggle continues."

Tangents

Nazi business

To the editor:

What should U.S. corporations do about their investments in, and other economic ties with, Nazi Germany? This troubling question was raised at numerous U.S. government hearings in the 1930's, as well as by a few stockholders at the time.

Throughout the Hitler era, General Motors kept its 100 percent ownership of the Opel auto-works. Opel was, among other things, Germany's largest producer of military tanks, and enjoyed tax-exempt status under Nazism. In April, 1939 a stockholder in the U.S. saw fit to question GM's German links. A high-ranking executive at GM replied as follows:

"To put the question rather bluntly, such matters should not be considered the business of the management of General Motors. An international business, operating throughout the world, should conduct its operations in strictly business terms, without regard to the political beliefs of its management, or the political beliefs of the country in which it is operating."

There were also some complicated market arrangements between I. G. Farben (the German chemical firm best known today for having manufactured Zyklon gas) and such U.S. companies as Alcoa, Standard Oil, and Dow Chemical. A spokesman for the latter firm commented, "We do not inquire into the uses of the products. We are interested in sel-

Reagan's defense plan: sci-fi fantasy

by Daniel Peris

Having studied history in high school, and expanding that study while at Williams, I turn to the real world and am often quite puzzled. Has Ronald Reagan forgotten the Cold War? Santayana's words ring a solemn, pertinent warning: "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." President Reagan is reigniting the Cold War and, with it, pushing civilization to the brink of disaster.

Reagan's lively rhetoric, continuous from the beginning of his administration, against what he views as the catastrophic threat posed by the Soviet Union has culminated in a number of events that are simply frightening. In the past few months we have been besieged by talk of limited nuclear wars, B-1 bombers, MX missiles, arms for El Salvador, and the like. Now, Reagan has proposed a space-based anti-ballistic missile (ABM) system to contain the "evil empire" of the Soviet Union.

The system, as put forth by Reagan, is itself fantastic. Even taking into account future advances in technology, Reagan's proposed ABM system would require so many satellites, so much energy, and such precision that we must consider it a virtual impossibility within the appreciable future. Even if the system were feasible, it would, for the following reasons, be an extremely dangerous addition to the nuclear scenario:

1. Even if such a system were to be implemented, its utility would be dependent on a 100 percent effectiveness rate. If just five or ten percent of the enemy's warheads were to get through, the resulting destruction would still constitute the virtual end of civilization. Few if any American military systems function at anywhere near that rate of precision and reliability.

2. At a time when monies for education and other worthwhile social goals are being drastically cut, the decision to initiate an incredibly expensive arms race (an event that would almost certainly result from implementing Reagan's proposal), would be a tragic mistake. Reagan's attempt to prioritize strategic dreams over domestic economic realities will, if successful, result in unprecedented military funding and record budget deficits. The U.S. could avoid the expense of this spiralling arms race if it were to abide by its 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with the Soviet Union. Recent history, however, has shown our government willing to pursue new and costly arms races. In the late 1960's when we had a lead in MIRV (Multiple Independently-targeted Reentry Vehicle) technology, we were unwilling to make a treaty with Russia regarding its limitation. Now, the presence of MIRV sophistication in the arsenals of both superpowers constitutes an extremely destabilizing factor.

Currently, we lead in cruise missile technology, and the Pentagon similarly refuses to include this advanced technology within the context of the present arms reduction talks. If in future years both nations possess space-based ABM technology, these systems will be the most expensive and dangerous part of both arsenals.

President Reagan appears intent on developing a defense system in direct violation of treaties with the Soviets.

But this bit of wisdom seems lost on President Reagan, who appears intent on developing a defense system in direct violation of treaties with the Soviets concerning both ABM's and space weapons.

3. The system would represent a complete reversal of the fundamental policy that has dominated the post-war world. To date, nuclear war between the US and the USSR has been prevented because each side has been able to deter a first strike attack due to the threat of massive retaliation against the aggressor. The theory called MAD (Mutual Assured Destruction) has successfully, albeit precariously, maintained the peace.

The introduction of a defensive system on the scale that Reagan has proposed would prove radically destabilizing, as the country that possessed such a shield might choose to initiate a war by attacking preemptively in the belief that its defenses were strong enough to absorb and render impotent enemy retaliation. The proposed ABM system could thus serve as partial incentive for unprovoked aggression.

The proposed ABM system could serve as partial incentive for unprovoked aggression.

4. If such a system were to be implemented by one side while it still possessed an Inter-Continental Ballistic Missile Force (which is, of course, quite likely), the opposing superpower could well view such action as an offensive measure and might be tempted to carry out a needless preemptive strike. Without a fundamental and unparalleled change in the atmosphere between the two superpowers, we must expect the Soviets to view the installation of Reagan's proposed ABM system as an offensive measure.

5. Finally, the proposed system would be vulnerable on several accounts. First, it would have no effect on the low-flying cruise missiles that bombers deliver, and it could easily be fooled by dummy warheads. Further, the system would be exceedingly vulnerable to attack, by either nuclear or conventional means. As proposed by President Reagan, it would be a proverbial sitting duck for enemy fire.

Clearly, then, the Reagan proposal is plagued by serious deficiencies. Perhaps the greatest of these is that, contrary to administration promises that the new ABM system would make world peace more secure, it would in fact contribute a severely destabilizing and potentially dangerous element to the already tenuous peace between the superpowers.

Students question non-tenuring of Katz

An open letter to the Religion Department

by Andrew Levine,
Steven Sowle, Fran Toler

As religion majors, students, and friends of Nathan Katz, we feel compelled to write you out of our concern for Professor Katz's career, the quality of teaching in the Religion Department, and the general lack of weight student opinion seems to have in the tenure process at Williams.

We understand that as the first (three year) segment of Professor Katz's tenure track contract came to a close, tials can hardly be questioned. The volume of his work is prodigious; he has edited two books and authored one since he has been at Williams and has made dozens of contributions to virtually every important periodical in the field of Buddhist Studies. The breadth of his work is also outstanding. Equally comfortable with Pali, Sanskrit, and Tibetan texts, Professor Katz is one of the few scholars doing serious comparative work among the various traditions of Buddhism. His articles in comparative Buddhist and Western philosophy contain a rare combination of sophistication and readability. Finally, and most importantly, the quality of Professor Katz's work has been consistently excellent. Those of us who know his field can attest to his growing international reputation.

Our feelings about Professor Katz as a teacher must be quite obvious. His classes have been very well attended, and participants in the annual interviews of students conducted by the department to evaluate Professor Katz's philosophical concepts clearly is extremely rare.

Professor Katz has shown tremendous dedication to the students and the college in other ways as well. We know of no other professor who is more accessible to students, more encouraging of their work (he has successfully guided several student writers to publication), or more respectful of students as people and as thinkers. Further, his participation in the political process of the College stems from strongly held moral convictions and a real commitment to acting on these convictions for the betterment of the College community and his fellow humanity. His commitment to consistency between theory and practice should not be stifled; many of us have bemoaned the seeming lack of such commitment in the Religion Department.

We strenuously protest the nature of the tenure process in the Religion department which Professor Katz's case reveals.

Professor Katz seems perfectly suited to our small Religion Department because of his versatility. Where else will you find a leading Indologist who can teach a course like "Anti-Semitism, Misogyny and Racism" as well as the sundry religious traditions of Asia? Diversity should be a premium for the department, and Professor Katz's breadth will not be easy to match.

We have heard that one reason for Professor Katz's rejection is the department's admirable desire to avoid tenuring an all-male department. While many of us strongly support the implementation of a much stronger affirmative action policy, it is our understanding that Professor Katz was explicitly offered a tenure-track position with the understanding that it would be difficult, though not impossible, for him to obtain tenure. As his performance here has been excellent, the only reasonable argument for his not being considered for tenure is a structural one: the desire to avoid an all-male tenured department. As this is the case, Professor Katz should have been honestly informed of the unavailability of a tenured position when he was hired. Admittedly, the department provided something of a "courtesy" in informing Professor Katz ahead of time that he would not be tenured; but this action has only a palliative effect in comparison to the serious nature of the original misrepresentation.

Finally, we strenuously protest the nature of the tenure process in the Religion Department which Professor Katz's case reveals. Although the yearly student interviews for evaluation of junior faculty would suggest interest in student opinion, the real measure of such concern is not how student opinion is solicited but how much weight it receives in the final decision. Beyond the fact that the unofficial decision to release Professor Katz was made in the face of overwhelmingly high student opinion of him, the secrecy of the decision and its very "unofficial" character have obviated student participation in the final decision-making process (some senior and junior majors were never asked to evaluate Katz), minimized student reaction (no announcement of the decision was made, even to majors), and revealed once again how little the student voice counts in the most important decisions shaping the quality of our classroom experience at Williams—namely, who will teach us.

We thus leave you with two messages. First, we are deeply disappointed over the effective dismissal of Professor Katz. We urge you to reconsider, and we ask that you make the reasons for your decision public. No less importantly, we are distressed about the implications of your action for student input in the tenure process in general. We hope you will explain why such unambiguous student praise of Professor Katz seems to have so little effect on your policy.

Besides his obvious mastery in his field, several factors distinguish Professor Katz as an unusually good teacher.

you conducted a review of his performance and of the needs of the department. Last summer the department informed Professor Katz that, while the renewal of his contract for the last four years of his tenure track had been approved, an unofficial decision had been made that they would not suggest he be granted tenure at the end of his contract. We consider this decision a serious mistake, and we urge you to reconsider it.

As a scholar, Professor Katz's creden-

performance have summarized the opinions expressed at the meetings as highly laudatory. In end-of-semester course evaluations, Professor Katz has received higher marks than both the department and school-wide averages; and his marks have risen steadily during his time at Williams. In a department known for its intellectual rigour, it is especially significant that he gets high marks for providing a challenging learning experience.

Besides his obvious mastery in his field, several factors distinguish Professor Katz as an unusually good teacher. His ability to find helpful examples and analogies that communicate complex panies responsible outside their own realm. "Even the companies with the best intentions will be ineffective" in meeting those criteria, he said.

Walte denied that the resolution mandates any specific way for the ACSR to go beyond the requirements of the Sullivan Principles.

Educational purpose

In a contrary vein, Professor Charles H. Karells said that the faculty, and the College, should refrain from making any moral and political statement on issues not of direct concern to the College's educational purpose.

Professor Robert Stiglicz argued the more extreme position that Williams must leave South Africa. Claiming that there can be no partial disengagement, Stiglicz said "Compromise is more repugnant than the most reactionary policy." He then left the meeting.

Professor Lawrence Graver brought a new resolution, which he said eliminated the sermon rhetoric of the first resolution, supported the ACSR without constricting it, and continued the case by case method without mandating change in policy.

The substitute resolution urges the ACSR "to continue to weigh the desirability of moving beyond the Sullivan Principles."

Professor John F. Relchert, another sponsor of the substitute resolution, objected that the Walte/Baker/Lewis proposal urges the ACSR to "adopt an explicit policy" for judging companies. He said that an explicit policy would restrict the freedom of the ACSR.

Professor Gary Jacobsohn supported the substitute resolution but proposed an amendment. His amendment removed the policy descriptions from the resolution and replaced them with a call for faculty to communicate individually and in groups to the ACSR their specific ideas.

On a later vote, Jacobsohn's amendment lost 42 to 23.

The substitute proposal lost its bid to become the resolution before the meeting by a 55 to 28 margin.

The resolution passed by the faculty is not binding on the ACSR or any other College officials. The meeting was attended by about 100 of the College's 200 faculty.

The following is the text of the Faculty's resolution:

"Resolved, that the Faculty of Williams College reaffirms its opposition to racism of any form. We applaud the Trustees' recognition of their role as socially responsible investors, while acknowledging that principled people may disagree on the specifics of implementation."

ies of implementation.

"We fully support the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities (ACSR) and the President and Trustees in their commitment to implement expeditiously the College's stated investment policy with regard to South Africa: that when College funds are invested in companies with South African affiliates and subsidiaries, such companies should demonstrate a record of effective opposition to all apartheid practices in employment and that the College will withdraw its investment in cases where the ACSR and the Trustees judge that a company fails to follow practices regarding its South African investments that are consistent with the College's policy and can be monitored effectively.

"Since the Sullivan Principles apply principally to the place of employment, they cannot constitute an adequate response for firms doing business under conditions of apartheid. We therefore respectfully urge the ACSR, President and Trustees to move further in the directions suggested by the Thomas Report and TIAA/REF and to adopt an explicit policy for judging the behavior of portfolio companies which extends beyond the work place. We believe that socially responsible banks and companies must demonstrate opposition to other aspects of the apartheid system and that they should engage in positive efforts to alleviate the grievous conditions under which black and other non-white South Africans live."

Council officers stressed that the section of the constitution dealing with the Housing Committee is not being officially changed. "We're just being practical," Council President Tom Paper said.

Paper stressed that the Council will retain some influence in the Housing Committee since the five housing category representatives in the College Council are also members of the Committee. "Those five votes will be very important," Paper added. However, the position of Greylock quad representative is presently unfilled.

Nominations approved

In other business, the Council approved the nominations of its Elections Committee for members of the Finance, Area Studies, Athletics and Faculty Committees. They also announced that they are still accepting applications for two minority, one international and one off-campus representative. These are non-voting members of the College Council.

The Council hopes to put out another all-campus newsletter this spring, dealing with such issues as the Investment referendum, the Housing Committee, house transfers and faculty tenure policies.

Funds Record

Finally, the Council approved 12-5-7 stopgap funding of $900 for the Record, enabling it to print a final issue of the year. The Record overspent its budget in January by publishing an extra issue to cover the hunger strike.

College Council treasurer Hamilton Humes commented, "We know that they're going to do a good job with the money. The Record has improved since the fall."

Stocking ends career on the right foot

by Bea Bast

For the past fifty years, Professor Fred H. Stocking has contributed his talents, enthusiasm, and sense of humor to Williams College. This spring, however, marks a transition for his career as Stocking plans to retire from the teaching staff.

Stocking graduated from Williams in 1936, then went on to earn his Master of Arts and Ph.D. at the University of Michigan. He returned to Williams as an English professor in 1940, and in 1965 was appointed Chairman of the English Department.

"I always had a secret longing to go to the University of Michigan," Stocking confided, "but, my father went to Williams, so I didn't have much of a choice."

Disliked Fraternities

As a student, Stocking clearly remembers "disliking the fraternity system, even though I was a part of it. I resented the attitude that fraternity brothers had toward non-fraternity guys," Stocking remembered. "Fraternity guys were snobby, and looked at the rest of the campus as if they were socially inferior."

Stocking still savors the pranks of the Commons Club—an association of non-fraternity men. "The fraternities always took on the Commons Club in touch-football," he started chuckling, "so one year, for the championship, the Commons Club students all dressed in their filthiest, smelliest clothes, and it worked. The fraternity boys wouldn't touch them!"

More pleasant

"Now that fraternities are gone, and the college is coeducational," Stocking continued, "I think this place is much more normal. There is a healthier, more pleasant, and more relaxed atmosphere here today." When Stocking was a student, "the campus emptied out on the weekends—it was only natural."

In Stocking's eyes, the quality of the student body has improved. "The kids today are better prepared," he explained, "and there is a greater variety of students."

In judging the academic style of these students, Stocking "is troubled by, although understanding of, their pattern of doing their work in great lumps. Even if we give assignments far in advance, everyone seems to fluctuate between long lapses, and then great surges culminating in all-nighters."

Enlightened teaching

"The variety of courses and subjects taught has also greatly improved" since Stocking's undergraduate days. Stocking has found that the teaching techniques are enlightened as well. "We memorized a lot of dates and dry facts. Now, there is more of an emphasis on creative and analytical ability."

Fred Stocking

These bolder teaching methods are partly a reflection of the faculty, which has changed greatly since the thirties. Stocking feels that "the faculty is livelier and more variegated." He believes that he is "fortunate to teach at Williams. Many professors," he explained, "especially at big universities, have too much to grade. As a result, they have assistants read the student's essays and exams. At Williams," he notes with pride, "we read and grade the papers and tests ourselves."

Stocking's energy has also been directed toward his writing, through which he addresses many issues. Last December, he wrote an essay entitled "Student Drinking". Stocking realizes that "excessive drinking can be a problem here as well as on other campuses. Yet, no one has made the important point that there are two different types of drinking."

The first, best illustrated perhaps by Europeans, involves "drinking as a pleasurable mode to enhance a social occasion. It is primarily a vital ingredient in the ceremony of courtesy." Then, there is the college method—"let's get drunk!" in which participants do not seek relaxation, but rather, "a state of oblivion."

Characteristically, Stocking has not missed the humor in the absurdity of a student bragging, "Boy, did I get squiffed last night," when all it takes is "the brute strength to lift a glass to the lips, dump some liquid into the mouth, and then swallow. I am not condemning drinking," Stocking added, "but rather, I think people should realize that there is a right way and a wrong way. It's something you should learn how to do—the same way you learn how to drive a car."

"The green flash"

Stocking's many other articles reveal a wide range of interests, and a terrific sense of humor. The gamut of topics he has penetrated range from humorous essays on America's electoral system, to the "Important Balance" between teaching the humanities and technology in education, to an atmospheric phenomenon known as "the green flash."

Stocking plans to continue writing, "primarily for my own pleasure and amusement." Stocking will stay in Williamstown, teaching during Winter Study, giving his lectures and simply enjoying himself. "I love college towns," he continued, "there are so many lectures and concerts to hear, fantastic library facilities, the Clark... Life is too short!"

Music groups shake Inn

by Paul Wolfe

The Jazz Ensemble and the Springstreeters teamed up to entertain an enthusiastic audience of both students and visiting parents last Friday at the Williams Inn.

The Ensemble played two sets, the latter more energetic than the first. Technically the band played quite well. A few more chances could have been taken, however, on the solos of the faster numbers. Their ballad work was particularly successful, with an interplay between the sections which created some nice layerings of sound. The band has an impressive line-up of new talent. Freshman Phil Tucher is a particular standout; he plays the trumpet with both technical power and clear tone.

The Springstreeters were a marvelous addition to the evening. They won over the audience with their rich harmonization and wide range of styles. Their pieces ranged from a moving rendition of the religious "Be Ye Glad" to a playful version of the "Temptations" "Just My Imagination", complete with Gladys Knight-and-the-Pips choreography. And while some of the dance steps were muffed, therein lies the appeal of the Springstreeters. They possess a freshness and contagious enthusiasm that I hope won't be lost as they become increasingly popular, which after performances like Friday night's they are sure to be.

Hunger strike?

The Harvard fast for divestment continues, but under somewhat dubious circumstances, according to one Harvard Crimson reporter.

According to Southern African Solidarity Coalition member Jamlin Raskin, more people are fasting every day. From the nine who started on April 18, their ranks grew to 19 by last Sunday. And, although Raskin had no exact figures on hand, he said the fast had "broad support" from both students and faculty.

Eating fruit

"About 50 or 60 people" signed up to participate in the last two days of the fast, which will end tomorrow, and fasters had hoped to enlist 100 by yesterday. At least one faculty member, Richard Lewontin, had joined last weekend.

Jesse Fried, a Harvard student who covers the fast for the Harvard Crimson, called the fast "a little dubious," because the fasters are eating fruit. "Some are eating a little fruit, some are eating a lot of fruit, and two are eating nothing, supposedly. Although I have my doubts about one."

Since the fasters do not live in one central location, but meet once per day instead, Fried feels that the logistics make accountability difficult.

An unrelated group of 140 seniors has protested in a different way, according to the Associated Press. They have donated 2600 dollars towards an escrow fund which would go to fund scholarships if Harvard divests or South Africa's apartheid policies change within the next twenty years. If the current situation continues, say the seniors, the money will go to charity. The interest will go to fund a series of informational lectures on South Africa.

According to Raskin, that group lacks SASC support and "has remained agnostic about the fast."

Trinity Pres: "Keep frats"

The fraternity issue at Trinity College is approaching resolution. James English, president of the college, last week recommended in an open letter that the Greeks be allowed to stay because "they are already here, have been here for a long time, and are important to a lot of people." However, he noted that their importance would diminish as students explored other social opportunities in the future.

English also recommended that fraternities and sororities be open to all students regardless of race, sex, or religious affiliation. Although, he noted, going co-ed may result "in the admission of women as second-class citizens" and the potential loss by some chapters of their national affiliations, he said that those questions would have to be resolved later.

Student opinion lies against the abolition of fraternities, according to Trinity Tripod reporter Floyd Higgins. "It would appear that they do not want to see them abolished. Although it also seems that a significant portion doesn't really care," he said.

Higgins said that even though only fifteen percent of Trinity's student body belongs to fraternities, "it is a fairly commonly acknowledged fact that social life revolves around fraternities."

Chandler awarded degree

Middlebury College will award President John Chandler the honorary degree of Doctor of Humane Letters as part of their Commencement Exercises on May 22.

The degree recognizes Chandler's excellence as a scholar, educator, and administrator. Chandler taught at Williams between 1955 and 1968 and has been president since 1973. He has served as Religion professor, provost, dean of faculty, and trustee.

Freshman warnings

Twenty-one percent of the 23 freshmen registered in Astronomy this spring have received freshman warnings. Computer science placed a distant second with 12.8 percent receiving warnings.

Once again Division III led the pack, issuing fifty warnings—more than Divisions I and II combined.

Departments with a warning rate over 10 percent include: biology, 10.2 percent; psychology, 12.7 percent; and Russian, 11.8 percent.

Fifty-nine students received one warning, while eighteen received two. In total, 15.7 percent of the freshman class was warned, down from 18.7 percent for last year's freshmen.

Tibet conference

The College sponsored the second annual Little Three Tibet conference this past weekend, which featured lectures on Tibetan art, psychology, culture and politics.

The speakers included professors from Williams, Amherst and Wesleyan as well as several outside experts.

The conference included a tour of a current exhibit at the Clark Art Institute, "Tibetan Art from the Newark Museum," which is one of the finest collections of Tibetan art in the country.

The women's lacrosse team used the home field advantage to rack up a 16-5 victory over Smith Saturday. Williams' record now stands at 3-1.

High scorers for Williams were Carrie Cento '86 with three goals, Allison Earle '84 with four, and Bea Bast '85 with three.

Co-captain Bea Fuller '83 played an outstanding game at defense wing, and Coach Peel Hawthorne attributed most of the Williams turnarounds to Fuller's versatility and pluckiness.

Smith is a young and inexperienced team this year, having graduated most of their players last spring. "I would say that this is definitely a building year for them," Hawthorne explained, "but they do have a lot of talent. We just have a firmer base and really weren't challenged that much."

Williams next meets Trinity away on Wednesday.

Golf drops tri-match

The golf team lost their opening match of the season at The Country Club in Brookline on Thursday.

Holy Cross won the triangular match with a 410 count, while host Harvard scored a 415 and Williams had 418.

Coach Rudy Goff said, "Lack of practice certainly hurt us. Taconic Golf Course has been under snow for the past week, while the other teams have had no weather problems."

Sophomore Bill McClements paced the Ephs with an 81, while classmate Mike Hennigan carded 82. Co-captain Phil Seefried showed the effects of the layoff, struggling to an 84, as did fellow senior Charlie Thompson. Todd Krieger '83 rounded out the Williams scoring with an 87.

"We hope to be able to get onto the course this weekend, in order to hit a few shots before New England," said Goff.

The Ephs travelled to Cape Cod yesterday and today to contend for the New England title.

Tennis still on top

The men's tennis team got wins from its top four singles players and barely survived a 6-3 victory over Little Three rival Amherst Saturday. Six of the nine matches went three sets in what Coach Steve Heath called Williams' "toughest match of the year."

Greg Zaff '84 competing for only the second time this season, coasted to a 6-0, 6-1 win over Fred Shepard at number one singles, but his teammates all had to battle for their victories.

Brook Larmer '84 took Spencer Grey at number two, 6-7, 6-3, 6-3; Craig Hammond '85 prevailed over Matt Corcoran at third singles, 4-6, 6-4, 6-4; Tim Rives '85 got by Milton Williams at number four, 6-1, 4-6, 6-1; the Zaff-Hammond first doubles team beat Shepard-Corcoran, 3-6, 6-2, 6-2; and Larmer-Rives whipped Grey-Williams at second doubles, 6-4, 6-4.

Williams singles losers were

Tom Harrity '84, who was beaten by Roger Hoyte at number five, 7-6, 4-6, 6-4, and Tom Paper '84, who fell to Tom Wyman, 3-6, 6-3, 6-4, at number six. Jamle King '84 and Tim Petersen '86 lost to Wyman and Bill Raffly at the twin doubles, 6-3, 6-3.

The win at Amherst boosted Williams' record to 5-0. The Ephs have four regular season matches left, including an away match on Tuesday against Trinity.

Softball slips, 9-2

by Liz Strelitz

The women's softball club lost 9-2 to Smith on Saturday.

Although the score remained close at 3-2 through the end of the third inning, Williams pitchers walked in five runs in the fourth. Smith scored another run in the seventh.

Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin said that team batting practice was hurt by a week of indoor practice caused by the weather.

Two hits

Williams was held to two hits to Smith's nine. Shortstop Kathy Haas '86 and pitcher Karen Montzka '85 each had singles.

Defensively, the women played strongly. Rightfielder Liz Jex '83, third baseman Stephanie Brown '85 and catcher Thalia Meehan '83 each started double plays.

Having had three games cancelled by rain, Williams is looking to improve on its 1-2 record Wednesday at home against Southern Vermont.

Ruggers split Little Three: A-side loses, B and C win

by Bert Salisbury

The Williams rugby club travelled to Wesleyan last Saturday for the annual Little Three tournament and finished the day with a mixed bag of wins and losses.

In the first match the A-side played to a 9-9 tie with the hosts from Wesleyan, but then lost to Amherst 28-12. Against Wesleyan the fine passing of Jim Steggall '83 and fine running by John Frese '84 accounted for the only try. Dave Park '83 scored the rest with his kicking ability.

Against Amherst the Steggall-Frese pair was able to score one try while Hugh Hui-zenga '84 chased down a pop kick to score the other, and Park converted both.

The game held the traditional hostilities and it was a hard fought match. Blake Martin '84 and Mike Kolster '85 did a very fine job filling in for the injured Dixon Pike '83 and Mike Chamber '83.

B-side splits

B-side fared better as they lost a close match to Wesleyan 10-9 but then rallied to beat Amherst 9-8.

The scrum played extremely well and provided much ball for the line to work with. The hooking of Dave Skinner '86 was instrumental in Williams' domination of the scrumdowns. But it was Rob Kusel '83 who was the B-side star of the day, who with his kicking magic tallied all 9 points in the Amherst win, two on field goals and one on a seemingly impossible 30 meter left-footed drop kick. The game gave both the players and the spectators an exciting victory.

C-side pride

C-side was the Williams pride of the day with two victories, beating Wesleyan 18-10 and beating Amherst 18-14.

Both the line and the scrum had the offensive punch and defensive strength to produce victories. Sean Crotty '84 had two tries, one a 50 meter majestic romp through a bewildered Wesleyan side.

Unselfish Eddie O'Toole '86 did not score one of his own but added to the smooth teamwork with his share of assists. Scrummie Greg Norton '86 holds the honor of being the only player to injure himself in 4 places on an unopposed try, using his baseball style slide to secure 4 points.

Kicking power

But once again it was kicking power, the pinpoint accuracy even at long distances, of Kris Strohbehn '83 that was instrumental in the wins. Strohbehn accounted for 6 points in the Wesleyan match and 14 in the Amherst victory. The C-side convinced all watching that they have the inspiration and potential to prove a tough side for the rest of the season.

Little Three regatta—

As both Amherst and Wesleyan have smaller women's crew programs than Williams, the Eph-women had to split up their junior varsity eight into two fours to take on the Amherst varsity four.

Amherst finished in 8:27. There was a tough fight for second among the two Williams boats. The four designated as the B boat (the bow four of the original JV boat) edged out the A boat (the stern four).

In the novice eights event the Williams women made their move at the 1000 meter point, turning a previously close race into a lopsided, 12 second victory over Wesleyan. Wesleyan overtook the Ephs, but the purple boat showed superior rowing style, impressing many observers.

Varsity decisive

The Williams women's varsity eight beat Amherst decisively, continuing their long domination over Little Three opponents. But the Eph-women weren't completely satisfied with the row. The 20 second margin of victory proved, however, that Williams was decisively stronger, and a superior crew.

These and similar kinds of data can be found in Gabriel Kolko, "American Business and Germany, 1930-41," Western Political Quarterly, 15 (1962), pp. 713-28.

There is a bizarre epilogue to these U.S.-Nazi business connections. Opel, Focke-Wulf aircraft (which was 50 percent owned by ITT), and other strategic industries were, understandably, bombed by the Anglo-American allies. Later, GM sued the U.S. Government for damages and actually got some $10 million. ITT was indemnified by at least 3 times that figure.

Distorted

To the editor:

Those who attended the talk by J. Andre Visser, Afrikaaner and spokesman for the South African Foundation sponsored by the campus Republican group at Dodd House April 14, could not have helped being impressed with his apparent first hand knowledge of the distorted image of South Africa which we have of it in the United States. That he himself might have been distorting the facts may not have been self-evident to his sponsors.

He held that all public facilities except the railroads had been desegregated. Indeed, in response to a student's question, he said that any apparent "segregation" of motion picture theatres (observed recently in mass media pictures of non-whites and whites lining up to purchase tickets for the screening of the motion picture "Gandhi" at separate theatres) was due simply to the differing residential locations of the varying ethnic groups. Unfortunately—for the young Republicans and their speaker—the New York Times South African correspondent, Joseph Lelyveld—reported in the following day's edition that not even the premiere showing of "Gandhi" would be open to those sharing Gandhi's ethnic background, to say nothing of "coloreds" and blacks.

Lelyveld pointed out the special irony involved: the site of the premiere would be at the old Empress Theatre—the precise setting at which Gandhi launched his first campaign of satyagraha—non violent resistance. A further irony not noted by the Times correspondent is the fact that both the Chairman of the Board and the President of the company that took over responsibility for the distribution of the picture (and thus acquiesced to its segregated screening in South Africa and to the decision to limit such screening for non-whites to but three cities in contrast to its availability to whites in six cities) are none other than Francis T. Vincent, Jr. and Richard Gallop, both Williams Trustees and both members of the Trustee Finance Committee to which the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities makes its recommendations.

This is an ambiguous world. But all of us should be able to agree that the prime mission of an institution of higher learning is to address that ambiguity with all the facts and all the truth at its disposal. Mr. Visser's failure on this score leaves me wondering if the other "facts" he offered were equally unreliable.

Basketball star named new coach

Williams' all-time leading scorer Harry Sheehy III has been named as the new head basketball coach, Athletic Director Robert Peck announced Friday.

Sheehy, who graduated in 1979, is one of the best who ever played the game at the college. He set and continues to hold three college scoring records, including career scoring record (1,391), season scoring record (506), and highest career average (21.1).

The 6'4" guard amassed all-star honors that included All-New England, All-East and Honorable Mention All-American. He was a regular on the ECAC Honor Roll for his performances in individual games.

"A real pro"

Peck, who was Sheehy's coach as a freshman, said he is "extremely pleased that Harry will be returning to join our athletic program. Harry has had a lot of worldwide experience. He has grown and matured as a young man from a student to a real pro. He will be very effective in his relationships with students."

"He made me a great coach when he was a freshman," recalled Peck. "I'm looking forward to him making me a great athletic director."

Peck says the decision to hire Sheehy for the position came after an exhaustive search that included consideration of more than 180 applications.

"Do Williams proud"

Sheehy succeeds Curtis W. Tong, head coach at Williams since 1973, who is leaving Williams this year for a position as Athletic Director at Pomona-Pitzer College in California.

Tong, who was Sheehy's varsity coach at Williams, says he is "delighted with the news that Harry is the new coach. I think I speak for the entire basketball program, including those who have played in the past and those who are here now, when I say that. Harry is an energetic, enthusiastic and ethical young man who loves and knows basketball and will do Williams proud."

"Coach Sheehy will be very good for the program," said co-captain John McNicholas '84. "He's energetic and has some good ideas."

Fellow co-captain Art Pldoriano '84 said, "Coach Sheehy has a sound background, and should be good communicating with the players. I'm looking forward to next year."

The Berkshire Eagle reported on Wednesday that Sheehy and Reggie Minton, assistant coach at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, were the two finalists for the Williams positions.

The Eagle reported on Friday that Minton had taken the head coaching position at Dartmouth, clearing the path for Sheehy at Williams.

Athletes in Action

After his graduation from Williams, Sheehy joined the Athletes-in-Action basketball organization, the athletic ministry of the Campus Crusade for Christ.

As a player for Athletes-in-Action, Sheehy continued his record-setting ways. He holds every season and career scoring record for Athletes-in-Action, whose teams are made up of top-flight former college players. In addition to holding the records for most points in a season (1,487), most points in a career (6,600) and highest career average (22.5 ppg), he is third in career assists and second in career steals. He was named Most Valuable Player in 10 tournaments while with Athletes-in-Action, including series against Poland, Greece, Hungary and France.

Since 1978 he has lived in Canada working with the Athletes-in-Action Canada basketball team, playing and serving as assistant coach as well as directing the organization's speaking program. This year an ankle injury sidelined him as a player.

Sheehy is well-known for his speaking skills, having delivered hundreds of speeches on behalf of Athletes-in-Action. He is also remembered at Williams for his well-developed sense of humor.

Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 and Lindsay Rockwood '85 led the pack in the high hurdles, and ultimately won the race. Williams women won the meet, 84-71. (Lockwood)

Tracksters split with Trinity

by Andrew Garfield

Lindsay Rockwood '85, with a part in five wins, led the women's track team to a 75-51 victory over Trinity on Saturday while the men were narrowly edged out 84-71. Tomas Alejandro '83 excelled for Williams in a losing cause.

Rockwood won the high jump, the long jump, the 400 hurdles and took second in the high hurdles. She was also part of team victories in the 400 meter and one mile relays.

Melanie Taylor '83 won the 100 and 200 meter sprints and was part of the 400 meter relay win. Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 beat Rockwood in the high hurdles and was second to the sophomore star in the long jump. Mahoney took third in the high jump.

Alejandro anchors Ephs

For the men, Alejandro won the 100 and 200 meter sprints and anchored the 400 relay victory. Kevin Jenkins '85 won the 400 meter run, Brian Angle '84 won the 1500 and Ian Brzezinski '86 won the 5000. Williams also took first place in the one mile relay.

Williams won only 2 of 8 field events. Junior Greg Lao's 13'6" jump won the pole vault and Paul Toland '85 leaped 6'4" to outdistance his competition in the high jump.

An injury to star runner Bo Parker '84 hampered Williams, according to Coach Dick Farley. But, although the Ephmen came up short, Farley was content: "I can't say I'm happy with a loss, but I was encouraged by our performance."

Both the men's and women's teams will face the dual challenge of Amherst and Wesleyan next Saturday at home. The field events will begin at noon and the running events will begin at two. While Farley "doesn't know too much about" the competition, he predicts Amherst to be very good and Wesleyan to be competitive.

Crew:

Women romped; men swamped

by Lee Farbman

The annual Little Three regatta was held on Saturday at the Williams race course in Pittsfield. On the men's side, the novice lightweight eight event was won by Williams, with both the Eph novice heavyweights and the varsity heavyweights finishing second. In the women's races, the Williams novice and varsity eights won, the junior varsity fours finished second and third, and the novice four finished third.

The men's freshman lightweight eight event pitted Williams against arch-rival Amherst, as Wesleyan had only freshman heavyweights. Amherst opened a lead from the start, as they went out at a rating of 36 strokes per minute.

But the Lord Jeffs were not able to sustain such a pace, and the Ephs, rowing at a steady 32, caught and passed them by the 1500 meter mark. Amherst had a strong sprint at the end, but Williams was able to hold on for a two second margin of victory.

The varsity heavyweight race was neck and neck for virtually the whole 2000 meters. Williams held a slim, two seat lead over Amherst for the first half of the race, with Wesleyan only three or four more seats back.

Amherst pulled even at the halfway point, and the two boats raced evenly for another 200 meters. But Amherst slowly pulled ahead to a half-length lead with 400 meters to go.

Renaissance racqueteer—Greg Zaff

by Mark Averitt

"I'm not that serious about tennis," claims 1982 Division III Tennis All-American Greg Zaff, "but squash—that's what I enjoy doing most in the world. Unfortunately, the world seems to care a lot more about tennis."

Zaff, a junior, has always gone his own way regardless of the popular trend and he was finally rewarded this month when he appeared in the April 4 edition of Sport's Illustrated's "Faces in the Crowd" section.

Zaff became a tennis All-American his sophomore year on the strength of a 10-0 regular season record.

Zaff's squash career has been characterized by consistent improvement. He's been the team's number one player since his arrival. After a 10-9 record in his first year, Zaff posted 16-3 and 17-3 marks. As a junior, Zaff finished fifth in the intercollegiate championship, winning the consolation bracket of the National Individual tournament in Princeton, N.J.

Turning pro

Zaff has been playing the big names in squash (like Harvard's Kenton Jernigan, the number one collegiate player as a freshman who serves as a frequent opponent for Zaff over vacations) on an informal basis for the past couple of years and has been faring well enough against them to consider going on the pro tour. Now what was once a distant possibility has become a firm resolution with Zaff.

Zaff is in the squash courts so much that his fellow students think him a bit peculiar. "But that's what I enjoy most," Zaff explains. "A lot of people here at Williams are studying to be doctors or lawyers, but I'm on my own training program. My dream is to keep an apartment in New York City while traveling around the country playing in squash tournaments—and striving for number one."

This picture of Greg Zaff '84 appeared in SPORTS ILLUSTRATED's "Faces in the Crowd," commending Zaff for making Division III All-America in both tennis and squash.

Marcus resigns

Citing the pressure of work, George Marcus has announced that this will be his last year as women's crew coach.

"Being on the faculty and coaching crew is like two full-time jobs," said Marcus. "It's gotten to the point where I can't juggle them any more."

The Athletic Department is now searching for a successor. "They got me for pretty cheap," Marcus said. "I don't think they'll be able to find anyone else on the faculty who is willing or able to coach. They will probably have to bring someone in."

Marcus was the first women's coach at Williams, starting in 1971, the first year women were admitted to the freshman class.

Good teams

Marcus remembered some of his better teams: "Our second year was fairly remarkable. We had only two people with previous rowing experience, yet we sent two people to the nationals, and finished third in the East."

"The clubs with Sue Tuttle in the mid-'70's, and the late '70's-early '80's teams were also very good... actually, I've had high regard for every crew I've coached."

"My goal for every crew has been that they will seek to excel," said Marcus, "and I hope they continue to do that. I'll still be close to the program."

Coles, Bennett to address graduates

Pulitzer winner, Humanities head

President John W. Chandler announced today that Dr. Robert Coles, Professor of Psychiatry and Medical Humanities at the Harvard Medical School, and Pulitzer Prize-winning author of the five-volume study, Children of Crisis, will be the speaker at Williams' 194th Commencement Exercises on May 29.

William J. Bennett '65, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) will deliver the Baccalaureate address on Saturday, May 28.

Coles will be awarded an honorary Doctor of Letters degree and Bennett an honorary Doctor of Laws degree during Commencement.

Since his graduation from Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1954, Coles has combined two active careers as a practicing psychiatrist and an author, writing 35 books and more than 700 articles for periodicals, newspapers and anthologies.

Following his medical training, Coles worked extensively with troubled and deprived adolescents at hospitals in Massachusetts and in the South. In the early 1960's his research centered on the first black children to enter newly-desegregated schools in the South.

The first volume of Children of Crisis, A Study of Courage and Fear, published in 1967, was a landmark study of the effect of school desegregation on both black and white school children.

Volumes II and III, Migrants, Sharecroppers, Mountaineers and The South Goes North, both published in 1971, earned Coles several awards including the Pulitzer Prize.

Coles's most recent research, conducted in countries such as Northern Ireland and South Africa, is a study of the ways in which children in various countries develop their political convictions and moral values.

William Bennett '65

Bennett's background in scholarship, teaching and academic administration makes him well-suited to head the National Endowment for the Humanities, an organization which promotes increased scholarship and strength in the humanities in the nation's schools and universities. He was appointed to the post by President Reagan in 1981.

After graduating from Williams, Bennett attended graduate school in philosophy at the University of Texas at Austin. He later attended Harvard Law School and earned his J.D. in 1971. From 1972-76, Bennett was an assistant professor of philosophy at Boston University as well as Assistant to the President there.

He has also taught philosophy and law at a number of other colleges, including the University of Southern Mississippi, the University of Texas and Harvard. He has consulted with many secondary schools on quality in curriculum development.

More humanities needed

As head of NEH, Bennett is strongly committed to fostering a renewed emphasis on the humanities. In an interview with Herbert Mitgang in The

New York Times, Bennett said, "My concern is that we are not teaching the groundwork sufficiently in the humanities... Students in high schools and colleges should be exposed to history and the philosophy of literature, and a foreign, if not ancient, language."

Before his appointment to the NEH, Bennett was Director of the National Humanities Center in Research Triangle Park, N.C., which he had been associated with since its early planning stages in 1976. The National Humanities Center is an institute for advanced study in the humanities which brings together 40-50 visiting scholars each year for individual research and exchange of ideas.

The selection of the Commencement speaker is made by the President and Trustees with the advice of the Honorary Degrees Committee. Anyone can submit names to the Committee for honorary degree nominations. The Commencement and Baccalaureate speakers are chosen from those to be awarded honorary degrees. The Committee is composed of three current faculty members, three students and College Marshall Frederick Rudolph.

Review

"Anything you want" at Chapin

by Michael Govan

The activism of the '60's has passed. And while the presence of non-registrants and hunger strikers among us may point out that we haven't lapsed into complete apathy, today our interest in a campus issue has an average half-life of a month-and-a-half. "All that junk like peace and love is just an aggravation," sang Arlo Guthrie last Saturday night during his Spring Weekend concert.

Guthrie and his superb band Shenandoah played for two hours and 50 minutes to a full, though not packed, Chapin Hall. The Williams crowd was pleased, and Guthrie came back for two encores.

Philosophy of time

Arlo seemed rusty, as did his band, during much of the first half of the concert, although that did nothing to detract from the crowd's enjoyment of such favorites as "City of New Orleans" and Bob Dylan's "Tombourine Man." Guthrie kept the crowd alive with his usual wit and charm, employing his down-home manner of speech to discuss bold topical politics and the philosophy of time.

The first half of the concert suffered from a noticeable lack of both energy and drive. The few highlights consisted of a lively solo, by "Terry on the drums," and solos on trombone and spoons during the last piece before intermission. Guthrie perked up for the second half, however, delivering powerful

Declaration bid exhausts gifts

by Jon Tigar

It was a close call.

When the gavel dropped on the College's $375,000 bid for the Declaration of Independence two weeks ago, the College had spent all but $5,000 of the money pledged for the document.

"That was the last bid we could have made," said Howland Swift of the Development Office. "The next bid would have gone up by $10,000."

The total purchase price of $412,500 included the $375,000 hammer price plus Christie's ten percent commission.

The purchase culminated six weeks of preparation which began when Chapin Rare Books Librarian Robert Volz heard of the document's existence. A week later, with pictures and notes from Christie's in hand, he approached President John Chandler and Director of Development John Pritchard. The search for contributions was on.

Volz feels the money was extremely well-spent, that owning a copy is "more important than people realize." The donors "wanted it because they believed in the Declaration and in the Constitution as something that ought to be studied and read and pondered. Many people will be reading those documents for the first time."

Some visitors may be surprised not to see signatures covering the bottom of our copy of the Declaration. Volz explained, "The copy that you see at the National Archives, signed by 56 people, was not done until August 2, 1776. . . . The actual Declaration of Independence consists of those copies printed the night of July 4. And we have one of them." Those copies represent the Declaration's official promulgation, he said.

The College's purchase landed in the pages of local papers, the Boston Globe, the New York Times, and United Press International's wire service, among others. Volz has been pleased with the coverage so far, which he says has been "mostly factual," except that most articles neglect to mention the premium when they list the price.

Although some newspapers have reported that Chapin Library is now the only library to own copies of the Bill of Rights, the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, Volz does not make that claim. He said, "We will be the only library that puts all four founding documents together and makes them available for public viewing and reading."

Volz hopes that the Declaration will increase interest in Chapin Library. Student traffic in the last week has been tremendous, he said, and there has even been talk of basing a course around the founding four documents.

The Declaration joins a Chapin collection which Volz estimates is worth "about $30 million." This collection is maintained by Volz, a full-time assistant, and student employees, of which there are now four. The total administrative budget, which comes from the College's general fund, is $12,000, and the Library also has two endowed funds for specific purchases, which generate a total of about $2,000 a year.

A better Baxter

Baxter Hall may undergo structural and functional changes in the near future. The only definite thing at this point is that nothing is certain.

The Gargoyle Society submitted a proposal with suggestions to President Chandler last December. They advocated relocating the Outing Club, the Chaplain's Office, and the Pottery Studio. They also suggested increasing food storage, installing a freshman lounge and photocopying machines, and expanding the mallroom traffic area. Suggestions from other sources have included an all-night eatery and expanded student services. A few weeks ago, members met with two Trustees to tour the building and discuss possible changes.

The Administration says it lacks a sense of student opinion on the issue. The door is therefore open for student input, while possible changes are still on the drawing board. Anyone with an interest in seeing Baxter become the student center it could be should make his feelings known. We still have the opportunity to formulate policy, rather than comment after the fact.

Hitler and the need for authenticity

by Robert G. L. Waite

If, as now seems likely, the documents being published as the "Hitler Diaries" prove to be spurious, it will not be the first time that noted historians have been duped by fraudulent documents purporting to have been written either by Hitler or by those who said they knew him well.

Respected students of Hitler—including Hugh Trevor-Roper—trusted the "memoirs" of one Josef Greiner who, during the 1940's, claimed to have lived with Hitler in a Home for Men in Vienna from 1907-1908. But it was not possible for Greiner to have known Hitler in the Home for Men in 1907-1908 because Hitler was not there; nor could Greiner have known him in 1909-1913 when Hitler was in Vienna, because Greiner was in Berlin during those years.

Other biographers—notably Robert Payne and John Toland—have accepted as authentic a typescript of some 250 pages entitled "My Brother-in-Law Adolph" and written by Brigid Dowling Hitler, the Irish wife of Hitler's half-brother Alois, Jr. This is an imaginary account of the months in 1912 when, she claims, young Adolph visited her and her husband in Liverpool. But Hitler never crossed the Channel. Vienna police records show that during the time Brigid (and Payne and Toland) put him in Liverpool he was actually living in the Meldemannstrasse in Vienna. And the British Home Office reports that a thorough check of Immigration Service files for 1912 shows no record of an Adolph Hitler—who never used an alias—having landed in England. All this is quite apart from the fact that the tastes, temperament, and interests ascribed to him by Greiner and Brigid Hitler bear no resemblance whatever to the real Adolph Hitler.

Before determining the authenticity of the present "Hitler Diaries," any historian must ask the standard questions he would put to any historical document.

(1) Do physical characteristics check out? Are the paper and ink and handwriting authentic?

Stern magazine, the German publication which holds the "Diaries" along with other documents allegedly written by Hitler, recently showed samples of handwritten pages to specialists at the Federal Archives in Coblenz. These specialists attested that the paper, ink, and handwriting of the specimens were authentic. Two respected Hitler scholars, Hugh Trevor-Roper (now Lord Dacre) and Gerhard Weinberg then read parts of the diaries and told German and American colleagues that in their judgment the diaries were genuine. Trevor-

Robert G. L. Waite is the Brown Professor of History at Williams College.

Roper said flatly, "I'm staking my professional reputation on it." But the pages Stern had shown to German handwriting experts had not come from the "Diaries." Those pages still await the scrutiny of handwriting experts. (As I write, both Trevor-Roper and Weinberg seem to be moving away from their earlier endorsement.)

(2) Are the contents of the documents consistent with statements we know to be genuine?

There has been no adequate opportunity to read the substance of the alleged diary. But the snippets quoted in the press do not inspire confidence. Hitler is quoted as having grudging admiration for Neville Chamberlain; all reliable witnesses say that Hitler had contempt for Chamberlain and those other "worms" he met at Munich. The "Diaries" say that Hitler knew all about Rudolf Hess's flight to Scotland in May 1941; the real Hitler was surprised and appalled by it.

(3) Were people who knew the alleged author aware that he was writing a diary?

Gladstone's secretaries knew their master kept a diary; Napoleon's aides listened to him dictate his memoirs; Nixon was seen editing his presidential papers. Hitler's entourage had no such experience. Not one of the people who knew him intimately over many years—his valets, Karl Wilhelm Krause and Heinz Linge (who saw him last at night and first in the morning), his personal secretaries Fraulein Christa Schroeder, Fraulein Johanna Wolf, and Frau Traudi Junge—not one of these either in memoirs or in later conversations ever mentioned a Hitler diary.

(4) Did the alleged author have time and opportunity to write the document?

We know what Hitler was doing during his waking hours. It is all recorded—not in his own handwriting—in the appointment calendars of the Reichschancellery or those of his secretaries. His appointment schedule did not allow him time to write so full and complete a diary which, we are told, comprised some 60 handwritten volumes with detailed entries for a period from mid-1932 until "mid-April, 1945"—shortly before his suicide. The only time Hitler was alone and could conceivably have worked on a diary was after he had gone to bed. But that was very late indeed. During the last year of his life, it was often 5 or even 6 o'clock in the morning before he dismissed his captive household audience, who had had been listening for interminable hours to his nightly monologues. Dead-tired themselves, they watched him shuffle off to bed mentally and emotionally exhausted. It is unlikely that he then sat down in his bedroom—where there was no desk—to write in a diary.

(5) Does the document fit the personality of the alleged author? Would he have been likely to have written it?

Lincoln's letters read like Lincoln. Pepys' diaries ring true, and he liked to write diaries; Hitler did not. He did not like to see his thoughts on paper. He later regretted the publication of Mein Kampf—a book which he dictated, as he did all his major pronouncements. His orders for the Blood Purge of 1934, for the Reichskristallnacht program of 1938, and for the Endlösung of the "Jewish Problem" were all given orally. He was understandably embarrassed by his atrocious written German which repeated the same grammatical mistakes he had made as a schoolboy. His forte was oral communication; he was a compulsive—and enormously effective—talker. If he had wanted to keep a diary he would have dictated one. He certainly lacked the Sitzfleisch and discipline to sit down carefully, page after hundreds of pages. It would have been out of character for him to do it.

(6) Was the alleged author physically capable of composing the document in question?

Doctors who saw Adolph Hitler during the last years of his life observed his palsied hands and shaking limbs and diagnosed, variously, Parkinson's syndrome, advanced syphilis, "rapidly progressive coronary arterio-sclerosis," or the physical consequences of irresponsible medication prescribed by his quack personal doctor, Theodor Morell. After the Bomb Plot of June 1944, the trembling first diminished then notably increased. During the last year of his life Hitler was not in physical condition to write the kind of document its purveyors have presented us.

Historians do not yet know definitely if the "Hitler Diaries" belong with other frauds, but skepticism about their authenticity seems appropriate.

Self-questioning: the human truth

by John Witter Donovan

I have often wished to impress a number of ideas upon Williams students, but for my own inarticulateness they have until now remained unspoken. Inspired by the spirit of Commencement which impels the wise and the foolish alike to bestow their insight upon the graduating class, but realizing that my own class knows me too well to believe me, I have decided to offer these ideas to the present senior class.

The organizing principle for my ideas (and not a bad idea itself) is the belief that there is no such thing as absolute truth; I do not think that there is any one right idea or value that everyone should share. I thus simultaneously dismiss both the liberals who assert that man has a moral duty to help the poor, or to save nature, and the conservatives who insist that man's human nature is grounded in self-interest.

Rather, I believe that truth is highly personalized and is arrived at only through a profound awareness of oneself and others. This idea of truth is quite hard to accept because it is so demanding. It requires that individuals ask themselves basic and difficult questions about what is truly important to them, and why, and it further demands that they answer these questions. It insists as well that we ask others the same questions, both to help our own self-analysis and to evaluate our relationships with these other people. Crucial to meeting these numerous demands are a sense of humor and a willingness to push (risk) stable friendships.

A sense of humor serves two purposes. First, because it promotes an ability to laugh at oneself it fosters a self-critical, self-analytical approach. Second, this self-questioning attitude helps prevent the restrictive belief that our own self-discovered truth is perfect and absolute.

The willingness to push at stable friendships derives partly from the fact that when one asks these questions others almost invariably perceive that he is stepping outside his "realm". It also results partly because the answers one receives may signal that a new approach to the friendship is required. The relative truths of the friends need not coincide as long as each can understand and accept what is important to the other. Indeed, if this happens a much fuller relationship can well result.

Furthermore, this self-questioning posture opens up many more possibilities than simply the establishment of fuller relationships, for the consequence of not asking oneself such basic questions is a behavioral and attitudinal conservatism (far more dangerous than political conservatism) that in its acceptance of an absolute truth denies all other possibilities. For example, by accepting the belief that man is by his very nature motivated by self-interest, one denies the fact that if he chose to do so man could act (in significant measure) cooperatively or charitably.

I hope that I sound more worried than idealistic, for I fear that a large majority of Williams students are products of this attitudinal conservatism. Our integration into a community of students with similar backgrounds, values, and expectations leads us almost invariably either to an unquestioned affirmation of those values and expectations or to an equally unconsidered negation of them. While either result—affirmation or negation—may help direct us towards achieving our accepted goals, it is the blindness to other possible goals, values, and expectations that is the worst conceivable possibility; indeed, it is the worst conceivable actuality.

These are the ideas, then, that I wish to offer the graduating class or, for that matter, the entire school community. Though I would be hard-pressed to assert their absolute truth, I believe that everyone can find a certain amount of truth and direction in some or all of what I have said.

Paine fuses complex elements 'Rich mosaic of sight, sound, and movement'

Marc Wolf and the cast of TOM PAINE

by Spencer Jones and Kristen Engberg

The recent Adams Memorial Theater spring student production of Paul Foster's Tom Paine was a rich mosaic of sight, sound and movement. All of the elements, especially the set, contributed to the carefully integrated production. The impact and intuitive understanding of the show came from this total fusion of separate components; each of the parts taken alone would be less powerful than the effect of the whole.

The visual-aural circus inundating the audience was almost overwhelming.

Sensual richness

The visual/aural circus inundating the audience was almost overwhelming. Attempts to impose historical or rational data upon such a rich spectrum would do the production an injustice. Such accessible data could be neatly plucked from the production; more defined personalities elicited more specific responses.

The three slapstick judges, Kate Prendergast, Mitchell Anderson and Sally Nicholson, drew roars of approval during their soft shoe interpretation of the hallowed courts of justice. Marc Wolf painted an equally successful portrait of Tom Paine's degradation, prostrating himself at the feet of such dangerous foolishness. Such vignettes, however successful unto themselves, only achieved importance and significance within the whole.

Vibrant stage set

Art Professor Ed Epping's original set design contributed to Tom Paine's continuity and sense of completeness. His chosen shapes and movements were pared down to essential elements which allowed the stage to reverberate with possibilities. The subtle choreography of light and shade on the set's movable framework shifted and defined the characters through time and space. The changeable quality of Epping's set complemented the richly uncategorical nature of the whole of Tom Paine.

Slave ship

Toward the end of the show Guthrie seemed to suffer a slight attack of conscience. He sat down at the piano and began a soulful and captivating "Amazing Grace" to which he added a personal note. "I just wanted you to know that this song was written by the captain of a slave ship who, in the middle of one of his crossings, turned his boat around and went back to Africa. He came back to America and began writing songs like this.

"Anybody who's not afraid to turn around is a friend of mine—all people... including people who run colleges. Don't ever be afraid to turn around."

"Anybody who's not afraid to turn around is a friend of mine... including people who run colleges."

Before the concert Guthrie spoke to an unidentified Williams student who apparently had asked him to address the issue of South Africa and divestment. He touched on the issue briefly in the middle of the show in a light-hearted song he called "Guabi Guabi," the story of a South African worker who met an unexplained death at the hands of a corrupt police force.

It wasn't until the second half of the concert that his light-hearted political satire turned more serious. With the recent reinstatement of draft registration, Guthrie has brought back into his repertoire the ever popular "Alice's Restaurant." He has modified the song about the draft slightly to pertain more directly to today's registration issue. The twenty minute song

Parkhurst helps bring College Museum alive

Former Nat'l Gallery
Director now at Williams

by Michael Govan

Among the new walls, new offices, and new galleries of Lawrence Hall is a new face. Charles Parkhurst, formerly Assistant Director and Chief Curator of the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D. C., has been working since February as Co-director of our own Williams College Museum of Art.

Parkhurst retired from his post as second-in-command at the National Gallery in January at age 70, although he looks barely 40. Parkhurst was asked to come to Williamstown for at least 18 months to assist Museum Director Tom Krens who is currently working towards an M.A. in Business Administration. With the College Museum growing rapidly, its administration needs are great. "It's a new enterprise with new problems," said Parkhurst.

"Alter ego"

Although Parkhurst handled a staff of 700 in Washington and handles a staff of only seven in Lawrence Hall, he says that his work here is not entirely different. He considers himself an "alter ego" to the directors at both museums, and humorously refers to himself as "low profile Charlie."

Williamstown is not new to Mr. Parkhurst. As a child he visited the campus with his father, a Williams grad of '98. Parkhurst himself graduated from Williams in '35 after transferring from Oberlin before his sophomore year. He taught a Winter Study course here three years ago.

More charm

"Williamstown has everything I like," said Parkhurst. "It has much more charm than Washington." Asked how he got to work in the relatively small College Museum after administering one of the world's largest art museums, he chuckled and answered, "I don't like this to get out... I angled for this job for five years, and finally got it." "I'm happy to live here and use the facilities," he added.

Besides helping out at the Museum, Parkhurst is in Williamstown to continue his research in the field of color theory. He now devotes much of his time to his study. "I had the field all to myself for years. Now dogs are barking at my heels."

Parkhurst has traced the origins of modern color theory back to the 12th century. He is working now to fill a gap in the history of color theory between 1500 and 1600. "Those artists don't seem to have written about it. They painted it," explained Parkhurst.

Magic and science

His research requires a breadth of knowledge—"lots more things than I can control," said Parkhurst. He has studied both Eastern and Western art, and has collaborated with scientists in some cases. He found some of his sources in 12th century Arabic. Among his stacks of books can be found A Medieval History of Magic and Science in eight volumes. "If you don't know where to start," said Parkhurst, "look it up in the index of that book."

Parkhurst has no definite plans when his 18 month term at the Williams Museum is up. "I could stay here with great pleasure," he admits.

New addition both imaginative and practical

Hammers are still pounding and construction debris is still scattered about, but the new addition to Lawrence Hall, the College Museum of Art, is nearing completion. The $4.5 million project will put the Williams Museum among the very best college museums in the country.

The addition, along with its new climate control and security systems, will allow the Museum to borrow works from other museums and set up shows of national importance.

The Museum will also display its own impressive collection, which is especially strong in American art. The permanent collection is growing along with the Museum. "Our goal," said Museum Co-director Charles Parkhurst, "is that no one can do a show in America without borrowing a work from the Williams College Museum."

"Sleeping giant"

Parkhurst remarked that the museum already rates high in the art world, but that few people outside the art world know how good it is. He attributes much of the Museum's new growth to Director Tom Krens who "brought the sleeping giant to life."

The Museum will open in September of this year with four new shows, one of which will display the works of Maurice and Charles Prendergast, two important figures in 19th/20th century American art. The show will consist of paintings on loan from the collection of Mrs. Eugenie Prendergast, wife of Charles.

Aerial walkways

The Museum staff is delighted with the new addition designed by prominent American architect Charles Moore. "It's easy to handle... a solid basis for future development," said Parkhurst. "It's rare to find designs of such imagination which are just as practical to work with." The addition features a spectacular atrium with skylights and aerial walkways between the old and new sections of the building.

Money is still being raised to complete renovation of the old Lawrence Hall and add features to the new addition, such as a loading dock and a ceiling in the main gallery, which had been deleted due to budget constraints.

Nighttime use

New offices for Art Department faculty and a new slide room, also part of the addition, have been in use since January. Art faculty are generally very pleased with the space. Students are already using the new art studio and renovated photography lab.

A lecture hall, a room for art conferences and a classroom will open in September. Several logistical problems involving nighttime student use of the facilities still need to be worked out. Professor of Art E. J. Johnson said that plans include provisions for student study areas with access to class materials such as photographs.

In Other Ivory Towers

Middlebury

Middlebury College has been the scene of great uproar in recent weeks. Vitao Acconci, a visiting professor of art, created a sculpture he called "Way Station Number One." The Middlebury Campus reports that many students have called it other, less flattering, names.

A group of students calling themselves the Committee to Relocate the Acconci Sculpture (CRAS) has organized a petition with over 800 signatures to move the sculpture to an unspecified "more secure" location. Leaders of CRAS have stated that "people who don't want to look at it shouldn't have to."

Another group has recently formed, People in Support of Vito (PISCOV), which would like to see the sculpture remain.

Two students in the class of 1986, because of low numbers in Middlebury's room draw, have volunteered to live in the sculpture, which faintly resembles a cross between a toolshed and an outhouse according to Middlebury sophomore Andy Bell.

The sculpture has provoked a strong response from the student body and the Student Forum voted for its location.

The Campus quoted Dean of Arts and Humanities

Stephen Donadio as saying that he was "uneasy with the idea that works of art should be subjected to a vote." He likened the student petition and the Student Forum vote to other forms of censorship. He also refused to comment on where the money for the sculpture came from.

However, students have taken matters into their own hands. Vandals have repeatedly attacked the sculpture in recent weeks.

University of Illinois

A survey was taken recently at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana. The survey compared graffiti in men's and women's bathrooms. Women's writings are, apparently, "more interactive and personal." In contrast, men tend to write about "sexual conquests and powers."

Connecticut College

Connecticut College recently adapted a student proposal to limit smoking in dining halls. The Connecticut College Voice reports that "current conditions... make eating unhealthy for all students as well as unpleasant and unappetizing for most non-smokers." The new policy will limit smoking to one room in multi-section dining halls and to a single table in smaller dining rooms.

Nuclear fusion field gets hotter

by Daniel Keating

The latest breakthroughs in nuclear fusion technology and its development as a new energy source were energetically described by Harold P. Furth in a lecture last Friday.

However, Furth, who is director of Princeton University's Plasma Physics Lab, cautioned that further research will be necessary before fusion energy becomes commercially available.

Furth oversees 300 physicists and engineers on a plant which cost $314 million when it was built in the early 1970's.

As Furth explained, fusion works by joining two atoms into a heavier one. When they are fused, some mass is lost. "Armed with e-mcs, you can deduce that energy is released when mass is lost," he said.

The advantages of fusion power are that it uses ocean water as fuel and creates no radioactive waste, as nuclear fission (splitting rather than joining atoms) does.

100 million degrees To push the atoms together, however, the temperature must be at least 100 million degrees Centigrade.

"The 100 million degrees is one of the problems," said Furth, "but not by any means the worst. Because the temperature is so great, the challenge is not letting the heated atoms touch anything, he added.

The method which Furth is pioneering at Princeton circles the atoms in a loop with magnetic sides. Furth compared this method to "the big fusion reactor in the sky," the sun, and concluded that the similarity means that "we have nature's approval on this project."

His laboratory at Princeton

Harold P. Furth, Princeton physicist, spoke Friday on the prospects of fusion power. (Lane) has reached 80 million degrees and is currently building a reactor twice as large, he said. Furth expects Tokamak, a donut-shaped reactor, to reach its maximum of 200 million degrees by 1985, and by 1986 to reach the break-even point of getting as much energy out as they put in to start it.

Other plans call for an Engineering Test Reactor, the first commercially feasible fusion reactor, to be built in 1991, he said.

Record Review

Reed explores HEARTS

by Brett McDonnell

For those who have already discovered Lou Reed, his new album Legendary Hearts is a must. For the uninitiated, it should serve as a good introduction to the work of the best, most mercurial and most complex of all rock songwriters.

Mercurial and Complex
Reed began his career as leader of The Velvet Underground, the late sixties New York band which many critics credit with spawning punk and new wave music as well as being one of the most creative and unique bands of all time.

After leaving that group, Reed started a solo career marked by more abrupt and startling changes than even Bob Dylan's. As an example, at one point in the mid-70's, Reed released Sally Can't Dance, a low key and populist affair. He followed that with Metal Machine Music—two discs' worth of electronic sludge. He followed that with the simple and beautiful Coney Island Baby—three totally different styles in three albums, and the records before and after those were completely different yet.

With 1980's Growing Up In Public, Reed began to settle down. This probably had something to do with meeting the person who is now his wife. This mellowing out phase has continued on his last two albums, The Blue Mask and Legendary Hearts.

Less Pain and Anger
Despite this trend, Reed has not given up on the pain, alienation, and anger which stood out on his earlier work. "The Last Shot," a song about his attempt to kick his alcoholism, has the lyrical and musical bite of his classic masterpieces. "Betrayed" and "Bottoming Out" are more intriguing. On the musical surface both seem to be moderate tempo, pleasant little songs, with a haunting melody added to the former. Then you listen to the lyrics and realize that both are deeply personal, dark gems. In "Betrayed" Reed writes about a lover poisoned (spiritually) by her father. "Bottoming Out" follows the lead of "The Last Shot" in detailing Reed's efforts to control his inner feelings and compulsions.

Wide Range
In case this all sounds too powerful and gloomy for Williams students, "Don't Talk to Me About Work" and "Martial Law" provide upbeat, fun relief (and potential single material). "Turn Out the Light" is a delightful little mood piece. Most surprisingly, there is the mild-mannered, liberal song "Pow Wow" about reconciliation with the Indians (this from the man who wrote "I Wanna Be Black").

As on The Blue Mask, for this album Reed has put together a tight band which makes more professional, more stripped-down music than anything Reed has ever done. Listen to Fernando Saunders's loping, expressive bass on "Legendary Hearts" for an example. Robert Quine provides distinctive guitar work which adjusts to both the mellow and the titanic.

Fizzles at end
Only on the last two songs does this album fizzle out. "Home of the Brave" is too long and depressing, with no power or insight to carry it. "Rooftop Garden," the finale, is a saccharine portrayal of marital bliss, infinitely less moving than The Blue Mask's "Heavenly Arms" on the same subject.

Marriage seems to have helped Lou Reed begin to come to grips with his problems. As a result, the excesses that made masterpieces like Berlin and Street Hassle are gone. In their place we get honest, smooth, and assured songwriting. Lou Reed may not surprise us much anymore (then again, he may), but on the evidence of Legendary Hearts he will go on making excellent music for a long time to come.

NEWS BRIEFS

Spring finally came to the freshman quad last week, and these students made up for all that time lost to April snows. (Lockwood)

Strikers support Harvard

Last Monday approximately one dozen Williams students began a two-day "solidarity fast" in support of the Harvard hunger strikers. The fast began with a rally in Baxter Lounge.

Although the Harvard hunger strikers had originally hoped to urge complete divestment, they were ultimately satisfied that their strike, which ended last Wednesday, was a source of "awareness raising."

Conflicting rumors are circulating at Harvard about an evangelical Christian group, the Seymour Society, which allegedly upstaged the strikers with their own strike. According to Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) member Mark White '84, the group said it was "ungodly" to exert political pressure by starving one's body and therefore encouraged students to eat fruit at least once a day.

However, WAAC member Andy Levin '84, spoke to a supposed spokesman for the Seymour Society who denied the very existence of the group.

On Saturday, a Northeast regional anti-apartheid meeting was held at Amherst College. The American Committee on Africa organized the meeting with the purpose of "carrying forward the process of regional co-ordination among Northeast activists."

Navjeet Bal '84, one of the Williams' fasters last week, attended the Amherst meeting and said no real issues were resolved. She also attended a recent forum at Hampshire College on "socially responsible investment," where topics focused on the various options available for investment in South Africa.

Mobil proxy condemned

Last week the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) voted unanimously against a Mobil Corporation proxy that demanded direct shareholder input into corporate lobbying on Mideast policy issues.

The shareholder resolution charged that Mobil has "taken positions on controversial issues without even consulting the shareholders, often in contradiction to their views."

The resolution cited Mobil's efforts in 1981 to promote the sale of American Airborne Warning and Control System planes (AWACS) to Saudi Arabia as the great test offense to the shareholders.

William Reed, College Treasurer and ACSR member, explained the committee's rejection of the proxy. "As we have done in the past, we have voted against resolutions advocated by smaller groups with a particular point of view, especially when it runs counter to U.S. foreign policy," he said.

The ACSR voted against similar resolutions for lobbying controls in regard to Mideast issues in two other meetings last February and March, Reed said.

BSU denied house

Because of zoning regulations, the Black Student Union center will not be located at Jenness House as originally planned.

Last week the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility unanimously denied a request by the College that Jenness House be given special status in the Residential district around Bank Street.

Dean of the College Dan O'Connor said that the request was denied because of fears that it would cause "a lot of noise." The College petitioned to have Jenness House changed from its present status as faculty housing to a center for the Black Student Union on one floor with one faculty apartment on the second.

As a result of the Zoning Board's action, Jenness will be "kept as faculty housing or maybe used as offices for coaches," according to O'Connor.

Nura Dualeh '85 stated that the Black Student Union will meet this week to discuss possible alternatives for their student center.

O'Connor said that there was "another building under discussion" for the Black Student Union, but declined to mention which one.

Russian women not equal

The myth of emancipation has not produced equality for Russian women and the prospects for the future are poor, said University of California Professor Rose Glickman, a specialist in Soviet women's studies, in a lecture Thursday night.

Currently, there are two popular images in this country of women in the Soviet Union, according to Glickman. One is of the cosmonaut, the doctor, the welder, the bricklayer and a host of other "liberated" workers. The other is of the woman street sweeper, the worker with the least status. Both are true, she said.

The distinction comes in the proportions, she explained. For example, women are 75 percent of the doctors, but they are 90 percent of the pediatricians and only seven percent of the surgeons.

"Women are highly represented in the professions," she said. "But the skill, status, income and prestige all go to men, not women."

Women not people
The position of women in the Soviet Union is a "basic and undeviated continuity with the past," she said. The pre-revolution plight of the Russian woman is best summed up by an old Russian peasant saying: "A chicken is not a bird; a woman is not a person," said Glickman.

Glickman used anecdotes from her personal experiments in Russia to describe the Soviet women's double burden of responsibility since the 1930's. Although 86 percent of the women work, Soviet household work is equivalent to American housework in the 1930's, when American women were not working full-time outside the home, she said.

"In an economy of unrelenting scarcity, chores are arduous and difficult," said Glickman. "Shopping there is like hunting and gathering. Women in the Soviet Union don't have time to be equal."

"If they have the perceptions [of their oppression], they don't have the vocabulary to express them," she said of most Russian women. "And everything is buried under layers and layers of acceptance."

New York bus canned

As of last week, there are no direct buses to or from New York. Vermont Transit, Inc., has cancelled stops at Williamstown, resulting in a disruption of service to Pittsfield and points south, and Bennington and points north.

The decision was made because of low ridership, according to a spokesman for Vermont Transit.

The only bus line still serving Williamstown is the Englemer line, which runs to Boston and Albany. Englemer is offering four buses a day to Boston and one bus a day to Albany.

A spokesman at the Williams Inn explained that students wishing to travel to New York may take an Englemer bus to Albany and switch to Greyhound for New York. This route will be longer and more expensive than the original direct route.

A local Berkshire County bus travels to Pittsfield, but takes more than an hour while going through North Adams and Adams. This bus is free and connections for points south can be made at the Pittsfield bus station.

Meanwhile, the A-side lost to Middlebury 7-4. Sophomore Ginger Greene scored the Ephwomans' only try with a 20 meter run up the weak side. Co-captain Jane Parker '83 commented that "it was a good scrum game." The rugger's face Amherst at Amherst to close out their season next Saturday. (Lockwood)

UMass powers past crew

Men's crew was home again on Saturday for races with the University of Massachusetts and Lowell. The varsity eight lost to UMass., while both freshman boats, lightweights and heavyweights, beat their opponents.

The varsity eight rowed a poor race on the Lake Onota course, finishing 17 seconds behind the UMass. eight. The Ephs did not seem to be completely in the race mentally, while UMass. was able to rely on their strength for the victory.

UMass. had a small lead at the 500 meter mark, but some rough water and some poor Williams strokes quickly dropped the Ephs back. Williams was able to take the rating up effectively at the end of the 2000 meters, but Massachusetts had too great a lead.

The freshman heavyweight crew demonstrated conclusively that they are a force to be reckoned with, demolishing the lads from Amherst and Lowell. Rowing a very strong race Williams beat UMass. by 18 seconds, and Lowell by 32. Williams led from the start and rowed a very controlled race, never looking back.

The freshman lightweights rowed as the second freshman eight against the Lowell second freshman boat. They too had a good day. Williams had opened water after the first 30 strokes, and rowed a clean race.

Walks—more rambling reminiscences

by John Clayton

All the teams I cover walk. They all walk opposing batters—sometimes by the dozen. I don't know if it's the pitchers in particular, the level of play in general, or me sitting on the sidelines.

The Williams team walked 30 people in three games this weekend.

Maybe my teams walk because I walk. Whenever I'm playing in a refereed baseball, wiffle ball or softball game, I go for a walk as much as a hit. That may have something to do with my barely being able to hit the ball unless it's on a tee.

When I played for my school in eighth grade, I only got up three times. Twice I walked. The third time I struck out, only because I felt I had to swing at a ball once in my school baseball career.

On a 3-2 pitch, I swung at a ball four feet outside.

My friends always regarded walking as wimpy. They also thought singles hitters were wimpy. Not being able to do much else, I didn't have much of a choice—I could be a wimpy hitter or strike out. I did both with regularity.

As a fan, walks annoy me. Especially inept walks. If you're going to be inept, there are a lot more exciting ways to do it: mugging a grounder, letting a fly ball hit you on the head, or stealing second with the bases loaded.

My favorite is playing first base and dropping an easy toss from the pitcher to blow the ball game. (Sounds like a Little League-type error, right? I did it last year in Keg Softball).

Walks, though, are easy for the hitter. Unless he's Pete Rose. The way he hustles down to first, they should call them runs. But that might get complicated.

Mishap caps women's crew weekend

by Lee Farbman

The women's crew left on Friday afternoon for a planned regatta at Philadelphia with the University of Pennsylvania, Georgetown, Princeton, and Dartmouth. However, on Saturday morning at race time there were three foot swells on the Schuylkill river course with a high wind. Since the course was clearly unrowable, the coaches decided to go to Princeton for races there.

Adventure

Dartmouth and Princeton are seeded in the top three in the east. The varsity race was an adventure in itself for the Williams eight. After a good start, Williams was up a seat on Princeton, and only two seats behind Penn. Then, at the 300 meter point, Molly Tennis '85, the Williams stroke, lost her oar when the oarlock inexplicably popped open. The Williams boat stayed cool, however, and continued to row the bow 7 while Tennis replaced the oar and tightened the lock, which took a dozen or so strokes.

During this interim Williams dropped half a length behind, but pulled together for a strong surge in the middle of the race to draw nearly even with Princeton. By the last 300 meters, however, the effort required to hold even and surge took its toll on the Ephwomans, and they fell victim to the Princeton sprint.

A clearly superior Dartmouth boat won the 1500 meter race in 4:54.2, Princeton edged out U.Penn. on the sprint to take second by .2 seconds, and Williams was fourth. Williams coach George Marcus called the Ephs' performance "extremely gutsy."

Novices fall short

In the junior varsity eight race Williams was able to hold within one length for more than half of the race, but in the end Princeton and Dartmouth proved too strong.

The novice four lost by seven lengths to UMass at home.

Holyoke outhits softball

by Liz Strelitz

The women's softball team lost 9-5 to a strong Mt. Holyoke club Saturday at home. Last Tuesday they beat Southern Vermont 9-0. The Mt. Holyoke game remained close, 3-2, until the bottom of the fifth inning when Mt. Holyoke's solid hitting pulled in four runs.

After the game, Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin said that although the women play better and better each game and continue to play a strong defensive game, the club needs to develop consistency at the plate.

Strong seventh inning

The women's seventh inning performance was certainly a boost to the team's confidence in its hitting. Down 7-2, the women scored three runs. Senior Liz Jex's triple at the top of the inning spurred on the last-gasp rally.

Along with Jex, there were other strong individual performances. Teresa Galms '85 went two for three at the plate and played an excellent defensive game in left field. Galms had a number of fine catches and threw out two Mt. Holyoke batters at the plate.

Karen Montzka '85 was one for three at the plate and pitched five innings. Debbie Wickenden '85 pitched the remaining two innings.

Beat Southern Vermont

In last Tuesday's home game against Southern Vermont, the women scored eight runs in the third inning on just three hits.

Montzka pitched five innings and had nine strikeouts. At the plate Montzka went two for four, scoring two runs.

Catcher Thalia Meehan '83 also did well at the plate. Meehan batted two for three and scored a run in the third.

The women have a busy upcoming week. They have a regularly scheduled games against RPI Wednesday and two against UMass-Boston Saturday.

Ruggers play in tourneys

by Paul Hogan

The men's rugby team split up Saturday, with the A-side traveling to Boston for the Babson Invitational tournament; while the B and C sides went to Albany for the Old Green tournament.

At Babson, the A-side won their first match 7-3 against Mass. Maritime RFC, then lost a close contest to the hosts from Babson 15-12.

The fine play of both the line and the scrum led to the victory over Maritime. Powerhouse John Frese '84 started off the Williams scoring with a try and co-captain Dave Park '83 accounted for the other three points with a field goal.

The smooth teamwork of the scrum provided much ball for the line to work with. Co-captain Brian Grady '83, Chip Connolly '83, and Joe Carey '84 played with intense ferocity. Linemen Hugh Huzenga '84 and Jimmy Bell '84 kept the Maritime defenders on the run with their fine kicking and passing. The side's potential bubbled forth throughout the match.

In the next match the Babson Beavers held the homefield advantage which helped them squeak to a close three-point victory. The magic foot of Rob Kusel '83 accounted for 8 of Williams' 12 points with yet another drop kick, a field goal and a conversion.

The line again played with smooth teamwork and the Williams try was scored in a pretty play featuring fine passing, explosive running and strong support. Dave Lipscomb '83, Bell and Frese were all instrumental in the try that Park finally touched down. The scrum again terrorized their opponents with Dixon Pike '83, Bill Donovan '83 and John May '84 leading the attack. A Babson field goal late in the game led to the Williams defeat.

Albany tourney

The B and C sides went west to Albany to play in a 12-team A-side tournament hosted by the Old Green RFC.

In the B side's first match against Albany Law, the scrum and line both dominated. Pete Alken '86 and Rich Weber '83 anchored a solid white pack, while captains Larry Hebb '83 and Drew Klein '84 kept the ball moving smoothly. Law ultimately bowed to the accuracy of senior Kris Strohhenn's right foot, as Williams won 3-0 on a penalty kick.

over the center field fence in the fifth, following a walk to Rob Cookley.

Delorenzo gave up one hit and four walks while striking out eight in his six innings. Hennigan replaced him to start the seventh, and pitched two innings of no-hit ball, walking two and striking out two. Matt Viola '84 pitched the ninth, walking the bases loaded but getting out of it with a double play.

On Tuesday, Williams lost to Amherst at Amherst, 5-0. The Ephs had only three hits, one each for White, Brownell and freshman Dick Hollington.

Morris pitched the whole game, giving up nine hits but only one earned run, while walking two and striking out one. Amherst scored one in the first, two in the third, and two in the fourth.

The team is now 4-5 up North, 6-12 overall. They faced American International yesterday.

Linksters eleventh in N.E.

The golf team moved its record to a disappointing 1-3 with a win over Union College and a loss to American International Thursday. Earlier in the week, they placed eleventh in the New England AIC's total of 398 was well ahead of the Ephs 410 and Union's 419. Earlier in the week, they finished eleventh in the New England.

Senior co-captain Phil Seefried was Medalist for the match; his 76 put him just ahead of several other players. Sophomores Chris Harned and Bill McClements carded 82 and 83 for the Ephs.

New England

In the New England, the team broke to a first day eighth-place standing with a 320 total before faltering on the final day of competition with four scores totalling 340. The Ephs 660 total put them well behind Central Connecticut's winning 612. Bryant took second with 619 while Amherst rallied for third at 630.

Sophomore Mike Hennigan paced the Ephs with rounds of 77 and 82 for a 159 total which put him just off the 144 winning total of Bryant's Jim Hallett, U.S. Amateur semi-finalist and Low Amateur at this year's Masters Tournament.

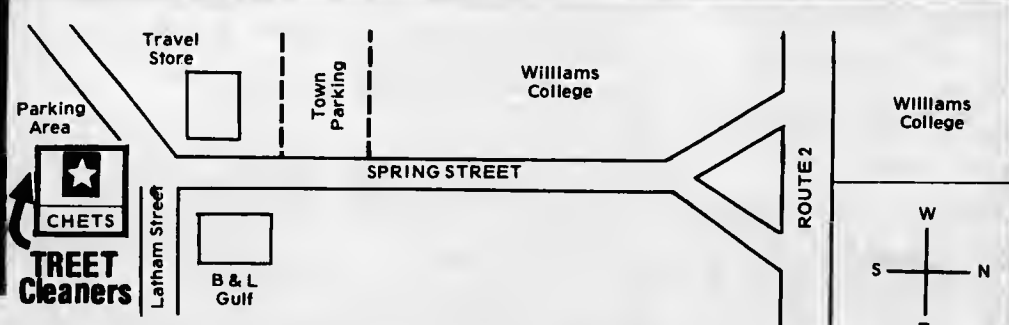

A talented quartet of Williams seniors closely followed Hennigan. Charlie Thompson carded 79 and 85 for a 164 total while co-captain Bruce Goff swung to a 168 total. Todd Krieger and Phil Seefried were just behind at 169 and 170.

Bad weather

Coach Rudy Goff said, "It's unfortunate that snow and bad weather have interrupted our practice schedule so seriously; we had some good individual efforts out there but we were a little rusty on the touch shots."

Mike Hennigan '85 won the NESAC tournament Monday with a 151, leading Williams to the top team score.

Track romps to Little Three title

The men's track team ably defeated arch-rivals Amherst and Wesleyan in the annual Little Three spring track meet.

The Ephmen chalked up 77 points to Amherst's 57 and Wesleyan's 56 at Saturday's meet at Weston Field. The Wesleyan women's team managed a 5-point lead over Williams in the final score, 69-64, with Amherst completing the tally with 25 points.

Alejandro double winner

On the Men's track events, Tomas Alejandro triumphed in both the 100-yard dash and the 200 meter race. He and Amherst's Lyons were the only double winners for the Men's events; Lyons won both the high jump and the triple jump.

In other track events, the Williams team won the 400 meter relay and placed second in the one-mile relay. Junior Bo Parker won the 1500 meter with a 3:57.0. Junior Ken James also triumphed in the 110 hurdles. Moreover, freshman Clark Otley provided team points in three events with third-place finishes in the pole vault, 100-yard dash, and the 200-meter race.

In the field events, Bernie Krause '84 won in the hammer event and captured third in the shotput. John Campbell '84 won the pole vault while Jeff Congdon '84 threw the javelin 179 1/4' to win that event.

Rockwood leads women

For the women, Lindsay Rockwood '85 contributed a win in the high jump, seconds in the 100 hurdles and 400 hurdles, and a third in the long jump.

Wesleyan dominated the remaining field events with their wins in the shotput, javelin, and discus, and a first-place finish in the long jump.

In the track events, senior Melanie Taylor won the 100-yard dash in 13.0 seconds and placed second in the 200 meter race. Amy Doherty '84 won the 1500 while teammates Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 and Susan Bragdon '83 won the 100 hurdles and 3000 meter race, respectively. Freshman Mary Kettler achieved two third-place finishes in the 800 and 1500 meter races as well.

Freshman Clark Otley surges past an Amherst runner in the 100. Otley took third in the race; the Ephmen won the Little Three meet. (Shapiro)

Walks plague batsmen

by John Clayton and Andrew Garfield

Hitting well but plagued by walks, the baseball team went 1-3 on a weekend trip to Maine; splitting with Bates on Saturday and losing to Colby Friday.

"For the weekend," said Williams Coach Jim Briggs, "in three games we had 36 hits but let up 30 walks. If we had some pitching to go with this hitting, we'd be a great team."

Junior John Hennigan pitched the first Bates game, walking eleven batters in seven innings. Five of Bates' runs were caused by walks. Hennigan walked four in the second inning, when Bates scored their first two runs.

Third baseman Brian Rutledge '85 was the Ephs' offensive star in the first game, going two-for-three.

Nine-run inning

A nine-run, nine-hit sixth inning propelled Williams to the second game victory. "All nine hits were wicked shots," said Coach Briggs.

Senior co-captain Bob Brownell capped off the inning with a 400-foot three run homer. Rob Coakley '86 had a two-RBI double, and Phil Lusardi '85 had a one-RBI double.

Lusardi also added a one-run homer in the fourth. Rob Coakley was four for five on the day, Louie Nasser '83 and Mark White '84 each went three for five.

Kevin Morris (2-1) pitched the whole game, walking eight.

Williams pitchers gave up 13 hits and ten walks in the Colby game.

"We walked six leadoff hitters," said Briggs, "and all of them scored."

Junior Bill Hugo started for Williams, and was given a 4-1 lead in the top of the fourth. But he walked the first three batters in the bottom of that inning, and Colby went on to score five runs.

Williams regained the lead at 9-8 in the sixth, but Eph pitchers Steve Watson, Dave Moss, and Rob Coakley could not contain the Mules.

Rob Coakley was the offensive star for Williams, going two for four with a home run. Brother Mike Coakley '85 went three for five, Lusardi was three for four, and White was two for four.

Earlier in the week, home runs by Brownell and White and six innings of one-hit pitching by John Delorenzo '84 led Williams in a win over Southern Vermont Wednesday.

Brownell had a three-run homer in the fourth inning, into the bleachers deep down the left-field line. The homer followed a walk to White and a pitcher's error that allowed Mike Coakley to reach first.

Tennis wins NESCAC

Williams entered the weekend NESCAC tourney with the highest number of seeds of any team in the draw. Competing against 10 other New England colleges, Williams won 3 of the 6 single draws, had semifinalists in two others and captured 2 of the 3 doubles draws. Williams finished with 25 points and second place Amherst had 19.

Greg Zaff '84 and Craig Hammond '85 captured the B doubles crown in a tough 3 set final against Trinity. Brook Larmer '84 teamed up with Mark Sopher '83 to take the A doubles and earn a berth at the Division III Nationals in two weeks.

Sopher, a number 1 seed, defeated his Amherst opponent in three sets to take the D draw singles. Tim Rives '85 won the E class soundly. As number 3 seed he cruised through in straight sets. Unseeded Tom Harrity '84 posted a three-set victory over Amherst's number 6 player to take the final draw.

After falling behind 3-1 in the singles at Trinity on Wednesday, Williams stormed back to take the remaining two singles matches and sweep the 3 doubles matches.

The team finishes its regular season with three home matches this week. They face Albany on Tuesday, Wesleyan on Saturday, and Colgate on Sunday.

Wesleyan edges laxwomen

Despite an incredible comeback in which Williams scored eight goals in five minutes, the Ephwomen lost to Wesleyan 13-12 on Saturday. The loss drops Williams' record to 3-3.

According to Coach Peel Hawthorne, Williams was "sluggish" at the outset of the match. Wesleyan put in five goals in the first six minutes to lead 9-4 at halftime.

Co-captain Bea Fuller '83 led the second-half charge, scoring

3 goals and making several "critical offensive and defensive plays." Alison Earle '84 and Cary Cento '86 also had 3 goals apiece.

Williams lost on Tuesday to Trinity 12-9 in spite of 3 goals by Laura Rogers '86 and 16 saves by goalie Beth Flynn '83. Hawthorne comments that "we haven't been able to put two good halves together." The team plays at Union on Tuesday and at Middlebury on Thursday.

WAAC asks senior class to withhold donations

Written by Jeff Brainard; reported by Brainard and Jon Tigar

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) distributed a letter to the senior class last week asking it to sign a pledge not to donate money to Williams until the College divests from all companies and banks doing business with South Africa. So far, 25 seniors have signed, according to WAAC spokesman Geoff Mamlet '83.

A group of 23 seniors responded with a letter asking the class to ignore WAAC's request. The letter said that students can support the College but still continue to work for social change as alumni. The seniors who signed said that many of them favor some kind of divestment but are opposed to WAAC's proposal.

WAAC made the same proposal in 1978 and 1982. According to the administration this year's contributions from the Class of 1978 set an all-time record high for a class five years out of Williams, but it is still too early to tell whether the boycott will have any effect.

"A moral question"
WAAC's letter said investment in South Africa is not consistent with the values that the College stands for, because those investments support apartheid.

"Investment in South Africa thus becomes a moral question rather than simply a financial one," the letter said, concluding that by not giving to Williams, seniors "will be helping the College to renew its commitment to its values."

A number of faculty and administration members said they oppose WAAC's proposal, because, among other reasons, the endowment contributes 40 percent of each student's educational expenses.

"After all the discussions of the past year, not to mention the years preceding," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, "to see that WAAC still reduces the issue to a single conflict between morality, on the one hand, and 'financial' considerations, on the other, fills me with a sense of deep frustration. What, after all, was the point of all the meetings many of us faithfully attended?" President John Chandler called the move "implicitly selfish" because he says it denies the future generations of students the same benefits that the signers have enjoyed.

Escrow account
John Small '83, current College Council Treasurer and candidate for Class Treasurer, made yet a third proposal, that the senior class put the funds it would otherwise donate to its class fund into an escrow account which would not be turned over to the College until it divested from companies and banks doing business in South Africa and "exhibited serious commitment and progress towards eventual full divestment." Small noted that the class fund which he proposes to put in escrow would be used only to fund class reunions. However, Derede Arthur '83, a WAAC spokesperson, said that WAAC may encourage seniors to put all donations to the College into such an account. She also said WAAC is looking at model escrow accounts, such as the one set up by Harvard seniors protesting apartheid this spring.

Seniors have made pledges not to give to Williams before, with mixed results. Between 100 and 150 seniors signed a pledge in 1978 not to contribute, according to Director of Alumni Relations Craig Lewis. He said he was told by 1978 Class Agent John Farmakis that about 50 of those graduates are still opposing giving money because of the College's investment policies.

Its first year out, 49 percent of the Class of 1978 donated, which Lewis said was lower than expected. This year its participation rate was 56 percent, still lower than the average for all classes, 65 percent. However the amount it contributed this year set the record mentioned above. Lewis said it was too early to judge what the mixed results meant for future fundrasing.

Effect on giving
Sixty graduates of the Class of 1982 signed a similar petition. The class's participation rate this year was 43 percent, although Lewis attributed the low figure to a number of other factors.

Lewis noted that many alumni were upset when the College abolished fraternities and introduced coeducation. Many stopped giving money, but Lewis said there never was any large effect on overall giving. "The more distant graduates get from Williams in time and geography," Chandler said, "the more they appreciate that there are legitimate grounds for disagreement . . . and the more they judge Williams' contribu-

Wiesel: survival in a hostile history

by David Kleit

"In order for us not to go mad, we must cure the world of madness," said renowned author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel Wednesday before a packed Chapin Hall audience.

Speaking on "The Jewish history and human conditions," Wiesel asserted that Jewish history and human history have become one. In the past the belief that there were differences between people led to events like the Nazi regime, said Wiesel.

"Now we know that whatever happens to one people affects all . . . once evil is allowed to act and reign, it does not stop," he said.

Wiesel commented that every method of persecution has been used to destroy Jews, but they still remain. "Jewish tradition has always invented responses. In Jewish history there is no period without response to suffering. I am proud of that tradition," he said.

Traditional strength
Wiesel sees that tradition as a source of great strength. No matter what happened, he said, "I cannot be the one to cut the link. I have on my shoulders 3500 years of tradition. What right have I to give up?"

Elie Wiesel was born in Hungary and taken as a child to Auschwitz and Buchenwald concentration camps. His many books deal with the questions raised by human suffering.

"I try to be involved with all people who suffer," Wiesel noted Wednesday. "As a Jew, I feel I must be involved."

The importance of people was a major topic for Wiesel. "We must wage on humanity," he maintained. "In spite of everything I do believe that any human being is more important than all the words I could tell you."

Beyond words

He also commented on the term "holocaust" which he himself introduced years ago. "I feel regret because I introduced it. I wanted to show it was beyond words. I wanted to bring in the mystical element," said Wiesel.

However, he said that now he objects to the term, since it has been cheapened. "I cannot use it anymore," he added.

Wiesel opened and closed his lecture with the disclaimer that he had questions and not answers to give. "The essence of man is to be a question, and the essence of the question is to be without answer," he concluded.

BOYER BANS BLUE BAXTER BILLBOARD—Public Information Director Ray Boyer discontinued use of the sports announcement billboard at Baxter Hall this week because the sign is "not very attractive." Boyer reached the decision following a discussion with President John Chandler. Boyer said he did not intend the move as a symbolic gesture toward the Athletic Department, and he is seeking new ideas for promoting the teams on campus. The sign in front of Lesell Gymnasium will remain through this year. (Scheil)

Nuclear freeze began here

by Chris Howlett

The dream of a number of Williamstown residents took a great leap forward Thursday when the US House of Representatives passed a resolution calling for a negotiated US-Soviet nuclear weapons freeze.

That resolution was the culmination of years of nuclear freeze activism on both national and local levels. In fact, the national freeze movement got its initial push in Massachusetts, in, among other places, Berkshire County.

In 1980 a small group concerned about nuclear proliferation formed in Williamstown, working mostly through the local churches to alert people to their fears. They met regularly and one day Jean Gordon, then assistant professor of mathematics at Williams, came to their meeting and told them about a group she knew, the Traprock Peace Center in Deerfield, Mass.

Ballot drive

The Williamstown contingent invited Traprock activists up and between the two groups the idea of a nuclear freeze referendum was born. Concerned volunteers, including Gordon and hundreds of Williams students, worked for months collecting enough signatures to place the question on the county ballot.

As a result of their efforts a referendum appeared on the Berkshire County ballot in November 1981, requesting the President of the United States to propose to the Soviet Union a mutual nuclear arms moratorium. Similar statements appeared in Franklin and Hampshire counties and all passed by an average 59.2 percent margin.

"This (Williamstown) was the first place in the country where it was voted on by the citizens," explained Judith Ann Scheckel of the Traprock Peace Center.

This is wonderful

"When the peace groups around the nation found out, they said 'This is wonderful,'" and concentrated their efforts on getting similar referendums in other parts of the country, Scheckel said. "We really sparked a prairie fire."

Scheckel added that the Williams students had played an important role as volunteer canvassers. "That really helped our campaign at the last minute," she said. "They were a tremendous boost."

Assistant Professor of Biology Barton Slatko has been active in the nuclear freeze movement for some time, and he explains that his "roles have been to play educator and organizer." He works with the Nuclear Weapons Freeze Office, canvassing and calling legislators, and often gives talks on the dangers of nuclear war to local school, church and business groups.

This past Winter Study Slatko also taught a course on the nuclear arms race.

Commenting on the House's recent freeze resolution, he said, "I think it's a big step forward. This resolution may once and for all point us in the right direction."

"It doesn't mean our work is done," he added. "This is just going to push us further."

The Wrong Victim

WAAC's recent letter to seniors asking them to withhold their contributions to the College pending divestment from companies which do business in South Africa hurts the school for the sake of one issue, and raises that issue above all others in importance. Investment policy is an important issue—but not the issue at hand. The withholding of funds is an inappropriate tactic because—if successful—it affects primarily the quality of a Williams education, and secondarily, if at all, the school's portfolio.

Both the annual giving fund and the endowment go to pay the College's current operating expenses, to the extent that they support at least forty percent of each student's education. To reduce alumni giving would drastically affect students here in three ways—tuition would rise to cover the loss, the quality of the education would decline, or both. In addition, it is unlikely that the College would be able to maintain its high level of financial aid.

WAAC members, as have their peers, have benefited from the package of opportunities made possible by alumni gifts. To receive this benefit and deny it to future students is unfair and inconsistent. Further, withholding money requires no sacrifice on the part of those who pledge, but places the entire burden on later generations.

WAAC's request values divestment above the school's commitment to educational leadership. The College produces a tangible social good by making available its education, research, and forum for ideas. Many alumni disagree with the College on a number of issues, and they can and should indicate the ways in which the College can improve. But for none of these issues does the level of education deserve to suffer.

WAAC continues to portray this battle as a struggle between moral and immoral parties. They claim that this pledge continues their fight to persuade the College to divest. Yet consensus on the issue is still far from clear. If WAAC wishes to succeed, more persuasive debate is needed, not a tactic which forecloses discussion entirely.

Following the lead of Harvard University and a letter issued by John Small '83, WAAC members have discussed the possibility of opening an escrow account payable to the College if and when it divests. While this option indicates a willingness to sacrifice for the College's good, it has the same effect as withholding completely: either the College divests, or its educational quality suffers. It is possible to effectively advocate the former without incurring the latter.

Everyone has the right to vote with his or her dollars. As long as our educational quality depends on giving, and as long as other means of change remain open, an indiscriminate boycott is the wrong path to follow.

LETTERS

Sadness

To the editor:

We read with disappointment and sadness the recent letter to the class of '83 from S. U. Box 1820, presumably representing the anti-apartheid coalition, whose members and numbers are not specified. This letter asked graduating seniors not to contribute to Williams College until it totally divests its holdings in U. S. companies that do even the most modest business in South Africa.

The prolonged discussion on campus this year—one result of which was the recent Faculty vote—obviously has made no impression on WAAC. A clear majority of the Williams faculty opposed total divestment. It agreed that selective divestment and using shareholder influence on company policy is a far better method of helping blacks and opposing apartheid in South Africa. Messrs. Baker, Katz, and Waite, along with 53 other faculty members, voted for this position. WAAC's extreme stand flouts the majority view expressed by the faculty and, we suspect, also flouts the views of the larger Williams community, including alumni and students.

WAAC's minority position attempts to use blackmail as a means of getting its way, having failed to do so through debate and discussion, by labeling student contributors, under present circumstances, as immoral. This is the tactic of a minority that cares little for the democratic process of orderly discussion and debate. We hope that members of the Williams class of '83 will reject this regrettable letter, refuse to be pressured through the use of false labels, and recognize that a decision to contribute to Williams College should not be linked to any other issue. Support for this college which, after all, accepts all students without inquiry into their political views and grants degrees on the same basis, is a worthy cause in its own right. As modest contributors to that cause for 35 years, we are even tempted to call it—if the words had not become so cheapened by indiscriminate use—a moral cause.

Misinformation

To the editor:

I write to set the record straight about the misinformation contained in an article written by Andrew Levin, Steven Sowle, and Frances Toler appearing in the April 26 issue of the newspaper. That article alleges that last summer the Religion Department "informed" one of its junior faculty members, Nathan Katz, that "an unofficial decision" had been made about his academic tenure. That is not so.

Music as the four year metaphor

by Paul Sabbah '83

Trying to sum up the meaning of the "Williams Experience" ain't easy (apologies to my English 101 prof). In looking back over my four years (four years!?), it seems that so much has happened. I realize though that if I don't try to tie it all together now while it's fresh in my mind, I may never be able to do so in the future. So, in trying to find that common thread, that developing theme, that evolution of spirit, that mystical journey of my soul . . . well, let's just call it the meaning of life at Williams . . . In trying to find that meaning of life at Williams, I realize that there is something that connects the dots: music. All my life, I've associated various periods of my life with music. I still get depressed every time I hear "Angie" by the Stones, although I can't remember why, and I still crack a smile everytime I hear "Superfreak." I've always been able to tie things in with music.

My years here have been no different in this respect. I associate various songs, or in some cases, albums, to experiences here in Billsville. As a matter of fact, I find that the lyrics to those songs hold special significance to my experiences: growing up, understanding my friends, understanding myself, have a hangover. . . you know, meaningful things. So in retrospect, I see that my record collection is really a treasure trove of memories, a photo album of mental pictures and maybe the only thing that I'll be able to "bring me back" in 20 or 30 years. Let's look through my "photo album."

Freshman Year

Here I am, wet behind the ears as I pull up to East College. Funny how after spending four years learning what life is about I find that I'm wet behind the ears again. Anyway, as I enter the building, I'm confronted by the ugliest sight in my 18 years. No, not my J.A., and no, not my roommate . . . It was Emmie, the bulldog who belonged to the kid across the hall—the same kid I would call Jim even though his name was Dave. My next memory after Emmie is setting up my stereo and playing the Cars:

"I don't mind you comin' here and wastin' all my time"

In some sense those words portray a great deal of freshman year—sitting around "wasting" time with people, getting comfortable with my surroundings and developing a cadre (I love that word) of friends. In a lot of ways, some of my best memories came from experiences when I was wasting time, e.g., blowing off my reading, playing frisbee in the Berkshire Quad or standing in the hallway at 1 a.m. discussing sexual habits, drinking ability, or lack thereof. You should know that by sophomore year I had proclaimed myself Blow-Off King. I do hope, however, that none of my professors reading here will take this into account around grades time. My parents might get upset if I make them stay two nights in beautiful, downtown Pittsfield while I petition for mercy from the Deans in the 11th hour.

Moral number one: waste your time wisely—invest in relationships—at least if your grades stink, you'll have someone to tell.

"I can't feel this way much longer expectin' to survive"

That's the Cars again, as you probably know. To me, those lyrics can mean only one thing—that low, low feeling. Those words—"I can't feel this way much longer"—are second only to that famous phrase, "I'll never drink again." I said that freshman year . . . well, a couple of times . . . okay, okay, five times, but I didn't mean it the fifth time, and I cleaned up anyway. Drinking is definitely one of the standouts in a college experience. It took me four years to realize that I can't do it. Another drinking contest? They haven't printed the money yet.

Sophomore year was the year of transition, no matter how corny that sounds. The Cars third album stands out as a highlight, and that is the source of these lyrics:

he will usually require one of the two following qualifications. First, he should be known by several people on the committee who will speak on his behalf. If, however, the candidate knows very few committee members, he may still be selected provided that these members strongly support him, and equally important, have the respect of the rest of the committee. (In such instances, former JAs can, but do not always, prove extremely helpful.) This coming school year, some students will serve as JAs who would not have been selected if certain influential Committee members had not participated in the process while certain other candidates were rejected who might well have been selected if their potential "campaigners" had been on the Committee.

To someone who asks, "Doesn't JA selection depend on whom you know?", I would answer "Yes."

Those candidates who were mostly unfamiliar to the Committee members had from the start little chance of success. The Committee generally discounted the importance of the interviews, and unless one's JA had writ-

"All those parties get so habitual the same sea of faces always pushing always pulling always in the races"

What do they mean, you may ask. Well, to some degree they are self-explanatory. But what stands out most vividly about the parties at Williams is—you guessed it—getting beer spilled all over you. We should all wear raincoats to parties, particularly Rec-room (wreck room) parties, where someone under 5'6" could suffocate, or drown, or both. I guess the real significance of those lyrics and of sophomore year was learning to deal with the fact that this really is such a tiny campus, with so few people, that you are bound to spill beer tomorrow on he who spilled upon you today. Seriously, though, dealing with the same sea of faces everyday is excellent training. It forces some people into honesty, some into perpetual deceit, and some into fights. But it is a lesson that must be learned.

Moral number two: don't proselytize, 'cause listening works better, and what do you know anyway.

Junior Year

How can any album come close to describing junior year like Dire Straits' Making Movies. What an album! Anyway, there are so many memories associated with the Straits, but one set of lyrics tells a good story:

"the heart that you break that's the one that you rely on the bed that you make that's the one you gotta lie on when you point your finger cause your plan fell through you got three more fingers pointing back at you"

I'm sure that everyone can interpret these lyrics personally, because they do say a lot about growing up, and growing in and out of relationships. There's that word again. It really says so much about Williams—good relationships, bad ones, or a lack of any kind. If there's one thing that most seniors regret when leaving, as I do, it's that the potential for relationships here is great, but sometimes the proper effort wasn't made. The lyrics also speak to another Williams Institution—extensions. But I'll leave that to you to decipher.

Moral number three: if in doubt, get an extension.

Senior Year

All kinds of music this year: Stray Cats, Michael Jackson, the lists go on and on. Trying to pick out one song is very difficult. Picking out a theme for the year is also hard, but I find that the name of one of the top groups of the year says a lot—Men at Work, (or women at work, for that matter). Finding work (a lifestyle) preoccupied the lives of many seniors this year. I now know what a "high net-worth individual" is, and I know that Morgan Stanley has an executive cafeteria, although I doubt I'll ever eat there. The infusion of reality into the Williams experience really makes for a different atmosphere. For one thing, seniors cut more classes than undergrads. That's to be expected, though; by now, we know everything already. Moral number four: don't cut classes, you don't know everything yet.

I guess there are some lyrics that say a lot about senior year. They are from Paul McCartney's latest album, and each word, like a picture, is worth a thousand words:

"It's a tug of war what with one thing and another it's a tug of war"

It's a tug of war alright. One side is an adolescent, and one side is an adult; and they're both pulling like mad. Each has his attraction to me, and I wish I could have the best of both: freedom and security, innocence and experience. Yeah, the true meaning of life at Williams is a metaphor. Chalk one up for the English department. The problem, though, is that I can sense which side is going to win, and in many ways that saddens me. Maybe that's that low, low feeling.

It really will take some time to digest and then look back. Meanwhile, I can only hope to heed my own moralistic advice, make sure they give me that diploma, and hold on dearly to my record collection.

JA selection depend on whom you know?" I would answer a resounding "Yes." But further, and at the risk of sounding convoluted, it also depends on how well you know is known among the other Committee members; that is, your status in the process is to a certain degree dependent on the respect that your "campaigners" have among other Committee members.

I do not wish here to propose various remedies for a system that has a decided element of subjectivity and perhaps even partiality. But serving on the Committee taught me the importance of the role that the chance composition of its members plays in the selection process.

The JA position, or so our thinking goes, requires outstanding social skills.

And if this knowledge detracts from the celebrity and honor of being chosen a JA, it should as well remove the ignominy felt by some at having been passed up. Too often we forget that the Committee represents little more than the individual opinions of 24 people who are as flawed and imperfect as any others, and who work out of biases that will always affect these decisions as long as the process remains the same.

David McCabe served on this year's 24-member Junior Advisor Selection Committee; he is a member of the Class of '85.

Pooh Perplex undersold?

Last Thursday the College Council narrowly passed a resolution that allows Follett Book Company of Chicago to send a representative to the Williams campus to buy used books from students and faculty. The representative will conduct business in Baxter Hall on May 17, 18, and 19.

Follett originally expressed an interest in doing business with Joe Dewey through The Williams Bookstore. Dewey was not interested in a used book business for his bookstore, however.

Dewey informed Dean Dan O'Connor of Follett's interest in the College. O'Connor, seeing a potential conflict with the Pooh's interest, referred the issue to the Council.

The resolution, passed by an 11-9 margin, met strong opposition from Council members who feared that the Pooh Perplex will be hurt.

Chris Harned '85 commented, "Not only will the Pooh be hurt by the loss of business, but also the entire Williams community will be hurt as books are taken out of circulation. More students will be forced to spend more money buying new books." Harned will be one of the owners of Pooh Perplex next year.

The Follett Company will pay up to fifty percent of the cover price for textbooks that are both in demand and in good condition. For example, the company will buy a copy of Baumol and Blinder's Economics for $10.50, roughly half the $24.50 cover price.

Follett offers little compensation, however, for texts that are not commonly used by other colleges or for any paperbacks. The Pooh Perplex pays fifty percent on all books, but only after the book is resold.

The resolution permits Follett to send a representative this semester on a trial basis only. If Pooh's business is visibly hurt, the Council may deny Follett a return trip, according to council member Joe Beach '84.

New gym strides ahead

Funding for the new gym is continuing, and if things go according to plan, construction will start in the spring of 1984, according to President John Chandler.

"We now have five and one half million dollars in gifts and pledges out of a total of nine and a half million," said Chandler. "When we get to six million, we will ask the trustees for authorization to go to drawings, thus starting the construction process."

Chandler said he expected to reach the six million mark sometime this summer.

"We have a proposal in for a foundation grant, and we've just received word that it has passed the initial stages. While it has not been approved, that is encouraging," said Chandler.

Goodies scoops all

More goodies arrived on Spring Street Saturday with the opening of Goodies's new addition, described by co-owner Patty Spector as "an old-fashioned ice cream store with a very up-beat decor."

The new store features 15 flavors of Ben and Jerry's ice cream, 15 toppings, seven kinds of frozen yogurt and ice cream cakes and pies. A soda fountain serves up soda, shakes and old-time cherry and chocolate cokes, for either sit-down or take-out.

Those people with more refined tastes can enjoy capuccino, espresso, coffee and tea, along with homemade pastries, anytime between 8:00 A.M. and midnight, seven days a week.

"If someone wants ice cream and you want capuccino and a pastry, now you can come to the same place," Spector explained.

New phones next year

The College will have a new telephone system next year. Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenaar explained that the "Dimension" computer-run network, which will be installed this summer by American Telephone, has several advantages over the current system.

"It's touch-tone as opposed to dial," he said, "and it has more flexibility for inter-connections, on campus and off. It has a program to automatically seek out the cheapest line for long distance routing, and if you dial a number that is busy, the phone will ring back once you've hung up to let you know when the number is free."

Actually, most of these special features will appear only in certain College offices. According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, who negotiated the deal with American Telephone, students may or may not get touch-tone phones, and for the most part, "the students will have the same basic services they have now."

Nuclear Weapons called necessary

Nuclear weapons are a necessary and unavoidable reality, said Frank Miller '72, Director of Strategic Forces Policy for the US Department of Defense Thursday.

Miller asserted from the beginning of his presentation that "nuclear weapons are a fact of life. We can neither wish them away or pretend they don't exist."

Deterrence, an aggression or attack is "the cornerstone of US nuclear policy," according to Miller. The US must have the ability to retaliate against any aggression, and the potential retaliatory destruction must exceed any gains an aggressor could hope to achieve. Miller insisted that "a policy of deterrence is the most effective means of preserving freedom."

For deterrence to be credible the US must respond appropriately to threats. "Deterrence is a dynamic, not static, policy. It changes as the threat changes," Miller noted that what was sufficient nuclear capacity a decade ago is no longer adequate.

Miller pointed to Soviet growth and its continuing range of attack abilities. Although US leaders, according to Miller, recognize that "there would be no winner in any nuclear exchange," Soviet leadership has often believed that a "limited nuclear exchange could be carried on and won."

During the 1960's the US was technologically one full decade ahead of the Soviet Union. However, with recent Soviet buildup, "our advantage can be measured in years."

If there were a bilateral freeze, "the US would be locked into a position of vulnerability," according to Miller, and deterrence would become ineffective. "It is unrealistic to believe that the Soviets will agree to lower equality levels," he concluded.

WAAC letter—

tion to society in broader terms."

Arthur said that a mellowing-with-age effect is possible, but added that WAAC will continue to work in the future so that "the issue will be a lot less easy to forget."

She admitted that withholding donations would have more symbolic than practical meaning but said that its success depends on future alumni doing the same thing. To that end, she said WAAC will try to get more recent graduates to pledge not to give.

Faculty reactions to WAAC's letter ranged from describing it as "marvelous" to "self-righteous." Professor Nathan Katz supported it, saying "student power is an alien concept at Williams, though alumni power is not. Students have power as future alumni."

Accepting diplomas

Professor Raymond Baker said students should not withhold donations. "I feel strongly that there would be substantial alumni support for a truly enlightened investment policy... with members of the Class of '83 articulating such a view while participating fully as alumni in community life, I am confident that such alumni support would grow... Given the progress made this year, I don't think a strategy of indiscriminate boycott and non-participation should, and more importantly, will be adopted by the Class of '83," he said.

Professor Vincent Barnett said that if seniors supporting the boycott "really wanted to be moral" they should refuse to accept their diplomas, because their education has been financed in part by investments in South Africa.

"Technically speaking, maybe that would be right," she said, "but it clouds the issue, which is that it would be morally wrong to give to this school's endowment if that money is invested in South Africa."

Trivia reigns as whiz kids vie

by Susan Relfer

A recent WCFM announcement features WCFM General Manager Lee Farberman explaining that Trivia Night will not be held this year, as the WCFM Board of Directors "felt that the contest was counterproductive and detrimental to the Williams College ethos as defined in the Student Handbook. Such a contest promotes a cavalier, I-don't-care attitude which flies in the face of our tradition of academic excellence." Farberman was just kidding.

Smedley Terrace. Of this group, Lee Farberman has been doing most of the organizational work. Phil Walsh and Jim Peak will be playing the music the night of the contest.

No Human Sexual Response

Walsh explained that some of the music will be from the late '50's, a lot from the '60's, and quite a bit from the early '70's. All were hit songs. Walsh emphasized that he will play no Human Sexual Response and no album cuts.

Naps at Four

The Trivia Contest will take place this Wednesday night, all night, midnight until 8 A.M. For those concerned about losing a productive reading period day, the sponsoring team generously revealed that there will be a twenty minute break at 4 A.M., "for naps."

This year's contest is being run by last semester's winners, Smedley Terrace. The nucleus of the Smedley Terrace team is the Singleman Party team. The Singleman Party won the contest Fall 1981, and ran last spring's contest. The Singlemen united with a host of Prospect House residents to form Smedley Terrace.

Approximately twenty people constitute the force behind

While the music extends over a range of time, "the trivia, as a rule, stops after 1975," said Walsh. The questions will explore "new fields of trivia" and play down older ones. Smedley Terrace is trying to avoid "minutia and dull questions."

Fun, Fun, Fun

Smedley Terrace is changing Trivia Contest scoring to be more like that of video games. "We're going to be scoring in 100's and 1,000's of points instead of ones and tens," Walsh explained. "We're doing this to make people think they're doing better than they actually are. When you stay until eight in the morning and only have 170 points, it's kind of depressing. But if you have 17,000 points..."

Beethoven challenges Choral Society

by Phyllis Jane Wolf

A semester's work on the part of the Williams Choral Society culminated in an all-Beethoven program Saturday evening in Chapin Hall.

Kenneth Roberts led the soloists, members of the Albany and Berkshire Symphonies and the Choral Society through three of Beethoven's largest works.

Phantasia, the first half of which seemed only a series of disjointed motives thrown from piano to strings. The second half, however, came together triumphantly whole as the above soloists were joined by Karen Smith, soprano; Richard Kennedy, tenor; they were assisted by Joyce Muckenfuss, soprano, and Peter Payson, tenor. Ennis-Dwyer's deft fingerwork drew repeated applause from the audience.

Society's Stamina

The relentless Mass in C Major was by far the giant of the concert. The Choral Society itself was a decided highlight, showing great stamina in the face of Roberts' repeated demands to reach resounding fortes. The soloists—Smith, Randles, Kennedy and Dwyer—also enriched the piece with a lovely blend of textures. Although Mass in C Major is a rather long work, progressing through the traditional Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei, Roberts' interpretation was a fine summation of an evening of challenging music.

Record review:
Back from Samoa

by Brett McDonnell

Any group that can write a song called "They Saved Hitler's Cock" must have something seriously wrong with it. That's what makes Angry Samoans and their album (EP, actually) Back from Samoa so great.

This Los Angeles-based group makes Fear and the Dead Kennedys sound like they are led by Pollyanna and Bambi, respectively. The sound is straight, blaring hardcore punk and the lyrics range from obnoxious to obscenely obnoxious.

Unnatural acts

The songs also have great, insightful social commentary. Take "The Ballad of Jerry Curran." It begins with a slow, melodic melody: "Jerry Curran is nice/ Sensitive, has lots of friends in Washington/ Jerry has a future/ Is sensitive, and likes meeting people." Then the song breaks into a blaring hardcore section, goes back to the ballad, back to the rocking section, back to the soft part, and ends with the hardcore section. The punk parts suggest that Jerry performs unnatural acts with excrement, men, his sister, his brother, toilet water, dogs and horses.

Such subtlety and perceptiveness are rare in modern pop music. The delicacy with which Angry Samoans dissect the hypocrisy of people like "Jerry Curran" defies description.

Not-so-subtle lyrics

My personal favorite on the record is "You Stupid Jerk." This 25 second long opus (five of the 14 songs are under a minute long), sung above screeching guitars, drum and bass, contains the following lyrics, in their entirety: "You stupid jerk/I can't take it no more/ Your face makes me want to puke/ And your mother's a whore/ (Inarticulate scream) /You stupid jerk." What more can I say?

And then there is "They Saved Hitler's Cock." It seems that they hid this pernicious little organ under a rock and the singer found it. It talks, and it is saying some nasty things.

Other highlights include "Lights Out" (Poke, poke, poke your eyes out"), "The Todd Killings" ("It's killing time"), and "Homo-sexual" (written by J. Falwell, or so it says).

This record should obviously appeal to Williams students, and I expect it to get a lot of play on WCFM. However, I suggest that if you should see any Angry Samoans around here, do not invite them to dinner. They probably do not have polite table manners.

Eerie photos exhibit tension

by David Cerda

Sixty-three photographs by Thom Herboldshelmer '83 are on view at the Mission Park Gallery through May 14th; they are well worth attention. Using a square format camera Herboldshelmer has created pictures that are at once mysterious and disquieting. In many of the photographs, dark shadows, blurred movement and unusual perspectives proscribe a quick reading of his prints. Indeed, the photographs uniformly exhibit tension, often subtly, by challenging our perceptions and preconceptions of "normality."

The still lifes, portraits and scenes are often comprised of unusual subjects and subject matter intended to provoke viewers to look harder and wonder while asking themselves questions about the print before them.

For example, "The Loved One," a bold and moody print, succeeds because it is ambiguous whether the viewer is looking from above or directly at the still-life that features a skeletal mask fitted with a leather jacket. What do you imagine when looking at this, how does it make you feel? It is undeniably eerie.

Herboldshelmer credits the bizarre and bold images of Ralph Eugene Meatyard and Robert Mapplethorpe for influencing his work. The dense show offers rich, perhaps overwhelming, viewing opportunities.

All appointment, reappointment, and promotion decisions have to be made in accord with the standard, faculty-legislated procedures (described in detail in the Williams College Faculty Handbook). Those procedures govern communications between departments and non-tenured faculty. They indicate specifically how persistent and continuing evaluation of the professional work of non-tenured faculty members is to be conducted. They also indicate with equal specificity the timetable within which decisions about reappointment and tenure are made. All non-tenured faculty, when they take up appointments at Williams, are appraised of these procedures in sundry ways both by their departments and by the Dean of the Faculty. The Religion Department has conducted, and will continue to conduct, its evaluation of its non-tenured members in accordance with these procedures, and it has consistently communicated the substance of its ongoing evaluation to the individuals being evaluated in accordance with those same procedures.

One of the most significant requirements of the procedures is that a letter be sent annually to the non-tenured faculty member whose professional work is under review. That letter summarizes, in a manner substantially congruent with the assessments conveyed in the department's staffing report to the (College-wide) Committee on Appointments and Promotions, the department's judgments regarding his or her performance as a teacher, scholar, and member of the College community. A copy of that letter is sent to the Dean of the Faculty for review. Consequently, non-tenured faculty in the Religion Department, as a matter of routine, have in their possession detailed written distillation of the Department's on-going review of their contributions to and their current status within its common educational venture. Furthermore, the recipients of those letters are granted an opportunity to meet formally with the Department chair to discuss the judgments and information which it had been the purpose of those letters to convey. The Dean of the Faculty is notified when such a meeting has taken place.

Professor Katz's initial three year appointment at Williams having only last year been renewed in the form of a maximum second assistant professor term of four years, the written synopsis sent of the most recent staff report forwarded by the Department to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions makes specific reference to the fact that, at the properly appointed time in his second term, a tenure decision will be rendered. And it will be rendered in a manner familiar to anyone acquainted with the detailed stipulations of the Faculty Handbook, namely through a careful process of consultation (recommendation and response) between the Department itself and the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. Departments do not, and cannot, "make" tenure decisions independently of that lengthy and highly refined process.

It is a matter of great personal disappointment to me, and of deep regret for all parties touched by the allegations contained in the open letter to the Religion Department, that the students principally responsible for fashioning and disseminating the letter did not secure an informed and measured understanding of the carefully assembled and continually monitored deliberative process which they have made the object of their scorn. One of the ostensible purposes of the letter, voiced in its opening paragraph and echoed intermittently throughout the remainder of the text, was to serve the interests of the Religion Department. I shudder to think what a course of action designed to be injurious to those interests would look like.

Exception

To the editor:

I take strong exception to the letter distributed by WAAC last week asking seniors not to contribute to Williams until the goal of divestment is accomplished. The apparent intent of this proposal is to make a moral statement to the effect that, "Investment in South Africa is not consistent with the values that Williams College stands for (sic)."

Tactics such as this must inevitably cripple the cause of those who are sincere in their advocacy of divestment. By associating the two issues of divestment and financial support for Williams, WAAC sets political beliefs in opposition to our feelings of loyalty to and fondness for Williams. The proposal implies that we must renounce our alma mater instead of hoping to change it. Such a scheme merely gives a legitimate excuse for not contributing to those who do not care very much about the values for which Williams really stands—values which are even more important than divestment.

I do not mean to belittle the sincerity and commitment of WAAC to its one goal. Yet I deeply resent the implication that those who refuse to support Williams are somehow more moral than those of us who welcome the opportunity to show our gratitude for the experience we have shared here over the last four years. I for one will not make my support for Williams contingent upon one issue, even if that issue is one as troubling and as important as divestment.

If WAAC wishes to make a statement, why not follow the example of some students at Harvard who are setting up a fund of senior contributions? The fund will be held in escrow until divestment is accomplished.

lished, at which point it will be turned over completely to the University. Such an approach would afford us the opportunity to simultaneously affirm that we support Williams College and that we oppose investment policy for Williams, and would consequently be a more effective lever for change.

If such a fund were created, its contributors could show that their motivations were more noble than niggardliness or ingratitude. Unless that alternative is opened, however, I urge my classmates not to allow warm memories and fond allegiance to Williams to be overturned by single-issue morality.

Donald R. Carlson '83

Paradox

To the editor:

Once again, WAAC is accused of being "radical" and "subversive" by resorting, in the words of one of the deans, "to a petty and divisive tactic hitherto used only by those alumni who have fought every progressive step the College has taken." Not surprisingly, the dean is not WAAC's only critic: 23 seniors have argued in an all-senior mailing that it is possible to "support the College and still work to end apartheid. We have achieved change in the College's investment policy this year... let us continue to work together."

The positions of WAAC, the 23 seniors, and the dean are all understandable, and the moral paradox which the former two groups confront is one with regard to which all of us, as (future) alumni, must one day take a stand.

Williams is, on the one hand, an institution to which we owe, probably beyond repayment, our education and our values. Yet it is also an institution which in managing its endowment cannot help but make significant moral and political statements, and which by maintaining investments in South Africa not only falls far short of "institutional neutrality" but contradicts the very ideals for which it stands: equality regardless of race or sex and intellectual/political freedom and responsibility.

If we as individuals are to be true to the values Williams has taught us, we cannot in good conscience contribute in any way to the continuation of apartheid. And only if the College withdraws its investments from South Africa can it be true to its own ideals. For these reasons, I believe we cannot contribute to the Williams endowment as it now stands. (An escrow account, however, might provide as a perfect "solution.")

Moreover, our withholding contributions to the endowment is a voice the administration and trustees will hear, particularly as other classes of alumni join us. As the 23 seniors noted, "we have achieved change this year"—but those who believe that such change came about by remaining passive are, unfortunately, rather blind. Change occurs only when we make change, and taking effective action to bring about such change is not only possible but morally imperative—to maintain both the College's integrity, and our own.

On baseball and writing

by John Clayton

I write a lot about baseball. It's a bit surprising, since baseball isn't my favorite game. Basketball is, although you can't get a tan while drinking beer in the bleachers during a basketball game.

But I play a lot of basketball; I don't need a tee to put one in the hoop. Basketball is exciting, physical, exhilarating to play. Playing baseball is more boring than watching it. You have to wear a silly uniform, so you can't get a tan, and you have to be alert, so you can't drink beer.

Maybe people write about baseball because it's the American game. Or vice-versa.

I mean, I'm not the only one who writes about baseball. Many have done it before me. Most of them were better.

It's something about the sport, that makes it writable.

Maybe it's the care that goes into the play; each swing of the bat is aesthetically beautiful, perfectly timed, perfectly placed, like when words come together to form magic on the page.

Maybe it's the laziness—the slow feeling of the game that's so similar to a writer picking choice words.

Maybe it's the American-ness—baseball, Mom, apple pie, Red Smith. Baseball is rich with tradition—writers enjoy extracting that with their words.

Maybe it's the experience. Every kid played baseball; every writer knows he can lead the reader to re-live those experiences.

Maybe it's the terminology. Only baseball could escape the English teacher's eye with words like "files out". Maybe writers enjoy mangling the language from which they make their living.

Maybe it's the drama—the tense moment of the batter waiting for the 3-2 pitch with two outs, the bases loaded and his team down three runs. In baseball, that moment would be wasted with some guy dribbling up the court. In football, they'd call a time out, and we'd watch a Lite Beer commercial. Only baseball captures that moment, the moment that writers would love to capture in words but know they can't.

Or maybe it's the beer drunk in the bleachers. Any writing sounds good if you've drunk enough beer.

Men's tennis team ends undefeated

by Mark Averitt

The men's tennis team kept its record perfect over the weekend by beating Wesleyan and Division I Colgate to complete a 9-0 season.

Wesleyan fell in Williams-town by a 9-0 score on Saturday to assure the Ephs of the Little Three title, then Williams returned to its home courts on Sunday to conquer "the best team we've played all season," according to Coach Stephen Heath.

1982 All-American Greg Zaff '84 put in a strong bid for 1983 honors by finishing his season with two convincing victories. He beat Wesleyan's Mark Kusner on Saturday, 7-5, 2-6, 6-1, then destroyed Colgate's Ken Pilot the next day, 6-0, 6-1, to notch a 5-1 regular season record.

Other winners

Number two singles player Brook Larmer '84 improved his record to 8-0 with a 6-2, 3-6, 6-2 win over Wesleyan's Alex Hinton before losing his first match of the season to Joel Beltklot of Colgate, 7-6, 5-7, 7-5.

Craig Hammond '85 won both his matches at number three, topping Ralph Savarese of Wesleyan, 7-5, 6-3, then Dave Hart of Colgate, 6-4, 6-3. Hammond compiled a 6-3 regular season mark.

Tim Rives at number four and Tom Harrity at number five also won twice—Rives took a 6-1, 6-1 win over Wesleyan's Pat Roth and a 7-6, 6-3 victory over Colgate's Dave Harper, and Harrity prevailed first against Moss Lender, 6-2, 6-4, then he beat Adam Sachs, 7-5, 7-5. Harrity was 5-3, Rives 6-3 on the season.

Sopher out

Co-captain Mark Sopher (6-0 as a singles player, 5-1 with Larmer at doubles) was forced to miss both of the weekend matches due to back injuries, but he should be ready to play in the National Individual tournament with Larmer at doubles on Thursday in Albany.

Larmer played at first doubles with Hammond on Saturday and the pair beat Wesleyan's Kusner and Savarese, 6-4, 6-4. Rives teamed up with Larmer the next day to drop a 6-4, 6-2 decision against Colgate's Beltklot-Harper duo.

Kelton Burbank won at number six singles on Saturday against John Goldberg, 6-0, 6-1; Tom Paper took his spot the next day and lost to Colgate's Bill Maiorino, 6-4, 6-3.

Co-captain Burbank was also a doubles winner on Saturday, winning a number two with Rives, 6-4, 6-2 against Hinton and Goldberg of Wesleyan. Paper-Harrity beat Roth-Bob Scott on Saturday, 6-4, 4-6, 6-4, at third doubles. Hammond-Zaff were Sunday victors at doubles, 7-6, 7-6 over Colgate's Pilot-Halper, and Burbank-Jamie Kling notched a 6-7, 6-2, 6-2 win at third doubles against Maiorino and Ryland Hanstad of Colgate.

Crew splits with Trinity

by Lee Farberman

The men's freshman heavyweight eight became the first boat in recent memory to beat a Trinity College boat hands on Saturday at a regatta on Lake Waramaug, in Connecticut. The freshman lights took second, and the varsity third. The women's varsity and novice eight boats won, while the women's JV came in second and the novice four was third.

Women's varsity

The women's varsity eight race was unquestionably the closest race of the day, with Williams taking first by literally inches. The winning time was 6:25.2; Trinity was second in 6:25.3; and Ithaca was third, 20 seconds back.

After a poor first few strokes, the Ephs battled back to a lead after 500 meters. They battled Trinity all through the middle 1000 meters, with the lead varying from 1 to 4 seats the whole way. Despite a strong Trinity spirit, Williams hung on for the victory.

Fresh heavyweights

The Bantams finished 8 seconds behind the victorious freshmen, 6 seconds behind second place Ithaca.

After a strong start, the Eph freshmen rowed an excellent first 1500 meters. But with 300 meters to go the boats ran into some rough water. But Williams was able to recover to hold on to the lead.

Laxmen lose Little Three

by Paul Meeks

The men's lacrosse team suffered a heartbreaking week at the expense of Little Three rivals Wesleyan and Amherst, and Middlebury.

The Ephs squandered leads of three goals in Saturday's 8-6 loss at home to the Lord Jeffs and in a 11-9 loss the previous week at Wesleyan. The squad also saw a 3-2 first quarter lead dwindle to a 12-7 loss at the hands of Middlebury at home on Wednesday.

A season of roller-coaster, inconsistent lacrosse has plagued the young squad. The recurring scenario in 1983 has featured stellar lacrosse and early leads, lapsing into poor defense and an inability to find the net. The result has been one frustrating loss after another for the Lax Ephs.

Fall to Amherst

The Amherst game turned out to be claw and scratch to the end contest as predicted. Williams took a 5-2 halftime lead but were shut out by the Lord Jeffs in the third period, 4-0. Amherst outscored the Ephs 2-1 in the final 15 minutes and posted a dramatic come-from-behind victory.

Tom Davies '84 again had a hat trick for Williams, with Keith Haynes '84, Mark Payton '84 and Tim Curran '83 adding scores. Payton, Curran, and Reese Hughes '85 assisted in the heartbreaker. Goalie Brad DuPont '86 saved 15, and has been valuable down the stretch.

The varsity eight ran into the same stretch of bad water that the freshmen had encountered earlier. After 1400 meters of racing, the Trinity A boat had a lead, with the Trinity B boat, Williams and Ithaca College neck and neck.

Unfortunately, Williams caught a major crab in the whitecaps, almost stopping the boat. Trinity B moved out, but Williams was able to recover enough to match the Ithaca boat stroke for stroke in the last 100 meters.

In the last three strokes Williams moved up to take third by 1 second. The Trinity winning time was 5:51.

After an initial Trinity surge at the start where Trinity moved out to a half length lead, the Williams and Trinity Freshman Lightweights rowed even for most of the race, with the Bantams extending their lead to one length over 1000 meters.

Women's novice eight

The women's novice eight had Coach Cindy Drinkwater chewing her fingernails, moving past Ithaca on the basis of a strong sprint at the very end.

At the 1000 meter mark, the Ephs used some superior strategy (rowing a silent 20) to surge and pick up half a length. With 200 to go, Williams sprinted, and Ithaca didn't, giving Williams a 2 second margin of victory. Ithaca was 2nd, Trinity third and Marist and Ithaca 'B' well back.

Women trounce Middlebury

by Bea Bast

The women's lacrosse team beat Middlebury 11-3 at Middlebury Thursday.

Coach Peel Hawthorne said, "The defense finally gelled into a cohesive unit, especially since we've shuffled a few people around."

Goalie Boo Flynn '83 was "awesome", letting only three out of thirty-four shots on goal sneak by her.

Allison Fuller '85 led the scoring with three goals, while Allison Earle '84, Bea Fuller '83, Laura Rogers '86, and Carrie Cento '86 each scored two.

Hawthorne explains the team's few losses this year as primarily due to "mental lapses". She elaborated, "as far as technique and strategy go, there's not much more we can do. The team just needs to maintain its concentration and intensity throughout the game."

On Tuesday, the team also triumphed over Union College 13-5.

Williams was paced by Seefried who covered the 6,589 yards of Farmington Hills Country Club in a eight over par round of 80. Hennigan and Chris Harned '85 were both just one behind Seefried, with rounds of 81. Also in the top five for the Ephs were Randy Rogers '85 at 86 and Doug Hoffer '85 with an 88.

Goff said, "It was another match we should have won, but a couple of our top players had academic commitments."

Williams completes its season Wednesday with the Little Three championships at home a 1:00. Last year Amherst captured the honors, but the Ephs with the home course advantage look to reclaim the title.

placed third in a meet at Springfield behind Springfield and Holy Cross. Marist College sent a small contingent and garnered one point.

Campbell won the pole vault with 13 feet, Bernie Krause '84 won the shotput, and Paul Toland '85 took the high jump with 6'4". Alejandro took thirds in the 100 and 200 against nationally-ranked Springfield competition, while Kendall James '84 took second in the 110 and 400 hurdles. Susan Bragdon '83 qualified for the Division III Nationals in the 5000 meter.

481 EARN DEGREES

The undergraduate career closed for the 481 members of the Williams Class of 1983 as they received their Bachelor of Arts degrees this Sunday morning.

Today's commencement ceremony, Williams' 194th, featured addresses by students and by the keynote speaker, Dr. Robert Coles, a noted psychiatrist and author from Harvard Medical School, whose speech was entitled, "The Moral Life of the Young."

In his address Coles discussed the relationship between religious ideals and the moral development of children, using examples from his 1967 Pulitzer Prize-winning work Children of Crisis, which explored the effects of school desegregation in the South on both black and white children.

Coles told the Record that by discussing the lives of both children and adults who faced moral dilemmas, he sought to draw some conclusions about the conflict between character and intellect, between "moral analysis and the way we live a life."

Get A's and flunk life

Coles quoted American novelist Walker Percy in saying "one can get all A's—even in moral education—and still flunk life."

Mike Nock, elected class speaker, delivered a humorous address entitled "Gather Ye Rosebuds While Ye May," in which he poked fun at what he called the increasingly-typical senior "who takes the job with the highest starting salary, beginning the life-long quest for remunerative success."

Concerning the "ridiculous costumes faculty wear," Nock said, "I stand before you today because I have an important message to share, and because I wanted to watch the faculty march in at close range. What is this, Commencement or Mardi Gras?" he asked.

Robert Forstot, the valedictorian, delivered a speech entitled

Conclusions about the conflict between "moral analysis and the way we live a life."

"Pangloss' Revenge," referring to the character in Voltaire's Candide who said "All is for the best in this best of all possible worlds."

"Best of all possible worlds"

Forstot used the quote to illustrate his point that a Williams education schools students in both liberal arts and the sciences, thus enabling them to face "the larger issues facing society today—such as nuclear power, genetic engineering and medical ethics—which require both technical and philosophical understanding." This holistic approach realizes Pangloss' ideal by providing the best possible balance, Forstot concluded.

John Walsh was elected to be Phi Beta Kappa speaker, and spoke on the subject "Responsibility and the Real World." He called on graduates to formulate new standards of justice and democratic accountability to respond to the growing complexity and bureaucratic quality of modern society.

"Insofar as the class will be going out to staff the organizations that perpetuate the loss of human control and democratic procedure," Walsh said, "the class must accept responsibility for the peaceful transition to a genuinely more just society."

In his address College President John Chandler told the graduates he hopes "the citizen in you will win out over the consumer," noting that because others have sacrificed to further their educations, the graduates will have much expected of them.

"Your Williams education was premised on the assumption . . . that you would contribute in special ways as leaders, as problem solvers, as discoverers of knowledge, and as bringers of hope and healing to the peripheral and powerless people of this and other societies," Chandler said.

Assuring the graduates that their anxiety over finding jobs would resolve itself, Chandler said "your Williams education has made you a much more interesting and useful person than you would otherwise be and . . . has provided you with a capacity to be adaptive and inventive in meeting circumstances and opportunities that no one could have predicted."

William J. Bennett '65 delivered the Baccalaureate address yesterday in Chaplin Hall. Bennett, who is chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, spoke on the subject "Advice for the Other Parts of the Real World."

Bennett told the Record he sought to "draw on my experience to advise people who I regard as soulmates—having gone through the same kinds of experiences as they have—how they ought to go about the transfer to the real world."

Honors awarded

Members of the class of '83 were awarded a wide variety of honors and distinctions. Of the 481 seniors, 3 graduated summa cum laude, with cumulative point averages of 10.5 or better. On the Williams grading scale, an A is rated an 11, an A- a 10, and so on.

Forty students graduated magna cum laude, with cumulative averages between 9.8 and 10.4, and 93 graduated cum laude, with averages between 9.0 and 9.7.

In addition, 29 degrees were conferred with highest honors, and 57 degrees were awarded with honors.

Yesterday was also Class Day, which featured such traditional activities as the planting of the Ivy and the watch-dropping ceremony from the roof of Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Seven Masters of Arts

Master of Arts degrees were handed to seven graduate students who completed two years of study in the history of art.

The graduate art program is offered by Williams in conjunction with the Clark Art Institute. Its graduates usually go on to museum administrative or curatorial positions, or continue studies toward doctorate degrees.

Three students who exemplify the intellectual ideals of graduate study have been designated Robert Sterling Clark Fellows, according to program director Samuel Edgerton. "They have demonstrated superior knowledge," he explained, "and have shown creative insight into what they have studied."

The Clark Fellows are Anne Havinga, Peter Lynch and James Weiss. Other graduates are Julie Aronson, Julia Bernard, Cynthia Delth and Ellen Wood.

Medicine, management and the arts

Eight awarded honorary sheepskins

Eight men and women with distinguished careers in medicine, management and the arts were awarded honorary degrees today by President Chandler.

Dr. Robert Coles, Professor of Psychiatry and Medical Humanities at the Harvard Medical School, the Pulitzer Prize-winning author of "Children of Crisis," and today's Commencement speaker, was awarded a Doctor of Letters degree. William J. Bennett, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities and a 1965 graduate of Williams, delivered yesterday's Baccalaureate address. He received a Doctor of Laws degree.

Also receiving Doctor of Laws degrees were William H. Curtiss, Senior Vice-President of the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation, and a 1940 Williams graduate; Major General Hugh G. Robinson, Commander of the Southwestern Division of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers; and Elizabeth H. Dole, Secretary of Transportation.

The actress Mildred Dunnock, and Margaret E. Mahoney, President of The Commonwealth Fund, were awarded Doctor of Humane Letters degrees. Dr. Stanley O. Foster, Assistant Director of the International Health Program Office of the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, and a 1955 graduate of Williams, was awarded a Doctor of Science degree.

Since graduating from Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1954, Robert Coles has pursued a dual career as practicing psychiatrist and author, writing 35 books and over 700 arti-cies for various journals and magazines.

Cole's psychiatric research into the neglected and largely forgotten groups in American society has resulted in many books, including the five-volume study, "Children of Crisis," Volumes II and III of which earned Coles several awards including the Pulitzer Prize and the McAlpin Medal of the National Association of Mental Health.

Cole's most recent research, conducted in countries such as Northern Ireland and South Africa, is a study of the ways in which children in various countries develop their political convictions and moral values.

President Reagan appointed William Bennett Director of the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) in 1981. His responsibilities include overseeing the budget and programs of an organization which promotes increased scholarship and strength in the humanities in the nation's colleges and universities. As head of the NEH, Bennett is strongly committed to fostering a renewed emphasis on the humanities. In an interview with Herbert Mitgang in The New York Times, Bennett said, "My concern is that we are not teaching the ground-work sufficiently in the humanities . . . Students in high schools and colleges should be exposed to history and the philosophy of literature, and a foreign, if not ancient, language." Before his appointment to the NEH, Bennett was director of the National Humanities Center in Research Triangle Park, N.C., with which he had been associated from its early planning stages in 1976.

Since his distinguished undergraduate career at Williams, William Curtiss has served the College in many capacities, most notably as a 20-year member of the Board of Trustees. Following five years in the U.S. Navy during World War II, Curtiss joined Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation in 1946 and has been with that organization since. In 1981 he was elected Senior Vice President.

After receiving her law degree in 1965, Elizabeth Dole worked for several government agencies before being named a Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission in 1973, a position she held until 1979. Dole was sworn in as Secretary of Transportation on February 7, 1983. In 1974, Time magazine named her one of America's 200 most promising young leaders.

Born in 1900, Mildred Dunnock taught school before her first appearance on stage in New York City in 1932 as Miss Pinty in "Life Begins." Dunnock has appeared in scores of plays by both popular and classical authors, in this country and abroad. Dunnock made her first film in 1945, and among the many films she has appeared in since then are "Death of a Salesman," "Kiss of Death," "Sweet Bird of Youth," and "Viva Zapata!"

After graduating from Williams in 1955, Stanley Foster attended the University of Rochester Medical School, earning his medical degree in 1960. Between then and 1982, when he received a master's degree in public health from Emory University, Foster pursued his interest in epidemiology and public health in the United States, Bangladesh, and Nigeria. Earlier this year Foster was named Assistant Director of the Center for Disease Control's International Health Program Office. He has received many honors, including the Meritorious Honor Award from the U.S. Department of State in 1970 and the Order of the Bifurcated Needle from the World Health Organization in 1976.

Margaret Mahoney has been president of The Commonwealth Fund, a foundation with a particular interest in medical and scientific education, since 1980. Mahoney serves on the boards of The Foundation Center, the National Humanities Center, the Sun Valley Forum on Health, the Council on Foundations and the Independent Sector.

... and Baccalaureate speaker William Bennett were among the eight who received honorary degrees today.

Major General Hugh G. Robinson entered Williams with the Class of 1953, but transferred to West Point to pursue a military career. As Southwestern Division Engineer of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Robinson is responsible for the Corps' water resources development activities in all or parts of eight states, and supervises the design and construction of military installations for the Army and the Air Force in a five-state area of the southwest. He has received many military awards and decorations, including the Joint Service Commendation Medal and two awards of the Army Commendation Medal.

College feels the loss of faculty, staff

Four profs to retire

Williams will feel the loss this June of four retiring faculty members: Arthur Carr and Fred Stocking of the English department, John MacFaden of the Geology department, and psychology professor Richard Rouse.

Carr, the Edward Dorr Griffin Professor of English, came to Williams in 1967 from the University of Michigan to become chairman of the department.

He is a specialist in Victorian literature and has co-edited several college texts, including Mas-terpieces of the Drama, now in its fourth edition, and the Norton Anthology of Poetry.

Stocking has been a part of the College community since he grew up in the area. He attended Williams, graduated in 1936, earned his Ph.D. at the University of Michigan, and returned here to teach in 1940. In 1965 he was appointed Chairman of the English Department.

John MacFaden

Stocking's Shakespeare course has been popular with students, and it is his love of Shakespeare by which most students know him. However, his often-light-hearted essays reflect a broad range of interests including student drinking, personal finances, and the electoral system. He will continue to teach Winter Study courses at the College and to contribute his thoughts to local papers.

MacFaden, who is chairman of the Geology department, and the Elna McConnell Clark Professor of Geology, graduated from Williams in 1948, following a stint in the U.S. Navy. He has been on the faculty since 1952 and has held a Ph.D. from Columbia since 1962.

In 1958 he received a grant from the National Science Foundation for research on the properties of clay. This led to the publication of his paper, "The Properties of Clay as a Model Material." In 1965-66, in conjunction with the Mineralogical Institute of Norway, MacFaden conducted a search for ancient rocks from the earth's crust.

Rouse came to Williams in 1948 when the Psychology department was only two years old and served 12 years as its chairman. Before coming to Williams he graduated from Harvard and later taught at the University of Connecticut.

Rouse's speciality is cognitive psychology with an emphasis on visual perception and the role of attention in short-term memory. In the past he has served as a consultant to the National Science Foundation.

College honors loyal staff

Eleven retiring staff members were honored early this month at a dinner at the Mill on the Floss Restaurant. They were joined by twelve more staff members who have worked at the College for twenty-five years or more.

In addition, forty-four people gathered at the Williams Inn for lunch to mark their 10th, 15th or 20th year of employment at the College. College treasurer Will Reed welcomed both groups and President John Chandler spoke briefly to each.

Retiring workers include: Pauline Brignolo, Office Services; Barbara Dupuis, Food Services; Lester Estes, Buildings and Grounds (B&G); Harry Gompert, B&G; Rose Hall, Athletic Department; Ralph Tacuessa, B&G; Andrew LeBeau, Food Service; Joseph McCann, Science Shop; Edith McLaughlin, Food Service;

Weeds graduate to top priority

The College will undertake a major assault on outrageous dandelions and suffering grass in many areas of the campus this summer. Plans to upgrade the grounds will include weeding, seeding, sodding and edging.

The main focus for this summer's projects, according to Physical Plant Director Winthrop Wassenar, is the Freshman Quad. The island will be torn up and replaced with new sidewalks and new grass and the road around the Quad will be repaved, at a total cost of approximately $60,000.

Wassenar has been consulting chemistry professor Bill Moomaw for advice on the use of chemical herbicides on campus. Moomaw said the herbicide 2-4-D had been considered for use in "peripheral" areas of the campus.

He told Wassenar that the chemical should not be used in areas occupied by students, since inconclusive evidence exists as to its harmful nature. 2-4-D is a relative of 2-4-5-T, a chemical under suspension by the EPA for containing the toxic chemical dioxin.

Currently the College uses 2-4-D only on athletic fields after all the sports seasons are over. According to Wassenar, the College has a long-standing policy of not using 2-4-D in other areas and has no plans to do so.

No solution to the College's rampant weed problem has yet been found.

Williams on laserdiscs

Scenes of idyllic Williams, recorded on laserdiscs, may soon be appearing in high school guidance offices around the country if Bob Whitaker has his way.

Whitaker is president of Info Disc Inc., a Maryland company which has arranged with Williams, Penn State and a few other schools to make a trial laserdisc featuring short promotional tapes of each school's campus and classes.

If the idea is successful, the disc and equipment to play it may eventually be distributed nationally to high schools, free of charge. Colleges would then pay a subscription fee to get their message on the disc.

Whitaker, who was introduced to Williams by an alumnus, was look-

THE YEAR IN REVIEW

by Rich Henderson '83 and Michael Govan '85

SEPTEMBER

In a very powerful sense, the year began and ended on fabulous Spring Street. It seems that nothing happens in the downtown core of metropolitan Williamstown, but this time it was different. Granted, very little happened, but the Record has to print something.

The long and furious feud between Spring bookstore owners Ralph "Hatfield" Renzi and Joe "McCoy" Dewey was resolved in September by the local sheriff's office in Hopkins Hall. Unfortunately, students were made to serve justice's sentence, and quickly formed chain gangs which were lined up in the hot sun outside Dewey's.

The local Spring Street liquor store was the target of an effort to alleviate the campus drinking problems. A freshman student broke through the store window to take away and destroy what appeared to be an oversized bottle of Heineken beer. Unfortunately, the bottle turned out to be full of only hot air—which seems to be exactly the content of Williams' supposed drinking problem.

Phi Beta Kappa voted to severely tighten its membership restrictions—but since it doesn't apply to us seniors, what do we care?

Meacham Street housemates and the Rugby team were confused by the sudden disappearance of Vaige.

Count Basie brought his dazzling showmanship and a group of talented soloists to a soldout Chapin Hall in January.

OCTOBER

All other issues in October were overshadowed by the College's completion of plans to discontinue matron service. The news rocked the College to its foundations and sent shock waves sweeping through the nation. From coast to coast, from The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal to the Fresno Bee, the media inconsiderately poked fun at our venerable traditions and Residential Ethos.

NOVEMBER

With construction of the Art building, the Alumni House, and the new Studio Theater nearing completion, and the new Gym far in the future, the College decided it needed to give those Buildings and Grounds guys something to do. So they decided to launch the SPACE SHUFFLE. Original plans were as follows: Computers to Jesup, Jesup to Weston, Weston to Stetson. Got it?

A long-burning dispute surfaced between the CUL and The College Council about jurisdiction over the Housing Committee, which likes to make pronouncements about the Residential Ethos of Williams College. Apparently the CC had its own pronouncements to make about Ethoses.

DECEMBER

As far as we know, nothing happened in December. Vaige, however, was still unfound, reputed to be somewhere in the science quad.

JANUARY

Spring Street once again leaped into the Williams scene. Two students, who will remain unnamed, had run-ins with Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zolto (that's right, Zolto). In a cleverly conceived plot to end The Drinking Problem once and for all, the students wreaked havoc on Spring Street alcohol establishments. Their ploy worked, as local authorities clamped down on Log drinking.

The Space Shuffle continued. Present plans: OCC to Roper Center, Weston to Mears, BSU to Mears, Jesup to Weston, Computers to Jesup, the Laboratory for Prehistoric Archeology to a yet-unnamed town. Still got it? Stay tuned.

The Trustees had hoped to invite the entire campus to their mid-year meeting with the Anti-Apartheid Coalition, but due to an apparent mix-up, the meeting room only accommodated 150. WAAC had anticipated many mix-ups regarding the Trustees and attempted to straighten things out by holding a six-day hunger strike. The Trustees didn't think themselves mixed up at all.

FEBRUARY

It seems that the Deans were worried about mix-ups in the Faculty regarding Divestment. Alleged phone calls were made to alleged faculty by alleged Deans allegedly putting pressure on them to reconsider their allegedly mixed-up opinions on divestment. Everyone talked to the Record; no one talked at the Faculty Meeting.

The College got involved in the student-initiated fight to end the Drinking Problem. Pitchers, containing dangerously large quantities of easily consumable alcohol, were banned at the Log, thus annihilating that venerable activity at the Log and rendering that watering hole a veritable desert.

The College Council clashed with the Housing Committee, presumably over the interpretation of the word "Ethos". They proceeded to clash with the CUL, presumably over the meaning of the words "jurisdiction", "transfers", and, of course, "Ethos".

Vaige was still not seen on campus, but no one was going out much anymore anyway because of all the rain.

MARCH

The Pomilla proposal was passed, and they say it had something to do with the Residential House Ethos, or Ephos, or whatever. More importantly, who was this Pomilla guy, and how did he manage to get his name banded about so much by attaching it to a Proposal? Not even Freddy Nathan, politician par excellence, was ever able to do that. What exactly did Pomilla know about Ethos anyway?

The student movement to confront the drinking problem continued in earnest as Club Bacchus made its presence known on campus. The Record asked President Chandler what he thought of them: "What is it? Tell me about it." We did. "I think it's the wrong emphasis in these times with the problems on alcohol." Bacchus' clever scheme to raise alcohol awareness will, they hope, lead Chandler to pay serious attention to The Drinking Problem.

Spring Street again hit the headlines, as a vast new establishment devoted to luring students away from Drinking opened. This was, of course, Goodies' candy and ice cream store. The place did tremendous business; rumor had it that Steve Epstein's purchases alone could pay the rent.

College Council Elections were held. 'Nuff said.

APRIL

Tuition was raised by "an unusually high amount"; seniors wondered when the College ever raised tuition by a "usual" amount.

Dean Chris Roosenraad accepted a position as Dean of the College at Carleton; apparently they have a severe problem with dogs at the small Midwestern school.

Even the College could not keep up with intricacies of the Space Shuffle, so they decided to simplify things. The Final Solution: Weston to Weston (?), Jesup to Mears, Personnel and Conference Offices from Stetson to Weston, Computers still to Jesup (maybe?), BSU from Mears to Jenness House (where?). The Laboratory for Prehistoric Archeology was last rumored to be discussing merger with the Museum of Petrified Forest Animals in Cazenovia, New York, but with all the moving no one has seen them in weeks. Confused? That's OK, so are they.

The College Council finally gave up the fight with the CUL for jurisdiction over the Housing Committee and all associated transfers, inclusions, and delusions, on the condition that the Council reserve exclusive rights to the use of the words Ethos, Ethoses, and Ethil.

MAY

By the end of the semester, both pitchers and maids were back, though both cost money, and the College was proudly displaying its latest acquisition: the most important Declaration this side of the Pomilla Proposal.

The College spent over $400,000 on the ancient document; rumor had it that they had saved up the money from the elimination of Row House Dining. Though we ended up the year with a definitive Declaration pertaining to events of 1776, we were still waiting for reasoned, representative declarations on issues such as drinking, shuffling, Residential House Ethosing, and—most importantly—divesting.

Vaige emerged, thesis finished, just as some sun emerged.

JUNE

Graduation was held. More than 'nuff said there.

Plans for the future of Spring Street were announced: A new gym, new shops, and shuffled storeowners. But since it doesn't apply to us Seniors, what do we care? As long as they finish our Alumni House.

Rich Oleson '82 managed the Log through I.D. hassles, pitcher drought, and its recent return to General Popular Hot Spot.

The year brought a very strong effort to convince the College to divest of its holdings in South Africa. Students and faculty mounted an ongoing protest against the Trustees' current position on divestment that included a hunger strike and this meeting with the Trustee Finance Committee.

The year in sports

Ephs master trials, tribulations

by John Clayton

You probably think we do it like the Real Reporters.

Keating, an editor-in-chief, is sitting in his editor-in-chief desk. "Clayton!" he barks. I come running.

"Eppie is now reliving the entire football season."

"Clayton! I want a wrap-up on The Year In Sports!"

"Right, chief." I bounce back to my desk, grab a Milky Way, and go off in search of The Year In Sports.

tremendous!"

Eppie is now re-living the entire football season. "Tufts. Unde-feated team. Their Homecoming. 13,000 fans. Last-second field goal. Missed. 13-11 victory."

"Middlebury; should've won. Union; turnovers. But Wesleyan, ahhh, Wesleyan."

In the back of my head a little

My next visit is to Dave Wood-worth. "Woody!" I ask. "What do you know about The Year In Sports?"

Hockey. Woody is my hockey and soccer man, and he is talking about hockey.

"Injuries. Terrible season. Nine game losing streak. But last two weeks: awesome. Five-game win-ning streak. Beat Middlebury, Princeton, then Babson—what a game: overtime, 3-2, Eddie Finn, Bob Brownell, Danny Finn. Finn-tastic!" I groan. Woody does too.

Woody is also high on the soccer team: "Most wins ever. 10-5-1. ECAC tournament; lose in cham-plonship; sudden death overtime.

I'm my own source for basket-ball: Trip to Cuba. Seven-game winning streak. "This team is good." Leading scorer: Art Pidori-ano. Chasing Harry Sheehy's points-scored record. New Coach: Harry Sheehy. What's he saying? "Artie, don't shoot!" (Two word sentences: I'm hung over too.)

Skling. Winter Carnival. John Pier and Crawford Lyons go one-two in the men's, Heidi Knight gets one in the women's downhill. First time ail year that Vermont loses a downhill race. Incredible finish.

Tenth in nation. Four second team All-Americans. Elien Chandier, Pier, Knight, Lyons.

Track. Bo Parker. New mlie record. Undefeated winter season; Little Three spring champs.

Images of the Year In Sports are flying by now: Women's crew: third in the Dad Vail. Gregg Zaff, Sports Illustrated's "Faces in the Crowd" celebrity.

Baseball: 10-16, best record in a long whlie. A team with offensive power, offensive punch and, occa-sionally, good pitching too.

Rugby: sick sport.

Squash: good teams. Tennis: them too.

Other sports: some successful, some disappointing. But great moments in them ail. More than I can handle. The Year In Sports is overwhelming me. I can't handle it . . .

Of course, we aren't Reai Repor-ters. Keating doesn't have an editor-in-chief desk (neither does Tigar). The Record office is so small and crowded that bouncing "Here come the fans! Here come the goalposts! This is tremendous!"

The first person I visit is Steve Epstein. "Eppie!" I ask. "What do you know about The Year In Sports?"

Football. Eppie is talking about football. In particular, the Wes-leyan Homecoming game:

"Look, there's the clock running out!" Eppie says. "There's the lineman tackling B.J.! There's Bernie Krause picking him up! There's Marc Hummon; he's wide open! He's caught the ball! Touch-down! Here come the fans! Here come the goalposts! Oh, this is voice is saying "52-26. 52-26." But I don't raise the question. Eppie is enjoying himself too much.

My next visit is to Chris Harned. "Chris!" I ask. "What do you know about The Year In Sports?"

Swimming. Chris says swim-ming deserves much praise.

"Outstanding regular seasons, New England champions—both teams. The women: national champions. Little Three titles? New England titles? Meaningless. National titles for this team. They're on another plane."

Seniors, defense, Ted Murphy in goal. Awesome year."

"Suddenly I realize everyone is talking in two word sentences."

Suddenly I realize everyone is talking in two-word sentences. Why? It's senior week. They're all drunk or hung over. Two words is a lot to put in a sentence when you're hung over; verbs are almost impossible.

back to my desk would require more choreography than ballroom dancing in the Purple Pub. The Year In Sports is sitting in a bunch of old Records in a file cabinet in the corner. Oh, yes, and Keating can't bark.

By now you must have heard that we have sold our textbook rights to Dewey's, located behind Pappa Charlie's Deli. Thank you for your support during the years.

We will continue to carry everything we have in the past except the textbooks. In addition we are going to considerably expand our offerings of publishers overstock, or remainders, as they are called. In effect these are brand new books reduced to 1/2 to 1/3 of their original price.

Have a good year.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1982

Let me tell you . . .

Well. You're in for it.

The madness of the next few days is comfortable and familiar to us. It's thrilling but sometimes frightening to you freshmen. You'll be dressed up, shuttled around, dragged to parties and lectures, and advised about all aspects of Williams life. You'll be told and shown how to act, what to avoid, and where to go by always friendly, occasionally misguided people who are eager to help you out. Stay loose, don't believe everything, don't rush into anything. But avoid doing nothing. Plunge into college life with joy and curiosity and spirit . . . it's a happy, wonderful experience. Treat the next year as an experiment.

Try new lifestyles, new subjects, new sports. Be an individual—don't be afraid to appear silly; instead, be eager to appear unique. Don't worry about grades, either. You may not get the grades you got in high school, but none of us do. It's OK. If you work hard, you'll do well. And if you study what interests you instead of what you think is "good" for you, you will work hard because you are enjoying it.

But don't try to go it alone. Your JAs and entymates can become your closest friends, and their aid and companionship is essential. Your professors and the administrators are always friendly and willing to help, too.

Finally, rely on the gems of information contained in this booklet. We're trying to give you a handle on Williamstown—where to go for sheets and suntans, where to go for a 3 a.m. snack or a Parents' Weekend feast, and where to go to get out of this place.

Williamstown Treasures

Little things we've discovered over three years here. We thought everybody knew about them, but a disturbing number of friends have graduated without having done, or seen, most of them. So we'll give you a head start on what to look for:

- Ice Cream Cones at the Tash Store. The two Tash sisters, each about four feet tall, have been running the place for sixty years, and haven't changed a single thing for the last fifty-nine. Wonderful old posters, old cabinets, old flooring, and old people. It can take twenty minutes for Fanny to scoop out your ice cream, but you'll get a fascinating conversation in the meantime and the huge cone is well worth the wait and the thirty-five cents. On Water Street.

Williamstown has a lot of colorful people.

The pastoral landscape of Stone Hill.

- A walk along Deer Ridge. You'll be trespassing, but during the foliage season nothing is more beautiful than a stroll along this grassy lane in the woods. And you may see a white-tailed buck bounding through a field on the Mount Hope Farm.

- College Hijinks. Sure, you're not supposed to go steam tunneling, or break into the pool for 3 a.m. skinny-dipping, or enjoy throwing buckets of water on Sage F, or test your strength at cow-tipping, but you only live once. Just be careful and make sure you're reasonably sober.

- The Green Mountain Racetrack. No, it used to be horses like a normal track but now it's dogs, which necessitated a few interesting changes in physical plant. You won't believe you're watching dogs run, but it's a great time. In Pownal past the soon-to-be familiar adult book store.

- Picnicking on Stone Hill. Walk up the hill behind the Clark and you'll vaguely think you're in Scotland or something. The view of the Village Beautiful is so nice it's a cliché. Eat some bread and cheese and wine and fruit, another cliché. Then go to the back left corner of the field to pick up the old High road to the south. It wanders around forests, fields, and hilltops. Watch out for the cows, however; one of them is a bull who likes to chase people.

- The Center for Development Economics. Williams' most beautiful residential house belongs to a fun bunch of foreign economics grad students who love visitors and information about the College. Drop in some day to marvel at the paneling, furniture and huge rooms. You may wind up in a fascinating conversation with a Somali.

- Climbing a Mountain. An easy one at least, like Pine Cobbie. Or drive if you must, up Greylock. But do it. What'd ya come up here for anyway?

- The Clark Art Museum. For God's sake, get over there. It's wonderful, especially on beautiful mornings, and you'd be surprised how four years can pass. Go frequently and buy their classy notecards, which will impress your mother.

- Phillips General Store. A real store, not for the tourists. If you can't find it anywhere, they've got one squirreled away somewhere. Penny candy, creaky wooden floors, and crusty New England service.

- The Williamstown Public Library. A big white house with lots of books Sawyer won't have—like travel guides, cookbooks, and trashy novels. The reading room is like your grandmother's living room and for some reason features twenty-six issues of Oklahoma Today Magazine.

The Tash store twenty years ago. Go in today and see the identical scene.

Getting Out Again: A Travel Guide

You can go in style . . .

Thoreau was referring to Williams when he said, "It would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain." It would be an even greater advantage if a train station, bus depot, or airport were located here. As it is, finding transportation into and out of Williamstown can be as challenging as getting an A from Kurt Tauber.

Buses provide the most reliable means of escape. Five buses leave the Williams Inn daily for Boston, the first at 6:15 a.m. and the last at 5:15 p.m. The ride takes about 3½ hours. The infamous New York-via-Pittsfield-and-every-small-town-along-the-way bus sets off at 7:35 every morning and arrives at the Port Authority terminal 5½ hours later. An extra run at 11:55 a.m. is added on the weekends. More information about schedules, fares, and routes is available at the Williams Inn (458-9371). The bus stop is right outside the Inn.

Ugly orange buses

The county bus system (those ugly orange buses with big B's on the sides) provides hourly service to North Adams. Buses leave the Williams Inn starting at 6:30 a.m. (8:30 on weekends) and can be boarded in front of the gym on Spring Street. Why would anyone want to go to North Adams, you may ask? Well, it only costs 70¢, and North Adams was once named one of the 10 most beautiful small cities in America. It has a very high teenage pregnancy rate, and the only arcade in the area is located there. Besides, you can catch a bus to Pittsfield at 7 after every hour.

Pittsfield is much like North Adams, except bigger and uglier. Pittsfield also has a train station (actually a large plexiglass telephone booth) with connections to Boston at 11:20 a.m. and Chicago at 8:15 p.m. The Chicago train stops in Worcester, Cleveland, and Buffalo, among other places.

Albany also offers railroad access, most notably 7 trains each weekday to Grand Central Station in New York. For more train information, call Amtrak: 800-523-5720. Albany also has the airport of preference for Williams students. The Travel Store on Spring Street can help with rail and air tickets and information.

No cars allowed

The easiest way to travel is by car. If you own one, you're in luck. Well, almost. As a first semester freshman, you're not supposed to be driving one, so you can either put it in storage or hide it from the authorities. Thereafter, you must pay a $55 registration fee each year to Security and park in an assigned lot—in the case of freshmen, behind the tennis courts.

If you're daring, the best way to conceal an illegal/unregistered car is to talk a faculty or staff member into giving or selling you their parking sticker, which will let you park anywhere you please. The second best method is to park the car off-campus (easier than you may think—church parking lots are empty six days a week.)

Cars not registered, or parked illegally, face fairly substantial fines if found by a Security officer, who seem to spend most of their time patrolling the parking lots.

Car connections

If you don't have a car, you can often find one that's going your way with a little effort. Informal contacts are often the most fruitful. Ask JA's, friends of JA's, and any other upperclassmen you know about people with room to spare in their cars. Remember that guy from your high school who told you to look him up sometime when you got here? Don't forget fellow freshmen—their cars can come out of storage on breaks.

The ride board in Baxter fills up with "rides wanted" around vacations. Post a notice (the more creative the better) and keep your fingers crossed. WCFM broadcasts a ride board with both offers and needs, as does WJJW, the North Adams State College station. WJJW's board usually has rides to the Boston area offered every weekend, and they play better music than CFM.

With a little planning, you should be able to get to just about any place you want during your four years here. But after paying $10,000+ to get here, who wants to leave?

. . . or on the ugly bus.

Some Important Faces

Dean O'Connor

Dean Daniel O'Connor is the Administration's point man for campus crises. As Dean of the College, he is responsible for the day-to-day operation of the College and supervision of student life. Students usually call him "Dean Dan," but not to his face, please. O'Connor's pet crusade is to combat grade inflation, which is something like what happens to our tuition each year, only not so drastically. O'Connor had little time for personal crusading last year as he walked the difficult line between student concerns and Administration policy. O'Connor is a philosophy professor, but fortunately he doesn't talk like one.

Dean O'Connor in the days when he fought ballooning grades.

The President will look more serious when you shake hands with him this week.

President Chandler

President Chandler is a highly visible college president. One can usually see him commuting to and from the office, watching football and basketball games, and at graduation. The President's job is to lead faculty meetings, explain what's going on when the Trustees visit the College, and pump alums for money. President Chandler holds degrees from Wake Forest and Duke—you would never guess his Southern background by looking at him, but Mrs. Chandler's accent gives it away. Chandler was a member of the College classics department from 1955 to 1968. He left the College for five years, but before long his heart pined for the Purple Valley. The offer to become College president might have made his choice a little easier.

Dean Oakley presides over the unruly bunch below.

Dean Oakley

Dean of the Faculty Oakley oversees tenure decisions and faculty hiring, and represents faculty opinion to the administration. He also teaches Medieval History, and you can find his name on the check-out card of many an obscure, heavy tome in the Library. The man himself is not obscure, however; while his Dean's Office duties bring him little contact with students, you can easily distinguish him from other professors by his wonderful Oxford accent.

Some of the happy folks who'll be teaching you this year.

Dean Roosenraad

Roosenraad is the radical in the Dean's Office. He hung around with Tom Hayden at Wisconsin and was one of the early members of what became the SDS. Much later he gained notoriety for expelling dogs from the Williams Campus. Nowadays he deals with much less serious issues as Dean of Freshmen.

Though he frowns on waterfights and boys-will-be-boys vandalism, Roosenraad is very friendly and understanding. Better yet, he gives extensions easily.

A friendly face: Dean of Fresh Roosenraad

The Recorded History of Williams College

In the early 1750s, British Army Colonel Ephraim Williams Jr. bequeathed several thousand dollars to establish a free school in West Hoosuck, Massachusetts. The result was today's elite and expensive Williams College in Williamstown. How did we get from there to here?

Col. Ephraim Williams held a series of commands in colonial Massachusetts, although in his day they spelled it "Maffachufett"—King George had a speech impediment, but no one dared embarrass him, so they changed the language. The colonel held a series of commands because he managed to lose forts as often as he was assigned to them. Williams met his end in an Indian ambush near Lake George, New York in 1755.

Williams' will provided money to establish a boys' free school in West Hoosuck, but only on the condition that they change the town's name to Williamstown. With a name like

West Hoosuck, one would imagine that the folks would jump at the chance. The town dragged its heels though, finally agreeing to the change in 1765 (and Mr. Bronfman settled for a mere science building?)

A series of legal disputes stood between the dream of a school and its realization. It took over two decades to decide whether Williamstown was in New York or Massachusetts. The struggle was resolved when some crafty Williamstown lawyers put up a sign ten miles to the west that read, "Welcome to New York—Hugh Carey, Governor."

By the time the trustees were ready to build the school in 1785, they learned that Williams' accumulated estate of $9157 would not cover the cost. They held a lottery to raise the remaining funds. Construction on West College finally began in 1790. The College's first building still stands on its original site, and some West College residents maintain that nothing has been changed in two hundred years.

Another judicial stumbling block was thrown by Harvard College. Harvard insisted that it was the only college the state needed. Williams won in court, but Harvard clings to the idea to this day. Litigation completed, the Williams free school officially became Williams College in June of 1793.

The College held its first commencement exercises in September of 1795 with a graduating class of four. Two became doctors and two became lawyers, setting the tone for nearly two centuries of Williams graduates.

The trustees of the late 18th century called for a curriculum that included three foreign languages, mensurations, conic sections, navigation, civil polity, surveying, and arithmetic. They threw in the arithmetic for students seeking an easy way out of Division III.

The College had a troublesome start, with most of its problems stemming from the isolation of Williamstown. Faculty were disappointed by the "country bumpkins" that were attracted to Williams. The College was continually in need of money. To resolve its problems, the trustees tried to move the college to a more convenient location, but the request to move was denied by the Massachusetts government (King George was dead by then, so the "s" came back into the alphabet).

Frustrated by the state's decision, Williams' second president, Zephaniah Swift Moore, scurried to the Connecticut River Valley in 1821, taking a number of faint-hearted students and faculty with him. They founded Amherst College, named after a British Lord whose most notable achievement was to wipe out an entire Indian tribe by giving them smallpox-infested blankets. The Williams-Amherst rivalry has endured as one of the nation's oldest college rivalries, although respectable Williams students deny any association with the Lord Jeffs.

The list of Williams alums does not contain many commonly recognized names. One of our better-known graduates is President James A. Garfield, who was assassinated minutes before boarding a train headed for a Williams reunion. Another well-known alum is George Steinbrenner, owner of the New York Yankees. Some people have been heard to suggest that Steinbrenner should be shot and that Garfield buy the Yankees.

Benchmarks in recent Williams history are the banning of fraternities and the switch to coeducation. In the early 1960s many faculty and students decided that there was too much drinking and carousing at Williams, so they tossed out the fraternities. A few years later, when the campus was deemed safe for women, coeducation was introduced. Then the new women students formed the Women's Rugby Team, and we were back where we started.

Amherst was founded by Williams' second President, who decided that a college could not survive in the Berkshire wilds. Every year we prove on the playing fields that we're doing quite well, thank you.

Stetson used to be the library. While the reference room was nice, students who see the old stacks breathe a sigh of relief and thank the Trustees for Sawyer Library.

Where to eat in the town

BERNARDY'S—Adventure across from the wire plant. We walked in, noticed that steak goes for $1.90. Saw that two of the three customers were about to have a fist fight. The bartender was huge and not particularly friendly. We left.

BETTE'S—Closes at three p.m., when most Ephs are waking up. Students are never seen in here, but the pancakes are good, the atmosphere is nice, and patrons get a great view of Spring Street.

BURGER KING—Not only is Joe Kling down there now, but it's open until three a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays. Grab yourself a paper Burger King crown and try the circular slide in the restaurant's playground. Within walking distance on Route Two, near the all-night Grand Union.

COLONIAL PIZZA—Cool people call it Constantine's. Real cool people don't talk about it at all. Awful pizza, but amazing things happen around 2:30 in the morning. Juke box has Greek folk songs and, for Christmas, singing dogs.

LIBRARY VENDING MACHINES—The weekday social center of the campus. Convenient to the main bathrooms, and open until 1 a.m. Terrible coffee, terrible sandwiches, overpriced candy.

THE LOG—Get there early for superior Alpha Pizza ple 'za—before they run out of things like crust. Beer and all the accessories.

PAPA CHARLIE'S DELI—Expensive, but the only good sandwiches on Spring Street. Huge variety, Haagen-Dazs, and newspapers while you wait.

PURPLE PUB—Upper classmen like to think of this as their turf, but frosh can often get in. See if there is a guy sitting next to the door, checking IDs. Good lunches.

SNACK BAR—Baxter burgers with a twist—they're good. The grilled honeybun with ice cream is a campus classic. So is everything else. The big library social crowd gets there at 11:00 every night.

Out of Town

BOSTON FISH MARKET—Near to Napolitano's in North Adams. Family restaurant atmosphere. Good, really cheap fish. They give you plastic forks and knives, so bring your own.

COZY CORNERS—Legendary. Good spaghetti, cheap pizza, good cheap drinks. Go with a crowd. Five minutes drive north on Route 7.

DUNKIN' DONUTS—On Route 2 in North Adams. Great as entry snacks. Call ahead for big orders.

GOLD COIN—At last, a Chinese carryout! The place can't be beat for good inexpensive food, and lots of it. On Route 2 across from Zayre's.

LA COCINA—Those who know Mexican food say it's lousy. Those who don't say, "who cares?" The only reasonably priced place decent enough for a date. Bring IDs to buy sangria.

LUAU HALE—This is someplace special. On Route 7 south of Pittsfield, but well worth the trip, especially with a crowd. Amazing drinks with umbrellas in them. Get trashed and marvel at the Polynesian wall murals. And order the PuPu Platter.

NAPOLITANO'S—Best local pizza. Now has sit-down dining too. Go behind K-Mart in North Adams and look around for it.

Check from home

BRITISH MAID—English country house atmosphere w/ English country cuisine. The most reasonably priced nice restaurant in town. Live band at the upstairs bar.

LE COUNTRY RESTAURANT—Varied menu of good but overpriced food. Service is slow. Behind Greylock quad on Route 7.

RIVER HOUSE—The place that everyone goes to. Pleasant atmosphere, good daiquiris. Specializes in meat and shellfish dishes. A civilized late-night alternative to the Pub and the Log. Call ahead for reservations.

WILLIAMS INN—Well suited for grandparents—you'll see plenty of them during leaf season. Overpriced drinks, decent food.

We extend a warm welcome to the incoming Freshmen and to the returning upperclassmen of WILLIAMS COLLEGE.

The Eph Shopping Guide

Furniture—Most freshmen arrive in their spacious suites and are pleasantly surprised to find couches, rugs, and tables already in place. Unfortunately, they probably belong to someone else, and if you have not been hit already, you probably will return to the entry one day to find your suite stripped to the bare walls. Refurnishing can be painful.

Most people get furniture by haggling with upperclassmen over some decrepit sofas, chairs, and tables. As a general rule, offer half of the asking price and settle for a little more.

A decent couch should go for about $30. Chair prices vary depending on the amount of padding—the less bare wood, the higher the price. If you can get out to Pittsfield, you can try the Salvation Army. One need not worry about being gypped there.

For freshmen whose parents are bankrolling the decoration, there is Hopkins furniture on Spring Street. This is the new stuff, not what you see thrown out of freshman quad windows. Hopkins also sells lamps, kitchen appliances, and other household accessories.

Hardware and Lumber—For do-it-yourself freshmen, there is Taconic Lumber and Hardware and Phillips' General Store, both on Water Street. A wide variety of tools, paints, etc. are there within walking distance of the campus.

A popular shelving idea is using brick and board shelves. Red bricks and pine boards (stain them if you are ambitious) make attractive and very sturdy storage units, especially good for stereo equipment.

Banks—Weighing the advantages of the checking accounts offered by the three local banks could occupy most of your Freshman Days, what with check charges, minimum balances, and NOW accounts to consider. Williamstown Savings' NOW account has no check charge and requires a $10 minimum deposit if you want interest. Customers of the First Agricultural Bank and the Williamstown National Bank often complain of the high minimum balance needed to get free checking. The First Aggie does have the longest bank hours in town, however, while the National offers big books of matches. The Savings Bank has matches and lollipops. The First Aggie gives away free key chains for opening an account, so you might want to open one there and move it elsewhere after a respectable time has passed.

Records and Tapes—The Record Store in "Eph's Alley", around the corner from the First Aggie Bank, is the place to go for speaker wire, jacks, and other stereo set-up accessories. The Record Store also has albums, tapes, and a disorganized cut-out bin.

Toonerville Trolley Records, on Water Street next to the River House restaurant, has an outstanding selection of new and used albums (great bargains in the used section). Cut-outs are well-organized. Hal, the owner, is a walking encyclopedia of album information.

Food—One can accommodate any palate in Williamstown, all within walking distance of the campus. Check out the cheese selection at the Slippery Banana on Spring Street. They have lots of foreign-looking crackers for your foreign-looking cheeses, and plenty of fresh fruit and vegetables. They still carry a lot of "health food", but it would be unfair to call it just a health food store.

For cheap eats and 4:00 a.m. hunger spasms, the Grand Union on Route 2 is open 24 hours a day except Sundays. Whether you need food or not, you have to try the Tash store on Water Street (see Williamstown Treasures, p 2).

Liquor—"I thought they'd never get to it," you were saying to yourself. The Massachusetts drinking prohibition for anyone under twenty is a problem, but not insurmountable.

King's Liquor on Spring Street and the Spirit Shop on Cole Avenue are the most common local purveyors of spirits. King's stocks a wide variety of beers and hard liquor. The Spirit Shop is good for kegs and party orders. Your JAs can buy for you (what else do you think they're there for?), or you can head north to the Vermont border where they sell to eighteen year olds.

The best place of all, however, is West Package Store on Rte. 2 towards North Adams. The lowest beer prices, (try their Carlings 16-ouncers) and friendly people.

Clothes—Spring Street prices are high, no matter where you go. But there is no tax on clothes in Massachusetts (apparently crew-neck sweaters are deemed a "basic necessity" in prep New England), so you even out some. For great bargains on crazy clothes, hit the Women's Exchange on Cole Ave. (for men too).

Miscellaneous—If you can get a car, you'll have access to the Zayre and K-Mart discount department stores in North Adams. They have everything. It may not be name brand, but it will usually do in a pinch.

The RIGHT extracurriculars

Now that you're finally here at Williams, you're probably wondering just how to go about achieving popularity, standing, and undying fame here. Well, you can't change your looks or your Brooklyn accent, but you can choose the organizations you join:

Extra-curricular Activities

The Record—What can we say?
Investment Club—Changes presidents every 2 weeks so everyone gets a chance.

Republican Club—You might want to wait until the next presidential election before joining.

WC FM—Shows you can talk good.

Extracurricular Activities to Avoid Ozzy Osbourne Adoration Society
Anything known by an acronym

Committees to Join

Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL)—You get a good dinner every time the trustees are in town.
Honor and Discipline Committee—Uphold high standards, stand for honesty, and get back at the kid who blasted his stereo your freshman year.

Any committee appointed by the President—Hey, if he thinks you're innocuous . . .

Committees Not To Join

Bondage and Discipline Committee
Prospect House Social Committee

Jobs to Hold

Teaching/Research Assistant—Someone thinks you're intelligent.

Computer anything—You're obviously in tune with technological advances.

Supervisor—Sounds responsible and draws the highest pay level.

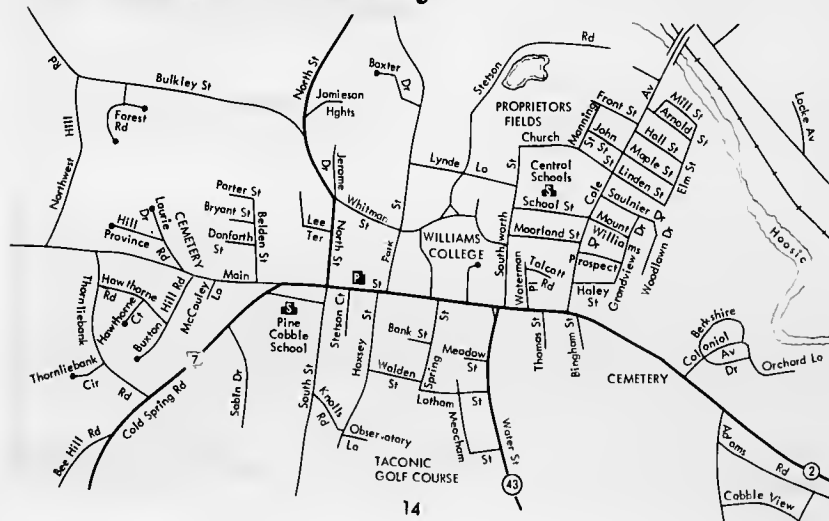

Reserve Room, Library—All your friends can stop by and visit.

Jobs to Avoid

Inter-campus Mail Deliverer—What kind of idiot wants to walk around outside in the winter?

Dishroom—words can't describe it.
Documents Office, Library—Nobody knows what (or where) it is.

Introduction to Ephspeak

The following paragraph illustrates a typical conversation on campus. It may be completely unintelligible to you at first, but get your friends and J.A.'s to help you. Once you have mastered both the words and inflections, you will be ready to venture into Williams society and maybe even talk to an upperclassman.

"Yo, Wreck Room tonight."

"Nah, Old Mill, froshburgers and bad tunes."

"No, c'mon, Party, Excellent!"

"Gotta tool at the Libes."

"You geek. With the guts you take?"

"What? Comp Sci's a bitch. I want to pull an A-bar from the Penguin. I aced the midterm."

"Oh, hoser! You can afford to get trashed at the Park."

Power tool! Later for you, much."

"Wait . . . I'm dying. Meat grenades at Baxter tonight. Haven't eaten since the Doghouse. Let's hit Constantine's and pig out."

"How 'bout Za at the Log? We'll catch the Zone on the Big screen."

"Up for foos? Foos is key."

"Totally."

"Ok, I'm there!"

Shuffle misses Mears deadline

JESUP OFFICES TO MOVE IN OCTOBER

by Christian Howlett

The great space shuffle of last year is not over. The shuffle of Jesup Hall offices to Mears House has been held up by a delay in the completion of renovations to Mears.

Those who followed the continuing saga will remember that the Jesup Hall offices—Alumni, Development and News—were supposed to move to Mears to make way for a new computer center.

The renovations are now nearly done and the Jesup Hall offices are finally scheduled to move into their new home on Oct. 7. In Jesup boxes are stacked to the ceiling in preparation for the move.

However, the Jesup crowd was scheduled to move into Mears in late August. Mears used to house the Office of Career Counseling, which has since moved to a renovated space in the Roper Center in the basement of Stetson.

Rewiring of Mears House will delay completion of the space shuffle. Computers will not move into Jesup until fall of 1984. (Schelbe)

The delay arose when contractors began renovating Mears last spring and discovered they had to completely rewire the building to accommodate new wordprocessing equipment.

"Mears like Vietnam"

"You should have seen it, it looked like Vietnam," Director of Development John Pritchard said, describing all the work that needed to be done. Besides the rewiring, a few new partitions were put in Mears.

The continued delays have caused problems for the Jesup offices, however. Alumni Relations Director Craig Lewis said his office is "using makeshift methods to get out alumni fund mailings that have to go out this month" since the mailroom's new equipment is still in storage in Mears.

The College is planning to build a relatively large commercial office building at the south end of Spring Street and may complete it by spring 1984.

College officials say the project will provide needed space both for new businesses and for merchants who will be displaced by the scheduled beginning of construction this spring on the new College gym south of the squash courts. (See New Gym story, pg. 8)

The proposed two-story office building will be wedged between the American Legion and the Travel Store. It will provide space for about five stores on the ground floor and more office space on the second floor.

The total floor space will be about 11,000 square feet, according to College Treasurer and Vice-President William Reed.

$500,000 investment

The building will be divided in half by a covered walkway stretching from the street to a parking lot behind the building. The new lot will have a capacity for 58 cars. There is now a parking lot on the proposed site, which is owned by the College, with space for only 26 cars.

The building should cost about $500,000, Reed said. "The cost will come out of the endowment," he said. "We're viewing it as a real estate investment."

The architect is William M. Kirby of Williamstown.

Big demand for office space

"Williamstown needs more commercial space," said Reed. "We could rent the whole building three times over if we wanted to. This project will develop the end of Spring Street. We're pleased that the street is being revitalized."

The College began planning for the building when it appeared last spring that it might be necessary to demolish a whole row of College-owned store space on the east side of Spring Street to fit the gym in.

A design change spared the Adams Building, which houses McClelland's Stationery, Hart's Pharmacy, Salvatore's and various offices.

News Room to go

But the Bastien Block, which houses Goodman's Jewelers and the Williams News Room, will still have to come down. The building housing Drummond's Cleaners will also be obliterated.

Reed said the new office building should be completed by this spring in time for those displaced businesses to make a space shuffle of their own. Construction may begin this fall.

And even if there are delays, "the digging of the gym's foundation can be phased so that the News Room won't be torn down until the office building is completely finished," Reed said.

The News Room will probably move down the street temporarily but the College may invite its owners to move back up into office space in a proposed section of the gym building which will jut out to Spring Street, Reed said.

Does Art Work?

Sure it does. Last year, for example, art worked for over $5.5 million in donations from culturally-minded alumni and friends of the College. That's how much we spent to build an art museum and a new theatre, not to mention posters—really cool posters with two fuzzy, disembodied photographs, lots of white space, and almost no words. Their point, however, is clear: times are changing for the better on a campus which has historically separated "art" and "learning".

This burst of funding and construction can lead to more than financial commitment. Hopefully, the increase in creative opportunity will bear fruit, eventually attracting more students seeking the arts. If this happens, the program will gain strength with each passing year.

For a campus unused to seeing more art than, say, Art 101-102 --The History of Slides--this onslaught of culture may provoke an uncomfortable dichotomy: some may rush into the arts with wild abandon while others write off all the publicity as nothing but hype. That kind of reductive, all-or-nothing reasoning has killed many earlier, noteworthy campus topics. One hopes the arts have a better chance. Interpreted as it should be, the College's commitment to the arts this year is a smorgasbord of opportunities which will remain next year as well as this, not a chore to be performed now under the duress of campus-wide advertisement.

"Art works," as the poster says, to broaden our perspective in a way which most of us will find novel, accustomed as we are to learning by ingestion and not by experience. The products of art, unlike those of other disciplines, are best accessible only through contact. It is therefore imperative that we integrate the arts into academic life, and that we no longer consider the arts extraordinary and extracurricular.

The variety of artistic activity on campus should make assimilation more, and not less, comfortable. The addition, over the past and coming few years, of performing and visual arts facilities will let everyone create and spectate with almost equal ease. We look forward to the elimination of the prevailing distinction between those who enjoy the arts and most of the campus. In the future, those who do not run headlong into the arts need not be left behind. They just have to take the first step.

LETTERS

Trust?

To the editor:

I am gratified beyond expression at your assurance that for a mere $16 I can help the Record tell the true story of Williams College. I am warmed by your promise that you will actually see that the paper is delivered. I am disturbed by your easy assumption that a computer will see that your promise is kept, especially a college computer. How am I to know, given recent events, what the college computer will do if I start opposing endowment investments in South Africa? The college computer will probably start endorsing veiled threats on my copy of the Record, or telling the postal service to throw my paper on the roof instead of on the porch where all papers should be delivered.

I am all for freedom of the press, guys, but I don't think Ben Franklin would have told subscribers to Poor Richard's Almanac to take comfort in knowing that a machine owned by George III would see that the rag was delivered.

This letter arrived in response to the Record subscription letter that we sent over the summer.—Eds.

WHO CARES?

Do you? Whether you want to raise your voice about the campus, the nation, or last week's issue, we've got the forum.

Letters

Letters to the editor must be limited to 250 words and in the Record office by 3 p.m. Sunday or in the Record mailbox by Friday evening. They must be signed and should be typed. They may cover any issue of interest to the College community.

OP-ED

If brevity's not your style, or you really hate the Letters section, you can write a longer piece for the Op-Ed section. Consult either Jon Tigar or Daniel Keating about length and topic, as we need to plan this section in advance of Sunday. But remember, we need pieces for Op-Ed.

Be heard in the Record.

ACSR to intensify queries

by Ned Ladd
The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR), after recommending divestment from only one out of eight corporations with unsatisfactory South African operations, will analyze corporate performance using a more exhaustive and time consuming process.

Committee Chairman Stephen Lewis explained that "it may slow things down," but he emphasized that the Committee will be making more informed decisions.

The new process involves a questionnaire that has been sent to all companies in the Williams portfolio that have South African holdings.

"We have already sent out letters," said College Treasurer William Reed, also a member of the ACSR. "The companies we are dealing with are pretty sophisticated in responding to shareholder requests. We should be receiving printed statements regarding their South African operations soon."

This information will be used in conjunction with other independent sources to evaluate the overall performance of each corporation.

Because of this new process and the heavier workload that accompanies it, the ACSR will deal almost exclusively with the South African question.

"South Africa is a special case--it's a priority," Lewis noted. "Discussion of other issues will be limited to proxy votes."

Question procedure

WAAC spokesperson and ACSR member Navjeet Bai '84 feels that the process will be too slow.

"I hope to go in there [to ACSR meetings] and question the procedural points," she said. "I favor a more principled position where the companies are not judged on a case-by-case basis." Last April the ACSR recommended divestment from Dresser Industries. The Trustees accepted their recommendation and liquidated $274,000 worth of Dresser stock.

However, no final action was taken on eight other corporations which received low ratings in the Arthur D. Little report on compliance with the Sullivan Principles. According to Lewis these corporations will be re-evaluated under the new process.

The ACSR will also consider corporate behavior outside of South Africa as a criterion for possible divestment.

College President John Chandler explained that "Corporations tend to take on characters." He also said that corporations considered to be "borderline cases" in their South African dealings may be vindicated by good practices elsewhere.

"We're going to give them the benefit of a doubt," he said.

Forum for discussion

The ACSR will become the forum for discussion regarding any investment policy. "We want to avoid what happened last year," Reed said, referring to the January Trustee meeting and the subsequent hunger strike.

Chandler expressed hope that students and student organizations would use the ACSR to discuss these issues before bringing them directly to the Trustees.

Lewis expects this year to be very busy in the ACSR. Two companies that received low ratings last year, Eli Lilly Industries and Dart and Kraft Incorporated will be scrutinized very closely this year.

"We have to keep pressure on the companies," Lewis said. "There are a couple of places where I'm worried about the responses we've been getting."

Alumni find home

Construction on the Alumni House has been completed, and it is scheduled to open to alumni for the Middlebury alumni football game on September 24.

The upper level of the addition to the Faculty House contains a dining room which seats 500. The lower level contains a lounge, bar, library and small lecture room.

The addition was designed by the same architect which is designing the new gym, Cambridge 7. The addition cost $1.6 million.

Van Duyne cited

An article by Economics professor Carl Van Duyne who died last year was awarded "the outstanding journal of the year" by the American Agricultural Economics Ass'n. His article, "Food Prices, Expectations, and Inflation," was published in the "American Journal of Agricultural Economics." The award was to have been presented in August.

Van Duyne died of cancer last February at the age of 36.

Brutus is safe

Poet and Northwestern University professor Dennis Brutus received asylum in the United States last week after a two year battle with the Justice Department.

According to the New York Times, Immigration Judge Irving Schwartz granted asylum to Brutus because he would be a "prime target" of the South African government if deported, Schwartz said. Schwartz said that Brutus was in no way "a menace to the United States."

Brutus is an active campaigner against the apartheid regime in South Africa and was instrumental in the effort to exclude South Africa from the Olympics. He spoke at Williams on the divestment issue last year. During his visit, he said of Williams that "this institution is involved in what is undoubtedly the most racist society in the world."

MacPherson named Brookings Fellow

Michael S. McPherson, associate professor of economics, has been named Senior Fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington, D.C. He will be on leave to spend two years at the Institution starting in the fall of 1984.

As a staff member at Brookings, McPherson will concentrate on the economics of high education, focusing on issues such as financing, enrollment and the labor market, and their effects on both graduate and undergraduate education. According to McPherson, research at the Brookings Institution is oriented toward public policy and centers on issues on which the government can take action.

McPherson spent the 1981-82 academic year at the Institute for Advanced Studies in Princeton where he did research on problems of ethics and public policy related to education. In 1977 he was named an American Council of Learned Studies Fellow and spent that academic year at Princeton University studying philosophical problems of economics.

Puberty studied

Biology professor Lee Drickamer has been awarded $133,000 by the National Institute of Health to study puberty in mammals. His study, "Factors Affecting Sexual Maturation in Mammals" researches social, genetic, and environmental factors influencing puberty.

The study, which concentrates primarily on rodents, may have some influence on pest control. Drickamer is studying two models of population regulation which may yield results affecting techniques of natural pest control.

Drickamer has been researching sexual maturation in rodents for ten years and has published several papers. He has been at Williams since 1972.

Museum addition draws rave reviews

by Michael Govan

More than 1100 people filled the atrium and new galleries of Lawrence Hall last Saturday night for the long-awaited reopening of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA). The new sales desk was used, not for catalogs and posters, but for cheese, crackers, salmon mousse, and $2000 worth of champagne to celebrate the completion of the $4.5 million addition to the College Museum; this will make the WCMA one of the finest college museums in the country.

The addition was designed by prominent American architect Charles Moore of the Connecticut firm Moore, Grover, and Harper. Construction of the building began in the midst of some controversy. The bid on Moore's original design came in almost 75 percent over budget. Consequently, much of Moore's characteristically whimsical architectural detail, such as a sculpture of a giant golf ball outside the Museum entrance and large screen walls between the Museum and Fayerweather Hall, does not exist as part of the addition. Other, more necessary, features such as a loading dock and a ceiling in the main gallery were also cut, although the College hopes to add those features at a later date.

Engaging environment

The festive atmosphere of the Museum's opening belied any controversy. Museum staff and Art Department faculty were extremely pleased with the way the addition turned out. The Museum's first visitors, as well, gave the building rave reviews. "It's a distinctive and engaging environment which is achieved through a combination of paintings and architecture," said student Peter Massey '85. "You're naturally drawn to it," commented Kathy Howard '84. "It's a place to walk through and enjoy."

Art Professor E.J. Johnson noted how beautifully the building worked with great numbers of people. "The atrium," said Johnson, "was full of commotion—people were talking, laughing, and watching other people. Yet the galleries were relatively quiet. People circulated well and could actually look at the paintings in peace." Johnson remarked that architects Moore and Harper were also pleased with the final product.

The addition provides the WCMA with sophisticated lighting, climate control and security systems, and a great deal of exhibition space, as well as classrooms, offices and a slide room for the Art Department. The addition will allow students many new opportunities for research and museum work. Museum Director Thomas Krens points out the opportunity students will have to be directly involved with exhibition development.

New directions

Some of the new directions the WCMA will take are explored in the opening exhibitions. "The New England Eye: Master American Paintings in New England School, College and University Collections," curated by former WCMA Director Lane Faison, includes works from almost 25 New England Museums. In his catalogue introduction, Professor Faison writes, "Our title 'The New England Eye,' refers to the perceptiveness of the directors and curators in developing their collections as adjuncts to the study of art." Faison will teach a course this semester based on the paintings in the exhibition.

"Selections from the Lawrence H. Bloedel Collection" resides in the two newly renovated galleries of old Lawrence Hall. Before his death in 1976, Lawrence Bloedel provided for the dispersal of his more than 300 examples of American Art in a bequest which allotted half the works to the WCMA and half to the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York. A Williams alumnus, Bloedel had been a resident of Williamstown for 50 years. The exhibition combines many of the paintings in the College's own collection with some from the Whitney Museum's.

Brothers Prendergast

Perhaps the most well-received exhibition was "The Art of Maurice and Charles Prendergast," in the new Maurice and Charles Prendergast Gallery. Included in the show are watercolors and oils by Maurice, and panels by his brother Charles. The gallery will be devoted to Prendergast exhibitions which will change periodically to define certain aspects of the work of the two. The show also marks the beginning of a new undertaking at Williams: The Maurice and Charles Prendergast Systematic Catalogue Project. Under the auspices of the Eugenie Prendergast Foundation, Inc., this effort to research and document the complete works of these two American artists will continue for three or four years, culminating in a fully-illustrated catalogue in several volumes. Dr. Milton W. Brown, the appointed Prendergast Senior Fellow, will serve as Adjunct Professor of Art History at Williams for the duration of the project.

Convocation changes tone and focus

Ceremony marks beginning of year-long Celebration of the Arts

"What do you know of the value of a dollar?" Jason Robards growled at a silent and spellbound audience. Robards delivered his powerful performance while in traditional academic dress on a corner of the Chapin Hall stage at Saturday's Convocation. Robards' reading, and a performance by Janos Starker—in lieu of the more usual Convocation speeches—was a microcosmic representation of this year's Convocation as a whole; it was very different from past convocations and delightfully entertaining.

Variations on a tradition

Convocation was dedicated to Williams' year-long "Celebration of the Arts." So while tradition had its place—the seniors and professors paraded down the aisle of Chapin Hall in their gowns and academic robes; and Robert Morris (in absentia), Alan Schneider, Janos Starker, Jason Robards, Jr. and Twyla Tharp received honorary degrees—the mood was light and untraditional. (At one point, even President Chandler dissolved into laughter.) In keeping with the theme, "Art Works," Starker and Robards delivered polished performances instead of speeches. And, our sober academic community blundered and laughed through a shaky rendition of "The Mountains," our alma mater.

Robards' stirring monologue

Robards presented a very effective dramatic rendition of a monologue from the fourth act of Eugene O'Neill's Long Day's Journey into Night. His portrayal of a father, responding to his son's accusation of being miserly, was well received by the entire audience. The selection dealt with one man's reaction to hardship and his subsequent fears to take risks, his compromise of personal fulfillment for monetary gain and his plea to his son for understanding.

Seniors Kathy Spralitz and Val Difebo share a laugh in a pause at the Convocation ceremony.

Flawless performance

Following this masterful, thought-provoking reading, cellist Starker performed two pieces without accompaniment: the "Prelude to Suite No. 3 in C Major," by J.S. Bach and "Suite for Unaccompanied Cello," by Gaspar Gasado. A fitting juxtaposition of classical and contemporary, these selections captured the mood of Convocation. The Prelude, an 18th century work, was both solemn and joyous, while the Suite, which clearly showed the influence of Eastern European folk tunes and exotic modal harmonies, (a 20th century trend), conveyed both extreme pathos and untrained gaiety. Not only were these selections appropriately fitting, they were also flawlessly executed and well appreciated by the captive audience.

Many people found Convocation to be more enjoyable than they had expected. "It was a lot more entertaining and original than others I had been to," Amy Lewtas '84 remarked. Assistant Professor of Physics William Wooters agreed, noting also that the theme added interest to the ceremony.

Singing and laughing

The lighter mood of the ceremony was enhanced by delightful and oh-so-human elements: The be-gowned and be-tassied seniors—especially the Phi Beta Kappa members—exuded a mix of pride and sheepishness. The professors, sitting properly on stage with rosy faces turned attentively toward the speaker or performer, shyly winked at students and joined in the giggling through "The Mountains." And renowned director Alan Schneider looked like he was having the time of his life; he grinned, smiled, nodded and laughed at everything, pleased as punch and full of genuine delight like a child at Christmas.

Convocation was brought to a close by the final benediction by the Reverend Carol S. Pepper and the customary singing of "The Mountains." Although our rendition of this time-honored song was not as flawless as Starker's cello performance, it was, indeed, as different as this year's convocation itself.

Robert Morris

Robert Morris is considered a pioneer of the minimal sculpture movement. He began his career as a painter and has experimented with many art forms, including video, dance and choreography. He has exhibited in major museums both in this country and abroad and has received many honors, including a Guggenheim Foundation Fellowship in 1969 and the Sculpture Award from the Society of the Four Arts in 1975.

Morris was an Artist-in-Residence at Williams during the 1977 Winter Study period and constructed a large mirrored sculpture which was displayed at the Clark Art Institute.

Alan Schneider

Alan Schneider has played an important role in bringing avant-garde plays to American audiences. He has directed more than 100 productions in the American theatre, including all of Samuel Beckett's plays. He has also directed most of Edward Albee's plays, including "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?," for which he won a Tony award.

Schneider has taught at Catholic University and Boston University and is currently head of the Graduate Directing Program at the University of California at San Diego.

Twyla Tharp

Twyla Tharp, an innovative choreographer, has studied ballet, jazz and modern technique. Since 1971 she has choreographed many pieces for her company of 16 dancers who have performed throughout the United States and Europe and are now in residence at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Tharp has received special commissions from other dance companies, including the Joffrey Ballet and the American Ballet Theatre. She is well known for her work in films such as "Hair" and "Ragtime." Tharp most recently completed an anthology videotape documenting her career from 1965 to the present.

Janos Starker

Janos Starker, born in Hungary, was a child prodigy who began playing the cello at age 6, instructed younger students at 8, and first played professionally at 14. When he first came to the United States in 1948 he had already established himself as principal cellist of the Budapest Opera and Philharmonic and as a promising soloist.

Before going to teach at Indiana University in 1958, he served as principal cellist with the Dallas Opera Orchestra, the New York Metropolitan Opera and the Chicago Symphony. Today he is considered one of the world's finest performers and has recorded most of the literature for cello.

World Premiere

New work marks Trio's longevity

by Alfred Haft

The Williams Trio opened its 1983-1984 season last Thursday with a world premiere of Benjamin Lees' "Trio for Piano, Violin, and Cello" and Beethoven's "Archduke Trio." The members of the Williams Trio are: Julius Hegyl, violin; Douglas Moore, cello; and, Paula Ennis-Dwyer, piano.

At the concert on Thursday, the Williams Trio performed Lees' work twice, in order to give it a chance to grow on the audience.

Special commission

Lees wrote his piece as a special commission for the Williams Trio after the members contacted him in early 1982. Moore, cellist for the Trio since its founding in 1970, felt that, after thirteen years, it was time the group performed a piece which would establish them in the eyes of a larger audience. They concentrated on well-known American composers, and finally selected Benjamin Lees.

Lees' artistic goals

In a brief talk between the two renditions, Lees commented that despite some maintenance of tonality, "the twentieth century has changed the concept of idea and theme. In the Classical Era, you had a theme stated, then a second theme, and then a recapitulation. I want to present one long idea, and within it, have many smaller themes which can be immediately developed. I want you always to feel that something has happened. Development comes and goes with ideas without having a formal 'development section.'"

The "Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello" is divided into two sections—a "slow" section and a "forceful" section. The piece has a thicker, more familiar sound than much contemporary music because, as Lees explained, the piece is tonal. Through themes and variations, the music always returned to a tonal center.

Lees was born in 1924 in China to Russian parents. He came to the United States when still young, and began studying piano almost immediately. After winning a Fromm Foundation award in 1953, and, later, Guggenheim and Fulbright fellowships, he went to Europe to continue his studies. Since then he has received numerous commissions including pieces for the Tokyo String Quartet, the American Symphony Orchestra, and the Dallas Symphony, and is now working on a solo piece for pianist Emanuel Ax.

Sunday, the Williams Trio gave a repeat performance at Simon's Rock of Bard College in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, and will play Lees' piece again at SUNY Geneseo on September 25.

"Lianna" opens Gaudino Forum

"Gay at the movies; gay at Williams"

by Benjamin Duke

Writer/director John Sayles '72 and producer Maggie Renzi '73 fielded a variety of questions about their careers and their latest film, Lianna, Sunday afternoon from a full house in Bronfman Hall. The discussion followed a showing of the controversial and critically applauded film about two women's homosexual relationship.

Even after deciding to produce the film, Renzi said, it took were questions informally, often jokingly, on scattered topics ranging from his treatment of lesbians in Lianna to general questions about the film industry.

Even after deciding to produce the film, Renzi said, it took her about 18 months to raise enough funds for a candid film that, as Sayles put it, "Nobody really wanted to see." News women's groups Renzi approached were reluctant to support the filming of a screenplay written by a man.

During the course of the dis-

Sayles said he set the film on a close-knit university campus, "a setting where your job is also your community." News spreads quickly there; a friend initially snubs Lianna, and her husband loses an important academic appointment.

"When you're gay," Sayles remarked, "There's always this wondering, 'Do they know?,' should they know?," and does it make any difference?"

That insecurity, he said, helped him guide his interest in how the characters are "paying in different ways" for the choices they make. Lianna suffers "every little day" during her marriage, Sayles said, but the alternative is the anguish of an opprobrious affair that doesn't last.

Though Lianna's first gay affair falls apart, Sayles agreed in response to a question that the film ends optimistically, skirting issues of job and child custody discrimination often suffered by lesbians.

"It's optimistic in that I didn't want it to turn into the well of loneliness...I feel that anything you choose to do, you have to pay. So I didn't want it to turn into melodrama."

'Do they know?, should they know? and does it make any difference?'

Flume clogs Baxter

by Jack Mayher

No one seems to care that it conserves water. No one seems to care how much money it will save the College. Most students just think it is disgusting. Call it what you will, the flume—a new dish-washing monstrosity in the Baxter dining room—looks like it is here to stay.

For anyone who has not yet experienced it, the flume is a long trough full of flowing water into which students are now required to dump their scraps and mess after meals. They also have to load their dishes onto moving racks on a conveyer belt.

Students seem united in opposing the flume. For the most part, complaints center on its slowness and its general unattractiveness. "It ruins your meal," said Debbie Semel '86. "To have to throw your food in there with everyone else's, and then to have it all over your hands with nothing to clean it off with—it's just gross."

In the past, students were required only to drop off their trays at separate windows on the north and south sides of Baxter, but both windows have been eliminated. Instead, lines of students now wind through both doors and converge on the central flume area.

Although watchful Food Service employees try to herd the students on at a rapid pace, the flume has caused delays of up to 20 minutes at lunchtime.

Kathy Hewitt '85, a Mission Park resident, summed up the opinion of many upperclassmen "I'm just glad that I don't have to eat there much."

The College installed three new dishwashers over the summer because the old ones simply wore out, according to Jim Hodgkins, Director of Food Services. He said the high bacteria counts found in some campus kitchens last year during a routine health check were probably caused by the old machines not functioning properly.

The other two new dishwashers, in Greylock and Driscoll, don't have flumes because installing them there would have required extensive renovation of both buildings, Hodgkins explained.

Hodgkins said the inconvenience the Baxter flume causes is well worth it when one considers it saves "over $20,000 a year in labor costs alone," he said.

Hodgkins said the use of the machine will cut out one full-time job and four student jobs in the Baxter dishroom. Student workers are no longer needed to load dishes into the machine, but they still have to unload it when it finishes.

However, those same shifts are easily made up because there are chronic shortages in manpower in the rest of the food service system, Hodgkins said.

Hodgkins said he believes the delays will decrease as students "become educated" in the flume's use.

However, a food service worker who asked not to be named disagreed, saying the lines will persist. "The trouble is that now both sides have to funnel into one dish area," he said.

Hodgkins described how the flume saves energy because it does not run all the time. When not loaded it can idle, yielding energy savings of up to 85 percent, he said. The machine will also save money because it recycles water. A regular garbage disposal wastes "about 1.25 million gallons of water a year," Hodgkins said.

The College may even be able to profit from the flume's refuse. The trough carries food, paper and waste water to a machine which grinds it into pulp. Food Service might be able to sell the pulp as garden mulch, although there are no such plans as yet, Hodgkins said.

Reaction was mixed to Pepsi's summer takeover of the dining hall soda concession . . . but the flume got looks like this from everyone. (Finnemore and Shapiro)

"No Coke--Pepsi!"

Williams students returned to campus this semester to find themselves victims of the Pepsi Challenge. During the summer Pepsi, Diet Pepsi and Mountain Dew replaced Coke, Tab and Sprite as the sodas of choice in the dining halls of the College.

Student reaction has been mixed, but Coke and Tab lovers have been the most vocal in their opposition. Senior Orrin Murray said "vehement" was not a strong enough word to express his opposition to the change.

"Let's talk incomparable," Murray fumed. "One is not a cola. I understand that Mountain Dew has more caffeine than any other soft drink. I will not drink that. I will not drink Pepsi. I want my Coke."

Need tinted glasses

"We should go back to Coke," said Andy McElfresh '85. "But if Pepsi is going to stay we should at least get tinted glasses for the Mountain Dew. It looks too much like urine."

"I need my Tab," said diet drinker Madeline Hughes '86. "Even the Diet Pepsi drinker isn't satisfied."

Director of Food Service Jim Hodgkins, who claims to find no difference in taste between Coke and Pepsi, said that Pepsi made him an offer which was better than the one he was getting from Coke, both in terms of price and service.

Better service?

With the machines being serviced directly by Pepsi's distributor, Mohawk Beverages in Pittsfield, Hodgkins hopes that the service will be better than Coke's, whose machines are serviced through the company itself.

Pepsi had never challenged Coke's domination of Williams before. "They [the companies] were not set up to be competitive," Hodgkins said.

Recently, however, Pepsi has become very aggressive in their marketing, picking up such dining empires as Burger King and Burger Chef as well as Williams' Food Service.

But Coke, Tab, and Sprite fans should not lose hope. Hodgkins said that if Coke comes to him with a better offer, Coke once again, could be it.

New gym springs forth

by John Clayton and Jeff Brainard

Ground-breaking on the new gym is scheduled for the spring of 1984, as the College has already authorized design drawings and raised $7 million out of the total $10 million estimated price tag for the building.

Plans call for the gym and swimming pool to be housed in a T-shaped building located south of the squash courts and stretching down Spring Street.

The basketball court will front on Spring Street and extend south behind the Adams Building, which houses Hart's Pharmacy, McClelland's Stationery and Salvatore's. It will have a brick facade similar to the Adams Building.

The basketball facility will have a seating capacity of 1800. Lasell Gymnasium, which houses the current basketball court, was built in 1886, five years before basketball was invented. The new court will be used for varsity games and can also be divided into two practice courts.

The building will also include coaches' offices and possibly locker rooms; the College also plans to rent out commercial space on the first floor, on Spring Street.

The new 50-meter swimming pool will be nestled between the gym and Lansing Chapman hockey rink. The pool will have seating for 500.

William Reed, treasurer and vice-president of the College, explained that Williamstown's zoning laws would have prohibited stacking the pool and gym on top of each other.

"As one building it would have been about 70 feet high," Reed said. "It would have dominated the town...and have been the only thing you'd see. And it would have obscured Lawrence Hall."

Buildings demolished

To make room for the gym, the College will have to tear down Drummond's Cleaners, the Williams News Room, and Goodman's Jewelers, according to Winthrop M. Wassenar, director of physical plant. The College owns both buildings.

Those businesses will probably be able to relocate to a commercial office building the College is planning to build at the south end of Spring Street, between the American Legion and the Travel Store, by this spring, Reed said. (See Spring Street story, pg. 1.)

College officials had thought they might have to tear down the Adams Building to make way for the gym. But the current plan no longer requires its destruction.

Initially, the architects also had problems fitting the pool between the gym and hockey rink. But according to Reed, the College bargained with the Post Office to acquire a 22-foot wide strip of land running down the rear of the Post Office's land.

In return for the rear plot, the College will swap a strip of college-owned land down the Post Office driveway, behind the Record Store.

"The postmaster didn't mind [the swap], he just needed some place to pile snow in the wintertime," Reed said. "He's been a true citizen for us. He supported the whole idea."

Conte slashes bureaucracy

However, Reed noted that the U.S. Postal Service had to approve the swap. At first he feared the project would be held up in the bureaucracy—"it looked like a good year until we could get a decision," Reed said.

Then U.S. Representative Silvio Conte, who represents Williamstown, intervened. "He really speeded things up," Reed said.

President John Chandler said, "We've already raised over seven million of the ten million dollars needed, and I'm very confident that we will be able to raise the rest by the springtime."

Chandler said a large portion of the money came from a $750,000 grant from The Kresge Foundation, which also gave Williams a large grant to help build Lawrence Hall.

"It's a very large grant, and it was a little bit surprising that we got it," Reed said.

Wassenar said they are now consulting with architects to determine how to use the old space in Lasell. "We're pretty sure that the upstairs gym will be used for a dance studio," Wassenar said. "Our questions now involve the pool and the locker rooms, depending on how much locker room space we decide to put in the new facility," Wassenar said.

Coaches' News Space shuffle—

Dick Farley was named New England Indoor Track Coach of the Year by the New England Track Coaches Association this summer.

Last winter's Williams squad, under Farley and four assistants, amassed a 10-0 record, including a win over strong Division II Springfield College.

While Farley was pleased with the performances of individual stars like Tomas Alejandro '83 and Bo Parker '84, he attributed the Ephs' success to the team's depth.

Joseph Dailey, wrestling coach, offensive line coach for the football team, and assistant professor of physical education, is spending the academic year at the University of New Mexico.

Dailey is working on his Ph.D. in physical education and teaching in the undergraduate physical education program at UNM.

Dailey will also be a member of the New Mexico football staff, working under coach Bill Dunn as a graduate assistant.

This year's annual fund-raising drive kicks off on October 1, and in spite of what he called "minor inconveniences," Director of Annual Giving Bob Behr said he expects "another spectacular fund."

"[Since] we couldn't have moved a month ago, I'm glad we're moving when the fund is just getting underway," Behr explained.

Jesup to be gutted

As soon as the offices in Jesup have moved, the building will be "completely gutted" to make way for the College computer center, according to College Treasurer William Reed.

The building will be totally rebuilt inside, with two new stairways and an elevator added. The Jesup auditorium will be demolished and separated into rooms on two floors, Reed said.

However, he stressed, the building will "retain unique architectural features. It won't be a cold building; it'll have some character, to let you know the building had a past."

The renovation of Jesup Hall is being done by the Joseph Fontaine Brothers of Springfield, who also built the Lawrence Hall addition.

Other offices which were formerly in Jesup have already relocated. The coaches are now in Jenness House behind the chemistry building; Pooh Perplex has moved to the basement of Weston Language Center; and the 1914 library now occupies the basement of Greylock Dining Hall.

Director of Career Counseling Fatma Kassamali said she feels very positive about her office's move.

"We don't feel downgraded at all," she said. "The new facility has more space and has been recently redecorated. Our library looks more like a real library. The administration has met all our needs."

Football stands attract fans

Home fans will have "the best seats in the house."

(Khakee)

A new press box and stands on the west side of the football field will be completed within a week and used for the first game September 24, according to Public Information Director Ray Boyer and Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar.

Williams fans will now sit on the west side, which will have 800 more seats than last year, Boyer said.

"Now our fans will get the best seats in the house," Boyer said. "Since those seats are on a hill, you'll be able to sit in the first row and see over the players."

The new press box is just as long as the old one but is three stories high. The ground level will be used for storage of maintenance equipment while the second level will be for print media and the press box crew. The third level will feature seven booths to be used for team spotters, visiting scouts, and radio broadcasts. There will be a platform for film crews on the roof.

The new press box will also feature opening glass windows and a heating system. Louis Allegrone, Inc. of Pittsfield is the contractor on the job.

A real stadium

Boyer said that the stands on the north end of the field, by the concession stand, will not be put up this year for aesthetic reasons. "It looks like a real football stadium when you go down there now," Boyer said.

Three new faces in Hopkins Hall

by Lucy Lytle

The College's Dean Team has a new line-up this year, with political science professor David Colby starting off as Dean of Freshmen. Newcomer Shella Spear will be Assistant Dean for exchanges, replacing Nancy McIntire who has moved on to become Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action.

The Record talked to the three last week as they settled into their new jobs.

"You have to have both a rapport with them and some distance," said Colby of the relationship he expects to have with students. "You have to be able to understand what's going on with them, feel empathy for what's going on in their lives, and have the distance to direct them."

Colby said he has not felt any conflict of interest in fulfilling his responsibilities as both a dean and a teacher but he admitted his schedule is "hectic." He said he feels his primary responsibilities are "to keep that academic level and excitement going."

"Psychological insight"

Colby declined to comment on what he thinks are the biggest worries and concern freshmen have to face, because he said he didn't want to start a self-fulfilling prophecy.

But he did say that he thinks the new freshmen class is "a very exciting group. From a teacher's perspective, they seem to be active in class. It is a very talented group of people."

When Colby was appointed to the new position last April, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor noted that Colby had "psychological insight and maturity." O'Connor also indicated that Colby's chairmanship of the Colby Committee on sexual harassment last year was an important consideration in his appointment.

McIntire's new job

As Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations, McIntire will be particularly concerned with hiring. Continued on Page 7

Campus revitalized over summer; New sidewalks, fences abound

by Sarah Abernathy

The College has spent more than $335,000 on renovation and beautification projects during this summer and fall.

One of the most visible changes is the revamped Freshman Quad. $60,000 was spent to put in new sidewalks, sod, blacktop and fences.

A second layer of pavement will be laid this week, according to Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar. The base coat was put down before students arrived to give the Quad a semi-finished look, he said.

"We put sod down so that people could get on it soon. Once the ropes are off, people should be able to play frisbee again," he added.

Speaking at Convocation last weekend, President John Chandler offered another explanation for why the Quad was renovated. "Recognizing how much alcohol and other toxic substances had been spilled there, we decided that the area needed a clean up," he said.

"I wouldn't want to subject that soil to too careful a chemical analysis," Chandler said in a subsequent interview.

Gargoyle fence

A new addition to the Freshman Quad is a replica of the famous Gargoyle Fence located in the Science Quad and along Chapin Hall Drive. The fence, with its broad railing, provides a good seating place as well as protecting the Quad from vehicular invasion," Chandler said.

New sidewalks can be found all over campus, including one in front of Lasell Gym, which was an $18,000 effort partially funded by the town. There is another new sidewalk outside the Admissions Office.

The five-year-old waffle path in front of Morgan Hall was finally replaced, too. "Two summers ago two students spent three weeks on their hands and knees filling the little holes with dirt and then cutting sod to fit. Then it all sank again and it got so muddy that people walked on both sides of the path but not on it," Wassenar explained.

Accompanying the new Alumni/Faculty Center is a $115,000 landscaping plan which will include a parking lot between St. John's Church and Woodbridge House. St. John's will use the new lot on Sundays, Wassenar said.

Some smelly problems

While digging a ditch last week behind Adams Memorial Theatre, workers hit a sewage pipe, creating an aromatic ambience around the new addition.

"It [the ditch] is for drainage from the new parking lots, and one problem digging on an old campus like this is that you never know what you'll hit," Wassenar said.

More sprucing up is slated for the campus later this year. The College will transplant about 25 trees from Hopkins Forest and $5000 worth of planting will be put in around Sawyer Library.

A plan calling for a circular driveway in front of Lawrence Hall has been temporarily put off due to a lack of funds, but will eventually be a concrete reality, Wassenar promised.

Students pack the house at Mission Park

by Tim Johnson

College dormitories are bursting at the seams, due to a number of miscalculations by the College and the resulting growth of the on-campus student body to 1,981, the highest in Williams' history.

The overcrowding has hit Mission Park the worst. In its scramble for bed space, the College was forced to assign 28 students to live in living rooms in Mission Park in late August.

Although most of them have since been relocated or have moved off-campus, eight students are still living in such makeshift arrangements.

"Certainly this problem was a fluke," asserted Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. "It occurred as a result of both the low rate of attrition and the relatively small number of students who decided to study abroad."

Returning students

In calculating the amount of space available for housing, the Dean's Office made three miscalculations. Last winter the deans estimated that 115 students would either study overseas or take time off this year. However, 11 of those students decided not to go abroad after all.

In addition, the deans anticipated that 25 students would return to the campus after having taken leaves of absence. However, 35 students returned after taking time off last semester.

The deans also expected that many transfer applicants would enroll. Thirty-two transfers enrolled—seven over the projected number of 25.

Finally, a number of students who expected to live off campus were frustrated when the owners of three houses which were previously up for rent withdrew those houses from the market over the summer, forcing the students to return to campus.

Door taken off

Dean Mary Kenyatta said Mission Park had to house all the students who were without rooms this fall because it is the only house whose living room doors can be locked.

Wendy Hopkins, Director of Student Housing, said that although Mission residents often plan to use extra rooms in their suites as living rooms, the College doesn't guarantee that it won't fill such rooms. She also said she thinks the relocation is progressing smoothly.

Phillip Holmes '86, one of those offered a chance to move out of a living room into another Mission room, does not think the relocation is running so smoothly. Holmes has been relocated twice. The first room to which he was assigned was a room that five other students had been using as a living room. When he tried to move into the room, he found that the door had been removed.

"It seems to me that the people living there took it off so that I couldn't live there," Holmes said. "As soon as I saw that, I

Hard to study

The library, mundane as it may seem, is probably the most widely-used resource on the campus. Given its popularity and the need for adequate study space, even small administrative changes become important to the student body.

That's why one recent decision concerning scheduling is worthy of our attention. Following recommendations from a variety of sources, most notably the Gargoyle Society, the Library Committee extended this year's weekday library hours from eleven to midnight. This shows, contrary to prevailing student opinion, that student input can affect library policy. The Library Committee and Gargoyle deserve our thanks.

Yet with the new hours came some new restrictions. For one, the direct-access stairway to the lower level has been closed-off in order to reduce the theft of books from Sawyer. Second, the Van Alstyne Lounge now closes at one a.m., in order to reduce vandalism. Finally, the lower level closing time has not been restored to its past level of two a.m.

The reasons given for the the stairway closure and the elimination of the all-night lounge are valid. It is maddening, however, that no warnings were issued, no new regulations promulgated for comment. Changing the rules without the consent or prior knowledge of those affected reflects a parental attitude which should make students feel uncomfortable.

The loss of the Van Alstyne Lounge means that the campus now lacks any late-night coffee and study facilities, a loss which will become more severe as the year continues. The College ought either to reopen Van Alstyne Lounge or provide an all-night alternative.

Input now

The College has announced that it intends to renovate Baxter Hall. Unlike the Alumni Center, the theater addition, and the proposed building on Spring Street, Baxter Hall affects almost every student every day.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) is now gathering ideas for what to do with Baxter, which is heavily but inefficiently used. Students have the opportunity to offer their suggestions now before plans are finalized.

The most obvious fault with Baxter is the mailroom. Twisted angles, narrow halls and limited access make it difficult to get one's mail, and even more difficult to get out.

Other, less obvious, problems include underuse of the Rathskellar and the entire basement, unused first floor space, and cramped student activity space (meaning, of course, the Record office, as well as the Outing Club space).

The question is not so much what is wrong, but what should be done. Ideas range from video games to computer terminals, more mail room to more telephones, an informal performing space to an all-night student lounge for studying or relaxing.

The current ideas are interesting, but incomplete. The CUL stands, arms open, waiting for the students to speak. Williams students have proven themselves able to express opposition to existing policy. It's time to count ourselves in while its anybody's ballgame.

Mockery

To the editor:

As a recent graduate of Williams, I feel obligated to comment on the offensive, elitist attitude exhibited in the Record's most recent publication of What's What (sic). Although most of the contents may have been published in jest, for an institution of higher learning that is supposed to promote higher truths and values, the mockery of less fortunate, economically depressed communities such as North Adams and Pittsfield is in poor taste to say the least.

Is it Williams's intention to impose this "snooty" attitude upon incoming freshmen? I sincerely hope this is not the case. If Williams is supposedly cultivating many of the future leaders of our society, this condescending attitude displayed in What's What reflects a lack of compassion that could prove to be a grave deficiency for those persons in positions of power.

I apologize to my friends that reside in North Adams and Pittsfield for your cheap journalism. Your snobbery is definitely not shared by all Williams students and alumni.

Marcos' power in the Philippines threatened by Aquino assassination

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

The assassination last month of the chief political opponent of Ferdinand Marcos, who is the president of the Philippines, and the reaction to the killing caused, have raised serious questions about Marcos' ability to continue his authoritarian rule.

Because there is evidence that Marcos may have been involved in the killing of the popular leader, observers think Marcos is in danger of going the way of the Shah, whose U.S.-supported regime fell before a popular uprising.

Marcos' rule has lasted since 1965, and included nine years of martial law. But critics charge that liberties in the Philippines are just as threatened today as before 1981, when Marcos ended martial law.

Marcos' regime has been cited by Amnesty International as one of the world's most flagrant violators of human rights. It has charged that government troops and security agents have illegally detained, tortured or killed hundreds of people in the last 18 months.

The internal stability of the Philippines is critical to the geopolitical interests of the United States in the area, so not surprisingly the U.S. has propped up Marcos' dictatorship with massive economic and military aid. The Philippines are home for the massive Subic Bay Naval Base and Clark Air Force Base, which are the staging points for American military presence in Southeast Asia, and even Africa and the Middle East.

Growing opposition

With no foreign powers threatening his borders and with the U.S. Seventh Fleet sitting in his backyard, Marcos has been able to use the growing American military aid almost entirely for internal repression. In 1972 his military budget was $82 million; in 1981 it was $862 million.

However, there has been growing opposition to Marcos and a group of approximately 10,000 armed Communist guerrillas, who call themselves the New People's Army, is fighting with government forces throughout the country. The NPA's umbrella organization, the National Democratic Front, has been aided by radical clerics and businessmen, and there are many as 150,000 other Filipinos prepared to provide food, shelter and assistance to the guerrillas. Observers also believe the military

President Ferdinand Marcos

Philippines' capitol city, and ended three years of self-imposed exile in the U.S.

Aquino became the leader of the opposition Liberal Party in the late '60s and criticized Marcos, who was elected president in free elections held in 1965. Marcos was reelected in 1969, amid charges that the election was rigged. Aquino prepared to run for president in the 1973 election against Marcos, even though the Philippines' American-style Constitution limits the president to two four-year terms.

But the election was never held. Marcos declared martial law in 1972 and canceled the election. Critics charged he did so to silence challenges to the legitimacy of his continuing as president, and also because polls showed that he would lose to Aquino.

Aquino was then arrested on trumped-up charges of murder and subversion, and was sentenced to death in 1977. But Marcos allowed him to leave the Philippines and travel to the U.S. in 1980 for a heart operation. Aquino stayed in this country until last month, teaching at MIT and continuing to criticize Marcos. Aquino decided to return in the hope of persuading Marcos to institute some kind of democratic reforms. He met with Marcos' wife and chief aide, Imelda, last May in New York to discuss his plans. At that time Imelda reportedly warned Aquino that if he returned to the Philippines he was marked for death by "certain allies of the president who couldn't be controlled."

Aware of threat

Aquino was apparently well-aware of the threat but continued anyway. He did put on a bullet-proof vest before arriving in the Philippines. On board the plane, he said "if it is my place to die from an assassin's bullet, so be it. I have to suffer with my people. I have to lead them."

He was to suffer only moments after his arrival in Manila. As he was led off the plane by airport security guards, he was shot in the back of the head at point blank range with a .357 magnum revolver. The troops then instantly killed a man standing on the tarmac, dressed in overalls and holding a revolver in his hand, in a hail of gunfire.

Government officials subsequently stuck to a "lone gunman" theory, claiming the assailant, identified as a former member of the presidential palace guard, had somehow slipped past airport security. Marcos appeared on national television to deny responsibility for the killing, calling it "an outrageous and heinous crime," and called for an investigation of the shooting.

But facts gathered subsequently have convinced observers in the Philippines and abroad that it is extremely unlikely that Marcos was telling the truth.

Lone gunman?

Perhaps most damaging to Marcos was the report of a Japanese journalist who was on Aquino's plane and who watched him disembark. He said that as the security guards led Aquino off the plane, they drew their own revolvers and shot him. The journalist also said he saw troops push the man in overalls out of an Army truck and towards the plane, and then shoot him.

A subsequent examination of Aquino's body showed that the bullet had entered from a position at least six inches above him—i.e., a position occupied by a trailing security guard. But the alleged assassin was shorter than Aquino.

The security forces cannot claim that the attack came as a total surprise. Massive security precautions have been in force at the airport since 1981, when Pope John Paul II landed at Manila for a pastoral visit. Nor should the assailant have been able to discover the exact time and location where Aquino would arrive, because that information was supposedly secret.

The depth of the popular support that existed for Aquino was evident at his funeral. Between 500,000 and 1 million people turned out to march in or watch his funeral procession down one of Manila's main boulevards. Some of them vocally accused Marcos of the murder.

With Aquino gone the remaining moderate leaders have probably been frightened into silence, leaving it possible that the general populace will be driven towards the Communists. Marcos evidently has not failed to recognize how possible this is, and as a result is depending on the Reagan administration for support.

President Reagan had scheduled a state visit to Indonesia, Korea and Japan for November, and originally did not plan to stop in the Philippines. But Marcos, conscious of the influence to be gained from such a visit, virtually begged him to come, and even held the threat over Reagan of interfering with future negotiations to renew the U.S. lease of the land used by the military bases. So Reagan added the Philippines to his itinerary.

In the wake of Aquino's slaying, Philippine dissidents and Americans—including some Congressmen—have called on Reagan to cancel his trip until the investigation of the killing is completed. Despite some characteristic confusion voiced by Reagan, his press secretary Larry Speakes was quick to correct him and say that the trip was still on. The State Department is agreeing with the Philippine government's "lone gunman" theory, although it is calling for a thorough investigation.

The U.S.'s willingness to placate Marcos is indicative of his political power. And its complete overlooking of his repressive policies was best summed up by Vice President George Bush, who told Marcos at a state dinner last July that "we love your adherence to democratic principles and to the democratic processes." Although Marcos is very dependent on U.S. aid, he is also a puppet who can pull back on the strings of those holding him. His key bargaining chip is the U.S. bases.

U.S. bases

The bases have existed since the U.S. wrested control of the Philippines from Spain at the turn of the century. The bases were built up during World War II and although technically leased to the U.S. since then, have remained virtual American fiefdoms.

But Marcos has permitted such autonomy at the cost of increasingly greater demands for U.S. aid. The Reagan administration has recently completed negotiations for a total of $900 million in aid to Marcos over the next five years. Of that, $125 million is in direct military assistance. The lease agreement for the bases themselves expires in 1991.

The U.S. government has shown how strongly it wants to keep the bases through Secretary of State George Shultz's gesture of consulting with opposition groups, in the event that Marcos is forced out and they come to power.

Welcome Back Williams

Grand Union is changing.

Once in a while, a company will make an important change which is in its own interest and which also becomes a great benefit to the people of the community.

We have been considered a somewhat high priced store. We don't want to be that. We will be a low priced store, and completely competitive to the lowest leading supermarket in your community. We'll increase our sales so that we can speed up our expansion and modernization plans.

We are reducing our regular prices to match those of our lowest leading supermarket competitor in all our communities. This is not a price war, but we will match them no matter how low they go. And that is a permanent change.

We felt that many may not believe this. "Just another promotion" is what they'll think. (Of course, we'll still have our Red Dot Weekly Specials—even more of them.)

But this they can believe.

We will publish, every week, for every store, over 9,000 regular prices in a booklet called the Grand Union Consumer Price Finder. It will be free to all to take home, to use in shopping at any supermarket, to help shoppers shop intelligently. It will be printed weekly with updated prices, and organized for easy use.

We believe it will be of enormous benefit to you, and we hope it will help us as well.

Come to Grand Union for your free Price Finder. You don't have to buy a thing to get it. But if you do, you'll like our lower prices.

I woke up and it was cold

by Vernon Squires

This past Thursday, the alarm clock's infernal screeching brought my blissful sleeping to a dispirited end. Four classes, starting at eight. Then it hit me. Suddenly, fiercely. It was cold. Not like September, but rather like the frigid dawn of late November. I sought cover and closed my eyes, hoping it all might go away. It did not. I switched on WCFM; the DJ remarked that he had seen frost on his way to the radio station. That one pierced the armor. It looked like a tough day.

Cold eggs

Breakfast at Baxter confirmed that misery loves company. From "It's cold as ----" to "What happened to summer?" students grumbled over

Some had it worse than I. Enter the cry, "The showers are freezing...I can't believe it." Ah, Freshmen. Reality hits hard, especially when it takes the guise of the north wind. And it is true. Hot showers are a myth for many here on cold mornings.

Complaining aside, Williams students were prepared for the onslaught of cold. Outfits from L.L. Bean and Land's End arrived in force, creating a sea of ragg and shetland sweaters. Prep-pies, after all, delight in cold weather.

Scarves and shorts

Still, my calendar showed that this first "brisk" day was only September 15, a fact precipitating visual surprises. While purchasing a paper I came across a man who was fighting the cold with all he had. Heavy corduroys, a Maine Guide shirt, hat and gloves, and even a scarf. A scarf! Granted, the mercury hovered near forty, but a scarf? This seemed excessive.

Bustling toward the science quad, I saw a friend clad only in shorts and a t-shirt. Either Miller Night at the Log still held him captive, or he hailed from the Yukon. He explained, however, the rationality of his garb.

"Think positive"

"It's all psychological," he informed me. "You mustn't give in yet, or it's all over. Think positive."

Luckily, as the day wore on, the sun restored a proper sense of fall to Williams. It actually turned out to be a beautiful day, prompting an optimistic group of Morgan residents to play shirtless touch football. A hardy lot, these freshmen, but I admired their approach. And maybe, just maybe, there will be an Indian Summer. Then again, it could be time to pick up another blanket.

"Reality hits hard, especially when it takes the guise of the north wind" the latest meteorological surprise. Indeed, it seemed scarcely possible that shorts and t-shirts were in vogue just the day before. Now, the warm summer sun was AWOL. And with it was my morale, which further sunk as I hunkered down to appropriately cold eggs.

Owners react to shuffle Financing of move remains uncertain

by Kathi Rosenbaum

The new gym complex to be built toward the north end of Spring Street will mean improved athletic facilities for Williams students, but what will it mean for the storeowners who must move because of it?

For the Goodmans, owners of Goodman's Jewelers, the new gym will mean an end to the store they have owned for ten years and had refurbished themselves. In effect, they must set up their new store, merchandise aside, from scratch.

Karen Goodman tries to remain optimistic about the task that lies before them, yet notes, "No move is easy. When it actually happens it's going to be a lot of work and concentrated effort."

Despite the amount of work that the move will entail on the part of the storeowners, "they were not participants in the decision," according to President John Chandler.

The College owns the buildings that must be razed in order to make way for the gym. Consequently, in going ahead with the plans, "we couldn't afford to give veto rights to tenants," states Chandler.

To Williams's credit, all the storeowners agree that the College serves as a decent landlord. Bill Paradise, owner of the Williams News Room, attests, "One thing about the College—they never hurt you as far as I'm concerned."

Vice-President and Treasurer William Reed remarks, "We have a reputation for being a very generous landlord," stressing the College's attempt to be as fair as possible to the dislocated storeowners.

Although the owners have known about the move since last May—Jim Drummond says that he knew about it as far back as 1975 when he sold his dry cleaning plant to the College—uncertainty remains regarding the details of relocation, including the question of whether the College will finance the cost of the move.

For Drummond, the move will actually be an improvement, as opposed to a major inconvenience. "It will turn out better for me—with the move I'll have a smaller and more efficient plant," he explains, glad to leave behind his outmoded 1930's plant.

Paradise, however, is presented with the problem of where he will move until the shopping level of the new gym is completed. He is emphatic, though, about not moving to the south end of Spring Street since the walk-in customers of the College are essential for his business.

Though relocation may be a hassle, from the College's standpoint the new gym is a necessity, and as Chandler points out, "It's remarkable that we're disturbing only three businesses instead of eight or so."

Don't let the sign fool you. (Ruderman)

'Free parking' but no shopping

by John Clayton

As the visitor drives through Williamstown, a sign reaches out and grabs his attention—"Shopping District," the new sign says.

The visitor has driven through Williamstown before, and has been tempted by the advertisements of "Post Office" and "Free Parking" in "The Village Beautiful". He has, however, resisted the temptation until now.

Intrigue

The "Shopping District" sign intrigues him, especially since he has just driven past a Burger King, a Grand Union and a Berkshire Clothing outlet. If these stores are not in the Shopping District, then that Shopping District really must be something special.

Besides, the visitor reasons, he wants to buy some stuff. Like some balloons, and bubble-blowing equipment for his daughter's birthday next week. And some scrimshaw—he has a small scrimshaw collection in his living room. Some home appliances. And some Chinese food, or maybe Italian.

So the visitor turns down Spring Street, and takes advantage of that much advertised "Free Parking".

Although he isn't interested in sporting goods, there is something in one store that catches his eye: jock straps with Purple Cows on them. A gift, the visitor thinks, for the man who has everything. Unfortunately, he knows no such men.

He still craves a nice Italian lunch—maybe a small dish of scampi, or even a calzone—but, for some reason he doesn't try Colonial Pizza.

Scrimshaw search

He tries the Williams News Room, McClelland's Stationery and Hart's Pharmacy, but none are able to fulfill his bubble- or balloon-blowing needs. (Less surprisingly, none have any scrimshaw, or Chinese food.)

A store name catches his eye: The House of Walsh.

"Just," he thinks, "what I need: a Walsh." But upon examination he finds they have no Walshes for sale, only clothes.

Salvatore's, Hopkins Furniture, both bookstores and a couple of other quaint little shops he peers into are also deficient in scrimshaw, and Chinese food. He does find a small selection of party accessories (but no balloons), and he even finds an appliance or two in Hopkin's Furniture, but he feels limited. "This is not quite what I had in mind."

Name brand bubbles

He sees a building blocking the road—the signs on the front of the building say something about Chet the barber and a special Treat. "Aha!" he thinks. "The road must turn here and the real shopping district will begin. There'll be a big shopping center, with a Sears (for my home appliances), and five different convenience stores each with their own brand of balloons and bubble-blowing equipment. "And there'll be a cute little area with funny old people selling their own scrimshaw and carvings and paintings and outdoorsy stuff."

Multitudes

"In fact, when I go around that corner there'll be a whole bunch of signs pointing to districts. "Restaurant District" (for my Chinese food, or maybe Italian), "College District"... "Nightlife district"... "Financial district"... "Tourist district"..."

By now he has reached the corner. He peers around eagerly. He sees a football field. "Best darn football field in Division III," a student murmurs as he walks by. "It looks like a real stadium now."

"Excuse me," the visitor says. "I seem to have misplaced the Shopping District."

"Didn't you see the jock straps with purple cows on them back there?" the student responds.

The visitor nods dumbly.

"Well, good grief, man, what more do you want?"

Bill Paradise's Williams News Room derives much of its business from walk-ins at its prime Spring Street location.

Library open until midnight

by John Calderon

Some noticeable changes in Sawyer Library's hours and security measures greeted returning students this fall, including the extension of its hours until midnight and the closing of its Van Alstyne lounge at 1 AM.

The main floors will now be open until midnight, Sunday through Thursday. But the lower level hours have been cut back one hour, from 2 to 1 AM on those days, and the Van Alstyne student lounge, which in the past was open 24 hours, will close at 1 AM.

Also, the outside door to the lower level will now be locked for security reasons. The stairs leading up to the door have been roped off. According to College Librarian Phyllis Cutler, in the past "people have drifted in who don't belong to us. We like to be aware of who's in the building."

But Andy Crain '84 feels, "it's a hassle to go up two flights and down one," referring to the new exit procedure.

Longer hours long-wanted

Extending the library's hours has long been supported by students at Williams. In response to student interest, and in particular a request by the Gargoyles Society, the policy changes were brought before the Library Committee last spring. The Committee, consisting of faculty and students, ratified the proposals.

The all-night lounge was closed because of problems with vandalism, according to College

Librarian Phyllis Cutler. Ransom Jenks, Director of Security, said that most damage to the lounge occurred "in the early morning hours."

Fires, popcorn

Throughout last year, Buildings and Grounds employees found the remains of fires started in the lounge, as well as "basketballs, popcorn and beer," Cutler said. This "recreation" was possible because the lounge had no supervisory staff past closing time at 11:00 PM, she said.

However, she felt that the number of students causing the problems was "relatively small. It was more carelessness than intentional," she said. Cutler said she doesn't think the students "deliberately intended any harm" but that "with tensions of exams, it tends to become highly social."

In an attempt to create a "more scholarly environment" there, the library will now post a night supervisor in the lower level from midnight until 1:00 AM.

Though Cutler feels that closing the student lounge at 1:00 AM is justified, a few students are very upset.

"I don't know how I'm going to get through this year without this room," said Kurt Rumsfeld '85. Rumsfeld, one of six or seven students who used the lounge regularly last year, said he doesn't recall any instances of fire, but does admit there was "popcorn making" and "a lot of sleeping." Yet, he feels, "some of my best work was done at 3:00 AM."

Faculty eye new freshman seminars, greet new professors in meeting

by Jack Mayher

All freshmen got either their first or second choice for the new Winter Study freshmen seminars, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor told faculty at their first meeting of the semester last Wednesday.

O'Connor said most of the seminar sections will have 20 students or less. He called the seminars "the first step in the strengthening of Winter Study."

The faculty broke with tradition by greeting their new members with normal applause instead of the time-honored snaps. The rest of the meeting concentrated on the administrative and curricular tasks of the new semester.

O'Connor discussed the possibility of implementing "a few more 101 courses" in departments other than English, in order to have more "writing-intensive sections." He also suggested that incoming freshmen be required to take a writing-intensive course in their first semester.

O'Connor announced the start of a Math Workshop, to be set up like the Writing Workshop, where student tutors will give help to students stuck on a particular problem for any course.

The implementation of the Math Workshop is just one part of the program set up with a $250,000 Sloan Foundation grant that the College received last year. The Foundation gave Williams the grant, in part, to put more emphasis on the role of the sciences in a liberal arts education.

Some of the other programs made possible by the grant include microcomputer seminars for faculty members in non-science departments, reevaluation of the course offerings in the sciences and math, and an exchange program with RPI, O'Connor said.

The grant could also allow faculty and equipment exchanges between Williams and more science-oriented institutions, as well as more emphasis in the Williams curriculum.

These stairs leading out of the lower level of the library can't be used anymore because of securing concerns.

Pouncey named Amherst president

Peter R. Pouncey, 45, a British-educated professor of classics at Columbia University, was named the sixteenth president of Amherst College on June 1.

He succeeded G. Armour Craig, who has been acting president since the death of former president Julian Gibbs last February.

Pouncey, who was born in 1937 in Tsing-tao, China, came to the United States in 1964 to teach at Fordham University.

He joined the faculty of Columbia in 1967 and in 1972 was elected Dean of Columbia College at the age of 34. At that time he was still untenured and was the youngest dean in the history of Columbia College. He held the position until 1976 when he returned to teaching.

George B. Beltzel, chairman of the Amherst College Board of Trustees, said, "We are delighted to have found for the presidency of Amherst a teacher, scholar and administrator who has demonstrated his dedication to undergraduate education within a large university context."

Pouncey was elected to the presidency by the Amherst trustees after a nationwide search by a committee of 15 trustees, faculty members, students and alumni.

turned around and left. I knew that I wasn't welcome."

Since the incident, he has been able to settle down into another room in Mission.

"It's been a very large pain," said Holmes. "I just wish the people who are handling the housing could have been a little more authoritative in dealing with the situation."

The overcrowding has also embittered students who have lost their living rooms.

"I was very disappointed when I got the letter over the summer telling me that I might not have a living room," said William Couch '85. "My friends and I would have chosen another suite because this one does not have a good location. We chose it only because it had a living room."

Robert Lee '86 is currently living in a Mills living room although he is neither a transfer student nor one who had planned to leave the school this year. Although he was assigned to Gladden House last spring, he did not get a room in the house's draw. Until August 17 he did not know where he would be living in the fall.

"I just think it's stupid to put so many people into a house before room draw," he said. "There were at least fifteen people who didn't get a room in the draw at Gladden."

"There will always be a problem at room draw, but I think the deans are doing the best they can," Hopkins said.

A similar overcrowding problem in Mission living rooms occurred two years ago although on a much smaller scale, according to Hopkins. All of the students were moved out of the living rooms by Thanksgiving vacation. Hopkins said she did not know the explanation for that crisis.

Although O'Connor said he hopes that this year's overcrowding problem does not develop into a long-term housing crisis, he conceded that the establishment of an arbitrary readmission deadline for returning students may be necessary in the future.

Disarmament Forum serves Atomic Cafe

Members of the the Williams Disarmament Forum (WDF) told about 50 participants it "seeks to end the arms race," and listed an agenda for the coming year of how it will do that, at its introductory meeting last Thursday.

The group's admittedly ambitious goal was stated by WDF treasurer David Yaskulka '84. He said the WDF hopes to establish a library on disarmament issues this year, and also schedule speakers and films, establish a faculty lecture series, promote a two-day forum scheduled for January and distribute literature in Baxter.

WDF members said they see the WDF primarily as an educational network. Yaskulka said the group hopes to "keep the Williams College community informed and participating in the national and international movement to end the arms race."

The participants also discussed the growing explosive power of the world's nuclear arsenal, the chances of surviving a nuclear war and this country's detente policy. The WDF began the year's activities by presenting the film "The Atomic Cafe" last Tuesday evening. The film dramatically yet humorously illustrated the dangers of nuclear weapons and the ignorance with which the American people have dealt with the real and potential dangers of nuclear war.

"The Atomic Cafe" was made up of actual footage and a narration from the 1950's and 60's. The horrifying beauty of an atomic explosion was shown and contrasted with the complete devastation caused by the A-bomb at Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The film also showed the irrationality and relative lack of caution with which nuclear testing was conducted in clips showing American soldiers participating in maneuvers within ten miles of an explosion site.

Amidst the laughter, however, lurked the disquieting question, Are we as ignorant today about certain aspects of nuclear power as the public was 20 years ago?

Chandler honored at Bates

Williams College President John W. Chandler was awarded an honorary doctor of humane letters degree at Bates College's June Commencement in Lewiston, Maine.

Chandler was cited for his "firm leadership during a decade of new challenges to higher learning."

In particular, Chandler was noted for the highlighted strengthening of the arts at Williams, the establishment of the Mystic Maritime Studies Program,

Hodgkins defends flume

by Angela Averitt

Director of Food Services James Hodgkins told the College Council at its meeting last Thursday that problems with the new dishwashing flume in Baxter Hall are working themselves out, and asked students to be patient with the system.

Hodgkins admitted that at first there were problems with long lines and students leaving their trays on tables. He said that although the system was "not perfect, it's already getting better." Hodgkins requested "indulgence, patience, and that people hold off on their judgements. I have every confidence that it will work out," he said.

Morally troublesome issue He pointed out that the flume saves 1.4 million gallons of water a year. Hodgkins felt that the College's vast consumption of water in a town as small as Williamstown was a morally-troublesome issue, and he found the system to be a good solution. Before the College acquired the machine Hodgkins said he researched its efficiency. He and the expansion of computer science in the curriculum.

In addition to his contributions at Williams, Chandler is president of the New England Association of Schools and Colleges and chairman of the Independent Universities and Colleges of Massachusetts.

Other honorary degree recipients at Bates included gourmet chef Julia Child. Chandler sat with Child and said that she "was a lot of fun. When they took our picture she told everyone to say 'souffle'."

New machines invade Record

In this age of video games, laserdiscs and computerized dishwashers, even a time-honored and venerable institution like The Williams Record must resort to computers to retain its position at the pinnacle of the publishing industry. So we did it. With a $12,000 loan from the College, the Record bought three word processing and typesetting machines.

The new Varityper 5404's will save approximately $150 to $200 an issue by allowing the staff to typeset newspaper copy before the printer gets it. The Record will use those savings to pay the College back over approximately five years, although the exact terms are yet to be determined.

The News and Features departments have moved their article deadlines back to Saturday so that the machines will be free on Sunday to process Sports stories and late-breaking news. "The main reason we got the machines was to have improved editing capability," said Co-editor-in-chief Daniel Keating '84, "and that will be reflected in our quality."

Co-editor-in-chief Jon Tigar '84 said that "after we finish training Record staff on the machines and are no longer forced to spend unnecessary time typesetting, I think it will result in huge savings of time and money, and also in a better paper."

ing women and minorities.

"When I was hired as a dean in 1970, one of my early responsibilities was to pay attention to the special needs of the female undergraduates, everything from housing concerns to physical education programs," she explained.

Accordingly, McIntire said she soon realized "If you're going to make a commitment to the education of women, you must have women in the faculty."

McIntire believes "in the intervening years the college has made a serious effort to attract women and minorities as professors." However, McIntire said she hopes to increase "the number of women and minorities in the applicant pool, and to hire more women and minorities from that pool."

Minority life in town

She believes "there should be more women and minorities throughout all levels of the faculty and administration. Williams has moved well toward achieving more representation in the faculty, at least on the junior level. It's just a matter of time before they are on the senior level."

"My other interest," added McIntire, "is to listen to what people say about being here in Williamstown. An issue for some women is the dilemma of dual careers, which may mean commuting."

"For minorities, well, it's a small community with a small minority population," she said. "Although that may not be a problem for some, there are minority families who may want to keep in touch with minority institutions, such as the church. It's something to be aware of."

Counseling exchanges

"I love it," said Spear of her new job. "Williams is a very caring institution, very responsive to individual needs. The people I work with have been very friendly, encouraging, and helpful."

Spear's job will include counseling transfer and exchange students to Williams, as well as those interested in study away from the college, both in this country and abroad.

There are 59 transfer and exchange students at Williams this year, with the majority of the latter coming from the Twelve College Exchange, particularly from women's colleges.

Spear noted there are some differences between the two groups. "For the most part, exchange students are coming from similar colleges, so they basically know what they're coming for. With transfers, one of their major concerns is how their previous records will match up with their classes here," she said.

Experience abroad

"One improvement Spear hopes to make is to institute a process 'by which old and new transfers can meet' more frequently."

Another of Spear's responsibilities involves counseling students who want to study away from the college. She will advise about 150 students annually.

Of her appointment as an assistant dean, Spear said "There are a lot of different ways to come into a dean's position. I always thought of deans as administrative... I didn't realize the extent to which a dean's position involves counseling. It's a combination of the two." Spear graduated from the University of London in 1962 and received a master's degree in education from the University of Melbourne in Australia in 1979.

She has just completed course work for her doctorate in education at the University of Massachusetts, and is now working on her dissertation.

She has traveled throughout Europe, Africa and the Far East, and worked for the United Nations Development Program in Tanzania and the Center for Development at the University of Wisconsin.

And the little Ephs said, "Someone's sleeping in my living room."

AROUND NEW ENGLAND

Boston's New England Aquarium

On October 1, a new exhibit, "Whales: New England's Wandering Giant" will open at the New England Aquarium in Boston. The focal point of the new exhibit is a 48-foot long, bas relief model of a humpback whale which is anatomically correct in every detail and is representative of the humpback whales which migrate to New England waters every spring.

Other features of the whale exhibit are a time line which compares the time on earth of whales, dinosaurs, tigers, elephants, sharks, humans, dogs, and other organisms. Other graphic panels compare the size of a whale's organs with those of other creatures, show migration patterns of whales to New England, and provide information about how whales feed, what they eat, and how they reproduce. The sounds of the humpback whale will be heard throughout the gallery.

More at the Aquarium

A most unusual Monopoly competition will be held at the Aquarium on October 28, 29 and 30, when scuba divers from the New England Aquarium dive club and students from Worcester Polytechnic Institute vie for the championship in the Aquarium's giant ocean tank. The scuba divers will play marathon Monopoly while surrounded by huge sharks and giant sea turtles.

Museum of Fine Arts

The Museum of Fine Arts, Boston (MFA) will have a free open house for full-time college students on Wednesday, October 5, 1983 from 6:30 until 10:00 pm. The MFA open house is designed to introduce full-time students to the Museum and its collections.

The MFA offers an array of lecture, concert and film programs throughout the academic year in addition to permanent collections ranging from Classical and Asian art collections to Impressionist and contemporary painting galleries. On the night of the open house, students will also have the chance to view the new exhibition A New World: Masterpieces of American Painting, 1760-1910, which includes such masterworks as Whistler's "Mother," John Singleton Copley's "Paul Revere," and Eakins' "The Gross Clinic."

Softer stance marks Gang of Four's "Hard"

by Brett McDonnell

Anyone familiar with the Gang of Four's first album, Entertainment!, knows that they made jagged, furiously danceable music with an ironic Marxist message. Their latest album, Hard, is a leap from left field to a safer place.

Can this be the Gang of Four? Hard seems like the wrong title for an album which features horn or string arrangements on some songs, uses a drum machine for most of the drumming, never gets hotter than tepid, and shies away from strong politics.

Our Marxist heroes have finally hooked into the system and replaced drummer Hugo Burnham with a machine. On my first two listenings, I didn't notice the change. I still find it hard to believe. The drumming sounds too subtly varied to come from a machine, although it lacks the energy and irregularity of Entertainment!

At last the Gang of Four has also done something about its greatest flaw, the lyrics. No more of that Bolshoi rhetoric. The central line of "Independence", the most political song on Hard, is, "Independence ain't dependence." There's subtle dialectical thinking for you.

But the Gang of Three (for some reason they still use Four on the album) has not totally mended its ways. Many of the songs still suggest its old sound and lyrics, especially "Independence", "Silver Lining", and "Woman Town". You will recognize an occasional bass twang, and Andy Gill's guitar sounds roughly familiar. For old time's sake, singer Jon King even pulls out his melodic on "Woman Town". The increasingly melodic tendency of Songs of the Free, their last album, asserts itself again here, leading to some catchy choruses. An old fellow-traveler listening to Hard will recognize this Gang of Three as a pacified version of the original Gang of Four.

But why stop there? I can see it now. In 1985 we will have the Gang of Zero. By then their music should be toned down enough for Williams students.

That's their plot: put the young members of the ruling class to sleep for good. How ingenious!

I never trusted those commies.

College Planetarium

Heavens revealed at Milham

This machine flashes the stars of the planetarium night sky.

(Eagon)

by Martin Hildebrand

The "oldest extant astronomical observatory in the United States," the Old Hopkins Observatory, now located on the northern edge of the Berkshire Quad, has contained a planetarium since it was built in the 1830's.

In those days, the stars were painted on the dome inside the building; electricity and projectors were not available. The building was moved several times, electricity and a planetarium projector were added, and paint covered the original stars, but the Milham Planetarium continues to provide shows.

"Springtime"

This semester every Friday evening at 7:30, the planetarium will show "Springtime of the Universe." This show presents a widely-believed scenario regarding the lifetimes of stars and the universe, and emphasizes how the universe is still relatively young.

In part of the show, some constellations are projected onto the ceiling. The show does not restrict itself to objects visible at night; a portion presents the evolution of the sun.

This portion includes two vivid demonstrations of the sun's energy. One demonstration is a spectacular film of solar prominences erupting; the other is a bill, for an amount which dwarfs the national debt, for the electric equivalent of one second's energy produced by the sun.

Museum of Astronomy

For a half hour before the show starts, one can view the Mehlin Museum of Astronomy. The displays show antiquated equipment, which had been used in the previous century, and pictures from the Voyager spacecraft, which investigated Jupiter and Saturn a few years ago.

Some recent photographs of the stars are also on display, as well as two remarkably care, fully drawn 19th century sketches of the sun.

Art

Clark Art Institute popping the cork

The three exhibits presently on view at the Clark Art Institute were developed to celebrate the opening of the new wing of the Williams College Museum of Art.

European art

During construction of the College's new building, much of its art has been in storage. Now, en route to their new quarters, some of the choicest pieces will be on view at the Clark in the exhibit European Paintings and Sculpture from the Williams College Museum of Art. The seventeenth century, a period in which the College Museum is particularly strong, is represented by "The Executioner" by Ribera and "Knight of Santiago" by Pacheco, Velazquez's master. Two large still lifes, a misty interior genre scene and a painting of the activities on a frozen pond in winter are examples of Dutch art at this time. In addition to the sculpture and painting on view, there is a mille fleur tapestry from the early sixteenth century and a Roman mosaic.

A second exhibition, American Prints of Four Centuries, has been organized to complement the College Museum's major opening exhibition, The New England Eye. Although most examples in the Institute's collection are from its own collection, there are a number of important loans from the Chapin Library, including the first map of New England, printed in 1677. Featured in the exhibition will be prints by such masters as Homer, Whistler, Cassatt, Audubon and Hassam.

Celebration

A toast to the College Museum is the subject of the third exhibit, entitled Pop the Cork!. The art selected represents celebration in its many forms, with such examples as MacMonie's sculpture of "The Bacchantes," Alma-Tadema's "The Women of Amphissa" and Zorn's etching, "The Toast."

All three exhibitions will be on view through October 23 during the regular hours of the Clark Art Institute, Tuesday through Sunday, 10-5.

Marcos in jeopardy—

Yet continued U.S. possession of the bases is by no means assured even in light of those talks. What moderates that remain are opposed to the bases, which they view as the both the symbol and the cause of the continued American propping up of Marcos. And the Communists are even less sympathetic.

Opponents of the bases say they cause widespread prostitution, drug traffic and black market activity, and that they contain stockpiles of nuclear weapons.

The U.S. should view its struggle with Marcos for control as a prime opportunity to influence change in the Philippines. It should recognize Marcos' extreme political vulnerability at this point and use the leverage it possesses in the form of aid in order to pressure Marcos into lessening his authoritarian rule and bringing meaningful democratic participation back into Philippine politics. Although the Reagan administration has so far shied away from confronting other dictators, the Philippines constitutes a clear case and one which demands action by the U.S.

Booters hope to repeat

by Greg Leeds

The men's soccer team, facing the dilemma of replacing nine starters from last year's squad, may experience some difficulty in matching their '82 season record of 10-5-1.

They have worked very hard in pre-season training, however, and have the potential for doing well, according to Coach Michael Russo. Though there are "big holes to fill", particularly in the back line, Russo says team morale and confidence are high.

He is very pleased with the team's performance in pre-season scrimmages against U-Mass and Hartford.

"I'm not sure we'll match the success of last year but it's a possibility if things go right and we don't beat ourselves," Russo said, adding that "Every game is going to be tough because we're so young".

The lineup

There is a good amount of midfield strength in senior halfbacks John Campbell and Dan Aramini, as well as Austin Lehr '84, John Mitchell '85, Denny Wright '87 and Jon Deveau '87.

Attempting to overcome setbacks due to graduation in the back line, co-captain Mike Sullivan '84, with the help of Doug McKenney '85 and Mark Schroeder '86, should provide the backbone for a strong defense.

Co-captain and New England All-Star Ted Murphy '85, a "very confident goalkeeper," will be backed up by freshman goalie Brad Bryan.

Russo believes that the offense is probably the strongest area this year, for he sees a "very good capacity to score more goals" in sophomores Jeff McEvoy, Paul Williamson and Clark Odey.

Tough Schedule

Facing a tough Division III schedule, Russo says his team is shooting for last year's record, but that the outcome really will "depend on the quality of opposition".

The team's first game is Tuesday, September 20 against R.P.I., who has already played three games. The first home game is on Saturday, Sept. 24, at 11:30, and pits the Ephmen against the Middlebury Panthers.

SPORTS SHORTS

Women's soccer

After a slow start, the women's soccer team gathered its strength to score two goals in the first half, propelling them to a 2-1 win over Vassar Sunday.

Andrea Raphael '86 scored the first goal fifteen minutes into the game. Forward Gigi Madore '87 scored the second goal after 37 minutes.

Vassar out-shot the Ephwomen 20-10, keeping goalie Laura Napolitano '85 busy in the net with 17 saves.

Coach Leslie Orton also praised the effort exhibited by sweeper Karen Montzka '85.

Williams, now 1-0, faces Skidmore at home Wednesday at 4:00.

Field Hockey

Completely dominating all aspects of play, the field hockey team defeated Vassar College 3-0 Sunday.

Led by the inspired play of link Sue Harrington '84, Williams out-shot Vassar 16-1. Harrington scored one goal and assisted on another. Coach Julie McHugh said, "Harrington played an exceptional game—both defensively and offensively. Junior forward Jane Rech opened up scoring for Williams with an unassisted goal six minutes into the contest. The Ephwomen continued to dominate play in the first half, but were unable to crack the Vassar goal.

Harrington scored Williams' second goal, assisted by Dorothy Briggs '84, six minutes into the second half. Forward Alison Fuller '85 closed out the scoring six minutes later, assisted by Harrington.

Although McHugh saw some flaws in her team's play, she attributed them to "first game jitters." The Ephs will put their 1-0 record on the line on Wednesday at 3:00 when they host Skidmore.

Harriers lose

The women's cross-country team finished third in a four-team meet Saturday at Middlebury, falling behind Middlebury and Bates but defeating Albany State.

The Ephwomen were paced by Lynn Vendinello '84, who finished twelfth at 20:54 on the 3.1 mile course. Katrina Pugh '86 (fourteenth, 21:05) and Susan Baer '85 (twentieth, 21:47) also placed well.

Middlebury won the meet with 25 points, Bates was second with 45 and Williams had 83 points, edging Albany State into fourth with 84.

The Ephwomen host the Williams Invitational on Saturday at 1:00.

Netwomen roll

The women's volleyball team defeated both Marist and Vassar at home Sunday to start their season.

Nervous mistakes plagued the Ephwomen in their opening game against Marist, but they came back behind co-captain Carol Dorfman '84 and Lisa Jayne '86 to win the match in two games, 15-6, 15-7.

Williams came back from an 8-3 deficit in the first game against Vassar to win 15-13, behind Peggy Gentles '86 and co-captain Sara Griffiths '84. The Ephwomen won the second game easily with team defense.

The Ephmen, ranked by one source as the number one team in NESCAC, hope to flex their muscles against Middlebury Saturday. (Shapiro)

Gridders look to Middlebury

by Paul Meeks

After a disappointing 4-4 season in 1982, the football team has high hopes for the upcoming gridiron campaign. Although several fine athletes were lost to graduation last June, a nucleus of veterans remain, complemented by a strong freshman class.

The New England Football Newsletter ranked Williams number one in a NESCAC (New England Small College Athletic Association) preseason analysis.

The squad returned August 31st and has been busy preparing for its home opener against Middlebury, September 24th, 2:00pm., at Weston Field.

Offense returns

Offensively the key is quarterback B.J. Connolly '84, a three-year starter. Running backs Ted Thomas '85, Sean Crotty '84 and Jeff Congdon '84 all return to bolster the ground game.

Connolly will throw to split end Marc Hummon '84 and tight ends John McCarthy '84 and Paul Coleman '85. Head Coach Robert Odell cited the "good receivers" who will allow Connolly to open up the passing game to relieve pressure on the running attack.

Coaching changes

Bernie Krause '84 anchors a strong offensive line under the tutelage of coach Walton Cueman, taking over for the popular Joe Dailey who is on sabbatical teaching and working on an advanced degree at the University of New Mexico.

Odell said "We will miss Joe but are fortunate to have a man of Coach Cueman's caliber." Cueman has changed the blocking rules on the line to accommodate every possible defensive set, allowing wider play selection.

Rich Turi of Hoosac Falls joins the coaching staff with the defensive ends after a three-year hiatus. He was a proven winner in a previous seven-year stint with the Ephmen.

Question marks

Odell feels the major question marks remain on defense. A strong point is depth in the line-backing corps and the defensive line, as tri-captain Mike Hawkins '84 and Tim McFadden '85 have returned.

"The secondary remains the $64,000 question," said Odell. Defensive Secondary Coach

Richard Farley is busy evaluating an army of personnel for four positions, demanding better pass coverage in '83. Tri-captain Dan Wilen '84 bolsters a defensive line few in number but strong.

Scrimmage Hamilton

Williams travelled to Clinton, N.Y., to scrimmage against the Hamilton College Continentals Saturday. Odell was disappointed: "The scrimmage against Hamilton was a typical scrimmage with many, many mistakes that need to be corrected before Middlebury."

In a half of game situation play the score ended knotted at 3-3. The Hamilton squad, winners of but a handful of games in past seasons, were more prepared and aggressive in search of pre-season confidence.

Odell feels the coaching staff may have counted on some of the younger players before they are ready.

Punter John DeLorenzo '84 and place kicker Chris Chapman '85 booted the ball with distance and accuracy, and the kicking game looks solid.

The coaching staff is still in the midst of determining personnel, particularly on defense.

Runners cream NASC, nail Middlebury

by Chris Stearns

The men's cross-country team came from behind to defeat a strong Middlebury team in a close call on Saturday. Co-captain John Nelson '84 won his second race of the year to lead the Ephs as they extended their record to 2-0.

The team knew it would be a tough race since the previous year they had only beaten the Panthers by a single point. Coach Peter Farwell said after the race "They really wanted to beat us. Their top three guys are seniors and they figured if they were going to beat us this would be the year."

Middlebury started off strong and had a commanding lead early on in the race. But at the three mile mark the Ephs began their surge and soon had the race in hand.

Everyone wins

Farwell said, "Every single guy from our team beat out a guy from their team, something I don't think I've ever seen before."

Following John Nelson were John Ellison '86, fourth; Bennett Yort '84, fifth; Brian Angle '84, sixth and Mike Coyne '87, eighth. Rounding out the top seven were Dave Grossman '87 and Kevin Jenkins '85.

Nelson said after the race, "I felt that I couldn't have run any harder and I didn't really expect to win." Yort added, "We knew we had to catch the guys in front of us to win and the top guys on our team really came through."

Mohawks fail

On Wednesday the Purple harriers left North Adams State in the dust as they swept the top eight spots with Nelson winning handily.

With the team in apparently good condition and the return of co-captain Bo Parker in a few weeks, one can expect a strong performance from the cross country team this year.

The team faces UVermont and Albany Friday at 4:30 at home.

Old Farts edge ruggers in upset

by Tom Dumphy

The Williams Rugby Football Club got off to a fine start Saturday despite taking a mandatory loss to the Olde Farts (Alumni) Club, 22-18.

WRFC got going early in this multi-halved game, pulling out to an 18-0 lead by the third half. But the Alumni, winners of this game each year since its inception, were not about to give up. The blood- (and beer-) thirsty alums scored four tries in the final two halves to put away the victory.

Youngsters jump ahead

The WRFC A-side debuted with aplomb, led by senior co-captains Hugh Huizenga and Joe Carey. Carey set up a try by Mark Evans '85 and then scored by his own with some clever play. Bob Aulse '85 converted both tries.

In the third half, Paul Hogan '86 scored, Drew Klein '84 converting, to give WRFC a huge 18-0 lead.

Oldsters go wild

The Alumni awoke from their stupor to show why they are unbeatable. Former captain Bill Hodgeman '82 put down the first alumni try and Vic Zerbino '79 got the extra points.

In the fifth and final half, the alums went wild, scoring 16 points to end the game. Kevin Drewyer '82 and Dixon Pike '83 scored to tie up the game.

Then, in the final play Dan Maynard '83 ran over the Williams team to bring the victory to the alums.

The WRFC did manage to win the post-game party. They face Middlebury at home Saturday at 11:00.

Beat Vassar Tennis splits

by John Schafer

The women's tennis team won its first match of the year on Sunday by defeating visiting Vassar, 6-3.

All three doubles teams won, with the duo of seniors Stephanie Gates and Melissa George crushing their opponents 6-1, 6-0.

Debbie Bernheimer '86, playing sixth singles, Liz Peay '86, playing number three, and sophomore Betsy Shulman, the team's top player, all won Sunday. Peay's victory was impressive, as she dominated her opponent 6-1, 6-0 in a relatively short match.

Lose to Tufts

The team opened its season last Tuesday with an inauspicious start, losing to Tufts 8-1.

Despite the lopsided score, Coach Sean Sloane saw some promise in the first of a thirteen-match fall season. Many of the scores were close, though only the doubles team of Liz Mangee '85 and Jennifer Koski '86 managed a win.

The team carries twelve women: six play singles and the others combine to make three doubles teams. Half the squad graduated last year—three singles and three doubles players. So the relatively young group was no match for the Jumbos, who returned all of their team after winning last year's match.

Young team

With only three seniors, including captain Marissa Gullino '84 who plays second singles, this team is much younger than last year's which had six seniors including two of the top three players.

With a 1-1 record the Ephs wait to entertain Skidmore on Wednesday at the 4:00.

Golfers swing away

Veteran coach Rudy Goff will be without four of last year's top seven as he leads his twentieth and final golf team through its fall season.

The Ephs, 7-0 last fall and NESCAC (New England Small College Athletic Conference) Champions as well as winners over Dartmouth, the Ivy League champion, in the spring, will be led by number one man Mike Hennigan '85.

Co-captains Eric Boyden '84, a former All-New England selection, and Phil Burr '84 will join Chris Harned '85 in the starting rotation.

Depth will help

Goff said, "As always following a heavy graduation, there are a lot of question marks about our line-up. We're fortunate to have some depth to work with." Juniors Doug Hoffer and Randolph Rogers and sophomores James Kenefick and Bill Tierney have shown talent in past performances on the course, and Goff looks to incoming freshmen, led by Andrew Kurtz, to fill the void left by graduation.

Senior John Hennigan, the brother of Mike, who plays baseball rather than golf in the spring, was a key contributor last fall and recorded a hole-in-one in the Ephs' victory over Middlebury.

The Ephmen opened the season at the Yale Invitational this weekend, hoping to place as highly as they did last year facing fifty of the top Division I teams in the East.

The season's schedule includes several top New England teams, and the New England Championships late in September.

Council slashes funding, meets with President Chandler

by Charles P. Goodwin

Student publications were particularly hard hit by budget cuts when the College Council reviewed the preliminary budget submission of its financial committee last Thursday evening.

The Council also met with President John Chandler to discuss faculty-student relations.

The magazine Mosaic was completely denied funding because according to Council Treasurer Hamilton Humes '85 it was badly managed and "really disorganized."

The Williams Literary Review and Parallax were both placed in a "test" category along with the Purple Rag, a proposed comedy magazine.

The test designation means the magazines will each receive enough money for two or three issues to see whether they are well-organized enough to produce work of acceptable quality.

A second group which had hoped to start a comedy magazine called O.C. Production was denied funding. Humes said a member of the group told him, "The people who are going to write for them couldn't reveal their names because they were so funny."

Another proposed literary magazine, Banter, was not funded because the financial committee believed, according to Humes, "the campus shouldn't have two literary magazines." Germinal found its request of $5076 reduced to $3815 because several proposed special issues could easily be spot-funded during the year, Humes said.

WCFM received its full request of $13,205, an increase of $1310 over the previous year's budget. The Williams Record's budget was cut by $5360 to a level $3160 below its 1982-83 funding. "Ten pages is enough," said Humes, who labelled the newspaper "really badly managed."

Political cuts

Several political groups also received cutbacks. The Committee for Palestinian Rights was denied funding because of severe financial mismanagement the previous year, according to Humes.

The Williams Hunger Action Project and the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition were also denied funding because the financial committee felt these groups had already raised enough money from outside sources.

However, none of the sports clubs' budgets were cut below last year's levels.

In other business, the Council approved $300 for a typewriter for its Baxter Hall office. "It's obvious our office isn't very well equipped," Secretary Matthew Dodds '86 said.

At his meeting with the Council, Chandler said that in order to improve faculty-student relationships, "all of us must work harder for faculty-student meetings outside the classroom."

Self-conscious?

Chandler characterized the difficulties on both sides as a "waitful awkwardness" and said there may be a sense of "self-consciousness on the part of the faculty in feeling that their houses or apartments are not fancy enough for students."

The Council offered several suggestions for promoting better relations, including moving the faculty mailboxes in with the students' mailboxes; a field day with faculty-student teams; closing the faculty club a few days a month to force the faculty to eat with students; and instituting various faculty or departmental events at the Log.

Baxter remodeling to take five years

by Jack Mayher

Remodeling Baxter Hall may take as long as five years, said David Colby, chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) at its meeting last Tuesday. The Committee is for now ignoring the question of cost as it looks at various plans for renovating Baxter.

College Treasurer William Reed told the Committee to "worry about cost later," according to Colby. This, Colby hopes, will "make people more creative in thinking of ideas for the building." The plans may be altered in a few months when the administration considers cost constraints.

The building will be usable while the changes are made, and students will probably not be encumbered.

President Chandler hopes that the CUL can come up with "a plan that would permit a schedule of alterations as the availability of money permits."

Trustees' meeting

The CUL and Architect John Jordan, who did the design work for the OCC in the Roper Center and the remodeling of Jesup, hope to have a plan together in time for the Trustees' meeting on 20 January.

Colby said that he will meet with College Council in order to get more wide ranging student opinion. He also said that he would appreciate input from students in the form of letters to him. There will also be an open meeting when the plan becomes focused.

The impetus for the change comes from a report the Gargoyle Society presented to Chandler last spring. The report recognized "that Baxter Hall is outdated and needs renovation to better accommodate student activities."

The report recommends moving out some groups, including Pottery Ltd., the Chaplain's office, and the Outing Club while shifting the other organizations around through the remodeling. The CUL will keep these plans in mind but will only use them as one source of opinion.

The CUL will tour Baxter this week with Jordan to start getting ideas for a new design.

The crowded mailroom in Baxter may disappear, but not very soon. (Glick)

Racism at Middlebury sparks college concern

by Ned Ladd

A black freshman at Middlebury College has been the target of a number of racially-motivated events since the beginning of the year, sparking student protest and an all-campus meeting to confront the issue.

On September 10 a black freshman found a racist note attached to his door, according to The Middlebury Campus. Later that night he returned to his room to find his window broken. The College has not released the name of the victim.

The broken window prompted an all-dormitory meeting on September 12, attended by Dean of the College Stephen Rockefeller and Dean of Students Erica Wonnacott. The meeting focused on stopping the incidents, not finding the guilty party. "No one wants to

by Lee Wierdsma

Williams will award cash awards directly to high school teachers in order to recognize and encourage excellence in secondary school teaching, under a new endowment program established by the estate of George Olmsted Jr. '24.

The College will award $1,000 annually to each of four teachers selected for classroom excellence and $500 to their respective schools, according to College President John Chandler.

Chandler said he thought up the idea of the program over the summer and worked with Olmsted's widow, Francis, to make it a reality. The total amount of the endowment fund is $102,000.

"I have a foremost interest in scholarship, as did my husband, and my whole family is a firm supporter of Williams," said Mrs. Olmsted said in a telephone interview. "This award will hopefully inspire teachers to send more students to Williams. I'm supporting the program 100 percent."

"Encourage excellence"

"It is easy and tempting to criticize shortcomings in secondary school education," Chandler said. "We believe it is important to recognize and encourage excellence instead."

Mr. Olmsted, who died in 1976, was the president and later chairman of the board of the S.D. Warren Co. At Williams, he was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, editor-in-chief of the Record and

The Williams Record

Getting a word in edgewise

Student frustration over being ignored in the tenure process manifested itself last year in Record submissions and College Council discussions. The Council recently took a step to alleviate student concern and promote input by publicizing channels of communication.

The letter circulated to all students is not revolutionary. It lists the faculty being considered for tenure now and in the next four years and asks students to contact the department chairmen to give their comments on the professors. The opportunity for students to make comments on tenure decisions is not new at Williams. Effective use of the opportunity would be.

The main reason students give for not bothering to speak up has been that their comments bear little weight, anyway. But faculty members have said that even when students input came only over the grapevine, it played a part in the decisions.

A dramatic increase in the student voice would demonstrate campus concern in a way that the faculty could both understand and appreciate. A drive in which each student gave his opinion would generate some 2000 letters and visits to department chairmen. That small effort by each student would provide a great deal of information helpful in evaluating teaching performance.

Many students come to Williams specifically because it is a school whose faculty is focused on teaching. Although student opinion should never take precedence over faculty sentiment in the tenure decision, student input that is offered thoughtfully and considered fairly will make the system more effective.

Op-Ed They paved my quad

by John Clayton

They paved my quad, and I'm kinda pissed off.

A quad is for playing football, waiking across in a haphazard fashion, playing frisbee or baseball catch, partying at all hours of the day, and, at certain times, building snow-sculptures or burning class notes.

If you don't believe me, look it up in the dictionary.

Now, you can't play football or frisbee on the tar (or even, at present, on the grass), and it's lost that central focus (where the two old paths crossed) that gave note-burning its quasi-religious significance.

But seriously, those fences seem to try to separate "the Quad" from Sage and Williams. In olden days, the Quad started at your window and continued across to Williams where some guy was blasting his stereo so loud that it woke you up. Now the Quad seems to start, and end, with a fence. It doesn't include you at all.

Apparently they're called "Gargoyle Fences", and they're supposed to be wonderful for sitting on. But I've never seen anyone sit on a "Gargoyle Fence". I've never seen any gargoyles (sitting or otherwise) on a "Gargoyle Fence". I've never even seen any members of the Gargoyle Society sitting on a "Gargoyle Fence".

Now they've got little walkways to take you to your particular entry. I'm waiting for the exit signs to go up: "Williams C, next right—Thru Traffic, keep left."

And what if you want to walk from Sage D to Mission Park? Or Sage B to Williams F? Not only don't you get a little exit ramp, you don't even get a hole in your "Gargoyle Fence". Talk about the College deciding what you can and cannot do.

Something else that bothers me: when the freshmen get wasted and go out at 2:00 A.M. to hit golf balls at Sage (we folks who lived in Sage would never hit them at Williams), there's now a much greater chance that they'll accidentally tee up on the pavement and wreck their golf clubs.

Granted, there can be more severe consequences to this action than ruining your golf clubs, (but don't forget: they're wasted—they'll probably miss the ball three times and then pass out on the grass, or lack thereof), but hey, why add to the list?

Sure, you may say I only played football a couple times on that grass (and never caught a pass). And I only played baseball catch a couple times in that quad (I did manage to catch some of those). And, sure, note-burning and frisbee can still occur on this new, paved quad.

But it won't be the same. You look up quad in the dictionary and you see "party", not "pavement" (At least, I think that's the dictionary—oops, maybe it's my copy of Scheibe's Guide to Mixology).

John Clayton does not own golf clubs and has never hit golf balls at Williams, or even Sage. Please believe me, Mom.

Log draws crowds with special events

by Helen Rozwadowski

The Log is enjoying a steady increase in business this year as a result of a number of steps taken by the new management to enlarge the popularity of the pub and control the sale of alcohol to minors.

According to Log manager Dave Heinlein '83, more people are visiting The Log these days because of frequent special activity nights and other newly-instituted special events. These have so far included special beer nights, Junior Advisor night, a video-taped Police concert, an imported beer of the week and the return of Monday night football on the big screen.

Slated for the future are open microphone nights, air band contests, Bingo and a weekly night at the movies.

"Creativity"

One reason Heinlein gives for The Log's popularity this year as compared to other years is that "In the past there was not an active policy of getting people down here."

Assistant manager Dave Lott '83 added that "what The Log really needs is an injection of creativity." Jim Noble '84, a Log employee, said, "The Log is becoming a more popular campus institution because we have a more aggressive management this year."

Hand stamping

The policy introduced last year of stamping the hands of students of drinking age—20 or over—is still in effect.

Employees at the bar are allowed to sell alcohol only to those people stamped.

This policy allows minors as well as upperclassmen to enjoy entertainment at The Log, the staff said. The managers agreed the system seems to be working well.

When asked what benefits The Log offers students, Heinlein said, "It is a social gathering place where you don't have to worry about work and you can be with friends. The tavern atmosphere is very comfortable for people to come to."

Other people around campus agreed. "This College is so serious, and this is a place where people can let their hair down. In a word, it's informal," said Associate Chaplain Gus Graap.

When asked why she goes to The Log, Alison Fuller '85 replied, "I go down there because there's nowhere else to see everyone at once that's not a huge Mission Park party."

And as Mace Foehl '85 said, "it beats the library."

The Log is once again crowded after recovering from its dry spring. (Ruderman)

ACSR clears 21 S. African operators

by Stuart Smith

The College's Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) received 21 satisfactory responses from the 24 companies to which it sent questionnaires regarding their business practices in South Africa, said College Treasurer William Reed at the ACSR meeting last Monday.

The questionnaire, mailed in August, asked companies in which Williams has invested to clarify their practices in South Africa, including plans for future expansion there and sales to the government.

The Committee found all of the company responses it reviewed to be generally satisfactory. All the companies earned the highest possible ranking under the Sullivan Principles, according to Reed.

The Sullivan Principles require companies to use racially equal work practices. Both the companies' practices and their ratings showed a "marked improvement in comparison to the situation several years ago," said alumni representative Dick Williams.

Provost Neil Grabols, also on the committee, said "companies now take the issue very seriously."

Those companies which stated in their letters that they sell to the South African government as a policy said they limit their sales to non-police and military agencies, according to Reed.

Student representative Susan Reilly '85 claims that the review process is moving too slowly. "It's a start, but it's not enough," she said. "I don't agree with the way the process is going at all."

Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition spokesperson and student representative to the ACSR Navjeet Bal '85 agrees with Reilly. "The changes [in the ACSR] that I'd like to see," said Bal, "are changes in the basic guidelines," including the use of the Sullivan Principles. "The whole process sidesteps the political issue," she said.

Preserving independence

At last Monday's meeting the Committee also expressed its determination to maintain its independence from the Trustees. The ACSR makes non-binding recommendations to the Trustees concerning investment policy.

According to Reilly, "we don't want to get in a locked-in position with regard to the trustees, and simply tell them what they want to hear."

Chairman Stephen Lewis brought up for future discussion the question of how the College should vote on shareholder proxy votes relating to defense and nuclear issues.

One suggestion was that the Committee consider recommending the policy, recently adopted by Harvard, of abstaining on all such issues. Reed suggested that such a policy might be extended to cover all foreign policy issues.

GLU sponsors AIDS talk

by Eric Adelstein

Public hysteria coupled with misconceptions about Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) contribute greatly to the problems surrounding this mysterious disease, according to Dr. William Harding '73 in a lecture last Tuesday sponsored by the Gay and Lesbian Union.

"Worrying about AIDS serves no purpose. The rhetoric does more harm than good," said Harding, who is himself gay.

Homosexual men have suffered disproportionately from the disease, Harding said. Researchers theorize that the disease may be transmitted through contact with blood or through intimate sexual contact.

Hemophiliacs also have a high risk factor because they often receive massive blood transfusions which increase their chance of exposure to contaminated blood. Intravenous drug users can contract the disease by using needles already used by AIDS carriers.

AIDS is deadly because it knocks out the victim's immune system, leaving him defenseless against resulting infections, Harding said.

"I'm often asked, 'Is it safe to kiss?'" he said. "You just don't know. You can't tell what is safe and what is not safe. As a doctor, I try to advise patients, but politically people must decide for themselves what risks to take during sex."

Two theories exist as to the nature of this disease, Harding said, one being that AIDS is a virus and could potentially be combated by a vaccine. The second theory says AIDS is the effect of an assault by a variety of infections. Harding believes the two theories are connected.

the disease.

Forty percent dead

Harding said that 2,259 cases of AIDS have been reported so far to the National Center for Disease Control in Atlanta. Forty-one percent of those have died. Approximately one out of every 10,000 gay men will eventually contract the disease, Harding said.

"Although mortality is high, the incidence is low," he said, adding that because of the high mortality rate public hysteria has exaggerated the impact of the disease.

Social implications

AIDS obviously has far reaching medical as well as social implications, Harding said.

"AIDS is one of the most fascinating diseases to face modern medicine and one of the most political issues to affect the homosexual community," he said. The disease "has had a positive effect on the gay community in that it has stimulated taking responsibility for one's actions," he said.

Harding concluded by reminding society to keep the real issues involved in perspective. "AIDS is the disease, not homosexuality or promiscuity."

New name, new image

Last week's lecture was only one of a number of new activities being sponsored by the newly-renamed Gay and Lesbian Union.

The GLU changed its name over the summer to better accommodate lesbians, according to a spokesman for the group who asked not to be named.

"Normally, women seek separation from men's groups," said the spokesman. "We had small numbers [of women] coming to meetings. The idea was to try and bring them back in. I think the homosexual community should cohere."

In addition to sponsoring lectures, the GLU is presently sending representatives to freshmen entries in a joint venture with the Peer Health Counselors.

"We want to provide the idea that the GLU is available," said the spokesman. "If they [the freshmen] are interested, we are here. There is something besides heterosexual activity at Williams...we're trying to provide information that we exist. We could send out a flyer but that would be very impersonal."

He emphasized that the talks are meant solely for informational purposes. "There is a lot of crap about recruiting people," he said, "but that's a lot of baloney."

"The reactions to the talks have been mixed," the spokesman said. "I think freshmen are really embarrassed. But one talk in particular went very well. They asked interesting and pertinent questions."

point a finger at anyone," said Rockefeller.

The meeting was not a success, because the next day, the same student found another racist note on his door.

In response to the note, the College held an all-college meeting two days later, with College President Olin Robison presiding. The meeting was attended by most of the administration and faculty and three-quarters of the student body.

At the meeting Robison said that the incidents were "antithetical to absolutely everything this place stands for."

Director of Public Affairs Ron Nief called the meeting the first of its kind "since the Vietnam War days."

The College has not yet said whether it has identified whoever is responsible for the act. "We seek to protect the perpetrator," said Nief, "because he is obviously not well and needs help."

Black Student Union President Sol Levy said "we view this attack as one against all of us. We won't take this kind of treatment." Former BSU President Doretha Gay said, "As a community this mars us. It waves a flag of ignorance on an institution which prides itself on academic excellence."

Middlebury has a black population of three to four percent. Of the 21 black students in the freshman class, only one has been harassed.

In the early spring the Middlebury Admissions Office sponsors a Black Cultural Weekend, in an effort to recruit blacks. Nief feels that their recruiting efforts will not be adversely affected. "The strength of our black programs here, and the quick and dramatic response by the community and the administration shows our commitment to the black community," he said.

Daily Advisor saves paper, time, money

In response to the growing number of announcements in campus mailboxes, the Purple Key and the College Council plan to publish a daily listing of events on campus, tentatively starting next Monday.

The new publication, The Daily Advisor, will replace all one-third page mailings. The Advisor will include movie, sport, party, and meeting announcements as well as personal messages.

All College Council-funded groups may use this bulletin free of charge for as many as five mailings a year, but any other groups must pay $1 for every 10 words of a message. Personal announcements of less than 25 words will cost $5.

According to Council Treasurer Hamilton Humes '85, "very few of the one-third page announcements had more than 100 words on them, so this won't make much of a difference."

All announcements must be received in the College Council office by 10 AM the day of publication. Groups required to pay must do so at this time.

Humes said the cost of the Advisor will be about $6,000 a year, but added that the money will come from funds previously earmarked for the publicity costs of a number of campus groups.

Staff in the Baxter mail-room and Office Services had complained about the overload from all-campus mailings. As of next Monday, one-third page announcements will no longer be distributed, and notices of one page or more will be charged two cents per SU Box.

Parakeet lost, regained

It's not your average day in the fourth grade at the Williamstown Public School when a blue parakeet swoops down over the playground and lands on your shoulder.

The bird, which belongs to Williams sophomore Suenn Ho, escaped September 9 when Ho walked outdoors with it on her shoulder. Ho then aired a message on the College radio station, WCFM, asking people to watch out for the feathered fugitive.

Ho said the bird, whose name is Beebee, had escaped once before but had returned. However, the onset of colder weather made things look bleak for Beebee. "I thought he was gone for good," Ho said.

But Beebee apparently made his way from Perry House, where Ho lives, to the Williamstown elementary school on School Street, and landed on the shoulder of a fourth grade boy whose name Ho did not know.

The boy's mother was put in contact with Ho, who then went to the elementary school to pick the bird up. "It's a miracle," Ho said when she heard the news. "I don't believe it."

"I called my mom in Hong Kong and said 'do you believe in miracles?'" Ho recalled. "She said, 'Beebee's back, right?' I was screaming into the phone."

Eph scales Mountains

Williams reached new heights this summer when Leo Murray '64 became one of four climbers to scale a previously unclimbed 16,002-foot peak in the remote Sinkiang province of northwestern China. Accompanying him to the top was a small Williams pennant donated by the Alumni Review and a Chinese flag.

In late July Murray and three climbers from Hong Kong also reached the summit of Mt. Bogda, a triple-peaked, 17,860-foot mountain, by a route never before used.

Although the team members had more than 40 years of climbing experience between them, their ascent provided many challenges. At one point they spent four days without supplies as a storm pinned them to a precipice.

Murray and team used yaks and horses to transport their supplies to base camp. They then climbed "alpine-style," carrying all supplies on their backs, foregoing fixed camps and climbing without oxygen.

WSP seminars yield faculty fruits

by Philip Busch

There has been a "cross-fertilization" of ideas among faculty this summer as they have prepared to teach the new, interdisciplinary Winter Study freshman seminars, and many of the faculty involved think the new seminars will help break down some of the traditional barriers between academic disciplines.

Freshman are required to take one of six seminar options. Offerings range from "The Idea of the Hero" to "The Invisible World" to "New England and the Sea." Each will be taught by four professors (except for "The Concept of Race" with three), from at least three different disciplines.

The seminar topics arose from shared faculty interests. Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong will teach a seminar, entitled "Public Man, Private Woman?", which brings together philosophers, historians, political scientists and others in a study of gender roles in public and private society.

"The topic was easy," said Tong. "The only problem was limiting it to eight [professors], four for each of two years."

"Fresh perspectives" Tong is enthusiastic about the seminar. "It's very helpful to find out what each of us is doing in terms of writing and research," she said. "This is a good way to find this out. It can give us new ideas within our discipline or challenge the boundaries of the discipline...each discipline must maintain its integrity, but it's dynamic to develop fresh perspectives and new questions."

"We wanted something in the arts exciting to freshmen," said Professor of English Lawrence Graver of his seminar, "The Idea of the Modern in the Arts." "We thought the idea of the modern would bring people together from theatre, music, art, and English," Graver said. Participants will study such varied works as Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness, compositions by Stravinsky, and the sculpture of Marcel Duchamp.

"We hope to have an interdisciplinary success," said Graver. "We hope to talk about things not just as experts but also as interested participants, so there will be cross-fertilization."

Graver emphasized the novelty of the interdisciplinary approach for students as well. "Students will not have had this approach before at Williams," he said.

"Habit-forming"

Professor of Astronomy Jay Pasachoff emphasized the expertise that each scientist will bring to his seminar on "The Invisible World." The seminar will examine objects and processes, ranging from the atom to galactic clusters, from the perspectives of biology, astronomy, chemistry and mathematics.

"Each of the scientists is an expert and is not qualified to teach another's field," said Pasachoff, "but we're eager to hear each other lecture about their own fields."

Tong said she would like to see the interdisciplinary approach used more often during the regular semester. "Once you experience the excitement of exchanging ideas, it's habit-forming," she said. Tong cited having guest lecturers in her regular courses as one way of continuing this exchange.

"We hope for more of this approach," agreed Graver. "These seminars can be a seedbed for this type of thing if they succeed. It's typical for an idea to become a regular course after being tried during Winter Study."

"Quite an effort"

Professor of Geology William Fox, who is teaching the "New England and the Sea" seminar, is more skeptical of the possible influences of the seminars on the regular curriculum.

"It sounds ideal, but it's very hard to do in the full semester because of the high cost of faculty time...right now there's only one course that takes this approach," he said, referring to Environmental Studies 203, a course on energy taught by five professors.

"A lot of work has gone into the seminars," said Fox, "and they should be more successful than past Winter Studies. But the momentum may be hard to sustain in the future—it's been quite an effort."

Tom MacIntyre: Riddle and Tension Irish author takes his turn as harper

by Don Gifford

Tom MacIntyre was a visiting lecturer in English at Williams, 1977-1978. He is a native of Ireland and has published novels, short stories, essays, translations of Gaelic poetry and plays. He returned to Williamstown this past week, and, while here, read from his own short stories.

Don Gifford is a Professor of English. He has been at Williams since 1951.

Tom MacIntyre, who took his turn as harper last Tuesday evening in 3 Griffin, occupies a unique and well-established place in contemporary Irish letters. As Seamus Heaney has put it, MacIntyre's "name figures in the very short list of Irish writers who have set out to make the short story new," with the added qualification that "story" is not quite the right "term," that "language left to play so autonomously is reaching for the condition of Poetry."

Tristan and Iseult

In his most recent collection of stories, The Harper's Turn (1982) from which MacIntyre read last Tuesday night energy gathers from the tensions between the elliptical compaction of the "poetry" and the implied sprawl of story-telling. For example, in "Deer Crossing" the retelling or rather the recasting of the story of Tristan and Iseult cuts aslant the ravel of and-thens in the Tristan stories we know.

In the first of the four brief sections of "Deer Crossing" Mark's jester teases his master to the point of high risk until the refrain of the last line turns surprisingly gentle: "Mark's eyes drank of the forest." No elaboration, but the Tristan stories tell of the Forest of Tristan where variously Tristan and Iseult consummated their love and Tristan ran mad.

The second section of "Deer Crossing" treats of the almost-murder of Brangwen at Iseult's behest and Brangwen's response:

When Brangwen was brought back from the forest, Iseult kissed and embraced her over and over. That storm passed. Brangwen stepped back.

—Iseult, you strange person...

In the third section, Tristan, on trial before King Mark, is "stymied" in a net of riddles, riddling words that image the inexplicable riddles of behavior.

The fourth section:

They remembered that long after but remembered more his replies that first day when someone or other had not so innocently asked—

—And what do you do in your spare time, Tristan?

—I ramble the woods.

—What do you do in the woods?

—I count the trees.

—How many trees in the wood, Tristan.

—Two.

—Name them.

—The Green. And the withered.

In the seductive voice he kept polished for any or all occasions.

—Two, says he. The green. And the withered.

Again, that explosive refrain of the "forest," the "woods." No comment; or almost no comment except in the resonance set up by the art of ellipsis, the "green" of the tree of life? "And the withered," the tree of the knowledge of good and evil? And that jaunty "says he."

Tension and resonance

A similar tension and resonance attends MacIntyre's plays which are composed from a perspective mid-way between that of playwright and that of choreographer. His most recent, The Great Hunger (1983), is an adaptation and transformation of Patrick Kavanagh's long poem, "The Great Hunger" (1941). In his play, MacIntyre seeks in the ellipsis of gesture to do on stage what he does so effectively in the short fictions.

Substrate of riddle

Beneath that tension between the spoken and the urgent presence of the unspoken in the stories and plays lies a rich substrate of riddle. In the tradition of the ancient Irish oivaves (who were poets and masters of learning) riddle was the language of wisdom lest wisdom be debased into cliché by the unlettered. And everywhere in MacIntyre's work, riddle is alive and well: in his "Versions of Gaelic Poems of the 17th and 18th Centuries," collected as Blood Relations (1972), and in his political commentary on Ireland's failed Watergate, Through the Bredwell Gate: A Diary of the Dublin Arms Trial (1971). The riddle is not just the compacted play of language but in the perspective itself, the enigma glimpsed and fixed, if never mastered. In "Standing Stone," a version of an 18th century poem: "A question, Stone: / What was the crime/ That set you here/ Stupid to the world? / The Wand of the Greek King's son/ Set me here—" In Through the Bredwell Gate members of the government (including Charles Haughey, recently prime minister) were apparently impli-words already. What I am seeking is the perfect order of words in the sentence." To MacIntyre's ear one of the finest of Swift's sentences was written not by Swift but to him by Hester Vanhomrigh whom Swift called "Vanessa" and whose unrequited passion for Swift has become legend: "I find myself unquiet in the midst of silence, and my heart is at once pierced by sorrow and love." In three sentences Joyce cated in the gun running but forgiven as "Not Gully" by an inscrutable jury in an atmosphere: "there's too much gamble in the air, every sound the sound of falling dice"; and the last lines of MacIntyre's "Eplilogue":

"Oh, Cabbage Republic, 'tis of thee we sing."

Few governments would have survived the tumultuous aftermath of the trial—but, in Dublin, the Party, long in power, kept power.

Oh, Cabbage Republic, 'tis of thee we sing.

Influence of Swift and Joyce

Presiding over his quest for style, MacIntyre says, are the two great Irish masters of prose style: Swift and Joyce—Swift who defined a good style as "proper words in proper places" and Joyce who responded to a question about his search for le mot juste: "I have the sums up four arid years of a bank cashier's life: "He kept away from concerts lest he should meet her. His father dies; the junior partner of the bank retired. And still every morning he went into the city by tram and every evening walked home from the city after having dined moderately in George's Street and read the evening paper for dessert."

MacIntyre on the burial of a miscarried foetus: "And fill with care, using the spade as they taught you, finding the beat of it, letting the cut of the wind take your bones. Fill it, and fill it, and tend it, and more, and leave the spade aside. And down, and by the small heap, and feel it, and cry what you have for the was and the wasn't."

Olmsted awards

captain of the swimming team.

Candidates for the award will be nominated each year by members of the senior class at Williams. Chandler said, "As college seniors, they will have gained the maturity and ability to make such judgements about their former teachers."

The first round of awards will be given out this spring, but Chandler said no deadline for the nominations has yet been set.

In their nominations the seniors will write a statement explaining why their particular teacher deserves recognition. The nominations will be submitted to a nominating committee comprised of five faculty members and five juniors chosen individually by Chandler for their different backgrounds and schools.

The committee will then talk with other students and alumni of the various schools to gain more information about the candidates, said Chandler. It will not deal directly with either the schools or the teachers involved, however.

Chandler chose this year's committee over the summer. It includes Thomas Parker, associate director of admissions, and Professors MacAlister Brown, Norman Petersen, Anne Skinner, and Fred Stocking, who will be the chairman. The students on the committee will be Janet Clarke, James Heyman, Jonathan Labaree, Jennifer Mah and Laura Voipe.

Chandler said it is conceivable that nominated teachers may refuse to accept the merit awards on principle, but such an eventuality would be "hard to believe," he said.

Silver Anniversary hits the airwaves

At 7:30 AM I was rudely awakened by my clock radio, tuned, as always, to "the radio voice of the Williams College campus, WCFM, 91.9 FM in Williamstown." Through the murk of my brain I heard the DJ saying something about winning a record. I groped for the phone, batted the receiver off the hook and managed to dial CFM. And I won an album by the Psychedelic Furs! I thought they only gave away Furs albums at stations like KROQ in Los Angeles.

The records are being given away to celebrate WCFM's 25th anniversary. Actually, radio at Williams began in 1941 when Al Eurich '43 and Bill Witherell '43

"carried their record changer and microphone from one secret room in Sage Hall to another and broadcast whenever the study load was not too excessive." Al and Bill's "heating pipe" broadcast system soon became WMS, AM radio.

When WCFM first started broadcasting, only the dormitories wired to the system could receive the signal. So much wire had been installed that one alumnus remarked that the wire could stretch from the Williams campus to North Adams with a mile to spare.

'Ephman'

WMS grew quickly, and in 1957 a new station, WCFM, blasted a full ten watts of FM radio to the Williams campus. Among WCFM's more memorable characters were Tom Pierce and Frank Perry, both '69, who conceived the superhero "Ephman."

According to the 1970 Alumni Review, Ephman's "popular exploits kept students and faculty alike glued to their radios each week to see if Jim Lunch (disguised as 'Ephman'), along with his roommate 'Studley Goodnight,' would have to 'fling out the Purple Hail' to freeze in violet the villains of the Directors of the Rural Alliance of Freedom Thwarters (D.R.A.F.T.)."

'Just because'

In addition to giving away records to celebrate its 25th anniversary, WCFM gave away four radio shows. The shows were awarded to persons who best answered "Why should you be on the radio?" in 25 words or less. Lisa Scott '84 won a show with the response: "Just because."

Alumnus Tom Costley '82, now working in admissions, won with the response "I'm old and balding...give me the break I need...Let me on the radio. I want to be a Radio Personality like Bill Wright." WCFM Music Director and contest judge Bill Wright admitted he "really liked this one."

The big event of the 25th anniversary celebration is a raffle and birthday party this Saturday. Prizes include an all-expense paid weekend for two in Mont-real, dinners for two at local restaurants, and packages of 25 records.

All proceeds from party and raffle tickets benefit Greylock A Better Chance Inc. (ABC), a local organization that brings underprivileged kids to Mt. Greylock High School to study. Prizes for the raffle and giveaways were donated by local merchants and record companies.

"The merchants were very generous," said Bill Wright, "they were enthusiastic about Williams students getting involved in the local community." Town residents have been encouraged to buy raffle tickets. Wright said that WCFM hopes to raise more than $3,000 for ABC.

Progressive music

WCFM has undergone changes in 25 years. "Much of the classical music and talk shows that WCFM used to broadcast have been taken over by public radio," commented Wright. "Public radio has greater resources in those fields than we do."

"Ephman" on Baxter lawn.

A recent WCFM campus poll revealed that Williams students want to hear consistent "progressive music"—new wave, rock, less known cuts off popular albums. "Commercial radio stations can't afford to play the variety of music we do," said Wright.

According to WCFM General Manager Lee Farbman, the station just instituted block programming. "It used to be a hodge-podge of music, and sometimes you might not hear music after dinner until 9 pm." "Commercial radio stations can't afford to play the variety of music we do," said Bill Wright. Now that different kinds of music have been allotted specific times, students know what to expect when they turn their radio to 91.9 FM.

Griffin Concert

Hill plays Rameau

by Carl Leafstedt

The year 1983 marks the 300th anniversary of the birth of the Baroque French composer, Jean-Philippe Rameau. As with all anniversary celebrations, the result is a renewed interest in Rameau's music, which has to a large part been overshadowed by that of his great contemporaries, Bach and Handel. Most of his music encompasses two genres: stage music (ballets, operas, incidental music to popular dramas of the day) and keyboard music.

All-Rameau concert

Last Sunday night Williams-town was treated to a concert of some of this keyboard music. Harpsichordist Victor Hill celebrated Rameau's anniversary with an all-Rameau concert as part of the Griffin Hall Concert series at the Clark Art Institute.

The program consisted of three Suites: two in A minor, dating from 1706 and 1728, and one in E minor, from 1724. Also included was the relatively late work, "La Dauphine", a written-down version of an improvisation Rameau gave at a royal wedding in 1747.

The three suites span a period of 24 years of Rameau's creative life. They are wonderfully varied, both within themselves and in relation to the others. None of them follow true suite form, having individual movements bearing descriptive titles such as Venetienne, La Villageois, and Le Rappel des Olseaux.

Chronologically

Hill performed the Suites chronologically, which helped to underline Rameau's growth as a composer. The 1728 Suite, one of his most mature works, includes several movements that are unusual and noteworthy; for example, the one entitled "Les Trols Mains", in which the left hand jumps back and forth over the right—hence "Three Hands". This work also has the distinction of having the longest Allemande ever written in the Baroque period.

As for Hill's performance—what can be said?—clean and enjoyable as always, perhaps more so than usual, since it appeared he had this music well under hand and was more relaxed than in previous concerts.

Water polo

by Ken Irvine

The men's water-polo team got off to a solid start last week, winning six out of seven games.

The Ephs, led by senior tri-captains John Gould, Jeff Mills and Mark Schmitz, were 19-2 last year and this year they hope to repeat as Division II New England champions.

Weekend tourney

On Wednesday they handily defeated R.P.I. 17-9 in an "A" game and 15-4 in a "B" game. Then over the weekend the team went down to play at the four-man Trinity tournament.

Friday the Ephs lost a tough game to division I Iona College. It was a close game at the half but then Iona set up a double bucket, which enabled them to catch the Ephs off guard on the switches. However, Williams displayed their superior depth in a "B" game, defeating Iona 19-1.

The next day, Williams started off by trouncing Trinity. Then they scored 15 against Amherst while this weekend's B-team goalie, Rob Sommer, once again let in only one goal. They topped the weekend off by crushing the defectors of 1821 in an "A" game, 18-8.

Key cogs

While depth and swimming ability will probably be the main factors in Williams' game this year, the key cog in their scoring machine will be the weekend's top scorer, Will Andrew '86. The Eph's defense, highlighted by numerous steals, was very strong this weekend. The focal point of that defense was goalie Dave Schelbe '86.

On Wednesday Williams will host R.P.I. and Deerfield, and they hope to have a home game against UMass this weekend.

Volleyball wiped out

by Sara Griffiths

The women's volleyball team traveled to Albany St. for the 3rd Annual Invitational Volleyball Tournament on Saturday.

Fifteen colleges split into three pools competed in the tournament. Williams played Rutgers, Binghamton, Colgate, and Columbia. The first match against Rutgers was Williams' weakest, mostly due to missed serves and play which was slow to warm up offensively. In the second game of the match Williams sparked up defensively and took the game but Rutgers came back to win the match, 6-15, 15-3, 2-15.

Against Binghamton and then Colgate, the Ephwomen's offensive playing improved tremendously as the team began to work together more effectively. "The scores of those two matches definitely do not reflect the skill level shown by Williams during the game," says coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin, "especially in the match against Binghamton." The final scores in the loss to Binghamton were 15-7, 15-3, and to Colgate were 15-6, 15-8.

One of the strong points of the day was the consistent strength of Kelly Andrews '86. She was reliable as a hitter and as a defensive blocker and helped keep the team together.

During the last match against Columbia, Williams played a strong defensive game and took the match to 3 games: 3-15, 15-11, 14-16. Hudson-Hamblin was impressed by the positive mental attitude of the Williams squad after 3 defeats: "they didn't let Columbia walk all over them and pushed Columbia right to the end and despite their disappointing finish, they kept improving throughout the tournament and played strongly."

Williams faces Mt. Holyoke and Connecticut at home on Thursday at 7 o'clock.

Ruggers nail Mt. Holyoke

by Helen Kaulbach

The Williams women's rugby football club started their intercollegiate schedule with two wins over Mount Holyoke Saturday, dominating the games with five tackles and fast runs.

The A-side outran, outtackled and outmatched Mount Holyoke, showing their expertise with the rules of the game. The try was scored by co-captain Lael Luedtke '84, resulting in a 4-0 win. Outstanding players included Marian Cremin '86, Allison Martin '85 and Anne Melvin '85 in the scrum, and Sunica Edelstein '85 and Robin Rutishauser '86 in the line.

The B-side pulled out a 4-0 win with a try scored by freshman Eileen Holland '87. Despite the team's lack of experience, the women held together remarkably against the Mount Holyoke women. Francie Billups 'Ex', Joan Horgan '87 and Stephanie Jacob '87 stood out in the scrum. Freshmen Maureen Ford and Anne Schmutz anchored the line.

Last week's game against the Used Bags alumni team ended as was proper. Alum Jane Parker '83 scored the only try in the first minutes of the second half. Barb Welcher '83, the only other Used Bag to show her face in Williamstown last weekend, played admirably, showing that alumni never lose their touch.

Golfers win

by Greg Keller

Paced by junior Mike Hennigan's four over par 75, the golf team defeated Middlebury, 392-414, and Hamilton, 398-455, last Tuesday at the Taconic Golf Course. Freshman Guy Kurtz fired a 77, while co-captain Eric Boyden '84, Chris Harned '85 and James Keneflick '86 all posted 80's.

After a disappointing finish in the Yale Invitational over the September 16-18 weekend, Coach Rudy Goff said he was happy to see the younger players filling the space left by the loss of four graduating seniors.

Unfortunately number one man Hennigan was not able to play in the New England Championships on September 26-27. "Hennigan has been a solid player for the past two years, and we were weakened by his absence," said Harned.

On Thursday, the Ephmen will play UMass, North Adams and R.P.I. at the Taconic Golf Course.

Runners win tight one

Molra Tevens of Dartmouth led her team to first place in the seventh annual Williams Invitational women's cross-country meet on Saturday. The Williams women came in ninth against the 13 teams that braved the 3.25 mile course. Lynn Vendinello '84 was the top Williams finisher with 38th place in the 115 runner field.

Middlebury claimed the number two and three finishers and second place overall. The University of Vermont took third. Fitchburg State, Hamilton, Smith, Springfield College and RPI finished in order ahead of Williams. Amherst, Westfield State, Tufts and Mount Holyoke rounded out the field.

Tennis edges Smith, annihilates Skidmore

by John Schafer

In their closest match of the year, the women's varsity tennis team squeaked by Smith 5-4 Saturday to gain their third straight victory since their season-opening defeat.

With the match score at four apiece, the spotlight centered on sophomore Liz Peay's number two singles contest, the last match on the courts, which would decide the winner.

Peay comes back

After losing the first set 6-1, Peay, who had just been moved up on the ladder from the third slot, fought back and escaped defeat by taking the second set in a tie-breaker. With the momentum her way, she then rolled to a 6-1 victory in the final set to give Williams the win.

"Liz got nailed in the first set, but she came back and then played very steady in the third set to win," said captain Marissa Gullino '84.

Sophomores Susan Brown and Betsy Shulman each won their matches in straight sets while Debbie Bernheimer '86, playing number six, recorded the fourth singles victory 6-1, 3-6, 6-1. The doubles combinations, which had been undefeated in the last two competitions, ran into some trouble at Smith, and only Sarah Menke '84 and Allison Holt '84 were victorious.

Field Hockey splits on week

by Dave Paulsen

The field hockey team (2-1) lost to Smith 3-1 on Saturday, although they beat Skidmore 2-0 last Tuesday.

Smith (4-0-1) jumped out to a 2-0 halftime lead, and although Williams played a much stronger second half, they could not come back.

The Ephwomen's high-powered offensive line was stymied by Smith's defense. Coach Julie McHugh said, "Nothing seemed to jell offensively in the first half."

McHugh cited the absence of senior co-captain Story Reed, who missed the contest due to illness, as a factor in the Williams defeat.

Williams' only score was netted by freshman halfback Sue Scarborough. The only other bright spot for the Ephs was the play of another freshman, sweep Lee Briggs.

Scatter Skidmore Williams goalie Jean Hakmiller '86 was not tested in the entire game on Tuesday, as the Ephwomen soundly beat Skidmore 2-0.

Williams jumped on the scoreboard seven minutes into the contest when forward Emily Sneath '85 scored on an assist from forward Carrie Cento '86.

With nine minutes left in the half, link Sue Harrington '84 continued her offensive outburst with a goal, assisted by a beautiful pass from Mace Foehl '85.

Although the Ephwomen did no more scoring in the contest, they clearly dominated play. Especially impressive was the teamwork and precision passing displayed by the offensive line.

McHugh was pleased with her team's play, citing the improvement made from last Sunday's game.

Gridders destroy Middlebury

by Paul Meeks

The football team convinced skeptics and lived up to high preseason expectations with a 29-14 blowout of rival Middlebury in its home opener Saturday at Weston Field.

The big question prior to the opening kickoff was the status of Williams' backfield, with starting running backs Ted Thomas '85 and Jeff Congdon '84 out with injuries.

Quarterback B.J. Connolly '84, Jay Hickman '86 and Rob Miller '87 moved the Ephs offensively without missing a beat for 315 total yards, 116 through the air.

Shut down Panthers

Defensively, the Williams secondary, a weakness in past seasons, intercepted twice and shut down the Panthers aerial attack (only 43 yards), while the interior held the opposition to a mere 150 yards on the ground.

Sean Crotty '84 had a big day at fullback with 109 yards in 20 attempts and two touchdowns.

Quarterback Connolly was intercepted three times, but threw a 31-yard touchdown toss to split end Marc Hummon '84 in a 9-for-20 outing. The quick and agile Connolly scrambled all over the Panthers and ran for paydirt from 15 yards out in the third period.

Hummon hauled in four passes for 63 yards during the contest. Tight end John McCarthy '84, recovering from sore ribs, grabbed three of Connolly's spirals for 22 yards.

Ephs can kick

Punter John DeLorenzo '84 and placekicker Chris Chapman '85 earned their keep and are threats to any opponent. DeLorenzo punted for an average of 40.4 yards in tight situations while Chapman accounted for five points, including a 43-yard field goal to ice the cake with 1:20 remaining.

The interior line pressured the Middlebury signal-callers all day and gave up only 150 yards rushing.

Secondary strong

Linebacker Mike Hawkins '84 and safety Bill Sperry '84 intercepted for the Ephmen. The secondary of Sperry, Tom MacLean '84, Ted Leon '84 and Joe Markland '84 was impressive, much improved from a year ago.

Williams struggled early, both offensively and defensively, yielding an early score to Middlebury midway through the first quarter. Gaining momentum, Williams rattled off the next 26 points, moving the ball at will. Connolly's pass protection and run-blocking were crucial throughout. Middlebury's final TD in the fourth quarter was too little too late.

An amazing 6440 attended the game. The Ephs take their show on the road to the University of Rochester to face the Yellowjackets Saturday at 1:30. The next home game is Oct. 15 against Bowdoin.

Women undefeated

Booters beat Smith

by Caroline McNerney

The women's soccer team has sprung off to a strong start this year, remaining undefeated after battling Skidmore on Wednesday and Smith in Saturday's game.

As in their game against Vassar last week, the team started slowly against Skidmore, playing a lethargic 15 minutes before picking up the pace with crisp, quick passes and alternating short and long balls.

Control play

Williams dominated throughout the game, working the ball upfield and controlling play in front of Skidmore's goal. However, in the first half the Ephwomen did not press their advantage by drilling in shots. Instead, the offense tended to dribble and pass around the penalty box. By the second half the team gained momentum and scored twice, ending the game at 2-0.

Center forward Lisa Dorian '87 made both goals, with an assist by speedy right winger Gigi Madore '87.

First win over Smith

The Ephwomen entered Saturday's game with a score to settle, having never defeated Smith in the history of the rivalry.

Thanks to Andrea Raphael '86, that score was settled and the winning streak remained unbroken. Starting as center halfback, Raphael moved quickly on a direct kick for Williams, pumping the ball high into the right corner of the net before Smith's defense had mobilized.

The team outshot Smith 17-13, with veteran goalie Laura Napolitano '85 making eight saves for a final score of 1-0.

The Ephwomen face Middlebury Wednesday on Panther turf.

Harriers tear to win

by Chris Stearns

On Friday the men's cross-country team left the crowd in awe as they crushed the University of Vermont and Albany State to raise their record to 4-0.

The big story was the way the Eph runners handled the competition, taking five out of the top eight places and finishing all of their top five runners under 26:07, an amazing time for the five mile course.

Everyone knew this would be a tough race for the Ephs, as they lost to both U.V.M. and Albany State last year. But such a close finish was unexpected. Exclaimed Coach Peter Farwell "The way these guys finished in such a close pack is something that I haven't seen in many years."

Unsurprisingly, John Nelson '84 again led the Ephs, this time taking second in an awesome 25:49.

A few yards

However, no one was prepared for the scene about to unfold in the next few seconds. Eight runners, separated by only a matter of yards, crossed the finish line in the following ten seconds. Although Albany State took third and fourth, and had high hopes of beating the Ephs, it was merely a dream as John Ellison '86, Tom Pingree '86, Mike Coyne '87, and Brian Angle '84 took fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth places, respectively, to seal up the win for Williams.

Two overtimes, no goals: soccer ties with Middlebury

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

Although Middlebury netted two goals in Saturday's men's soccer game, they came up empty-handed as the score remained 0-0 after two overtime periods.

The referee ruled that time had expired when the first goal went in with 00:00 left in the first overtime period.

This ruling was vehemently protested by Middlebury because the sideline referee, who counted down the final ten seconds to the field referee, was actually between 1 and 2 seconds ahead of the official clock. Nonetheless, the goal was disallowed.

Do it again

The Panthers, in shock and disbelief, went on to score again just 28 seconds into the second overtime. Middlebury players and fans were again ecstatic, but only for a few seconds. One of their forwards had been offside—again the goal was disallowed.

Middlebury coach Ron McEachen was disappointed with the refereeing. "We thought there was still time on the clock, and he didn't see the second goal going off a defender's foot. And later in the overtime, Murphy pushed one of our players to grab a corner kick. But they didn't call anything. We didn't like the inconsistency, but what can we do?"

No goals were scored in the remainder of the OT period.

During the entire game, Middlebury and Williams both played well and were evenly matched.

An offensive drive by Middlebury halfway through the first period was held back by outstanding play by Williams goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85. Murphy stopped a 1-on-1 play, then followed with a deflection and another spectacular save off a direct kick.

The Ephmen then put together a tough offense but were unable to penetrate the Panther defense. Standout players for Williams were halfbacks Dan Aramini '84 and Jon Deveaux '87, though all their players demonstrated high quality.

Last Tuesday, the team opened its season with a 2-1 win at R.P.I.

Neither team scored in the first half. The Ephmen were "a little hesitant, a little tentative" at the start but "settled down and played a good first half," according to Coach Michael Russo.

Jeff McEvoy '86 opened the scoring 1:58 into the second half off an assist from Scott Walker '87. The lead was short-lived, though, as R.P.I. struck back with a goal a minute later.

Despite that goal, Russo said the Ephs "pretty much dominated" the second half. At 28:26, Mark Schroeder '86 headed a corner kick by John Campbell '84 into the goal which provided the winning margin.

Booth: Grade inflation over Statistics reveal decline over last five years

by Stuart Smith

Grade inflation at Williams has leveled off and grades have stabilized at a median grade point average of 8.23, according to figures recently compiled by Associate Provost David Booth.

As a result of his findings, Booth said grade inflation is "no longer an issue" at Williams, but Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor disagrees.

The median grade has remained fairly constant since 1974, but before that the College was plagued with rapid grade inflation stretching back to the 1950s. The median GPA rose from 6.6 in 1954 to 8.28 in 1974.

The median is defined as the middle value in a set of ordered values, such as GPA's, as opposed to the average of all the numbers.

O'Connor's campaign

The median GPA hit its zenith in 1978 at 8.34, which led O'Connor to launch his much-publicized campaign to convince both teachers at Williams and deans at other colleges in New England of the dangers of cushy grading.

O'Connor said he thinks the problem still exists at Williams and in other ivory towers. "The fact that the rate of grade inflation has plateaued doesn't mean that the problem has disappeared," O'Connor said. "What it means is that we have regained a sense of proportion on grading."

He added that he feels the median grade is still at too high a level when compared to the past. "A 'B' median is incredible," O'Connor said.

O'Connor also said that the rapid grade inflation was "very dangerous in that it devalued the standards of the institution and made grades less credible." It would help students, he said, "if the median went down to a more sensible level such as a B-."

However, Booth said he thinks the slight drop-off in median GPA since 1977 is evidence that teachers' behavior is changing. "There was no decline in the measured academic ability of the classes that entered during that period," he said.

Different standards

Another problem that both Booth and O'Connor emphasized was that of differences in the grading standards of different departments. Booth noted that there are "no college guidelines on grading, different departments do very different things." He added that he would be "very surprised if there are many department-wide grading standards."

O'Connor agreed and said that there should be "some attempt to get agreement between departments about what the letters mean." One would expect the grades of the various departments to average out over time, he said, "but that doesn't happen."

The median GPA has risen since the '50s, but grade inflation has leveled off since 1974, a new College study has found. Last year the median GPA actually fell from its 1978 high of 8.3. On the College's grading scale, a 12 is an A-plus, a 9 is a B-plus, a 6 is a C-plus and so forth.

Touch-tone phones coming in January

by Nick Levis

Students will receive touch-tone phones by January or soon after as part of a major improvement in the College's phone system, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden.

The new phone system was originally supposed to be installed over the summer, but legal complications arising from the break-up of American Telephone and Telegraph (AT&T) caused the six-month delay and may cost the College more money in the long run.

Last year, the College began the process by choosing a new Dimension switching system to replace the old Centrex system. Unlike Centrex, the Dimension can be used to control service for each phone, so that a student who doesn't pay his or her phone bill will not lose all service but will be limited to "Williamstown only" or "campus only" service.

This feature will allow the Dean's Office to call the delinquent student and demand payment, according to Riorden. It will also make phone service over the summer possible for visitors to the College.

Ma Bell pressure

The Centrex switching system, which was installed in the basement of Hopkins Hall in 1972, has had many problems, according to Riorden. Although the whole system was never completely out of order, phone company repairs were almost always repairing some part of the system, he said.

College Vice President and Treasurer William Reed called the Centrex system "a major maintenance concern." AT&T, which was trying to update the national telephone network, has been applying pressure on customers to switch to Dimension by threatening to raise maintenance charges on Centrex systems, said Riorden.

The Centrex system presents other problems as well. Although Wide-Area Telephone Service (WATS) can be installed on Centrex, the Centrex cannot keep track of the individual departments that use it. WATS is a system that reduces long-distance charges for heavy users.

The new Dimension will help the College avoid the increased long-distance costs it incurred last year when departments overused a WATS line which the College temporarily installed in faculty and administrative offices, Riorden said. The Dimension, which will cost $250,000, will accommodate WATS and will individually bill each department for its calls.

The Dimension offers many other time and money saving features, such as Call Forwarding in faculty and administrative offices. These services will not be offered to students.

The Dimension will also take up much less space than

The Williams Record

No one I know

"I don't care if someone's gay, as long as I don't have to hear about it." This is a common sentiment, but is it as fair as it sounds to those who believe it? Why should homosexuals have to pretend to be something else?

This year has seen and will continue to see an increase in publicity and discussion about the role of gays and lesbians here on campus. The Gaudino Forum is addressing that issue as part of its "Gay at the Movies/Gay at Williams" topic, and Williams' Gay and Lesbian Union has taken a more public stance which will grow as the year continues. We as a community can determine the effect this publicity will have on our lives and the lives of a largely invisible minority.

Some may view this rapid increase in information about homosexuals as an invasion by the gay and lesbian community into our "straight" campus social structure. That would be a mistake. One lesson of this year's discussion should not be that there are more homosexuals than previously, but that more are asking to be recognized—and that some of those around us whom we think to be straight only hide their sexual identities for fear of our reactions. We must see an element that already exists. Taken correctly, the publicity this year is an invitation to learn more about that element.

The atmosphere on campus currently discourages that kind of investigation. This is a very conservative college, and many people assume that "No one I know is gay." As a result, passing derogatory remarks about "queers" and "faggots" go unchecked and are often encouraged. In addition, many of us describe our straight sexual experiences or fantasies when among our friends, unthinkingly placing pressure on gays and lesbians around us to do the same. On the other hand, were homosexuals to relate their sexual experiences, they would be met with hostility.

But most homosexuals seek no such outlet. At the risk of generalization, they seek only to live their lives without fear of repercussion for what, to them, is often not a matter of choice but of natural behavior. By classifying gays and lesbians as deviant, we force them to hide their homosexuality, and thus to use an ability not available to other minorities—to hide their minority status and to "play straight". This means that homosexuals, as well as straights, often do not know the extent of the homosexual community.

By signalling our willingness to examine our attitudes, we can make gays and lesbians more comfortable, and make ourselves more comfortable with gays and lesbians. We must make that effort, or our discussion this year will see little result.

It seems to me that we're a sad bunch if all we have to speak out against is the new dishroom system in Baxter. What I'd like to know is, what do you do with

Baker, Falwell debate on Russia

Associate Professor of Political Science Raymond W. Baker appeared on national television Friday night and debated Moral Majority leader Jerry Falwell on "Communism: What Is It and Why Is It a Threat?"

The live segment, shot in Detroit, appeared as part of Public Broadcasting Service's "Late Night America" show.

According to Public Information Director Ray Boyer, who saw the debate, Falwell's position was that "Russians are bent on one thing and one thing alone — taking over the world. Baker of course responded that that's entirely too simplistic." Baker said he has done a lot of media debating but had never before taken on Falwell.

"I disagree with everything he says. I think I agree with Reagan more than he; that's extraordinary," he said.

"I think he's absolutely irresponsible and dangerous as a political force in this country," he added. "That's why I did it." Boyer characterized the debate as "heated" and "exciting." "Falwell would make a statement and Baker would be right there with the response," he said. "The two of them were obviously clever debaters."

"Baker stood up extremely well against Falwell. He did a terrific job," added Boyer. "It's not the kind of thing where you can declare a winner, but Baker was sure no loser."

According to Boyer, at the beginning of the debate Falwell mistook Baker's name, referring to him as "Prof. Gray" and "Prof. Green." Later on, Baker called Falwell "Forwell" several times.

When an angered Falwell then snapped "what, my name's FALWELL," Baker put his hand on Falwell's arm and said "now we both know each other's name," Boyer said.

Boyer hopes to show his videotape of the debate on campus sometime soon.

reports that members of the Middlebury administration confronted Grace and he admitted to the actions.

Grace wrote a formal apology to Middlebury President Olin Robison and withdrew from the college last Friday.

Dean of Students Erica Wonnacott said, "He's obviously a young man with a lot of problems," according to the Globe.

In a Letter to the Editor in The Middlebury Campus, Grace said, "Despite all, I consider these attacks as the acts of a solitary deranged person. I did not sense any atmosphere of racial intolerance here at all."

Wonnacott said after Grace left for his home in Burlington, Massachusetts, "I'm glad it's over. Thank goodness it's over." The college is not pressing charges against Grace for the damage he caused.

Architect, CUL tour Baxter

Architect John Jordan and members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) toured Baxter Hall last Tuesday to develop ideas for a new design for the student center. The most crucial problem confronting Baxter is unused and misused space, Jordan said.

The basement is a prime example, he said, because entrances and exits are small and poorly located. This problem could be solved, however, if the College would move organizations with specific functions to the basement, Jordan said. Groups such as The Record and the Outing Club would not be affected by reduced access to offices there, he said.

Another priority facing the CUL is how best to move large groups of students through Baxter. "This building has a lot of funny entrances and exits," said Jordan. By establishing a better traffic flow, he continued, this problem could be eliminated.

The traffic problem is most apparent in the mailroom. Jordan suggested moving mailboxes to what is now Baxter Lounge, providing more space for collection and reading of mail.

Snack bar stairway?

Jordan also suggested expanding the Snack Bar by connecting it with the Rathskeller by a stairway. He pointed out, however, that cost and fire safety considerations would make this a complicated and expensive project, and added that the Snack Bar could be expanded in other, simpler ways. One way could be the construction of an addition where the courtyard on the south side of Baxter now stands, he said.

The incidents, beginning with racial notes and culminating in the breaking of Grace's window, caused an uproar on the Middlebury campus and an all-college meeting.

One note was sent to Boston for handwriting analysis. The results indicated that Grace had written them. The Boston Globe

New York City bus is back

Daily bus service from Williamstown to New York returns this year at prices lower than last year. Bonanza Bus Lines has agreed to operate daily while Englander Coach Lines will continue to operate weekend service.

The Bonanza buses will leave daily from the Williams Inn at 10:10 AM Monday through Friday. A 4:10 PM bus run by Englander will continue to depart on Friday, Saturday and Sunday. A one-way ticket will cost $21.50, $8.85 less than last year's fare. There will also be a special one-day, round-trip excursion fare of $22.95. The one-day excursion only gives you a brief one-and-three-quarter hour visit to the Big Apple, since Bonanza's daily return trip leaves at 4:45 PM daily from Manhattan's Port Authority Bus Terminal in Manhattan.

On Fridays, Saturdays, and Sundays, Englander's buses will depart at 8:45 a.m.

The trip will take approximately five hours in both directions.

Last year's carrier, Vermont Transit Lines, dropped Williamstown service last spring because of lack of interest among the student body, according to Scott Smith of the Williams Inn, who coordinates bus service there.

Bonanza moved in with lower rates and more buses this year, said executive vice-president of Bonanza George Hunter in a telephone interview. "Because of the general community with Williams and North Adams State, we feel there will be enough demand for service to New York City," Hunter said.

WCFM raises money for ABC

WCFM's 25th anniversary party raised over $500 to benefit the Mt. Greylock "A Better Chance" (ABC) program last Saturday night.

Although only 150 people showed up to pay the $5 entrance fee, prize and liquor donations from local businesses cut costs for WCFM. The College security guards on duty also donated their services. Thus WCFM was able to donate most of the money it raised.

Music director Bill Wright '84 said, "We would have liked to raise more money for ABC, but we learned a lot from the experience."

In the raffle Senior Charlie Mitchell won the grand prize, a weekend trip to Montreal during fall reading period. Second prize winner Bill Sawyers '84 won 25 records which were donated from Warner Brothers. Amy Barstad '87 will get to select 25 records from CBS.

Local restaurants donated dinners which were won by two Williams students, one Williamstown resident and a Smith College student.

Trinity spares frats

Faculty irate; wanted frats forced to coed

by Christian Howlett

Controversy continues to rage at Trinity College between students, faculty and trustees over whether fraternities should become coeducational or cease to exist altogether.

"The faculty are still really up in arms about the trustees having betrayed them by letting the frats continue to exist," said a member of the dean's office who asked not to be named. As for College President James English, "he's in a no-win situation," the member said.

In response to a December letter from the faculty urging that the fraternities be closed, and an April letter from President English that they be kept but modified, the Trustees announced at Commencement that the frats must become coeducational by Oct. 1 unless granted a specific exemption from the president.

To obtain an exemption a fraternity must submit a petition indicating that within three-quarters of its membership wishes to retain the single-sex status. The exemption would have to be renewed every three years.

"I would imagine that almost all of them are going to want an exemption," the dean's office source said. President English has publicly announced he will grant exemptions to all fraternities who petition.

Faculty protest

As a result, five motions pertaining to the fraternities are currently before the faculty.

College counsels problem eaters

by Philip Busch

Eating disorders are increasingly viewed as a problem at Williams, according to College nutritionist Ginny Skorupski and Infirmary psychiatric counselor Barbara Joslyn, who has formed a weekly counseling group for women students to deal with psychological problems associated with eating.

Eating disorders range from moderately excessive concern about weight to potentially fatal anorexia nervosa, a pathological self-starvation. Bulimia, another serious disorder, is a cycle of eating "binges" often followed by self-induced vomiting or excessive use of laxatives to prevent weight gain.

Such disorders are "absolutely a problem" here, Skorupski said. "I've counseled people who were obvious anorexics, and I frequently see people with some of the symptoms such as refusal to eat despite dangerous weight loss, she said.

"Williams seems to be a target-type population," she added. "Most anorexia victims are well-to-do females who are bright and usually anxious to please their families and friends. Female athletes also tend to be very weight-conscious."

"Eating disorders are a fairly widespread problem," said Joslyn. "I've seen students with anorexia and bulimia...students have been hospitalized for treatment in a few instances."

Anorexic students rarely fail academically, according to Joslyn. "I've never seen one flunk out," she said, "but they may become social dropouts who become increasingly wrapped up in not eating and in being physically active."

'In control'

Anorexics are unlikely to come in for counseling, said Joslyn, because they see themselves as increasingly successful while their condition worsens.

"It's a psychological problem," explained Skorupski. "Our society focuses on female beauty and slenderness, and this is one way of saying 'I am in absolute control.' Anorexics think they look better the less they weigh."

Bulimics are more likely to come in for counseling than anorexics, said Joslyn, but are more difficult to spot. "They can be normal weight," said Skorupski, "and their friends may never see them 'binge and purge.'"

Joslyn's counseling group is one approach to eating disorders. "We had regular attend-

LECTURE NOTES

Hoppin explains Sappho's poetry

Was the ancient Greek poetess Sappho "a whorish woman, love crazy," as described by Tatian in 180 A.D., or was she the "violet-haired, pure, honey-smiling Sappho" described by Alcaeus?

Classics Professor Meredith Hoppin addressed these and other questions about Sappho and her erotic poetry in a lecture Thursday titled "Nymphs, Gardens and Song: Sappho's Retreat from the Traffic in Pleasure and Desire."

Sappho's poetry consisted mainly of wedding songs and erotic lyrics and was probably performed for small groups of women, possibly of the cult of Aphrodite, as part of an initiation for girls entering womanhood, Hoppin said.

Therefore, Sappho was probably not a "whorish woman" or social outcast who publicly poured forth her private emotions. Her homo-erotic poetry was most likely meant for her close friends, Hoppin said.

Hoppin said that one poem verse, "Sweet mother, truly, I cannot work the loom since I am overwhelmed through Aphrodite by desire for slender youth," is typical of Sappho's writing, as well as the writing of other poets of the time, because the reader cannot distinguish if the "youth" referred to is male or female. Writers of the age often wrote to homosexual or bisexual lovers, Hoppin said.

"Sappho presents an economy of pleasure and desire in which one party does not dominate the other. Instead the two relationships are characterized by mutual sharing and empowering," concluded Hoppin, who added that she is currently preparing a course on women in the ancient world.

Hoppin's lecture was the first of five in this year's History of Ideas Colloquium on Pleasure.

Feminists discuss links to N.Y. nukes

The linking of the peace movement with the feminist movement at the nuclear arms protest rally in Seneca Falls, N.Y. this summer helped feminists' solidarity but may have hurt their image, according to members of both groups at a discussion last Tuesday.

About 25 members of the Williams Feminist Alliance and the Williamstown Nuclear Freeze Office met at St. Raphael's

Church on Cole Ave. In their discussion, entitled "Feminism and the Peace Movement: A Critical Look at Seneca Women's Peace Encampment," they discussed the encampment in Seneca Falls this summer of hundreds of women who held demonstrations and vigils protesting nuclear arms.

Their largest demonstration occurred Aug. 1 when nearly 300 women were arrested during a rally in front of nearby Seneca Army Depot, believed to house nuclear weapons.

Tuesday's discussion included several of the women who were involved in the Seneca encampment and the Aug. 1 demonstration. Some said they had sensed feelings of hostility towards men among the women at the encampment and some were offended that their husbands were not welcome.

Negative connotation

Several of the participants spoke of the danger in associating the feminism and peace movements since feminism has negative connotations for some people.

Most of the women involved said they felt that at Seneca the feminist movement wasn't "riding on the crest of the wave of the peace movement."

But others felt the involvement of women's groups was important. "It [Seneca] was more successful as a women's group; it might not have happened at all another way," one participant said.

Another participant, Pam Baker of New Ashford, described how state police at the Aug. 1 demonstration told a group of women to climb over the gate of the military base and allow themselves to be arrested in order to protect themselves from violence.

"We discussed it and made our decision in consensus," Baker said. "That wouldn't have happened with men there."

Although Seneca gained a lot of attention for being solely female, next summer it might include men, since, according to Judy Fitzgerald of the Williamstown Weapons Freeze Office, "we're all striving for the same thing, men and women."

Law dean fights nativity scenes

Jonathan Chase '61, Dean of Vermont Law School, gave seniors a taste of a lawyer's life by describing his work with a case involving the legality of publicly-sponsored nativity scenes.

He spoke last Monday in the first of a series of lectures sponsored by the Office of Career Counseling (OCC) designed to give seniors exposure to different job opportunities.

In the case, Lemon vs. Kurzman, Chase is representing the plaintiffs, a group of Denver atheists who are challenging the right of the City of Denver to sponsor a nativity scene on the steps of city hall.

Chase is representing this group on the behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union. He said took the case because, among other reasons, he felt it was something which could touch his and his family's lives.

At present the case is frozen in the upper levels of the Western District Courts because a similar case in Pawtucket, R.I. will be heard by the Supreme Court this fall. Chase thinks the result of his case hinges on the outcome of that one.

The opponents of nativity scenes in the Pawtucket case won their case before the Supreme Court consented to hear it on appeal. But Chase said he thinks their victory may be overturned and the legality of nativity scenes upheld. "In most of the cases the Court hears, it overturns the decision of the lower court," Chase said.

cil decided to return the GLU's budget to the Committee for reconsideration so that the issue of printing costs can be clarified.

Despite pleas from Bruce Rutherford '84, treasurer of the Committee for Palestinian Rights, that last year his group made "administrative mistakes because of ignorance [of the correct procedure for running an organization]," the Council passed the Financial Committee's recommendation to cut the group's funding by $166, to $504.

SAT too low

In an interview after the meeting, Council Treasurer Hamilton Humes '85 explained why the budget cuts which many campus groups are facing were necessary.

"The Student Activities Tax last year was $65, but we found $10,000 that hadn't been used the year before," said Humes, "so there was more money to go around—the effective SAT was $72 last year."

"So even though the SAT went up to $70, that wasn't enough, so we had to make cuts," Humes said.

Another one of the Council's upcoming tasks will be to help with the plans for remodeling Baxter Hall. At Thursday's meeting Dean David Colby asked for input from the Council as to what it sees as goals for the building. He said the Committee for Undergraduate Life expects to begin drawing up plans before Thanksgiving.

In response, the Council formed a subcommittee to determine how Baxter can best serve the needs of the student body.

ance for the support group last year," she said. Joslyn hopes to keep the momentum going this year, focusing on the meaning of food and the participants' images of their own bodies. "We're available to anyone," she said, "but they have to come to us."

The group is limited to women because of women's unique concern about these issues, said Joslyn. The group is for any woman concerned about eating, not just those with severe disorders.

A "non-aggressive" counseling approach to the problem is best, said Skorupski. "Active interference usually repels a person." One non-aggressive approach involves the "table tents" on dining hall tables warning of harmful dieting practices.

Peer Health counselors can also help with eating problems. "I wouldn't say it's a pervasive problem," said Peer Health coordinator Bill Sawyers '84, "but one case is one too many."

Peer Health counselors usually try to work through a friend of the victim to persuade her to seek professional help.

Centrex and it will generally be quicker and easier to repair, Reed said. The extra room gained in Hopkins Hall will be used as office space, he said.

The Dimension is now being installed and will be hooked up over Christmas Break. The touch tone phones will be in student rooms by Winter Study, according to Riorden.

The delays have been caused by the break-up of AT&T, which left two of AT&T's independent divisions, American Bell Advanced Information Systems (ABAIS) and New England Telephone (NET), in dispute over which one would own the telephone equipment at Williams.

Riorden said that all the telephone lines which the College uses belong to NET, and under the terms of the break-up it is illegal to have the same cables carrying NET and ABAIS services. New cables had to be installed throughout campus, and Riorden said, "In the long run, we're going to pay for it."

Gays at Williams lead 'double life'

Fear of 'fixed labels' confines gays to quiet existence

by Benjamin Duke

With this fall's Gaudino Forum focusing on "Gay at the Movies, Gay at Williams," and with a spate of publicity generated by a more assertive Gay and Lesbian Union (GLU), sexual attitudes and preferences and the issues surrounding them have begun to gain a scrutiny on campus unprecedented since the formation of the first gay people's organization here in 1973.

Yet twining through that tentative curiosity, agree gay women and men interviewed over the last two weeks, remains the same distrust and hostility typical in the past among much of the heterosexual population. That unfriendliness has done much to make the many gay students at Williams a mute and often anxious minority.

Public awareness

To the surprise of many gays and lesbians on campus, however, the first event in the Gaudino series packed the house in Bronfman when screenwriter/director John Sayles '72 and producer Maggie Renz '73 came to Williams to discuss their most recent film, Lianna, which is about a woman's first homosexual affair.

The following week, on September 20, a gay physician, Dr. William Harding '73, gave a lecture addressing the current epidemic of acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), the incurable disease which debilitates the human immune system and has primarily afflicted homosexual men.

The lecture, sponsored by the GLU, marked the beginning of the group's campaign to increase awareness and understanding of gays and lesbians among the heterosexual population at Williams.

Magnified problems

That awareness, gays and lesbians agree, is rare among the large majority of students here. And with a small, close-knit community turning a healthy rumor mill, they add, the problems and hostility gays and lesbians can experience anywhere can be magnified into a day-to-day burden.

"There's a disruption of lifestyle," says one senior political science major. "There's a lot of depression and frustration among gay people."

As a result, many lesbians and gays end up playing their emotional cards especially close to the vest. The small number who openly acknowledge their homosexuality, and the few gay students willing to have their names printed publicly, suggests how they have responded to the pressures they face here.

The active gay population at Williams, which GLU members estimate at between 70 and 100 women and men, has thus never formed a distinct community with its own identity. Instead scattering among all segments of the student body. Though largely a natural scattering, since homosexuality describes neither interests nor abilities, the gay population still suffers for lack of a distinct self-reliant social cell of its own.

At the same time, many gay students feel forced to keep their sexual preferences disguised, fearing that openness would only lose them many of their heterosexual friends. They choose to open how many potential friendships I would sacrifice."

That label can become indelible in the small, mainly conservative atmosphere at Williams, where, she notes "you don't disappear" and much of the population shuns unconventional behavior.

In fact, a powerful aversion to acquiring a fixed label leads some gay students into hiding their homosexuality even from most other gay students. A portion of the gay population becomes "invisible," with "closeted" gay students mingling only among exclusively heterosexual, and often homophobic, groups of friends.

Reactions

More commonly, gay students lead a "double life" by letting down their reserve with only a few close friends. "Sometimes you forget that the rest of the community isn't as relaxed as you are," one woman observes. "It would be so much easier if you could just tell everyone—and no one would care because it's not something that should matter."

"It comes to a point where you're afraid to meet people because you don't know what's going to happen if they even pick up on what you're doing," a male senior agrees. "A gay person on campus will approach someone almost as a straight person. There's a lot of role-playing."

Other gay students who have come out openly, however, say that many of their fears proved unfounded.

"I expected that there would be more repercussions," says one sophomore art major. "I don't think there's a pervasive homophobia. It's not an active hatred, it's basically homophobia through lack of awareness, lack of understanding."

"After a while, you realize that, really, no one seems to care," observes assistant professor of theater Bruce Goodrich, commenting on attitudes toward gay students on campus. "No one looks the other way in the halls."

Yet there are some tribulations that come from being open. "I always expect to see something about myself on the wall" of a dormitory bathroom, says one senior, who also notes that coming out also laid him open to offhand slurs at parties or at the Log.

And one can no longer put on a disguise in the presence of hostility, he continues. "You find yourself getting along really well with someone and they know everything about you except that you're gay. Then as soon as they find that out, boom. There's that fear of being rejected."

One gay student, who co-heads the GLU, emphasizes the possible barriers to employment

"Even the best fall because of irrational prejudices."

up among small groups of gay and other straight friends who are comfortable with the various sexual orientations.

Reasons for prejudice

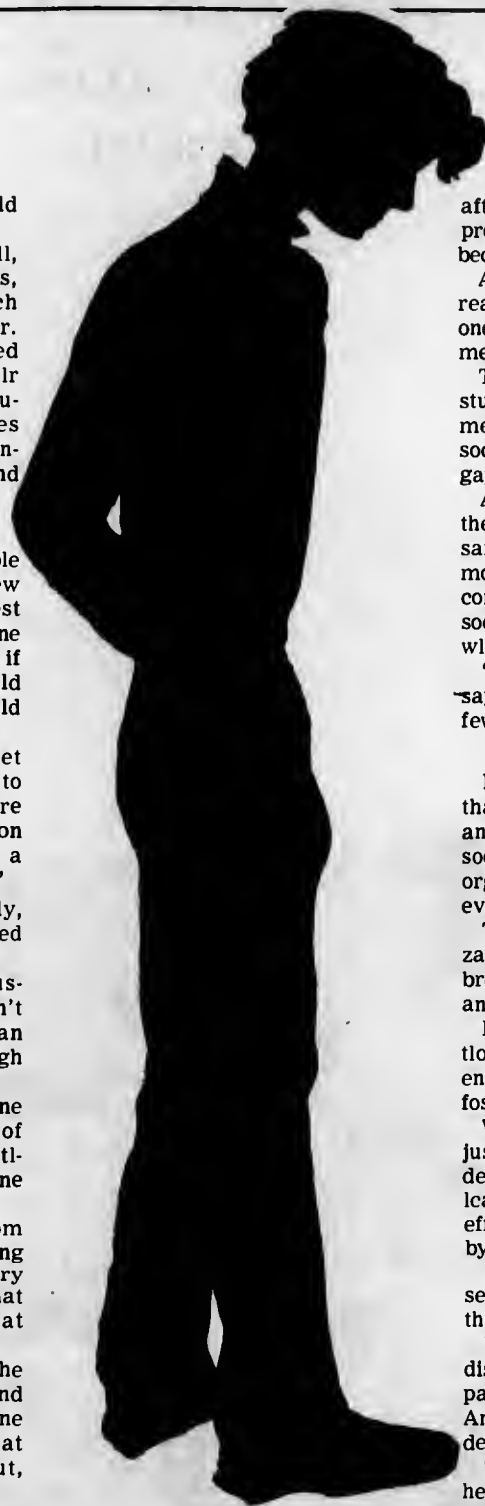

The hostile atmosphere has sowed fertile ground for speculation. Gay students offer an abundance of possible explanations, most focusing on the inflexibility of social conventions here. The GLU takes an official point of view in its standard leaflet, suggesting that "Prejudice against gay people is at times a form of projection—an effort to deny homosexual attractions within ourselves."

Whatever the causes of such prejudice, lesbians and gays agree that the categories of "gay" and "straight" people—and those of "normal" and "deviant" behavior—manufacture false distinctions which help to preserve widespread ignorance about sexual preferences. While each person's sexual interests wash across hard and fast lines, they argue, people use such labels to make gays and lesbians seem fundamentally different from themselves.

Indelible labelling

"People don't know how to relate to gay people," remarks one lesbian sophomore. "With men, they don't know how to deal with you because there are no role models. Once you're labelled gay, you're cutting off most of the people from being comfortable around you."

By dropping the disguise, she says, "You're labelled and I can't even begin to know what would happen if everybody knew. And I wonder

Ellmann draws Wilde life: relates Oxford anecdotes

by Martha Foley

Prominent biographer and literary critic Richard Ellmann entertained a Williams audience with a compilation of lively anecdotes titled "Oscar Wilde at Oxford."

Renowned for his interpretations and biographical sketches of James Joyce and W.B. Yeats as well as Wilde, Emory University professor Ellmann offered a spirited orientation for understanding the literary critic and playwright.

Decadence

Providing insight into the deliberate contradictions entangled in Wilde's playful language, Ellmann described the influences and activities pursued by Wilde during his years at Oxford. Wilde said of that period (1874-1878): "I never sowed wild oats, but I have planted a few orchids."

Ellmann placed the root of Wilde's famed wit, unexpectedness and enthusiasm for decadence in his family experience. His father did "nothing predictable"; his mother wrote Irish nationalistic poetry and formed with young Oscar the Society for Suppression of Virtue.

"Wilde was caricatured as an indignant aesthete at Oxford," Ellmann explained, and was conspicuous in his "self-mocking excess and insolence to putative superiors."

Preoccupation

His fondness for subverting authority, for toying with convention, did not prevent his maturation. On the contrary, he was later to write: "Any preoccupation with what is right or wrong in conduct shows an arrested intellectual development."

Ellmann explained that Wilde's development defied linear definition—contradictory influences moved him in many directions. Dabbling in hetero- and homosexuality, Freemasonry and Catholicism, as well as different schools of aestheticism, Wilde never hesitated to follow his various inclinations. According to Ellmann, "between alternatives, he chose both."

Wilde's little-publicized interest in social reform was cultivated by religion and the teachings of Oxford professor and art critic John Ruskin. Like Ruskin, Wilde strongly believed that art played a role in the improvement of society.

Refined decadence

Yet even as he looked to Ruskin for spiritual guidance, Wilde was profoundly moved by the writings of Walter Pater. Through Pater's encouragement to relish "not the fruit of experience but the experience itself," he learned a "refined and comely decadence," and discovered that beauty could contain a touch of evil.

Ellmann indicated that Wilde tried to resolve the contradictions in his life, but eventually came to view them as a source of strength. He pointed out writings which reveal Wilde's attraction to heights and depths, and to the capability of acting in adversity to principles. His most famous play, The Importance of Being Earnest, contains "a parody of his own tendency to look for contradictions," Ellman said.

Wilde's nonconforming and controversial style had specific roots in convention, in the unyielding rules of organized religion and of academia. Ellmann concluded that Wilde emerged from Oxford with the conviction that life's complexities can not be reduced to "The Twenty Commandments" or "Forty-nine Articles" or any plus-and-minus creed, but that the "the object of life is not to simplify it."

Beckett's "Play" christens DownStage

by Sean McAvoy and Susan Reller

Beckett's "Play" assaults the audience. For thirty-five minutes three actors—encased in urns—with only their heads visible—pour forth a dialogue full of frustrated emotion and haunting impotence.

Isolation and futility

Isolation permeates this piece—in the staging, in the lighting, in both the tangible and the created. The actors, Cameron Smith, Regina Kelly and Martha Hughes, all class of '86, have only their faces and voices to illustrate Beckett's brief and unconventional exploration of human futility. Throughout "Play" their respective characters of husband, wife and mistress grope for each other in a pathetic love triangle wrought from misdirected passions.

The emotional intensity of "Play" builds frantically and believably. And, as the relationships portrayed develop toward their poignant yet sterile climax the audience is, almost unwillingly, drawn into the stagnant, limited world of the playwright's creation.

Compelling and tart Hughes is startlingly compelling.

ing, maniacal and tart as the mistress. "Am I not perhaps a little unhinged already?" she asks. She does not just deliver her lines; she calls forth an essence that is forcible and consistent in the form of a so humanly inconsistent and vital character. Hughes is exemplary. Her performance refreshingly avoids that jaundiced, self-conscious, "I am on stage" overkill so typical of dilettante productions. She is subtle in her regard for the mechanics of Beckett's work; in the rhythm of "Play" her character is caustic in the beginning, achieves full force in the middle portion of the play, and recedes into pitiful haunting repetition in the end.

Conjecture-ridden

Smith is believable as the fantasy- and conjecture-ridden husband. His character tries to convince himself that what he speaks is genuine truth: "God, what vermin women." And, he occasionally breaks down in confrontations with reality: "I know now all that was just play." Smith creates a character who is wry and poignant and very human. At times his theatrical consciousness prevents his character's moments of

Dartmouth

"In the bedroom, in the boardroom, on the playing field, on the battlefield, women have proven that they can play ball."

"What kind of men do women want? Big, hairy-chested, arrogant 'machos' men. Right? Wrong. But not 'quiche-eaters' either. They want real, sincere, personable men. Men with a sense of humor who care about what their women want and feel. Men with a touch of class."

So reads the promotion for the newest profit-making endeavor of the Dartmouth Entrepreneurs Club: a 16-month calendar titled "Men of the Ivy League." The calendar sports photographs of men from Brown, Columbia, Cornell, Dartmouth, Harvard, Princeton and Yale posed in such natural settings as Princeton's crew shell, the Charles River, a Mercedes and with such props as lacrosse sticks, frisbees, dogs and even books.

A statement from the model, such as "Women are some of the finest things that God created and deserve to be treated as such," accompanies each photograph. Twelve hundred copies of the calendar have already been sold.

Holy Cross

The Dean of Students Office (DOS) at Holy Cross has changed the party policy on the Holy Cross campus. DOS eliminated student campus beer representatives and hired four non-students to deliver beer and collect empty kegs, all of which must be done through the Dean's office. DOS must approve all parties, even private parties, and may limit the number of kegs at any party on campus.

Middlebury

Middlebury students also face increasing regulation by the administration regarding alcoholic beverages. "There will be no carrying around outside of open bottles or cans of alcohol... These bottles and cans litter the campus. It doesn't look good for visiting parents," Middlebury director of campus security Fred Spencer told the Middlebury Campus.

Furthermore, "a student's name and identification number will also be recorded if he is found passed out in a hallway or outside. These procedures are being enforced to benefit the problem drinker," Spencer explained.

Middlebury Dean of Students Erica Wonnacott has said that "the current definition of a party is 'more than five people in a room with alcohol making noise for more than 45 minutes.'"

Tenor ranges from Mozart to Afro-American

by Tracey Tenser and Carl Leafstedt

Last Friday night, in Brooks Rogers Recital Hall, tenor William Brown and pianist Charlotte Hegyi presented a program ranging from Mozart to African and Afro-American music.

At the beginning of the concert, Brown walked onto the dimmed stage alone and began to sing/chant a short song cycle by the contemporary South African composer Priaux Ranier, entitled, "Cycle for Declamation." This unaccompanied set of songs, set to a text by John Donne, was conveyed with an intensity that captivated the audience.

Emotional Brahms

More traditional selections comprised the remainder of the first half of the program: especially well-received were the four Brahms songs, during which the audience broke into uncharacteristic applause following the very emotional rendering of "Feldesamkeit."

This responsiveness of the audience was characteristic of the whole concert, particularly the second half, in which Brown sang a wide variety of the music for which he has become famous—African and Afro-

American music. Before his performance of two traditional Zulu tribal songs, Brown gave some humorous explanations, and described how he devised one instrument, the "click" instrument, to replace the "clicking" sound made by the Zulus in their speech, which he admitted he could not incorporate into his singing.

Also notable on Friday's program was the duo's rendition of David Baker's "The Black Experience." This is a set of five songs composed especially for Brown in 1971. Brown performed these with even more than his usual amount of expressiveness in voice and facial features. He added a theatrical element as well, by quietly walking off the stage as the piece was ending.

Special mention must be given to Hegyi for her fine performance of the many difficult and technical passages, especially in the Brahms songs. She played with a sensitivity which added considerably to the effectiveness of the duo. This effectiveness was enhanced by the visible enthusiasm of both Brown and Hegyi, who, in good humor, even went so far as to give the page turner her chance to bow.

Tenor William Brown with accompaniment from Charlotte Hegyi on piano performed selections from Mozart to African music in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall Friday night. (Shapiro) honesty to be perceived as such; his Man's cockiness does not always slough off into honest perception when it could be most effective. Some of his character's moments of epiphany are diffused as a result.

Beckett's "Play"

Smith, too, flows well within Beckett's orchestration. His character has most force and draws most empathy in the first half of the play. He grows less pitiable as his own actions draw him down and he remains impotent. He becomes merely pathetic in the end. Smith's portrayal merges beautifully with this flow, although he occasionally seems to want to jump out of his urn.

Kelly's character is the least personable. The wife is strident, theatrical and bitchy. Kelly's portrayal is, however, too theatrical. Her grimaces are too big and her pauses too pregnant. Her character may be the least accessible of Beckett's three—some, but the portrayal of such a character might still be more believable. Kelly's dramatization is consciously that, sapping strength from the fact that such strident and theatrical shrews do exist.

Overall orchestration

Kelly does, however, move with her role gracefully through the overall rhythm of the play. In the first half of the play her character is cacophonous and overbearing. After the midpoint of "Play," as her adulterous husband evokes less sympathy, her character begins to gain more resonance, a resonance subtly enhanced by Kelly's performance. In the end, Kelly and her character move into their own. "Weary of playing with me? Get off me." The wife is worn, and here Kelly does draw pity and sympathy.

"Play" is truly a definitive production for the new DownStage wing of Adams Memorial Theatre. "Play" needs intimacy and is built and derives much of its impact from its consummate repudiation of conventional theatre. Viewing Beckett's creation in the intimate context of DownStage exhibited clearly the necessity of such an alternate stage. Its more flexible and experimental emphasis is a refreshing, vital one. Surely, in the current production, this emphasis evokes promise and seems much more meaningfully and professionally to utilize the talents and resources that the Williams Theatre program possesses. It shines in contrast to many of its Mainstage predecessors.

Ephs beat Wesleyan, Mt. Holyoke

by Dave Paulsen

The field hockey team upped their record to 4-1 with a 6-0 whitewashing of Wesleyan on Saturday. The shutout was the third of the season for goalie Jean Hakmiller '86.

Forward Carrie Cento '86 started the scoring with an assist from link Sue Harrington '84. Halfback Allison Earle '84, tallied the second goal off a penalty stroke.

The Ephwomen scored the remaining four goals in the second half. Forward Emily Sneath '85 was assisted by classmate Allison Fuller. Cento tallied her second goal with the help of forward Jane Rech '85. The final two goals were scored by halfback Mace Foehl '85, assisted by Cento.

Outlast Mount Holyoke

Williams defeated Mount Holyoke 3-2 in a slow-moving game on Tuesday. The Ephwomen once again controlled play, outshooting Mount Holyoke 16-6.

Mount Holyoke started the scoring with a goal 7:26 into the first half. Williams bounced right back with forward Jackie McEvoy '85 scoring on an assist from forward Carrie Cento '86. Lori Symanski '85 added an unassisted goal before half-time.

Williams started the second half scoring when forward Emily Sneath '85 scored on an assist from link Sue Harrington '84. Mount Holyoke later netted a consolation goal.

Coach Julie McHugh was pleased with the play of Symanski, saying "Laurie played a real solid game for us." McHugh also cited the strong play of Harrington, the mainstay of the team thus far.

The team travels to Middlebury on Wednesday.

Golfers tenth in New England

by Greg Keller

Co-captain Eric Boyden '84 eagled the 510 yard eighteenth hole to earn medalist honors in a four-team match on Thursday at the Taconic Golf Course.

The golf team, now 5-0, won the meet with a five-man total of 404, followed by UMass with 411, R.P.I. with 413, and North Adams State with 436. Boyden finished with a 76, while junior Mike Hennefeld and freshman Guy Kurtz shot 78 and 79 respectively.

Earlier in the week, the Ephmen competed in the New England Championship Tournament and placed tenth out of 45 teams. Kurtz finished sixth overall with rounds of 75 and 78, and junior Chris Harned captured seventh with a 76 and a 79.

Despite these fine individual performances, the team land placed tenth out of 45 teams. Kurtz finished sixth overall with rounds of 75 and 78, and junior Chris Harned captured seventh with a 76 and a 79.

Junior Mike Hennigan lines up a put in the golf team's victory over UMass, North Adams State and RPI on Thursday.

Trinity frats

Among other things the faculty has asked a committee to draft a position on sexual discrimination in fraternities which it can adopt independently of the rest of the college. That proposal was passed by a two-thirds majority of faculty members.

"Faculty governance" has become the overriding issue at Trinity now. In the future the faculty plans to continue protesting presidential actions and hopes to publish independent news releases citing its position on College issues.

"The faculty has taken an extremely strong opinion in the past on sex discrimination," said Psychology Professor George Higgins, chairman of the faculty committee which first recommended abolishing the fraternities. "We don't really think that permissible sex discrimination is alright."

"The policy we've got now will keep that discrimination as college policy. Needless to say, those of us who voted against it are not happy," Higgins said.

Frats "anachronistic"

He said the faculty believe Trinity's seven fraternities and two sororities to be "irrelevant," "anachronistic" and "inherently divisive." The faculty decided "fraternities in general didn't have anything to add to the college today," he said.

"Their purpose 100 years ago was to make the place more intellectual. It seemed to us that that day had passed," he added. Higgins admitted that although the faculty had never really expected the trustees to abolish frats, they had at least hoped for mandatory coeducation. "I think a lot of people were surprised [by the exemption decision]," he said.

"I don't think anybody ever dreamed that we would do what Williams did. We're not a Williams yet, maybe someday," Higgins added. Williams abolished fraternities in 1964.

He said as far as the students were concerned "if there was an up-down vote, the students would vote to keep them. They have parties that they like to go to."

"General disgruntledness"

However, Trinity Tripod editor Jennifer Wolf characterized student response to the situation as a "general disgruntledness."

"Nobody likes it, nobody wants it, but nobody has any choice," she explained. "Frats are the main social organization. People wind up going whether they like it or not because that's all there is."

"It's too scary for people to really consider, especially when there's nothing to replace the fraternity system on campus," she added.

The college recently renovated its student center and is considering other social alternatives such as building new dorms and providing some faculty with on-campus housing to increase their interaction with students. In the long run, however, "the Trustees are not going to give up something they've had for years and years," Wolf said.

"It's really very, very shaky," she said. "There is still a great deal of controversy among the faculty about that."

SPORTS SHORTS

Volleyball

The women's volleyball team traveled to Albany State Saturday where they were defeated by Albany but then came back to soundly defeat Russell Sage and Oswego.

Against Albany, Williams went down 4-0 early, but Caroline Teer '87 brought the Ephs back into the game with powerful serves. The score was held at 6-4 to Williams for several points before Albany found their offensive attack.

Although starting out strong in the first game, Williams couldn't score in the second. The final scores were 15-6, 15-2, Albany.

Consistently powerful

The matches against Russell Sage and Oswego were dominated by Williams both offensively and defensively. Co-Captain Carol Dorfman '84 started off the match against Russell Sage with a service ace and served 4 more points.

Williams maintained a consistently powerful offense and never fell behind. Williams won in two games, 15-6, 15-4.

Against Oswego, the story was much the same—Williams topped Oswego both offensively and defensively to win, 15-11, 15-6. Mary Hickcox '86 repeatedly set up powerful hits that Oswego players could not get a hand on. Thursday, Williams beat Connecticut 5-15, 15-10, 15-6, but lost to Mt. Holyoke 15-11, 15-5. Williams' record now stands at 5 wins, 4 losses. Their next game is at Union on Thursday.

Cross country

The men's varsity cross country team took a close one over the Alumni Saturday as John Ellison '86 managed to stave off a last minute Alumni surge to win his first race of the year.

This victory enabled the Ephs runners to maintain their unblemished record at 5-0. Although a win for the varsity was expected, the Alumni proved that they were no slouches either.

Ellison finished just ahead of former Williams stars Ken Leinbach and Derek Leonard, who finished second and third.

Six of seven

But the Purple Wave broke open the race by taking the next six out of the seven places to extinguish the Alumni threat. In fourth was Tom Pingree '86, followed by Co-captain Bo Parker '84, fifth, Brian Angle '84, sixth, and Mike Coyne '87, seventh. Sealing the Alumni's fate were Co-captain Bennett Yort '84 and Kevin Jenkins '85 who took eighth and ninth. Finishing up the top ten was cross country Coach Peter Farwell.

Farwell, though disappointed that the team he was running for lost, was pleased with the performance of his runners. At the traditional festivities which follow the race he noted that "John Ellison ran a really good race. I was surprised that he held off both Ken and Derek."

This Saturday the team sojourns up to Dartmouth where they will take on both Dartmouth and UConn in a race that should prove to be the toughest of the season for the Ephs.

Women's soccer

The women's soccer team beat Wesleyan 1-0 in a wet match on Saturday, chalking up their third shut-out.

The Ephwomen were at their best early in the first half, combining precise passing, quick runs and smooth teamwork, leading to a goal by freshman scoring machine Lisa Dorian in the first ten minutes.

Goalie Laura Napolitano '85, playing in a mud puddle the size of a buffalo wallow, made some spectacular saves in the second half to end the game at 1-0.

Lose to Middlebury

The team suffered their first loss of the season against Middlebury Wednesday, 2-1 in double overtime.

For the first goal, Dorian triumphed in a one-on-one encounter with Middlebury's goalie, passing a quick ground ball into the net midway through the first half. Middlebury followed close behind, capitalizing on an open net when keeper Denise Saunders '87 went down with a head injury.

The Panthers scattered the Ephwomen's defense with switches and crossfield runs, making close marking and teamwork difficult for Williams. The score remained a frustrating 1-1 throughout, and the game moved into double overtime with Middlebury slipping in the winning goal in the last 45 seconds of the second period.

Williams' record now stands at 4-1. They played Dartmouth today, and travel to Trinity on Saturday.

—Caroline McMorney

Green Chicken

The Williams math team, led by the performance of Scott Smaliwood '84, defeated Middlebury 176-101 in the annual Green Chicken competition last week.

Smaliwood earned 64 points, more than twice the leading Panther.

Every year math majors from the two schools compete for the award, a cookie container colored and shaped like a green chicken atop a plaque. The top four individual scores are totaled to give the team scores.

Of the six Green Chicken competitions, Williams has won four times, with one loss and one tie.

The Green Chicken will be at Williams, providing food at math colloquia, for at least another year. During that year, some of the team members plan to keep their skills sharp by taking the difficult Putnam Exam in early December.

Mistakes cause gridders' loss to Rochester, 14 - 7

by Paul Meeks
and Dan Keating

The football team fell to the University of Rochester Yellowjackets 14-7 Saturday in a game not decided until the final seconds.

Trailing by seven points with under two minutes remaining, senior Eph quarterback B.J. Connolly directed an eleven play drive toward the Rochester end zone. With less than a minute to play and Williams on the Rochester eight yard line with a third down and one yard to go, Connolly rolled out to the left on a play-action pass, but had his throw intercepted in the end zone, ending the Williams threat with only 40 seconds remaining.

Big play game

The game was evenly played, Williams' 327 total yards to Rochester's 321, with the difference being that Rochester came up with the big play on virtually every occasion. The most obvious big play difference of the game was Williams' two intercepted passes—one on the one yard line and one in the end zone—and one goal line fumble, compared to Rochester's turnover-free play.

The first big play came on the first Williams drive, which stalled when Williams senior receiver Marc Hummon was forced out of the end zone before landing with a touchdown pass from Connolly. Williams kicker senior Chris Chapman attempted a field goal, but Rochester blocked the kick to stifle the promising drive.

Goal line fumble

The next big play came in the second quarter. Williams once again drove deep into Rochester territory. Connolly went right on an option play from the three yard line, but coughed up the ball on the one. After a scramble, Rochester came up with the ball in the end zone for a touchback.

On the Yellowjackets' first play from scrimmage, freshman Sam Guerrieri broke free for a 35-yard carry, then fumbled the ball. Rochester recovered after the ball hopped between various Williams defenders. Rochester moved down to the ten yard line where quarterback Jeff Witting narrowly avoided a sack and hit split end Greg Parrenllo scrambling in the end zone for the opening score of the game.

Guerrieri accounted for Rochester's next touchdown when he broke a third and one off-tackle plunge for a long touchdown. With the Eph secondary and linebackers up close to stop the first down, Guerrieri encountered almost no defenders after breaking through the line of scrimmage. That touchdown made the score 14-7, which was preserved when Williams' final drive was cut short.

Frosh touchdown

The Eph score came in the third quarter on a toss from Connolly to freshman Rick Lipinski. Lipinski and fellow freshman Rob Miller saw considerable playing time when starting backs Sean Crotty '84 and Jay Hickman '86 both came out of the game in the first quarter with injuries.

Crotty had problems with his back, which he injured against Middlebury last week. Hickman received a concussion and jaw injury. Senior defensive end Doug Stalger also hurt his knee on the astroturf field, on which the Ephmen suffered an unusual number of bumps and bruises.

Connolly finished the day with 13 completions in 25 attempts, with one touchdown toss and two interceptions. Hummon caught six passes for 83 yards and junior tight end Paul Coleman caught three passes for 24 yards. Junior fullback Ted Thomas led the running attack with 56 yards while Miller added 53 yards, almost all on sweeps.

Defensively, Williams stopped Rochester often, but gave up the big plays. Senior Linebacker Chris Woodworth was named the defensive player of the week for keystoneing the defense while playing across from an All-American guard.

Men's soccer whups Dartmouth

by Greg Leeds
and Mike Best

In an outstanding exhibition of skill and desire to win, the men's soccer team soundly defeated Dartmouth Saturday, 3-1. Coach Michael Russo said afterward, "If we play like this we can beat anybody."

Two goals

John Campbell '84 reigned as Williams' offensive leader for the day, netting two goals. He opened the scoring off an assist from David Wolfe '85 halfway through the first half. At 1:07 into the second half Campbell dribbled through numerous Dartmouth defenders and ripped a shot which hit the underside of the crossbar and bounced straight down into the net.

Tight defense

Dartmouth then followed with an offensive drive held back by a very strong Williams defense. Doug McKenney '85, Helge Weiner '87 and Mark Schroeder '86 were aggressive. Goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 made several outstanding saves.

Sweeperback

The standout player of the day was sweeperback Jon Deveau '87, playing superbly in place of injured co-captain Mike Sullivan '84. Deveau, a freshman, is continually outplaying everyone he goes against.

Lose to Clark

Earlier in the week, the team lost a close game to Clark, 1-0.

Neither team had many good scoring opportunities due to strong defense on both sides.

The only score of the game came off a Clark corner kick six minutes into the game. Goalie Ted Murphy punched the ball out, but it did not clear the penalty box and Clark forward Gabe St. Remy was able to head it in.

Going into the game, Clark (4-0-1) was ranked tenth in New England Division III while Williams was sixth.

"Technically we were a little better," said Russo, "but they were much more aggressive, much more physical than we were."

The Ephmen take their 2-1-1 record to North Adams on Wednesday.

Ephwomen notch wins over tennis foes

by John Schafer

Continuing their winning ways, the women's varsity tennis team won twice this week to raise their record to 5-1. A third match, at Wesleyan, was postponed due to rain.

In their finest performance of the year, the team romped over Springfield on Thursday.

The Ephs won 9-0 and took eighteen of the twenty sets; in other words, only two of the matches went to three sets.

"We beat them last year in a last-match, third-set, tie-breaker, so we didn't expect to wipe them out," said captain Marissa Gullino '84.

Triumph over Holyoke

Two days before squashing Springfield, the team travelled to Mt. Holyoke with just over half their regular squad. Despite missing their second, fourth, and fifth singles players and a regular doubles player, Williams rose to the challenge and devastated Holyoke 8-1. "We knew we should beat them, but missing some players put more pressure on us," Gullino said.

The four members out due to illness or exams were replaced by JV players. "We had to dig deep into the JV ladder to assemble a team. They deserve a lot of credit for the win," stated Gullino.

The shuffled lineup worked well. Top player Betsy Shulman '86, the only one playing in her usual place, won 6-2, 6-1. Gullino, Jennifer Koski '86, Debbie Bernheimer '86, and Liz Mangee '85 all moved up on the ladder for this match, and all won.

A regular varsity doubles team, Gerry Hugo '86 and Noelle Montgomery '87, narrowly won 2-6, 6-1, 7-5. The new combination of Amy Bartstad '87 and Stephanie Gates '84 was victorious as was the JV duo of Sarah Menke '84 and Laura Rogers '86.

The Ephs travel to Middlebury on Wednesday.

Ruggers second in tourney

by Tom Dumphy

The Williams Rugby Football Club was a rickrolling success on Saturday, earning second place in the Fifth Annual Berkshire Rugby Tournament held in Pittsfield. The Ephmen defeated two clubs before bowing in the finals.

Win County Cup

In their first contest, Williams defeated the hosts and cross-county rivals, the Berkshire RFC, 9-0. Bob Aulsebrook '85 opened the scoring early in the game with a field goal. Following some brilliant passing, captain Hugh Huizenga '84 scored a try, with Aulsebrook converting to close the scoring.

The win insures that county cup will reside in the Log for another year.

Overtime victory

In the semi-finals, the WRFC was pressed into overtime by Albany Old Green before gaining a well-deserved victory, 10-6. Williams grabbed a 6-0 lead early in the second half. Brad Bissell '86 crashed over the try line following fine scrum play.

Albany scored late in the game to tie, but Williams ended things in overtime on a nifty twenty-meter run by Dave Skinner '86. Skinner's try was set up by a long ramble by Steve Zlotowski '84.

The first blot on Williams' record this year came in the finals versus Springfield Towne Club. Springfield jumped out to a quick 8-0 lead before Aulsebrook put three points on the board.

Springfield kept scoring before Williams came alive late in the second half. Unfortunately, a try by Zlotowski, assisted by Ed O'Toole '86, was not enough. Springfield went on to win 20-9 with a late score.

B's get stung

The B-side also played in the tournament, filling in for a non-arrival. Despite losing to Springfield 16-6 and Albany 18-9, the B's played very well considering their opposition.

The B's, consisting mostly of freshmen and sophomores, performed admirably. Chris Edwards '87, Mark Tompkins '87, Roger Merriam '86, and scrummies Geoff Kass '86, Jon Stanley '87 and Evan Zahner '87 were especially worthy of mention.

ACSR continues evaluations, examines alternative actions

by Martita Well

Only one of the six companies reviewed last week by the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility received a unanimously-favorable reaction from the Committee to its response to a questionnaire which the ACSR had mailed to companies in the College's portfolio which do business in South Africa.

In a departure from previous meetings, ACSR members debated the effectiveness of the review process itself, and whether other alternatives, including divestment, might be a better method for meeting the College's responsibilities as a shareholder.

In previous meetings this year, the ACSR had not discussed the larger questions of methodology and had simply concentrated on evaluating the responses to the questionnaire themselves.

The ACSR mailed questionnaires this summer to 24 companies about their treatment of sales to the government of South Africa and their plans for future expansion there. The ACSR is considering 21 of those responses.

Of the six companies on Wednesday's agenda, only Chase Manhattan Bank got a unanimously favorable reaction. "They are far ahead of most of the others" said College provost Neil Grabois.

The ACSR discussed not only each company's practices but also how openly the company responded. History professor Jim Wood pointed out that "the fact that a company gives us all kinds of information is not enough to exonerate them."

General Motors questionable

Smith-Kline, Exxon and Sohio Corporations will all be asked for further information, according to ACSR secretary and College Treasurer William Reed. The most questionable response of the six came from General Motors.

Rev. Sullivan, author of the Sullivan Principles which stipulate fair work ethics in South Africa, is a member of GM's board of directors. The ACSR is now considering asking Sullivan for more information about GM's practices.

Navjeet Bai '84 and Susan Reilly '85, the student representatives on the ACSR, brought the policies of the Committee into question. "I like what this committee is doing," Reilly said, "but I don't think it's doing enough."

Asking companies about their policies is a start to ameliorating the racial situation, but Reilly and Bai contended that it's not as forceful as divestment.

Both Bai and Reilly are members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

Fire heats up Mills

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

Newspapers which a student had stuffed down an air duct in Mission Park to cut off the flow of cold air to his suite ignited when the College turned on the campus' heating system for the winter last Friday, creating a small fire and toxic smoke.

The heat also wreaked havoc when steam from a radiator pipe set off a heat sensor and turned on the sprinkler system in Sewall House, which is part of the Dodd complex, flooding student rooms there.

According to Winthrop Wassenar, director of physical plant, heating coils in the air vent ignited the paper. Dense, dangerous smoke began filling Mills suite 410 around 10:40 a.m. Friday and immediately triggered off a smoke detector, which sounded the building's fire alarm. College security investigated and gathered the four residents of the suite who were there at the time, some of whom were still in bed, and led them out as the corridor was filling with smoke.

Security then called the Williamstown Fire Department, which arrived ten minutes later with twelve men and three trucks. By this time, smoke could be seen pouring out of the suite's windows.

The firefighters donned air-masks and some of them scrambled up a telescoping ladder which was extended from a truck to a fourth-floor window. It took the firefighters about five minutes to isolate the fire and ten minutes to put it out, according to Fire Chief Gordon Noble.

Insulation ripped out

The firemen had to rip out insulation surrounding the duct which caught fire, Noble said. The fire darkened the walls and ceiling surrounding the duct but caused no further damage in the suite.

Wassenar said there are problems associated with the start-up of winter heating every year, but usually not of this severity. He said he had not yet determined the cost of the damage caused by the fire.

Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta said the deans were not sure whether they would take disciplinary action against any of the suite's residents, or charge them for the damage, because the deans did not yet know which of them had stuffed the newspaper in the duct.

Ron Resnick '84, one of the suite's residents, did say that one of the men living in the suite had put the newspaper in the

Earthquake rocks campus

The biggest earthquake in almost two years shook Williamstown for nearly ten seconds Friday morning at 6:19 a.m.

The quake, which measured 5.2 on the Richter scale, was centered at Blue Mountain Lake near the New York/Vermont border in the Adirondack Mountains, about 120 miles from Williamstown.

The main quake, which sent shock waves from Montreal to Kentucky, was followed by two smaller aftershocks at 6:40 and 6:59 a.m., measuring 3.8 and 3.0 on the Richter scale respectively. No damage was reported in this area. In Lake Placid, near the quake's epicenter, windows were broken but no major damage occurred.

According to the Berkshire Eagle, local residents felt their homes shake, rattling plates and scaring pets, and some heard sounds like a distant explosion.

New England usually averages about three earthquakes a month, according to Williams geology professor William Fox. But most are small, about 1 or 2 on the Richter scale. "You'd only be able to sense one every two or three years," Fox said.

Friday's quake was the largest in the region since January 1982 when there was one centered in New Brunswick, Maine which was measured at 5.9, according to experts at MIT's Geophysical Observatory.

Fox said the quake was the strongest to hit New York in 40 years. The most forceful earthquake ever to hit New England occurred in 1755. It was later estimated at 6.5.

The Richter scale is a measure of ground motion as recorded on seismographs. Every increase of one number indicates a tenfold increase in magnitude.

Fox said the geology department owns seismographs but that they haven't been working for several years.

CUL calls for freshman space in Baxter

by Sarah Abernathy

Baxter Lounge may have a special freshman lounge and a mailroom where the lounge currently is, according to new proposals for renovation of the student center which the Committee on Undergraduate Life reviewed at its meeting last Tuesday.

The CUL also debated whether to circulate a letter among students asking them to reduce noise on campus from stereos.

"We still need to get a better idea of what people want and expect from Baxter," said John Jordan, the architect who is helping the CUL consider alternatives for a new Baxter.

CUL member Amy Harrison '86 proposed putting a lounge where the mailroom is now and putting a new mailroom in the current lounge.

In two weeks the Freshman Council will report to the CUL about freshman needs in regards to Baxter.

Freshman partying

"Perhaps the lounge could be for everyone's everyday use, but the freshmen would have priority if they wanted it for a specific purpose," Jordan said.

CUL members agreed the Pressure Point

As midterms approach, students may be comforted to know that our own President John W. Chandler told the Alumni Review (Summer, 1982) that "... Williams students today are very serious, perhaps too serious, as students." This is a generalization, as Chandler acknowledged, but it is predominantly true.

The increasingly common resolution of this conflict is to use Williams simply as a prep school for New York banks and law schools. This attitude is unsatisfactory.

One alumnus and former American Studies professor explained that a Williams education is not intended to get people jobs, but to help them live with themselves after getting a job. This theory is comforting, but does little to relieve the self-imposed pressure that plagues Williams students.

There's nothing wrong, or unusual, about wanting a job. It's impossible to expect students to engross themselves in "learning for learnings sake" for 3½ years, and only then concern themselves with the job market. In fact, students internalize the pressures of the job hunt early in their education, reducing the scope of their college years to 'preparation' rather than 'investigation.'

Williams must confront the inherent conflict between the system's principles and the students' needs.

The cause of this excessive seriousness is anxiety over the post-Williams world: be it the job market or graduate school.

Williams holds out the liberal arts ideal—college is life training, not job preparation—but students in the 80's seem more concerned with professional training. This conflict pits the College's principles against the students' goals, and may account for the underlying unhappiness that besets many students.

LETTER

Poster

To the editor:

A poster that was put up by the Committee for Palestinian Rights on the Student Activities Board has mysteriously disappeared. This is not the first time that the Committee for Palestinian Rights has received such hostile reactions to its publicity. Last year signs of speakers coming and films to be shown would disappear a few hours after they were put up. A letter was sent to the Dean expressing the CPR's distress concerning these violations of its freedom. If certain individuals do not agree with what the CPR has to say to the Williams campus then they have every right to express their objections, by even putting them up right next to the CPR poster—but not by taking it down. This was the message on our poster that we wanted to convey to Williams students who have every right to read it regardless of whether others disagree:

DON'T SAY YOU DIDN'T KNOW!
ACT NOW BEFORE IT'S TOO LATE!
—20,000 Palestinians and Lebanese civilians killed
—40,000 wounded
—600,000 homeless
—hundreds of villages and towns razed to the ground
—3270 Palestinians and Lebanese civilians were massacred in Sabra and Shatila
THIS IS THE TOLL OF ISRAEL'S INVASION OF LEBANON
THIS IS GENOCIDE!

Demand:

Israel's immediate withdrawal from Lebanon
Israel's implementation of U.N. resolutions on the national rights of the Palestinian people.

My Cap'n Crunch is stale

by John Clayton

What follows is a story of braveness, of courage, of sacrifice and hardship. It is more than just one man's problems, it is a symbol of all of life's struggles.

Day 1: I arrive at school. No big deal, but you can't start a story on Day 2.

Day 5: I finally got enough sleep so that I can get up for breakfast. I eat my pancakes, my orange juice, my donut, my coffee and my Cap'n Crunch.

My Cap'n Crunch is stale.
It's so stale I can't eat it.

Day 7: I go to breakfast again. The Cap'n Crunch is stale again.

Day 8: Repeat of process.

Day 9: Record editor Jon Tigar is looking for an editorial topic. "What are you upset about?" he asks me. "My Cap'n Crunch is stale." No response. "They paved my quad." Still no response. "The new gym isn't finished yet." His face registers no expression. "Art Works," he finally says. Bravo.

Day 10: With still more stale, I write a note to the Napkin Board. "The Cap'n Crunch is stale," it says in big letters (It's early in the morning—I have to write big). By the next day it has been torn down.

Day 11: Still more stale and more frustration. I write another napkin: "You can take this napkin down but the Cap'n Crunch is still stale." They take the napkin down.

Day 12: The Cap'n Crunch disappears. There is no more Cap'n Crunch at breakfast.

Days 13-27: There is still no Cap'n Crunch. Where on earth is it? Getting de-staled, hopefully.

In desperation I try Cheerios. They're stale. I try Rice Krispies. They're fresh, but bland.

Day 28: I'm experiencing heavy withdrawal symptoms. I need my morning sugar. I try putting seven sugars in my coffee. It tastes good—I must be doing something wrong. I try putting seven sugars on my pancakes. I try chugging a glass of "maple" syrup. I try putting honey in my orange juice.

Nothing works. I need my Cap'n Crunch.

Day 29: I write an article for the Record about my experiences. I end it with a plea to Food Service to restore my fresh Cap'n Crunch.

If you've ever seen John Clayton in the morning, you know why he needs his Cap'n Crunch.

Palestinian people stand alone, in self-defense

by Suad Khalaf

Two days ago, I was talking to Samia, a friend of mine in Beirut, who was a Williams special student last year. Samia had lived in the dormitories of the American University of Beirut, and worked as a volunteer cook and nurse during Israel's invasion of Lebanon last summer. She managed to escape in August and come to America for one semester—leaving her parents and family in Beirut. While talking to her on the phone, I was aware that Lebanon was still in a state of civil war. So in a feeble effort to cheer her up, I told her of how we in Williamstown were standing in solidarity with them; that the Committee for Palestinian Rights was educating the student body by showing films, bringing speakers and fund-raising.

Samia replied that I had a distorted view of reality. For the past week she could look out her window and see American ships firing on Lebanese civilians and "snipers"—and here I was telling her of the concern Americans felt for her people. "Forget it," she said, "use your efforts where people will appreciate them and view our misery with a truly open mind."

Invasion

Three weeks ago, the Arab and Islamic world celebrated its religious holiday, Eid, by mourning over the one year old massacres of Palestinian civilians in Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps in Lebanon. These crimes were one phase in a series of events relating to the June 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, which was carried out under the ironic name of "Peace for Galilee", the stated aim of which was to liberate southern Lebanon. Instead, in violation of the American peace envoy Philip Habib's agreement, the Israeli army extended its invasion and entered West Beirut, asserting its "responsibility" for the maintenance of order and the avoidance of bloodshed. Subsequent events proved otherwise.

...she could look out her window and see American ships firing on Lebanese civilians and "snipers"—and here I was telling her of the concern Americans felt for her people.

A chronology of the events that took place right before the massacre brings to light the extremely vulnerable situation that the Palestinian people are living in.

PLO evacuation

Aug 23: PLO fighters began to evacuate Lebanon, against their will. They expressed deep concern for the safety of the families they left behind.

Aug 31: Arafat and the last 700 PLO forces left Beirut.

Sept 10: American peace-keeping forces began leaving Lebanon. Israeli reconnaissance flights were conducted over Beirut, and Israeli tanks remained in the port area, violating the Habib agreement.

Sept 14: Lebanese President-elect Bashir Gemayel was killed.

Sept 15: Begin, Sharon, and Shamir approved entry into West Beirut "to prevent bloodshed" and anarchy. 5:30 a.m., the Israeli Defense Force (IDF) invaded major parts of West Beirut. IDF's request for the Lebanese army to enter Palestinian refugee camps to "purge" them of PLO guerillas was refused.

Sept 16: IDF announced its control over key points in West Beirut, completely encircling Sabra and Shatilla camps.

Three hundred dead

Sept 17: The Massacre: IDF commander Dror met with the Christian Lebanese Phalange forces after which the Phalange militia set up a command post near Shatilla camp entrance, across the street from the IDF

"observation post." They entered Sabra and Shatilla camps and began house to house searches while the IDF illuminated the camp for them with flares. Phalange commanders were in children, came to the hospital seeking safety and security. On the night of Thursday, Sept. 16, she, along with another American and an Englishman, decided to go up to the top floor of the hospital to see what was going on in the camp, and she says: "A flare would go up, lots of artillery, and then another flare would go up. I'm sure it was the massacre. I stayed up there for about forty minutes and then came downstairs."

"By Friday morning...people inside and outside the hospital, including our staff, were screaming 'Haddad, Kataeb, Israel.' They took their finger and put it across their throats...This was all I could get from them, and the word 'majzara' which means massacre. Then massacre related casualties began arriving Friday morning...That same morning the Palestinian and Lebanese on our hospital staff were told to leave the hospital because it was no longer safe."

On Saturday morning Seigel was taken by the Lebanese army, along with the rest of the hospital staff. She says: "I believe that as we were taken down the street, the killing was still going on...At one point I looked to the right and saw three bodies...then I saw hundreds of Palestinians from the camps and health care workers, sitting on both sides of the road under guard. We recognized some; some got up and gave us a Victory sign."

"One woman along the street gave her baby to Dr. Swee Chal Aang, who carried it for a couple of minutes until one of the soldiers told her to give back the baby. It's strange how people respond. I didn't do anything, and no one else did either. It's a second in your life—everyone wanted to do something, but we just didn't. It was very painful to watch."

Low spirits

After she was interrogated, Ms. Seigel went to the U.S. embassy to express her worry for the patients left behind in the hospital as well as the refugees in the camps. A week later she returned to Gaza Hospital and explained how "People's spirits are low; somebody in the family is in Yemen, one in Sudan, one in Damascus. They are not in the mood to raise their fists. They are deeply grateful and appreciative of the people who are there in solidarity, they love their struggle and they still love their homeland, but at the moment it's a matter of day-to-day survival."

Ms. Seigel decided that Ryan Crocker, head of the Political Affairs Department at the US embassy should see some of the war's casualties. She says: "I also took Crocker to see an eleven year old in Shatilla. The child told us the Kataeb came to his house on Thursday evening, the first day of the massacre, and shot and killed twenty-two members of his family. The child had covered his eyes; the Kataeb shot his finger and he lay down and pretended he was dead. All night he lay there among his dead family. On Friday morning he ran to a friend's house who brought him to the hospital."

What has been the world's reaction to this massacre? The Arab world has looked with disgust, fear and hatred, but also with amazing apathy at how Western civilization, of which Israel is an outpost, is proving itself on Palestinian children's skin; whether by cluster bombs or burning phosphorus bombs.

The Jordanian newspaper, Al-Rai, expressed the view that the Commission of Inquiry was simply "what was required for a cosmetic operation on the face of Israel." In the Jerusalem Post of September 24, 1982, Abba Ebban reflects the Labor Party's position on the massacre and invasion. He writes: "The facts are simple; a hideous pogrom has been perpetuated with fearful death and torment of innocent people in a place where the Israeli government asserted its responsibility for the maintenance of order and the avoidance of bloodshed."

Massacres today

Where do the Palestinians stand today? Where does twentieth century civilization stand in relation to these crimes committed against law and humanity? Massacres are still being committed in Lebanon today. The Palestinians are in Diaspora: living under Israeli military occupation in the West Bank and Gaza or as 7000 prisoners in Ansar detention camp, or scattered throughout the Arab world and the West.

"It's a second in your life—everyone wanted to do something, but we just didn't. It was very painful to watch."

Clearly, the war in Lebanon has magnified the fact that the Palestinian people have to stand alone in self-defense, relying neither on Arab armies nor on world consciousness to save them. Their voice must be heard on the same volume that the Israeli voice is heard. Only when a fair solution, that does not compromise their inalienable rights to a sovereign homeland is reached, only then can we be sure to avoid another Sabra and Shatilla massacre.

Swiss musicians delight crowd

by Carl Leafstedt
Last Monday night, Williams hosted a musical group of international stature, the chamber orchestra Camerata Bern.

Composed entirely of strings with a harpsichord continuo, this group of young musicians from Bern, Switzerland, is one of the preeminent chamber orchestras in the world today. The Camerata specializes in nonspecialization, even though they are considered proponents of little-known baroque and early classical music.

New works
The first half of the program Camerata Bern presented Monday night contained two of these relatively unknown works: a concerto grosso by U.W.C. von Wassenauer, and a violin concerto by the early Viennese composer, M.G. Monn. Another work, J.S. Bach's 6th Brandenburg Concerto, gave the audience something more familiar.

The Camerata's performance of all three was wonderful. From the very start of the Wassenauer, which opened the concert, it was evident that these were first-rate musicians.

After intermission, the Camerata jumped ahead about 200 years and performed two works written in the late 1930's: Bartok's divertimento for strings, and a piece entitled "Summertime" by the Swiss composer Othmar Schoek. The Schoek piece, subtitled "Intermezzo pastoreale...", was beautiful with its murmuring strings and evanescent ending.

No conductor
The Bartok was played, like everything else by the Camerata Bern, without a conductor. The lack of conductor did not help them here since the Bartok is a difficult piece with lots of "give-and-take" in the tempo. As a result, their timing was just a hair off in a few spots.

But this is nit-picking—a bigger problem with the Bartok was not in the performance, but in the disruptiveness of the audience. Members of the audience leaving in the middle tried to be quiet, but in Chapin Hall it just can't be done—the floor creaks, the chairs creak, the big doors creak, too, and all this sound carries. The mood of the pianissimo opening of the second movement, especially, was destroyed by creaking footsteps. Even the performers were visibly bothered.

The playing of the Camerata Bern was lush in the slow movements, clean and crisp in the fast ones, yet nothing was overdone. The approach was conservative, too, with no unnecessary frills. Articulation was good, though Chapin Hall did its best to muddle the sound. In short, a great concert by a great group.

Music in the Round opens season

by Tracey Tenser
Dohnani, Mozart and Schubert inaugurated the 32nd Music in the Round season last Friday. Performers in the opening concert included Julius Hegyi, violin; Susan St. Amour, viola; Douglas Moore, cello; David Scott Allen, double bass and Charlotte Hegyi, piano.

Belabored
Dohnani's "Serenade," written in 1904 for violin, viola and cello, was one of the composer's earlier works. Although at times a bit belabored and repetitious, it nevertheless produced a generally pleasing and lighthearted effect through its lively syncopation and simple folk-like themes. It also contains many beautiful lyrical passages—the viola solo which opened the second movement was especially well played.

The Mozart Duo which followed illustrated Hegyi's affinity for Mozart. The violin part was fairly demanding, as opposed to the viola part, which seemed to be written more in the style of accompaniment than as half of a duo. Throughout this piece, Hegyi demonstrated his ability to shift emotions quickly, as Mozart's works inevitably demand.

'Trout' Quintet
The highlight of the program was the final selection, Schubert's "Trout" Quintet. Its name is derived from the title of a song Schubert had composed 2 years earlier—this song became the basis for the set of variations which comprises the fourth movement of this quintet.

Unique instrumentation allows the piano and cello more freedom than ordinarily found in this type of chamber music. The addition of a double bass spared these instruments from their more customary roles as harmonic basslines, and the omission of a second violin allowed for more solo passages for these instruments as well.

The piece was originally commissioned by a cellist, and the cello solos were prominent and abundant. Moore's playing, full of emotion and grace, was especially noteworthy here.

Drinan attacks Reagan

"Something very dangerous and reckless is going on in Central America," said former Massachusetts Congressman Father Robert Drinan Thursday evening as he lashed out against the Reagan administration's policy in that region.

Citing U.S. subversion of Nicaragua and support for El Salvador, he termed U.S. policy an "awful aberration. We thought all of these things were gone forever, but it is happening again before our very eyes."

Drinan, a Jesuit, left Congress three years ago when Pope John Paul II issued a directive ordering priests to disassociate themselves from politics. He is currently president of Americans for Democratic Action, and has traveled extensively in Central and Latin America.

On this, a return visit to Williams, he complimented the College on its "new buildings, programs, and oversubscribed endowment," but added that "I wish there'd be a few more student riots on campus."

"Why isn't there more outrage in the country at what is going on?" he asked. "I want the American people to rise up and say you can't be doing this. It's against law and morality."

"They're just wrong"

Drinan dismissed the Reagan administration's claims that the Nicaraguan revolution was communist-inspired. "I'm not attacking their sincerity," he said, "they're just wrong." "Catholics were in revolt because of the situation in Nicaragua," Drinan stressed. He said he has "loads of quarrels with the Sandanistas," but added every new government has problems at the outset.

"I hope the slaughter of the last 1000 days will persuade us that we have to do something very different in the last 400 days of the Reagan administration," Drinan concluded.

However, he emphasized, the U.S. cannot succeed because "the peasants are determined to win."

"The Reagan administration is getting away with it right now," he charged, "and I want students all over this earth to do what the kids at Stanford did and go out and protest what's going on."

Films lack gay view

Vito Russo, gay film critic and author of The Celluloid Closet, traced the history of the portrayal of homosexuals in American film Saturday evening as part of last weekend's Guadalupe Forum, "Gay at the Movies, Gay at Williams."

The presentation showed how the American film industry has distorted the image of homosexuals. "You'll find more homophobia in cinema" than homosexuality, Russo said.

When homosexuality began in American film, it was usually used as a foil, he said. In early films, heterosexuals and homosexuals were seen as the "real man and the sissy" respectively.

CC finishes remainder of budget

In a busy and lively meeting last Thursday the College Council encouraged smokers to be more considerate of non-smokers and debated noise levels on campus in response to proposals on the subject from the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

The Council acted in response to the complaints of non-smokers about smoking in the dining halls, especially Dodd House. When the issue arose several weeks ago one Council member suggested establishing smoking and non-smoking areas in the dining halls.

According to Council President Tom Paper '84, however, Director of Food Services Jim Hodgkins said such a set-up would be impossible to enforce. Paper therefore suggested that "we urge all smokers, before they light up, to ask those nearby whether their smoking will be offensive." The resolution passed 12-8.

The CUL's proposed noise guidelines (see pg. 1) were then read, including a provision that students inform their neighbors before hand of their intention to play loud music. The proposal was greeted by outright laughter from many Council members.

Paper decided to form a sub-committee to write and submit to the CUL a more restrained response to the rules.

The Council also discussed the opening of a new, all-night study area on the fourth floor of Hopkins Hall. The study area was opened by Dean Daniel O'Connor as a result of a Council initiative to find a replacement for the Van Alstyne Lounge in the Sawyer Library basement, which now closes at 1 a.m.

Several council members felt the Council should not concede the closing of the lounge without protest, especially since students were not informed of the move beforehand.

The discussion on the remodeling of Baxter Hall included a resolution ranking various Baxter functions on the basis of importance. The resolution assigned high priority to a larger mailroom, a student lounge, "pool, game, and TV room — in some capacity" and space for the College Council, Purple Key, Williams Record and WCFM.

COLLEGE COUNCIL ALLOCATIONS FOR STUDENT ORGANIZATIONS: The Council passed all of its Finance Committee's recommendations for student performance, service and sports groups without much debate at a special meeting Oct. 3.

lounge would not be the right place for big parties, but Director of Food Services Jim Hodgkins said the North dining room could be used for freshmen parties.

CUL Chairman David Colby stressed the need for having offices in the basement and common space on the first floor. Jordan agreed, saying "we need to attract more people to the great space in the basement."

"Like a maze"

"Right now the feeling is like walking through a maze, and we have to move away from that," Jordan said. "We might put dedicated uses [such as the Record, Outing Club, etc.] in the basement because then people would have a reason to go down there."

tively, said Russo.

Films, said Russo, tend to bring out peoples' fear of homosexuality because "male intimacy really drives people nuts."

It was only in the last ten to fifteen years that gay people attempted to change that portrayal, according to Russo. He said that gay people, like himself, had seen a "double vision" while growing up in America in which they knew they were different, yet tried to act normal.

For that reason gay people want to see "a redesigned systematic experience," he said. "Movies are made for white straight teenagers."

One recent example of gay experience was a film documentary titled "The Word Is Out,"

The CUL debated over the wording in a letter it may circulate among students about noise levels on campus.

"Blasting stereos has become the norm, and people objecting have to take the initiative," said Bolton. "It should be the other way around. A large part of the day should be quiet."

Several students disagreed. "Unless people complain about the music, you have to assume it's bothering no one," said CUL member Andrew Cyplot '85.

As it stands now, the letter proposes that people play music in their rooms only at low levels or with earphones on, and that they make "every effort to inform neighbors well before" playing music loudly. No vote was taken at last week's meeting on whether to accept that wording.

which was shown Friday and Sunday afternoon in Bronfman.

The film featured interviews with several dozen gays and lesbians who described their experiences growing up homosexual in decades less accepting than this one.

Many spoke of the conflict involved in being gay in the army, in the church, in heterosexual marriages and even in mental institutions where they had been sent because of their homosexuality.

Although most felt better adjusted in the present day than in the past, they spoke of the feelings of isolation and lack of self-worth which so often accompanied homosexuality then.

According to Wood, the questionnaires themselves could cause companies to change. "If [shareholder inquiries] become too much of a nuisance, these companies may decide it's not worth it," he said.

Alternate methods of effecting change were also considered. "Embargo seems to me the only effective way to get corporations out," said Wood. Lewis and Grabols questioned that view. "Is [getting corporations out of South Africa] the goal or is it trying to get some fundamental change in South Africa?" Grabols asked.

Reilly, who along with Bal favors total divestment as the most effective plan, claimed the ACSR "would not get very far in a discussion of total divestment."

John D'Agostini '76 disagreed, however, saying such preconceptions were unfair. "Total divestment is an alternative ... an idea worth at least spending some time talking about."

The heating start-up also set off the sprinkler systems on the upper floor of Sewall house when a steam pipe which had been recently disconnected by repairmen released steam into one of the bathrooms and triggered heat sensors, Wassenar said.

"There were about six to nine inches of water everywhere," said Ron Issen '84, a resident there. The water ruined rugs and severely damaged wallpaper and ceilings in the hallways.

NOW-WE'LL PAY YOU TO ATTEND MEDICAL SCHOOL

In fact, we'll even pay you more than $575 a month while you attend. That's in addition to paying for your full tuition and required books and fees.

It's all part of the Armed Forces Health Professions Scholarship Program.

How does it work?

If you're selected for a Physician Scholarship—from the Army, Navy, or Air Force—you're commissioned as an officer in the Reserve.

While you're in school, you'll serve 45 days a year on active duty, gaining valuable medical experience. After graduation, you will serve three or more years, the length depending on the requirements of the Service selected and years of scholarship assistance received.

As an Armed Forces physician you'll receive officer's pay and benefits, and enjoy the advantages of working regular hours. You'll also see a diversity of patients and have opportunities to use sophisticated medical technology.

But most important, while you're in medical school we'll help pay the bills. For more information, send in the coupon. There's no obligation whatsoever.

Harriers lose to Dartmouth

by Chris Stearns

On Saturday the men's cross-country team traveled up to Hanover, New Hampshire, to take on Dartmouth, UConn and UMass and took fourth in what proved to be their toughest meet of the year thus far.

Jim Saplenzo of Dartmouth set a new course record of 22:26 over the grueling 4.7 mile course. Again co-captain John Nelson led the way for the Ephs as they finished strongly but they could only muster up enough points to take fourth.

Eph finishers

Finishing in the top five for the Ephs were John Nelson '84 in 12th; freshman Mike Coyne, 16th; John Ellison '86, 17th; Brian Angle '84, 18th; and Co-Captain Bennett Yort '84 in 24th place. Also finishing well for the Ephs were co-captain Bo Parker '84 and sophomore Tom Pingree.

Remarked Farwell on his runners, "John Nelson has really been consistent and has done a good job for us all year. Mike also ran really well today and this race has been great experience for everybody on the team. I just hope that we can pull it all together for the race on Saturday."

Saturday the team will travel to Amherst where schools from all over New England will vie for the coveted NESCAC (New England Small College Athletic Conference) title. It is a historic meet since for the first time in NESCAC's history a team score will be kept. The Ephrunners figure to stand well in the meet and possibly walk off with the crown.

by Ken Irvine

The men's water-polo team took the first step toward repeating as New England champions last weekend when they swept the first league tournament. The Ephs, who upped their record to 13-1, defeated Trinity, Amherst, Springfield and Coast Guard.

The women's team is also off to a good start, having defeated Mt. Holyoke 13-8 in a game in which Chrissy Radioff '86 played particularly well. The women are led by senior co-captains Sally Worthington and Celia Cleplela.

Shatkin MVP

The men's top player this weekend was Rob Shatkin '84. Although not the top scorer, Shatkin was voted most valuable player of the tournament.

The team was executing well on the weekend, although there were a few minor flaws with their passing. Peter Orphanos '85 said "The hole was set well but the passes were wide, causing turnovers."

The Trinity game was physical, and some team members suffered cuts and abrasions, but when co-captain Jeff Mills '84 dove in, he settled things down. The team then proceeded on to a strong victory, 12-4.

Cube offensive

Against Coast Guard, the Ephs set up the new "cube" formation offense, which was led by freshmen Dean Pomerleau and Chris Kirwin. In the future the team will be looking for Adam Ifshin '87 to make a contribution to this play.

In the Amherst game a slip by junior co-captain Mark Schmitz nearly caused a bench-clearing brawl, stemmed by the quick action of Will Andrew '86. Despite this distraction Williams worked their new counter-offensive successfully. John Gould '84 in particular was driving well.

Field hockey

The field hockey team lost to Trinity 2-1 Saturday. Emily Sneath '85 scored the lone Eph goal.

On Wednesday, Middlebury defeated the Ephwomen 2-0 in heavy rain. Coach Julie McHugh said, "It was a frustrating game, because we played well, especially in the second half. We out-shot them, but they scored both goals on penalty kicks on fluke penalties on our goalie [Jean Hakmiller '86]."

Men's tennis

The men's varsity tennis team completed its short season on Saturday, hosting RPI for a scrimmage. The three fall matches provide a chance for some veteran players to compete against other schools, although the team's real season is in the spring.

Against RPI, a match that gave the coaches an opportunity to look at some JV and freshman players for the first time, the team lost 7-2, but more importantly, several standouts played impressively.

Frank Gill '86, at second singles, won 4-6, 6-0, 6-1. The other victory was recorded by the doubles team of freshmen Bob Kurtz and Albert Ree in straight sets.

Dartmouth rolls

Dartmouth, a very strong and deep team by Division III standards, beat the varsity 7-2 in a scrimmage on Tuesday. Only the top doubles team, Tim Rives '85 and Brook Larmer '84, and the third duo of Gill and Mike Shore '84 won. Dartmouth, which plays a full fall schedule, is better than any squad the Ephs will face this spring.

Second in tourney

At the Great Dane Classic in Albany on September 23-24, Williams finished tied for second (with RPI and Albany State) out of 20 teams. No one player won his division, but most reached at least the semifinals so the point total was enough to tie for second behind UVM.

The fall season helped the coaches determine individual rank and prepare for the spring. "I think we'll have a good season," said Coach Ed Grees, "because many players worked hard and did well this fall."

—by John Schafer

Women's tennis

Running into their toughest competition of the year, the women's varsity tennis team was routed twice last week. Their string of five straight wins was snapped Wednesday at Middlebury, and this Saturday Trinity handed them a 9-0 defeat, making their record 5-3. Trinity, the top Division III team in New England, had few problems with Williams. The doubles were close, and two went to three sets, but overall the Ephs were no match for the powerful Bantams.

Unexpected loss

The frustrating 8-1 loss at Middlebury was not as expected as the Trinity defeat. Only sophomore Sue Brown won, though many of the matches were close. "We could have won," Coach Sean Sloane said. "It was actually a close match with many of the scores 7-5 or 7-6 in the third set."

The absence of three players did hurt the team, but not as much as the conditions. Rain drove the match indoors onto poor-quality but fast-paced courts where Middlebury went on the offensive. The Ephs did not adapt easily to this aggressive style. Outdoors the team might have fared better, but they were still without three regular players.

Women's rugby

Although the women's rugby football club tied Colgate 3-3 on Saturday, the Ephwomen played a skillful and exciting game and clearly controlled the game.

The Williams scrum and line quelled all Colgate's attempts at breakaways with solid tackles and strong mauls. Yet the Eph line could not make any breakaways either. No tries were scored, although Williams continually kept Colgate near their try line.

Although the game went into two ten-minute overtimes, Williams could still not score.

Conversion kicks brought the only points to the game. Helen Kaubach '85 managed to boot the ball over the goal post for three points. Then Colgate brought out their star kicker to tie the game at 3-3.

Good technique

Williams showed their experience and tactical skills with fine tackling, rucking, switching and kicking techniques.

Dorrie Dewar '85, Becky Halle '86, Liz Gardner '87 and Missy Wilcox '87 displayed great talent in the line, confusing Colgate with kicking and switching strategies. President Sarah Keohane '84, Sara Harkness '85, Betsy Anderson '87 and Sara Finmore '87 all played remarkably, consistently rucking and mauling to get possession of the ball.

Princeton loss

Williams realized these tactics after last weekend's game against Princeton, in which the women were unable to score against the Princeton blockade, except for a try scored on the B-side by Maureen Ford '87. Although Williams held its own against the Amazon women, Princeton won 12-0 A-side and 12-4 B-side.

The club plays Babson this weekend.

Women's soccer

The women's soccer team defeated Trinity 1-0 on Saturday. Lisa Dorton '87 scored the only goal of the game, assisted by Lindsay Rockwood '85. Goalie Laura Napolitano '85 saved 16 shots; the Trinity goalie saved six. Trinity out-shot Williams 20-13.

Last Tuesday the team lost to Dartmouth 2-0.

The Ephwomen, now 5-2, played Union yesterday and face Amherst at home Saturday.

WILLIAMS CO-OP

Soccer beats Trinity 3-1; Gridders outplayed, lose 41-14

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best
The men's soccer team boosted its record to 3-1-2 with a 3-1 win over Trinity Saturday.

After a scoreless first half, Jeff McEvoy '86 penetrated Trinity's defense, scoring off a corner kick six minutes into the second period. Williams' lead was soon eliminated, though, as Trinity's Chris Downs put the ball in from ten yards after slipping through the Williams defense.

Defense key
Coach Michael Russo said that the "back four", the defense of Mark Schroeder '86, Jon Deveaux '87, Helge Welner '87 and Doug McKenney '85, was once again outstanding. Led by goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85, they have allowed only four goals in six games.

Murphy was again very consistent. Though not tested much, he "had some outstanding saves", according to Russo.

Williams asserted itself later in the period when John Campbell '84 scored as he put a corner kick straight into the net. Then, with 2:30 left in the game, John Austin '87 put in the clincher off an assist from McEvoy. It was his first goal of the year, "which added to the excitement" said Russo.

Russo pleased
The Ephmen were clearly dominant but, according to sweepback Deveaux, "The score should have been 9-0." Russo said that he plans to work on creating more scoring opportunities. Nevertheless, he said he is quite pleased with the team's performance this year.

Tie North Adams

In an exciting game on Wednesday, the Ephs played to a scoreless tie with North Adams State. The action went from end to end throughout the game, but neither team was able to take advantage of scoring opportunities. Despite the score, Williams controlled the ball significantly more than North Adams did. Said Russo, "From an artistic point of view, it was our best game this year."

The Ephs outshot North Adams by only 20-17, but just four of North Adams' shots were on goal, as opposed to Williams' 12. Once again the back four provided solid defense, limiting North Adams' chances.

Sophomore Paul Williamson nearly scored on a header that hit the crossbar and fell on the goal line. However, the Ephs were unable to get to the ball in time to put it in. Later, Clark Otley '86 had an open-net shot blocked by a defender, and a subsequent shot went wide.

The Ephmen's next game is against a tough Bowdoin team on Saturday at home.

by Paul Meeks

The Bantams of Trinity thrashed the football team this Saturday at Jessee Field in Hartford 41-14. Trinity scored three times before the Ephs got on the board while rolling up 500 total yards against the Eph defense.

Trinity junior quarterback Joe Shield completed 20 of 28 passes for 344 yards and two touchdowns. Junior split end Tim McNamara hauled in eleven spirals for 234 yards, including a 57 yard touchdown with 2:18 remaining in the first period.

Senior running back Ned Ide inflicted the most damage with 121 yards and three touchdowns rushing. In addition to three receptions for 31 yards and another score. Fortunately for the Ephs, Ide will graduate in June, but the Shield-McNamara passing combination will return next year.

Williams offense
Williams quarterback B.J. Connolly '84 aired the pigskin 33 times, completing 15 for 201 yards, but was intercepted twice. Tight end John McCarthy '84 led all Eph receivers with five receptions for 85 yards.

Fullback Ted Thomas '85 hustled for 88 rushing yards and both of Williams' touchdowns, capping drives at 1:43 in the second and 10:27 in the fourth periods respectively.

The Ephs proved they could move the ball against the Bantams when Connolly directed an eleven play, 80-yard drive to paydirt to end the second quarter. Chris Chapman '85 added the point-after-to-Thomas' eight yard score to close the gap to 20-7.

The Bantams ended any thoughts of an Eph rally when Ide capped a 61-yard drive with his third score, an eleven yard sweep around right end, less than four minutes into the third period.

Special teams

All day Trinity helped itself to great field position through the "hidden yards" of special team play. Punter John DeLorenzo '84 was forced to kick eight times as the Ephs failed to contain the Bantams, who returned the ball for 105 total yards. Williams managed only seven yards in three punt returns during the contest.

Injuries have crippled the Ephmen in past weeks. Center Greg Taylor '86, running backs Sean Crotty '84, Jeff Congdon '84 and Jay Hickman '86 are cogs missing in the Williams offensive machine.

Defensively, end Doug Staiger '84, tackles Matt Kennedy '84 and Tony Gloffre '85, and backs Mike deWindt '85 and Tom MacLean '84, are lost.

Excuses aside, the Ephs faced a more talented opponent in the Bantams Saturday and would have had to play perfect football to win.

The Ephs try to even-up their 1-2 record at the friendly confines of Weston Field against Bowdoin Saturday at 1:30.

Behind guard Dan Keating '84, quarterback B.J. Connolly '84 rolls out with tight end John McCarthy '84 open for the pass. (Eagon)

Spikers nail Union, North Adams State

by Sara Griffiths

The women's volleyball team proved their tenacity when they defeated both Union College and arch-rival North Adams State on Thursday. The two wins boost their record to 7-4 at the midpoint of the season.

Against North Adams, Williams started out on top in both games and maintained consistent offensive play to win 15-1, 15-4. Some new team members contributed strongly to the win—freshmen Carol Smallwood, Sumin Eng and Martha Hoopes set up strong attacks that North Adams couldn't return.

Beat Union

In the first game against Union, Williams served six points before Union got on the scoreboard. Starting setter Mary Hiccox '86 became an effective front row hitter and found the holes in Union's defense. Williams took the game 15-7.

Union made a strong comeback in the second game, scoring 14 points to Williams' 7. Union missed several opportunities to take the game and Williams capitalized on Union's mistakes.

College to host Olympic field hockey

The U.S. Olympic field hockey team will be playing against the Ephwomen at Williams in two weeks.

The Olympic team includes Williams Coach Chris Larson Mason (on leave this year) and alum Leslie Milne '79. They will play an exhibition against Williams at 4:00 on Monday October 24 at 4:00 at Weston Field. The Olympians will also give a clinic that night at Towne Field House.

Williams Coach Julie McHugh said, "This should be great exposure for the girls on our team. They'll get to see good hockey, and compete in high quality hockey games."

"I hope the girls will realize that the Olympic style field hockey is not that far removed from what they're doing."

The Olympians are touring eight New England colleges with the dual purpose of raising funds for their training and bringing top-caliber field hockey to New England colleges and high schools.

After the game pitting Ephs against Olympians, the teams will be jumbled, with both teams having Olympians and Ephwomen. "I think many people will be surprised at how well our girls do when playing with the Olympians," McHugh said.

The event is co-sponsored by Merrill Lynch and V-8. V-8 juice will be distributed at the game.

New track for Field House

by Lisa Payne

The College plans to resurface the indoor track at the Towne Field House this winter with a new substance which will cut down on running injuries, according to varsity track coach Richard Farley.

He said the main incentive for the new surface is the "physiological problems we've had with runners on the hard surface. Women, especially, have gotten shin splints," which are small fractures of the leg bones.

The athletic department has chosen an elastic, thirteen millimeter-thick surface called Rekortan to cushion the track. This German-made product now covers the Olympic outdoor stadiums in Berlin, Munich, and Los Angeles. However, the Williams facility will be the first American indoor track with a Rekortan surface.

As a result, Farley said, "I think they will use this as a showcase and do a first-class job."

Only the running surface from the pole lane out is being resurfaced, since that is the part of the recreational floor which receives the most use, Farley said.

Before finalizing the decision to use Rekortan, the athletic department sent a square-foot sample of the present Tartan track to Germany to insure that the bond between the two would be chemically correct. The department also contacted other institutions which had used the surface, and they endorsed it as "a top-shelf product," Farley said.

$36,000 "very fair"

In addition, the athletic department compared the price of Rekortan, around $36,000, to that of other surfaces and found it "very fair," Farley said. The money is being provided by Mrs. Herbert Towne, wife of the alumnus who donated the field house. Mrs. Towne has established a fund to maintain the building, said Farley.

"We are very satisfied with the bonding and warranty and super-satisfied with the price" of the track, said Robert Peck, chairman of the athletics department.

Farley said he hopes that the new Rekortan surface will make track practice more pleasant and productive. With the present hard surface so conducive to injuries, "we don't work hard [workout] days back-to-back," explained Farley. "The track team should improve because kids will be able to work out more."

"In the long run," he said, "the make-up of Rekortan is sufficient for fast times and best to prevent injuries." Peck hopes it will "alleviate complaints from joggers, too."

The resurfacing process should take about three days and is tentatively scheduled sometime between the start of exams and Christmas. "If we did it any other time people would be biting at the bit to get in and use it," Farley explained.

"This way we have two weeks for it to set up."

Three sides of rugby all maulate Engineers

by Tom Dumphy

The rugby football club continued its winning ways Saturday, as all three sides defeated the RPI opposition.

A-side edges RPI

The A-side never really got untracked but managed to beat RPI on talent alone. Williams scored early when George Clemens '86 touched down a try after some tough running by Brad Blissett '86. RPI came back with a drop kick to make the score 4-3 at the half.

RPI went ahead 6-4 on a penalty kick. Williams regained a one point lead when Bob Aulse '85 scored on a penalty kick into a strong wind. The remainder of the game Williams held off the threatening RPI squad. John Freese '84, Peter Alken '86 and Paul Hoban '86 shone for Williams all game long.

Gunman accosts students, town teen to be charged

by Christian Howlett

Two Williams students were accosted Wednesday night outside East College by a Williamstown teenager wielding a gun. No one was hurt but police said they will charge 17-year-old David Tanzman with assault with a deadly weapon, illegal possession of a handgun, possession of a deadly weapon and possession of marijuana, a Class D substance.

Shannon McKeen '85 and Mark Evans '85, who are both Junior Advisors in East, were involved in the incident, which took place at around midnight.

According to McKeen, the altercation started when Evans and Charlie Mitchell '84, who were waiting for McKeen on the corner of Route 2 and Spring Street, saw a fourth person cross Spring Street to Lasell Gymnasium. McKeen said that as the pedestrian crossed, a blue car coming up Spring Street sped up and swerved as though to hit him.

An angered Evans then threw beer into the car as it passed, said McKeen. Later, as the two walked toward East, the car pulled into the driveway between East and Lawrence Halls and the driver yelled "Are you the guys who threw beer in my car?"

"Books around my head"

McKeen said he responded by yelling "are you the guy that tried to hit somebody?" The driver then got out of the car, demanding to know who had thrown the beer. He said "I'm either going to beat their face in or put a hole in their head," according to McKeen.

"He said he was going to wrap my books around my head,"

House presidents' inaction draws threats from Kenyatta

Reported by Stuart Smith, Chris Howlett and Melissa Matthes; written by Jeff Brainard

Several house presidents have expressed feelings ranging from anger to indifference over a letter sent to them by Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta on Oct. 5 asking them to submit to her the guidelines they had established on noise control in their respective dormitories. Kenyatta's letter threatened that she would take disciplinary action against house presidents who were slow in responding.

Kenyatta's request for guidelines stems from a passage in The Student Handbook which states that the deans have the right to receive a summary of the rights of dormitory residents from house presidents at the beginning of the year. The rule asks for a written summary by the president of the discussion and resolution by house members of what these rights should be.

Kenyatta asked that the summaries be turned in "during the month of September." In a subsequent letter to house presidents she set a Sept. 26 deadline.

Many house presidents missed the deadline. Kenyatta responded with another letter on Oct. 5, which this time threatened disciplinary action if the guidelines were not turned in by Oct. 17. The deans have the authority to give a variety of disciplinary punishments, ranging from a warning to suspension or expulsion.

"Too severe"

Most house presidents felt the threat was inappropriate. Jean Marie Congdon '84, president of Bryant House, said she thought "the threat of disciplinary action was too severe," but said "a lot of people are taking it really lightly."

Others were surprised and curious about the threat. "For her to threaten me with disciplinary action about something that is an extracurricular act—I don't think that is within her bounds as a dean," said Oliver Johnson '84, president of A-Gar-Wood House.

"What could she do?" asked Mark Rice '84, president of Prospect House. Rice said he delayed responding in order to "give people a chance to live in the house" before holding the meeting.

Others said that they sympathized with Kenyatta's action. "Sometimes I think that's the only way you can get people to do things," said Carter House President Bob Ause '85.

Didn't plan to punish

Kenyatta said last Friday that she never actually planned to take specific disciplinary action against the house presidents.

"I thought that after receiving the letter they would take the responsibility seriously, and there would be no need for action," she said.

The whole purpose of having house meetings on noise guidelines was "to put the issue back into the houses, and deal with the issues there," Kenyatta said. "I've gotten very good reports of discussions and hope it has served a useful purpose."

Kenyatta said she thinks noise is a real problem on campus, and she noted that it may be one reason for the decline in Mission Park's popularity in housing selections last year. "If we can get a handle on the problem, it would be a much more attractive place to live," she said.

"Little to ask"

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said he did not know that Kenyatta had made the threat of disciplinary action, but he backed the move.

"It's an established rule of the College," said O'Connor about the noise meetings. "It is the deans' prerogative to challenge someone on it. It seems very little to ask. I can see why she'd be irritated."

He said the deans need the statements because many house residents do not try to work out their grievances with the house officers and complain directly to the deans and Security instead.

"We need to know what each house's agreement is, so we can say [to those who come to the deans], 'you should go back and try to talk it out with the officers first,'" O'Connor said.

O'Connor said that the deans' approach is intended to minimize their interference in student affairs. But several of the presidents said that the letter was itself interference.

"A lot of baloney"

According to Armstrong House President Richard Dodds '84, the presidents told Kenyatta at a housing committee meeting that "this is a lot of baloney, we've taken care of it, so get off our backs. It's getting down to personal issues."

Spencer-Brooks President Helen Mango '85 said that "quiet hours," or noise curfews, were a bad idea because house members would be discouraged from asking others to turn down stereos during hours before the set curfew.

Council to Trustees: We need more power

by Charles P. Goodwin and Jeff Brainard

Members of the College Council complained to several trustees at an Oct. 13 meeting that the Council lacks power to make important College decisions affecting students and that it has trouble representing student opinion. The Council met with the Trustee's Committee on Campus Life during the Trustees' semi-annual visit to campus last weekend.

In a later meeting Oct. 20, the Council formed a committee to better communicate with students who serve on College committees.

Jan Van Eck '85, vice-president of the Council, told the trustees that "Council members want to make conclusive decisions on 'College decisions that affect our life—the flume, an all-night lounge, leaving [transferring out of] houses."

Council President Tom Paper '84 said that there has not been enough student input into decisions like the end of all-night studying in the Van Aistyne lounge in Sawyer Library.

"Unilateral decisions"

In response Trustee E. Wayne Wilkens said that the Council should be "very careful about wanting to make unilateral decisions."

Dean Daniel O'Connor reminded Paper that there are three student members on the Library Committee, a group which approved the head librarian's proposal that the Van Aistyne lounge be closed.

Van Eck said one of the reasons the Council is not more effective is that there are too many pathways for students to express opinion.

"Decentralization is one of the problems we face," he said. "There are too many structures for student input, and no body exists to take the bottom line." He said the Council was the best body for consolidating student opinion since it had the easiest path for information flow from the students, via the representatives and the House Presidents.

Trustee Andrew D. Helneman agreed that the Trustees "do need student input" and that decentralization of student power makes "life hard for the Trustees."

"Broad section"

However, he said the Trustees still need to speak to many student groups, because in the past, when the Trustees thought they had surveyed "a broad section of the student body" on some issue, it turned out to be "only one or two students speaking for themselves."

Van Eck said other campus groups dealing with student issues are not representative of students. He criticized the Committee on Undergraduate Life for not communicating with the student body or with the Council. One of the CUL's main responsibilities is to report student opinion to the Trustees.

Van Eck also criticized the Gargoyles Society, calling it a

Wise up

Phyllis Schlafly's upcoming lecture will test how openly we at Williams can debate controversial ideas. Her visit will give many people an opportunity to consider anew positions they had previously dismissed. As extreme as those positions might be, they can lend insight into the thinking of more moderate political figures.

Unfortunately, this is a very conservative campus—conservative in that word's traditional meaning: slow or unwilling to accept new ideas or changes. We often recognize this stubborn inflexibility in our opponents, but when faced with an opposing view, many of us recede into mockery rather than discussion. This close-mindedness is most visible when it surfaces in intellectual arrogance rather than curiosity.

This arrogance cuts down the debate from which we could all learn. Smith College's rebellion against Jean Kirkpatrick last spring made her a martyr to those who like her and left her opponents clinging to beliefs that they did not have the opportunity to debate. Closer to home, many found Mary Daly's rhetoric extreme beyond reason during her visit to campus last year. Nonetheless, those who opened their ears could have gleaned insight into the foundations of a broad range of feminist thought. Phyllis Schlafly's views are similarly polar, and they can similarly be applied to a broad range of thought.

As an open marketplace of ideas, Williams encourages speakers of varied stances. No student is expected to agree with everything expressed, but anyone who is "too smart" to listen is really too dumb to learn.

Unnecessary roughness

Dormitory living can become loud, and it is therefore understandable that the deans ask house presidents to establish regulations for dealing with noise. Recently, some presidents' failure to meet a deadline for submitting those regulations led to an ambiguous threat of disciplinary action from Dean Kenyatta. That threat went far beyond the context of their tardiness.

That "disciplinary action" was never specified added to the threat. To most of us, that phrase connotes fitting punishment for academic misbehavior or the commission of a crime against campus or student. How severely can someone be punished for a late letter? Not severely, one hopes, but Kenyatta's letter did not say.

One also must ask how severely the deans can punish someone for his conduct in an extra-curricular activity. Non-performance on the job should lead to loss of the job, not "disciplinary action."

The greatest indignity, perhaps, is that the threat was idle. Kenyatta herself had no specific punishment in mind when she wrote the letter—she simply hoped to scare the delinquent presidents into action. Empty threats are counterproductive to good relations between students and Hopkins Hall.

Luckily, we do not have a general noise problem on campus. We have a few isolated incidents of loud stereos or typing. Those incidents, as the deans recognize, can be handled through the houses. The deans want houses to practice self-governance, so they ought to find ways to make sure the process works. Saying "boo!" is not the answer.

LETTERS

Noise

To the editor:

In response to the article on the CUL's proposed letter concerning stereos, I agree completely with Professor Bolton. Page 23 of The 1983 Student Handbook states: "The creation of persistent and excessive noise is a violation of good conduct." It makes no difference whether someone complains directly to the perpetrator of that noise; one should listen to music because one wants to listen to it, not because one wants to broadcast it to all others to hear.

In addition, I'm appalled by the attitude voiced by CUL member Cypriot, that "unless people complain about the music, you have to assume it's bothering no one." As anyone who knows anything about human nature will say, people prefer the route of least resistance, which is not to complain. Peer pressure being what it is on campus, few students are going to risk the negative social implications of being a complainer, and will suffer in silence. As a matter of fact, students who wear their stereos in public should consider that, even if no one complains, it will be bothering a number of people.

Incidentally, I would feel equally strongly about Beethoven being played under such circumstances as about any rock music. It's the invasion of privacy that concerns me. It's like going to a restaurant and having waiters come along and stuff unwanted food into my mouth, completely out of my control.

Grades

To the editor:

Your article on grade "inflation" [Oct. 4 issue] cites "accurate numbers, but they represent the mean grade point average rather than the median. Both the mean and the median are types of averages."

The mean is obtained by adding together all of the grades and dividing by the number of course registrants; the median is determined by finding the value that divides the ordered grade distribution into two equal-sized halves. Had the median been used, the conclusion that grade inflation is over would still hold. However, those who agree with Dean O'Connor that the current GPA is nevertheless too high would have even more reason to be alarmed. The median grade for 1982-83 is 8.49, about one-quarter of a grade point higher than the mean of 8.23.

I'm writing to the Record because by the time the next issue of The Williams Republican comes out, everyone will have completely forgotten about the first.

Who is the mysterious Nikolai Lenin referred to on the back page of their October 13 issue? I have heard much about a Vladimir Ilich Lenin, and even of a pseudonym he wrote under, N. Lenin. Never, however, have I heard of a Nikolai Lenin.

As John Washington, our first President, used to say, "Better dead than red—especially if you can't get the Com- mune's name right."

To the editor:

We, the members of Gargoyle, are aware that some on campus view Gargoyle as secretive and not representative of the campus as a whole. Gargoyle is not an elected body, like the College Council, nor do we perform the Council's function. Gargoyle's purpose is to generate ideas, discussion and suggestions on a variety of campus topics.

The power of suggestion, though, is not without its own result. In order to make this power available to more students, we are publishing the name of every Gargoyle member. Anyone who is interested should please contact us with ideas for improving the campus or questions about the organization.

Baldwin's prophecy pessimistic, but on target for America

by David L. Smith

For three decades now, James Baldwin has been one of the most distinctive and profoundly moving of all American writers. A writer deeply sensitive to the moral contradictions in American life, Baldwin has consistently embodied in his writing the most troubling paradoxes of race, religion, social justice and sexuality. Taken as a whole, his novels, plays and essays constitute one of the most telling social commentaries of our time. Along with his coeval, Norman Mailer, Baldwin has become one of those essential artists through whose work we find a unifying vision of ourselves as a society. And true to the tradition of prophetic writers, his vision gives us little reason to rejoice.

Baldwin began his career at a time when Existentialism was making its initial impact on American writers. That was also a time when many American writers were rebelling against Stalinism and the social realist aesthetics of the Communist Party, which had been so influential during the thirties. Both of these tendencies color his early work. "Everybody's Protest Novel" (1949), his most famous early essay, attacked the tradition of polemic fiction, extending from Uncle Tom's Cabin through the thirties and, by implication, including the work of Baldwin's mentor, Richard Wright. This essay opened a rift between Wright and Baldwin which was never mended, creating one of Baldwin's most severe personal traumas. (He recounts their relationship in Nobody Knows My Name (1961).) The Existentialist flavoring of pained self-consciousness pervades Baldwin's fiction, especially his autobiographical first novel, Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953). The Fire Next Time (1963) presents Baldwin as Christian prophet, declaring that Afro-Americans might, through their own love and sacrifice, redeem Euro-Americans—"our lost brother," he calls them—from their historical sins against the rest of the world. (Many liberal critics consider this his best book.)

Most people think of Baldwin as primarily a writer concerned with "race relations." But then, for most Americans, Afro-American writers are always, by definition, primarily concerned with "race relations." The fact that most people believe such foolishness, however, does not make it true. Obviously, Baldwin, like most Afro-Americans, is deeply concerned with racial issues; and regarding this concern as predominant and definitive leads one to dismiss other foci of his work as secondary, peripheral, or extraneous. Hence, Baldwin's works on other topics such as Giovanni's Room (1957, on homosexuality) and The Devil Finds Work (1977, on film) receive less attention than they deserve. But even more importantly, this view prevents one from understanding correctly the relationship between the various themes within Baldwin's more familiar works.

Actually, the impulse which defines nearly all of Baldwin's work has been a compulsion to explore the possibilities of individual integrity and authenticity in our society, when individual needs and desires defy the patterns prescribed by coercive structures of authority and domination. This, for Baldwin, is not merely a question of racial oppression. It is, rather, a project which calls liberal clichés about the freedom and openness his solidarity with the Black Power Movement. But those people who read in Baldwin's early work only the redeeming power of love—which like the Civil Rights Movement, proposed to save white America from its sins—ignored half of Baldwin's message and forgot the

"...for most Americans, Afro-American writers are always, by definition, primarily concerned with 'race relations.' The fact that most people believe such foolishness, however, does not make it true."

of American society radically into question. Naturally, Baldwin extends this concern to his critique of racism: the most egregious deviation from the American ideal of freedom and equality. But the same rebellion against coercive authority informs his writings about his father, the church, sexual relations (homo- and hetero-), and the nefarious exercises of American state power, at home and abroad. Ultimately, Baldwin's vision is a moral vision—and a deeply Christian one—which defends the integrity of individuals against the prerogatives and deprivations of power. On the other hand, it is a pessimistic vision which recognizes the inevitability of suffering and the terrible price of persistent wickedness. Baldwin's hope or social salvation is constantly chastened by his doubts that it can, in fact, be attained.

Many of Baldwin's liberal enthusiasts turned against him in the late sixties when he became more critical of the American government and expressed tradition of Biblical prophecy. Even the New Testament ends with an apocalyptic vision in the Book of Revelations. The righteous are indeed saved, but the wicked are vanquished with "a sharp sword"—heid, significantly, in the warrior's mouth—and cast down into hell. No one should be surprised, therefore, that Baldwin's recent documentary film, "I Heard It Through the Grapevine," (1982) ends with a vision of the destruction of America. James Baldwin has not abandoned his moral vision or the ambition he announced in Notes of a Native Son "to be an honest man and a good writer." Nor has he abandoned the concept of writer as prophet. Baldwin reminds us in his recent work that Reagan's America is certainly no more righteous than Kennedy's. The fire next time is fast becoming the fire now.

Finding the thoughts behind Reagan's action

by Raymond Baker

I have just had an experience that I wish every person serious about a rational U.S. foreign policy could enjoy. It was a face-to-face debate with Reverend Jerry Falwell of the Moral Majority. Our forum was the excellent "Late Night America PBS." During the course of our heated exchange I understood more fully an important fact that foreign policy analysts have been missing. People like Falwell, and that includes our President, do not really care about the complexity of foreign affairs in a nuclear age. To them it still comes down to simple, down home good versus evil. The American way against the Soviets. It's a frightening concept.

The Reverend Falwell will be a real help all around when it comes time to choose for or against a second term for Ronald Reagan. The President has enthusiastically welcomed support from Falwell's fundamentalist Moral Majority and endorsed its general positions. Falwell, in turn, is throwing the full force of his organization behind the President's reelection. But, quite unintentionally, Falwell is also helping Reagan opponents. With his gutsy country preacher style, Falwell clears away the haze that still surrounds the foreign policy of the Reagan presidency. By listening to Falwell's words and watching the President's actions, it is possible to get a clear fix on just how disastrous for U.S. interests a second Reagan term will be.

We need such clarity. On foreign policy, Ronald Reagan is still a blur for most Americans. Recent Harris and New York Times polls point persuasively for the first time to a broad popular dissatisfaction with Reagan's foreign policy. But the displeasure remains vague and is unlikely to have a galvanizing effect.

Why hasn't Reagan's dangerous mismanagement of foreign policy produced a stronger reaction? For one thing, it is hard to believe that Reagan is really conducting any foreign policy at all. We all know, although it is still embarrassing to say it bluntly, that the President regularly displays a stunning ignorance on crucial foreign policy issues. He jumbles even the main outlines of the SALT agreements with the Soviet Union and hasn't a clue about the history of the U.S. role in Central America. Yet, when aggressive reporters reveal this ignorance with probing questions, the President is never rude in return. We're such a fair people. It's hard for Americans to criticize so pleasant and earnest a man for things that he doesn't quite have a handle on.

limitation talks, describes the President's initiative as a "nonoffer" that "will do nothing to advance actual negotiations with the Soviet Union." In fact, argues Gortoff, the latest proposals may "have seriously reduced prospects for a successful negotiation."

Exactly the same story with Central America. Wayne Smith, chief of the U.S. interests section in Havana from 1979 to 1982, remarks that the Reagan adminiswhen one is trying to describe Falwell. And the Reverend certainly isn't silky. But Jerry Falwell does put into plain words what President Reagan is actually doing.

Ignorance and persistent gaps between Reagan words and deeds do add up to a policy. Falwell explains clearly, if not nicely, why knowledge of the world is not necessary to conduct a Reagan foreign policy. Falwell expresses directly the judgement that underlies Reagan actions. For both men, the enemy is communism and it is everywhere the same. And for both men, the remedy is military force. So why bother with the details?

Suddenly it becomes clear how we can have an administration that claims to be serious about improving relations with the Soviets but that has had no important political adviser knowledgeable about Soviet politics, comparable, say, to Marshall Shulman of Columbia in the Carter years. It is understandable, too, that Reagan could purge the government of Central American experts just as soon as he took office, knowing full well how important the region would be to our foreign policy.

Jerry Falwell can help us face some simple facts. Ronald Reagan has no intention of talking seriously to the "evil" Russians about anything. Military force, not diplomacy and negotiation, is his solution to all Third World problems from Nicaragua to El Salvador to Chad to Lebanon and beyond. "Gromyko couldn't have said it better" is Falwell's reaction to any disagreement with this simplistic new Cold War recipe.

Talking with Jerry Falwell makes it possible to understand the gap between the nice guy Reagan image and nasty Reagan deeds like the "secret" war against Nicaragua and the slanderous attacks against the patriotism of those who have called for a nuclear freeze. Jerry Falwell lifts the veil: our President is a nice-seeming guy who thinks he's right when he does dangerous and nasty things.

Alums urge Development, Alumni offices to merge

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

A group of alumni recommended to College officials in a meeting Oct. 14 that the College's Development Office and Alumni Relations Office be consolidated under one administrator, a move College officials say should make the College's already immensely successful fund-raising efforts even more efficient.

The recommendation was made by a subcommittee of the Development Council, a group of alumni which counsels the College on fund-raising matters. The Development Council met with members of both offices, College administrators, and several trustees, who were campus for their semi-annual meeting.

The two offices will not themselves be abolished, but the new administrator will be responsible for making them work more closely together, according to College President John Chandler. Chandler has appointed a committee, consisting of trustees, faculty and alumni, to further study exactly how the two offices should cooperate and what the new administrator's duties would be. The committee's report is expected by the end of the year, Chandler said.

In recent years Williams has raised on average more money than any comparably-sized school in the country, and also boasts the highest rate of alumni participation in fund drives.

New vice-president?

The Development Council originally recommended that the new administrator be a vice-president solely responsible for overseeing the two offices. But the idea may be reconsidered in light of opposition from faculty, according to Director of Alumni Relations Craig Lewis.

"It's a sensitive issue, to add personnel at the highest administrative level when the faculty is being held to a set number," he said. Chandler said the Trustees have not yet considered who may be chosen to be the new administrator.

Alumni and development officials said they think closer coordination will be helped their efforts.

"It makes good business sense," said Director of Development John Pritchard. The Development Office solicits donors for large capital gifts.

"A lot of the functions of the two offices are almost inseparable," Pritchard said. "You have to know who the alumni are and where they are before you can ask them for money. But sometimes we lose track of what's going on in the other office day to day. We need to better understand each other's plans and how they might merge."

"Avoid goofs"

"I like the direction we're going in," said Lewis. "The two offices approach alumni for different reasons. Right now the Annual Giving drive [a four-month effort run by the Alumni office] is in full swing and Development kind of lays off to avoid collision with it."

"But it's still difficult to anticipate all possible conflicts," he said, "so we need more day-to-day coordination to avoid goofs and mishaps. Occasionally an alum gets too many requests and gets mad and says 'I'm not giving anything until you get your act together.'"

The Development Council also recommended that the size of the Development staff be nearly doubled, to intensify its efforts.

Morgan draws blood

The Red Cross collected 326 units of blood during a blood drive at the First Congregational Church last Wednesday and Thursday. 92 people were first-time donors, including Tom Perry '84, who was brought in bound and gagged as a joke.

Of the 326 total donors, 239 were Williams students and ten were faculty or staff members.

Morgan Hall won the Vampire Sweepstakes, which is a competition among dorms sponsored by the Red Cross. Morgan won because it had the highest percentage of its residents—30 percent—donating blood of any dorm on campus. The house will receive as its prize a decorated cake from Molly's Bakery and root beer from Pappa Charlie's deli.

Armstrong House came second in the Sweepstakes with 23 percent, followed by A-Garwood with 21.8 and Dennett with 21.6.

The Bloodmobile's next visit to Williams will be Feb. 7-8.

Botswana honors Lewis

Stephen R. Lewis Jr., professor of economics and an advisor to top government officials in the southern African nation of Botswana, received the highest civilian honor awarded at Independence Day ceremonies there on September 30.

Before a crowd of 10,000 people in the National Stadium in Gaborone, Lewis received the Presidential Order of Meritorious Service from Botswana's President Quett Masire during the nation's annual celebration of its independence from Great Britain in 1966. Lewis was the first American and only the fourth non-citizen to be given the honor. He was the only foreigner of the four award winners this year.

Lewis began working as an economic advisor to Botswana in 1975. He has lived in Kenya and Pakistan, and worked in Tanzania, Uganda, and Lesotho.

Lewis described his eight years in Botswana as a firsthand seminar on developmental economics. "It makes me feel good to see people I've worked with moving into positions of higher and higher responsibility," he said.

In 1981, largely through the efforts of Lewis, formal ties were established between Williams and Botswana in which Williams recruits specialists from throughout the world to serve as consultants to government ministries.

Council brings back cookies

The College Council restructured its recommendations for the remodeling of Baxter Hall, deleting the pottery studio, an all-night study area, and a bookstore from its list of priority needs for a new student center, in a meeting last Thursday.

Space for the Outing Club, an upstairs office for the Council and the renovation of the Rathskeller were given high priority.

In other action, the Council announced the reinstatement of Tuesday afternoon cookies in Stetson Library as part of a continuing effort to better student faculty relations. The Council will hire a manager to buy cookies and facilitate student-faculty interaction. The Dean's Office and the Council will pay for cookies and the manager's $300 salary. Tea, coffee and cocoa will be provided by the Provost.

Bikers raise $1500

A "Wheels for Life" bike-a-thon sponsored by the Chaplain's office raised $1,500 for St. Jude's Children's Hospital in Memphis, Tennessee last Saturday.

Twenty-one Williams students and one towns person rode on two courses, one two miles long and a longer ten-mile course to and from Steele's Corner in South Williamstown. Participants rode as long as they wished, and collected money from pledgers for each mile they rode.

Bike-a-thon coordinator Jeff Sultar '84 said he was pleased with the results. "The average amount of money raised for St. Jude's in bike-a-thons like this is around $800, so we did better than average," he said.

Vincent Hill '84 won a pound of fudge from Goodies for riding 60 miles during the four-hour bike-a-thon. Other local businesses, including Mountain Goat, the Record Store and the River House, also donated prizes. Burger King donated french fries for all the participants.

The money will be used by St. Jude's for research programs and will help defray the costs of care for patients, who generally can't pay for their care, Sultar said.

Pressure is not uncommon at Williams, as three students note above. Whether it be academic, social or all-encompassing, stress affects every Williams student at some time or another. Interviews with students, faculty and counseling staff indicate that everyone recognizes the situation, and that it stems from a variety of causes. No one, though, has an easy solution.

Lightened workload

Professor Kurt Tauber, political science department chairman, remarks that students continue to regard the academic workload as being excessive, despite efforts he and other faculty members have made to pare down assignments to today's "streamlined" level.

Tauber comments, "I have responded to complaints on the SES's [students' evaluation forms] by reducing the amount of reading, but the workload is still being put down as too high. Even though in my own syllabi I'm assigning fewer pages, I'm still known as a heavy assigner."

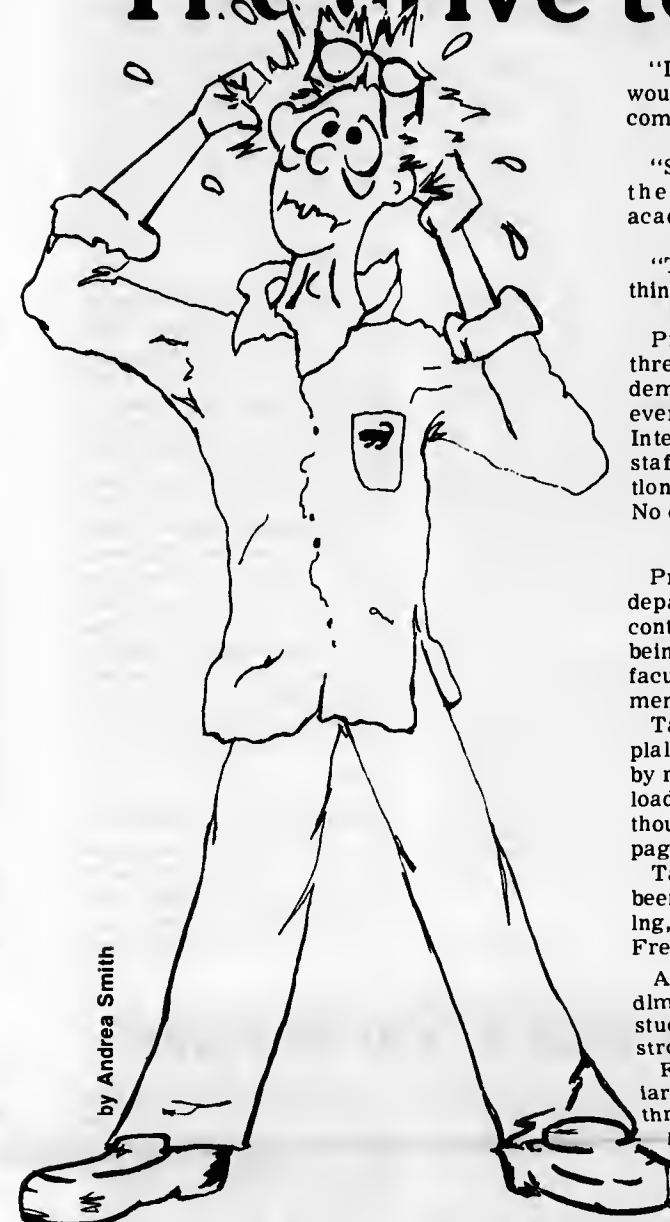

Tauber is not alone. Other "faculty who have been here a long time see the workload as lightening," according to David Colby, Dean of Freshmen.

Although the amount of student work may have diminished from its past level, many Williams students continue to find themselves faced with strong academic pressure.

For freshmen, the experience can be particularly jolting. Mensei attests that "after the first three or four weeks when everything begins to pile up, the stress really hits you. It's scary."

Even when socializing, he continues, a preoccupied

Freshmen show talent

by Kristen Engberg and Joshua Swift

The 1983 Freshmen Revue breaks from its own tradition of being student written. It is directed by students, however, and the results reveal the immense potential of the freshmen performers. The two producers/directors, Margie Duffield and Sarah Horowitz, both juniors, created this revue in two parts: "Interview", a short play by Jean-Claude von Itallie, and "A Brecht Cabaret", poems and lyrics by Bertolt Brecht, compiled by Mark Horowitz. Although the two parts differ greatly in presentation, costume, and method, they share the common themes of social oppression and the dehumanization of the individual.

"Interview" outstanding

"Interview", directed by Margie Duffield '85 and written during the political turmoil of the 1960's, depicts the regimentation and depersonalization of the individual in an automated society. All eight performers, four women and four men, are dressed identically, in black pants and white shirts. The play opens with the interviews of four applicants seeking employment. The interviewers all wear identical masks, which unfortunately muffle whatever the performers are saying, but which also metaphorically reduce them to the same cold, monotonous existence as the applicants, who are all named "Smith".

The simultaneous interviewing of the four candidates is cleverly effected through the incessant overlapping of voices. Not one applicant or interviewer voices a complete personal thought—each performer adds merely a new phrase, ultimately producing an entire sentence. Indeed, the use of voices in this fractured and monotonous manner demands smooth timing on the part of the cast, and, although the transition from one performer to another is sometimes rough, the cast generally handles these transitions successfully.

Despair and frustration

The body of the piece projects the despair and frustration of the individual against various social backgrounds. After the interviews abruptly end, the shifting scenes present the regimentation of apathetic institutions such as the army, the phone company, and a cocktail party. Emotion and pain are subordinated in futile personal attempts to break away from this cold indifference. Psychiatrists, priests, and politicians, seem only to offer empty rhetoric and platitudes.

The freshman cast of "Interview" deserves recognition for their moving interpretations of von Itallie's theme: the rejection of the individual by society despite attempts by that individual to reclaim the self. The subtlety of the directing was outstanding.

Notre Dame

The following story is excerpted from the October 13, 1983 edition of The Wall Street Journal.

After a sit-down strike, students at the University of Notre Dame have won their demand: an unlimited supply of Cap'n Crunch, their favorite cereal.

They even had a week-long Cap'n Crunch Festival last week to celebrate the victory.

"The students talk a lot about your health foods, granola and such, but there's never been a strike over anything but Cap'n Crunch," says William J. Hickey Jr., director of food services.

It all started one night last February in the university's South Dining Hall in South Bend, Ind., where about 20 cereals are kept in bins. At the evening meal, students had a choice of three hot entrees—not Cap'n Crunch. So 20 students blocked the cafeteria serving aisle, locked arms and

Take the air guitar into your own hands and hit the stage

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

The Record does not often review books. It does so only if the book is especially relevant, timely or important to Williams students. This is clearly such a case.

Everyone has seen would-be rock stars jumping up and down in time to blaring music, swinging their arms and legs around in imaginary Pete Townsend windmills. If you have ever wanted to join them, there's a new book out that will teach you how you too can become the Jimi Hendrix of your floor or entry.

The Complete Air Guitar Handbook, by John McKenna and Michael Moffitt, is a short but thorough guide to the intricacies of air guitarism, the most advanced form of audience participation.

The book first notes the more obvious advantages of the air guitar, such as its low weight and easy maintenance, and lists essential air guitar accessories, like bandanas and air fuzz pedals. The book climaxes with a description of practical applications and amply-illustrated essential air guitar moves: the duck walk (pioneered by Chuck Berry), the Windmill (Townsend), Sliding Stringteens (kneeling and leaning back), and the dramatic Flying Stringsteen (preferably off the top of an air amplifier.)

McKenna and Moffitt are heavily-biased in favor of '70s mainstream hard rock to accompany one's gyrations, as shown by their selection of the ultimate air guitar albums—Get Yer Ya-Ya's Out, Who's Next, Born to Run, and AC/DC and Van Halen albums.

To this, I can only say: wrong! What about Bowie and the Talking Heads, who often substitute hypnotic rhythms for the more egocentric lead guitar solos? What about songs without guitars at all? More and more, air guitarists of the 80s and 90s are turning to air synthesizers and air syndrums to boogie to their favorite technopop. McKenna and Moffitt seem out of tune with the times. Worse, they gloss over the excitement of the Joe Strummer lurch and other amusing skinhead antics.

Still, this book shows one how to listen to classic rock and roll in style and get a good workout at the same time. Practice makes perfect, and the authors suggest the beginner start with air guitar substitutes like tennis rackets (chain saws are unacceptable) and work up from there.

Whether this training could blossom into exciting pseudo-performances on the Williams campus remains to be seen. There was supposed to be an air band contest at the Log, but it hasn't yet materialized. Scores of air guitarists are reportedly holed up in their rooms and entries, but when will the community at large be witness to their virtuosity?

The book ends where it begins, by noting that the air guitar is now part of the New American Dream—to be a rock star. According to the authors, the dream was born in 1956 when an unnamed air guitarist replayed Elvis Presley's "Blue Suede Shoes" in his living room after he first heard "The King" perform it on the Ed Sullivan Show: "As he heard 'The King' wall, 'Well it's three to get ready and four to go,' he could stand it no longer. He jumped up out of the chair, leaped onto the dining room table, and mimicked with complete accuracy every move he had seen Elvis make. No longer was he a lonely, overweight, acne-pocked adolescent. He was 'The King.' The television lights were blinding him; sweat poured from his body; the hysterical shrieks of hundred of overwrought teenage girls deafened him.

"The first air guitar was born."

demanding their cereal.

"I don't know why it's so popular except it's crunchy and has a lot of sugar," says Mr. Hickey. Cap'n Crunch, a product of Chicago-based Quaker Oats Co., is 43% sugar. The rest is a mix of corn and oat flours. The company says it's the second-largest selling pre-sweetened cereal behind Kellogg Co.'s Sugar Frosted Flakes. Students attribute the popularity to Cap'n Crunch himself, a jolly cartoon sea captain who has appeared in advertisements during Saturday morning children's TV shows since 1963.

"Now we're all grown up and at Notre Dame," says Susan Baker, vice president of the sophomore class. Miss Baker seized on the strike as a campaign issue. Along with Lee Broussard, now the president of the class of 1986, she ran on a Cap'n Crunch platform. "We promised that there would be enough Cap'n Crunch, and said we would do something in the way of community service," she says.

Now Mr. Hickey orders massive amounts of Cap'n Crunch and makes it available all the time. Next week's university-approved festival, which is sponsored by the Class of '86, will feature a Cap'n Crunch eating contest that students will pay $1 to enter.

The proceeds will go to a local soup kitchen, which some critics find darkly ironic. Others say the students shouldn't be encouraged to eat sugary cereals like Cap'n Crunch, but Mr. Hickey disagrees. "I think the cereal is better for them than beer," he says.

For its part, Quaker Oats is donating $1,000 worth of food to South Bend charity, and also giving away cereal, free football tickets and other prizes. "We're flattered that they like our cereal," says a company spokesman. "Nobody ever went on strike for it before."

Middlebury

Middlebury sophomore Julie Lambert recently represented Vermont in the Miss America pageant in Atlantic City. Glamorous, you say? Maybe for some, but, said Lambert in The Middlebury Campus, "The majority of girls...are just like you and me. They're in the pageant to advance their career in entertainment, modeling or fashion."

Lambert, who sang "Don't Rain On My Parade" in the talent competitions, sees the pageant primarily as an outlet to display talent. She added, however, that "as much as you hate to admit it, it does have a lot to do with the points accrued in the swimsuit and evening gown areas," according to the Campus.

Amherst

The name BACCHUS means alcohol at campuses all over the country, but not in the same way it does at Williams. A recent issue of The Amherst Student invited "anyone interested in helping to promote healthy drinking behavior [or] alleviating the problem of alcohol abuse on campus" to an organizational meeting of Amherst's form of BACCHUS. This BACCHUS (Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students) is a nationwide organization.

According to Williams' Bacchus member Paul Meeks, who christened the club, the name in no way refers to the national group. Meeks was unaware of the group's existence at the time the club was named.

Faculty meeting

Endowment increases 50 percent

by Philip Busch

The College's endowment grew by nearly 50 percent last year, announced College Treasurer William Reed at last Wednesday's faculty meeting. The endowment reached the record figure of $163 million, up 48.6% from the 1982 figure.

College President John Chandler also alerted the faculty to a hoax letter supposedly written by him, which poked fun at a recent editorial in The Williams Record. The letter was circulated to certain faculty mailboxes last week.

The faculty then briefly considered changes in the College calendar and classroom arrangements. What pleased many faculty the most about the meeting was its adjournment after only 35 minutes, perhaps a record for brevity. "This is unheard of," gasped one professor.

Reed first said that the increase in the endowment reflects the bullish stock market during the fiscal year ending last June, said Reed. "We were well positioned for the rise," he said. Reed termed the rise "highly unusual; it's one of the largest swings in Williams history."

Williams aims for a five-percent annual rise in its endowment in the long run, said Reed.

"The endowment is performing well above average," he said.

Hoax letter

On a more humorous note, Chandler commented on an anonymous spoof letter that someone circulated with the President's letterhead and a signature to several dozen, randomly-picked faculty mailboxes.

The letter purported to be Chandler's comments on a recent Record editorial which discussed pressures on students resulting from conflicting intellectual and career preparation demands.

It initially criticized the editorial as "poorly composed and reasoned." The editorial was in fact garbled, due to an error made at the printing plant by a staff member who inadvertently rearranged the editorial's paragraphs.

The fake letter gave Chandler's alleged thoughts on the problem and concluded with three philosophical quotations that professors were urged to share with their students.

"The memo purports to be from me but is not," said Chandler. "It's a very skillful forgery. I agreed generally with the sentiments; it even sounded like me. I am offering general amnesty in return for forty hours of ghostwriting."

Alcohol Awareness Week bids students drink responsibly

by Lisa Payne

A wrecked car on Baxter Lawn, a drunken senior on WCFM and free Pepsi at the Log were all just part of Alcohol Awareness Week, a series of events sponsored by the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program to make students more aware of facts and dangers surrounding alcohol use.

"Moderation and not abstention is what we're trying to promote," explained Bill Leininger '86, president of the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program. "We don't want to act as a haunting force, just as a reminder to keep things in control."

On Monday night WAAP sponsored a spot on the radio in which Steve Zlotowski '84 drank screwdrivers and then was tested at intervals for reaction time and coordination; and on Tuesday the committee showed a movie on drunk driving.

Robert Samuels, a psychology intern at the University of Massachusetts, lectured on Wednesday evening on the relation of alcohol to stress reduction. He advised that students avoid the use of alcohol and drugs to alleviate stress since they usually do not work, and recommended instead "the use of people around you in a positive way as a means of support."

Alternative beverages

On Thursday night WAAP organized the Alternative Beverage Night at the Log during which free soft drinks and t-shirts were given out. "That went over really well," said Leininger, who added that there was a good turnout and a large number who drank soft drinks. Also as part of the week, WAAP displayed a wrecked car outside Baxter Dining Hall as an example of the effects of drunk driving.

As part of its program, WAAP also surveyed 346 people on their general drinking habits. WAAP was surprised to find that 91 percent of the respondents would not feel uncomfortable asking for a non-alcoholic drink and 54 percent had never been in the situation of wanting a non-alcoholic beverage and not being able to get one, Leininger said.

He said a very significant finding was that 67 percent of the people surveyed knew a problem drinker.

According to Dr. James T. Corkins, director of Medical Services, there have been two cases of "dangerously intoxicated" people in the infirmary so far this fall. This, he says, is "a distinct improvement" over last year although "it is still too early to be statistically significant."

Groups respond to Phyllis Schlafly's upcoming talk

by Eric Adelstein

Conservative women's activist Phyllis Schlafly will speak on "Feminism, Family, and Freedom" in a lecture sponsored by the Garfield Republican Club on Wednesday, Nov. 2. Known for her arch-conservative stance on women's issues, Mrs. Schlafly will address "today's family problems," according to Daniel Blatt '85, lecture coordinator and a member of the Republican Club.

"Many supporters feel her greatest intellectual contribution has been her accent on the importance of the family," Blatt said. "She maintains that feminism destroys the family. I have asked her to present this theme in an hour lecture."

In bringing Schlafly to Williams, Blatt said "we hope to present the conservative alternative to equal rights. I think she has been misrepresented in the media and on this campus."

Two conservative foundations, the Republican Club, and the Lecture Committee all contributed to Schlafly's $2,500 fee.

Possible shouting match? Schlafly's arch-conservative stance on women's issues has made her a target for verbal abuse from more liberal groups. Blatt is concerned that the lecture may turn into a shouting match.

"We are making every effort to make it an intelligent debate," Blatt said. "It's now up to the Feminist Alliance. If it gets out of hand, it would be a terrible affront to this college."

Feminist Alliance member Marjorie Duffield '85 said, "We do not have anything planned. We are going to hear what she says and ask questions. Although she is infuriating, it is worthwhile to hear her viewpoint."

For the most part the faculty response reiterated the Feminist Alliance's willingness to hear alternative views.

Different viewpoints

"It will be interesting," said Kathleen McNally, assistant professor of economics. "I hope it draws lots of different people with different viewpoints. We may not agree with her but we may learn how she sways people."

McNally also said she hopes the audience will show respect to Schlafly. "My only concern is that it not be embarrassing," she said. "I have been at lectures at other places where the lecturer was booed off the stage."

Other faculty members, however, were less intrigued by the prospect of Schlafly's speech.

"I have no intention of going to hear her speak," said English professor Lynda Bundtzen, who is also chairman of the Women's Studies program. "We have heard her on television so many times that I do not see why we have to hear her speak at Williams."

The formal lecture will be followed by a question and answer period.

MBA at UNION

Schenectady, New York

Students serious about their long term career know they need to impress their next employer. They also value an education that allows them to grow into top levels of management. The MBA Program at UNION COLLEGE offers a balance between valuable entry level skills and a broad perspective of the managerial process. Learning takes place in a congenial atmosphere of classes with typically fewer than 20 students. Outside of class faculty are happy to provide individual assistance.

At UNION students are encouraged to acquire some depth in an area of interest to them. With the Private Sector MBA they choose from concentrations in Management Planning and Control, Production Management, International Management, and Computer Information Systems. The core in Health Systems Administration, one of three accredited programs in New York State, prepares students for an exciting career in the expanding field of managing the nation's health services. A core in Accounting will be available to prepare students for a career in public accounting.

Consider the MBA at UNION. You may qualify for a partial tuition waiver or for a graduate assistantship with a full tuition waiver and a stipend. GMAT scores, a good undergraduate GPA and three letters of recommendation are required for admission. We want to make it possible for good students to attend a small, high quality program without regard to their financial means.

LECTURE NOTES

Psych prof says elections all image

Presidential candidates have increasingly relied on non-verbal communication, including appearance and posture, to enhance their image in recent presidential debates, according to psychology professor George Goethals who lectured last Saturday to a group of students and parents.

In his lecture, titled "Image Making in Presidential Debates: Problems of Style and Substance," Goethals cited the rise of television as the major factor in this change. He presented videotapes of three debates, the Kennedy-Nixon debate in 1960, the Carter-Ford debate in 1976, and the Carter-Reagan debate in 1980.

In the 1960 debate between Kennedy and Nixon, Nixon displayed awkward movements and a poor appearance that together were a major cause for his loss of popularity following the debate, Goethals said.

In several clips from the debate, Goethals showed how Kennedy projected self-confidence through a kind of "paralanguage." Kennedy sat straight with his legs crossed and arms folded, and his voice displayed strength, pace and energy, making a sharp contrast with Nixon's posture and fidgeting, Goethals said.

Unaware of influence
Goethals said that although such cosmetic details as poor posture or sweat on the chin should not influence voters, they actually have great impact. "It isn't clear that people are aware how these things are affecting them," he said.

By 1976 the candidates had capitalized on Nixon's mistakes and naivete about the power of television, Goethals said, and had developed debating styles crafted after Kennedy's 1960 performance. For example, the candidate who was not speaking at the time would begin taking notes when the camera turned to him, copying a precedent set by Kennedy.

By the 1980 debate, both Carter and Reagan were experts in projecting favorable images, Goethals said. Reagan overcame his warmonger image through his use of gestures and expressions, he said.

Goethals said that in light of this image-projecting, presidential debates should be viewed with caution. "They [the candidates] appeal to your heart and gut rather than to your intellect," he said.

American bishops condemn nukes

The 1980 American bishops' pastoral letter which condemned nuclear weapons was "a miracle of modern Catholicism," but it still does not commit them to complete pacifism, according to Dr. David O'Brien, a history professor from Holy Cross Seminary who lectured last Thursday.

In his lecture, which was sponsored by the Newman Association, O'Brien outlined the history of the Catholic Church's position on nuclear arms. That the American bishops came to a clear consensus in 1980 was unexpected, he said.

Their letter gave a clear, unequivocal "no" to nuclear war, including a condemnation of strategic nuclear weapons because they are "weapons of indiscriminate effect"—i.e., they indiscriminately kill civilians. The bishops also expressed "profound skepticism" over battlefield tactical nuclear weapons, because they conceded that such weapons might be used in a limited context in war.

O'Brien said the latter position provides a loophole to the bishops, because it allows them to accept the policy of deterrence with the condition that it be a temporary expedient, while the superpowers make real attempts at disarmament.

Historically, the Catholic Church defended so-called "just wars," up through the Vietnam War, as necessary. But when the Second Vatican Council reconsidered the human community as one at a crossroads, facing the alternatives of total annihilation and survival, it changed its view and condemned weapons of indiscriminate effect, O'Brien said.

The immediate background of the Peace Pastoral was the bishops' support of SALT II with the understanding that it was the first step in the execution of a mutual disarmament policy, O'Brien said.

4-D video opens eyes

Most people think the fourth dimension belongs only in comic books, but mathematicians have theorized about its properties for hundreds of years, and modern computer graphics have made it visible.

Brown University professor Dr. Thomas Banchoff showed films and slides of his computer-generated four-dimensional objects and explained his work in a lecture last Thursday.

"We are seeing things that give a new meaning to manipulation of form that didn't exist before," Banchoff said. He said his work stems from the idea that if you understand something, you should be able to draw it.

Banchoff presented two films, "The Hypercube: Projections and Slicing," and "The Veronese Circles," which were made in his lab to better understand higher dimensions. The revolving images of four-dimensional objects elicited sighs from the audience of some 60 people in the Thompson Biology building. With Banchoff narrating and explaining what was happening, the films showed sections of the four-dimensional figures as if someone were slicing through the shape with a knife.

"Power of visualization"

Although the fourth dimension has been examined theoretically for a long time, Banchoff said some things the computer showed researchers were surprising.

"These phenomena sent us scurrying back to the formula to see what happened," he said. "The power of visualization is to suggest new theories and relationships."

In detailing the origin of his research, Banchoff said he was attracted to the fourth dimension by a comic book he read in 1948, at the age of ten. His work now stretches to the new medium of fantasy entertainment, as students trained in his research laboratory were involved in the special effects production for the "Star Wars" films.

Office of future poses no challenge

The office of the future will be much like the factory of the past, playwright and author Barbara Garson said last Thursday. She said that office work is now being deskilled and demoted to the level of factory assembly line labor.

Garson's lecture, "The Electronic Sweatshop: Office Work in the Age of Automation," included many anecdotes and observations from her own work in a number of offices, as well as from interviews she has conducted.

Industries are making formerly-skilled jobs more routine by introducing machinery that eliminates the need for the worker to make decisions, Garson said.

She said that by breaking complex skills into simple decisions, which the computer can make for the worker, the management gains greater control over the workplace and the worker. Even middle management and office workers are now coming under this kind of control, she said.

The office is becoming increasingly like the factory, Garson said, because machinery reduces the need for training and experience, and the resulting output is measurable.

Deskilled labor

Garson said McDonald's is one company which uses deskilled labor. Its cash registers no longer have numbers, she said, just the names of the products. All the worker has to do is push the name of the product, eliminating even the need to remember the prices or be able to add.

"You don't need training," she said. "After an hour, you could reach your maximum efficiency. When workers don't even have to be able to add anymore, they are treated like a dime-a-dozen."

Nuclear power grows in complexity

The role nuclear technology plays in our society, and our society's view of both its military and peacetime applications, have changed in recent years, history professor Michael Smith said in a lecture Oct. 12.

"Technology became increasingly complex as well as less visible," Smith said. "It became more vital to our lives and also less comprehensible."

The change in technology has led to a rise in scientism—a superstitious belief in the power of technology and social beliefs surrounding them, Smith said.

Nuclear technology was a part of these changing beliefs,

Smith said. "In the Manhattan Project both the product and the idea were concealed," he said. "Atomic power became linked to American ideology and technological superiority, so when the Russians developed the nuclear bomb, we had to appear to have more technology."

"The ballistic missile is like anti-perspirant—what it prevents is what is important," Smith said.

People viewed nuclear technology in two ways, he said. Nuclear power represented unlimited ability of wish fulfillment because there was the potential to make man free of energy constraints. Nuclear weapons, however, embodied the fear of loss of social control.

In 1949 the US became interested in commercial nuclear power, Smith said. "By then, other countries had let out the nuclear secret, so we had to also," he said.

AEC's dual problem

The view of nuclear power also changed as more information became available to the public.

The Atomic Energy Commission had the dual problem of trying to publicize the destructive ability of US atomic weapons for defense purposes, while stressing the positive aspect so people would want nuclear power, Smith said.

In recent years, anti-nuclear protests and frequent nuclear power plant shutdowns have led to a general distrust of atomic power.

"We must now begin addressing the problems at their source," Smith said. "The total faith in a given technology has swung to a total doubt of it. In both cases, we miss the point of what is happening."

"We have to understand the false reliance on technology," he concluded. "We can't keep slapping on new technological fixes to cover problems of old technological fixes."

McKeen added.

"It was probably my own fault, I was reasoning and he was just mad," he said, adding the driver, Tanzman, seemed to be under the influence of either alcohol or drugs.

When Tanzman again demanded to know who had thrown the beer, McKeen replied "Just suppose it was me, what would you do?" Tanzman then repeated his threat about beating the perpetrator up or "putting a hole in his head" McKeen said.

"Then I said 'I don't see a gun' and then he pulled a gun out of his belt," said McKeen, adding Tanzman never pointed the gun directly at either of them.

"Wasn't so psyched"

At this point a security guard, who was investigating a false alarm at the Lawrence art museum, pulled up next to East, according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks. Tanzman then drove away, threatening to return, McKeen said.

McKeen told the security guard about the incident and gave him the license number of Tanzman's car. Security called Williamstown police who went to Tanzman's house later that

Photojournalists present Iran

Two foreign correspondents cautioned a Williams audience not to believe media coverage of the Iranian revolution and said that their reports, which have been taken to be pro-Iranian, merely show the desperate conditions which now exist in Iran.

The talk was given by foreign correspondent Bill Worthy and photojournalist Randy Goodman. Worthy works for CBS news and specializes in covering revolutions in third-world countries. He is notorious for his frequent run-ins with the U.S. government and for his "uncompromisingly-honest and hard-hitting reports," he said.

The two journalists stressed that there is a severely-unequal distribution of wealth in Iran and that Iranian people still perceive American policies as promoting the wealthy in Iran at the expense of the poverty-stricken.

The two displayed slides, including a picture taken while they were on a trip with a United Nations delegation, sponsored by the Iranian government, to assess the extent of devastation in the country. The slide showed several impoverished Iranians holding a sign reading "can you see now what is happening to the people of Iran? So tell the world?"

Worthy said journalists who report this side of Iran are dismissed. "American journalists for revolution do not win Oscars," he said. "The American press has no expertise in covering revolutions." He said the U.S. government tries to prevent pro-Iranian news reports from reaching the American public.

pation with academics exists, explaining, "You think in the back of your mind, 'Should I be here partying?' There's always more work to be done."

Senior Anne-Marie Camerota, who studied abroad her junior year, also has noticed this preoccupation; she states, "Williams students are more obsessed with schoolwork 24 hours a day than the students at any other school I've seen."

Work not overbearing

By contrast, Dana Ulrich '86, a transfer student from Wellesley College, sees a great difference between the attitude of students there toward work and the attitude at Williams, which she finds less pressured in comparison.

She explains that "academically Wellesley was more stressful because people would spend a lot more time working and were more concerned about grades and whether they were working enough. People here are more relaxed and less concerned about getting everything done on time."

Jonathan Labaree '85 also believes that the work at Williams is not necessarily overbearing. "I don't feel too much pressure as long as I keep a fairly good distance between myself and my studies and keep perspective on it all," he states.

Gaining perspective

Some students, however, have difficulty in keeping the situation in perspective. Colby points out the availability of the Deans' Office in "helping to think things through when it seems as if 'all these things are coming at me at once.'"

He suggest that handling a seemingly endless amount of work is easier when "it's broken down into smaller packages so it's not so overwhelming."

The Deans' Office also arranges extensions for students when unanticipated assignments or illness interfere with work. "Our policy is to make the smallest adjustment we can to get a student out of the bind," says Daniel O'Connor, Dean of Students.

"Williams students are doers, but there is a limit to how much one can do."

Students spread thin

One reason students may be pressured academically, according to O'Connor, is that their time is spread thin among sports and other activities.

In a 1979 memo on "Pressures on Student Time," he writes, "There is tremendous peer pressure on the extracurricular side of things. Skipping practice is anti-social; skipping class is not always."

Freshman Alix Reid-Schwartz agrees that sports-related pressure exists, noting, "When I first came here I felt under a lot of pressure to join a sport. It seemed like I was missing out on something a lot of people had."

Don't acknowledge limits

Dr. Andrew Crider, a psychology professor, notices that students tend to be over-obligated. He finds that "Williams students are doers, but there's a limit to how much one can do—many students come up against that limit."

Students, though, may have difficulty in acknowledging that they have reached their limit. According to Robert Samuels, a counselor at the Infirmary, "Students here are the 'cream of the crop' and they think they're supposed to be able to handle any situation."

Tauber theorizes that this may be true for women even more than for men, because traditionally they have been brought up to be deferential to authority. "I've found women to be more conscientious about doing work than men. When authority gives them something to do, they'll click their heels mentally and do it," he affirms.

Carol Silva, a junior advisor, agrees that all students are hesitant to say that they are unable to cope. "It's hard for kids to admit that they're not on top of things anymore. They think they're the only ones straggling along," she notes.

Need to reach out

Crider too recognizes that students fear being labeled as "not being able to hack it." In addition, students tend not to reach out to others because they are afraid of intruding on their friends' privacy.

"I'd like to see more mutual social support among Williams students," asserts Crider, emphasizing that this is one of the best immunizers to stress.

Bill Sawyers '84, Peer Health coordinator, also observes, "There's a tendency at Williams for people to try to solve things within themselves. Some people can. Most people can't—they need to learn to lean on outside sources."

Junior Advisers provide much needed support for freshmen adjusting to college life; however, nothing analogous to the J.A. system exists for other students. "There was a point this year when I really wished I had a J.A. to turn to," attests sophomore Denise Ross.

Sarah Cooper, a J.A. herself, stresses that "friendships are essential in dealing with problems, particularly after freshman year."

Some students turn to Peer Health for advice (especially with regard to social or sexual problems), "but a lot of people just want to talk to somebody," according to Sawyers.

Social pressures

Sawyers also points out social pressures that Williams students face; for instance, boyfriend/girlfriend relationships can be frustrating because "it seems like everyone knows what you're doing."

Labaree, too, acknowledges that "as far as social life goes, it can be pretty restricting since Williams is such a closed environment," although he asserts that he is "happy in love."

'Beer-guzzling'

The pressure to drink, another sort of social pressure, is also quite strong, Ross notes: "It's hard for people who aren't into beer-guzzling since most Williams parties center around drinking." Parties, and drinking in general, are a common way to relieve stress. However, the pressure they create to drink may leave non-drinkers with no other adequate outlets—and the feeling that they ought to be following their classmates' example.

Dealing with these pressures, both academic and social, is no easy task for students, and feelings of stress often result. Stress, however, is really "a signal telling you to step back and take stock of the situation," Crider explains.

He emphasizes that by setting their priorities straight, seeking support from others, and engaging in stress-relieving activities such as exercise or meditation, students can effectively cope with the pressures they face.

New pizza in North Adams

by Sarah Abernathy

Vincent's Bakery, located three miles down Route 2 (next to Burger Chef), is a new store in the area and the only one to offer a unique kind of pizza—deep-pan Sicilian style.

"Sicilian pizza is what Italians would recognize as real pizza," said owner Vincent Morgano. "Sicilian pizza is special; not everyone will like it."

"First of all, it's not floppy," Morgano said. "You don't make it by throwing dough up in the air. Secondly, it has a taste of its own. It's less spicy but tastier than other pizza."

The shop, which opened four months ago, is an Italian bakery with other specialty items as well. Morgano said he is only offering take-out service for now, but he said he might put in booths if business warrants it.

"If all goes well, I'd like to have a place where people can sit down," Morgano said. "College kids, especially, want somewhere they can enjoy a pizza close by, but that's all in the future, just food for thought."

Only cheese pizzas are available Tuesday through Thursday, but Friday and Saturday Morgano will bake made-to-order pizzas. Morgano is open weekdays until 4:30 p.m. and weekends until 9:30 p.m.

He suggests students call ahead when they order pizzas, because it takes around 45 minutes to prepare each one.

When he makes specialty items "I use my father's special recipe from the Old Country," Morgano said.

The extra items—peppers, mushrooms, pepperoni, meatballs, extra cheese, or The Works—are put under the sauce and cheese so they won't burn as the pizza bakes, he said.

Sausage is not an offered topping because Morgano, an Rugbers nail Albany Law in hard-fought victories

by Tom Dumphry

Saturday afternoon the rugby club defeated Albany Law in three hard fought games.

The Williams A-side started with a tough 10-6 win. Senior co-captain Hugh Hulzenga opened the scoring with a try following a fine run by Ken Deveaux '85. Albany cut the lead to 4-3 with a penalty kick. Bob Aulse '85 made it 7-3 Williams with a penalty kick of his own. Albany came back to make it 7-6 with another penalty kick.

Albany threatened to score late in the game but Williams prevailed 10-6 with Aulse adding the final three points. Williams was led by the ferocious play of Blake Martin '84 and Deveaux, who caught everything thrown his way.

Roger Merriam '86 scored all of Williams' points in a 9-6 B-side victory. Merriam connected on three long penalty kicks to bring Williams back from a 6-3 deficit. Hitting hard all game for Williams were Tim Faselt '86 and Paul Hogan '86.

In the best game of the day, the C-side defeated the lawyers 10-0. After receiving the kick-off after a scoreless first half, Williams found itself in the try zone after some crisp passing and tough running. Scoring was Craig Kirby '86 assisted by Joe Carey '84. Jeff May '85 converted the extra points to give Williams a 6-0 lead. Rounding out the scoring was Dave Skinner '86.

Crew rows Charles

by Lee Farbman

Williams crews journeyed to Boston over the weekend to participate in the largest single-day regatta in the world—the annual Head of the Charles.

Thousands of spectators lined the banks of the river to watch over 700 boats of all varieties row the grueling three-mile upriver course. The Williams men's crew entered a lightweight (all oarsmen under 160 pounds) and a heavyweight boat, as well as a boat rowed by alumni; the Ephwomens entered a varsity and a novice boat.

The varsity women rowed a strong race at a rating of 29 strokes per minute. The Ephwomens were able to pass the eight from the Florida Institute of Technology, who started two boats ahead, and practically passed the U.S. Naval Academy in the home stretch. (Boats start at roughly ten-second intervals, so Williams beat both of these schools in time.)

Williams co-captain Nica Faulkner '84 felt that the few style problems the Ephs encountered could be ironed out before the spring racing season begins. The oarswomen were pleased with their performance in relation to their spring competition. The women finished in 26th place, but only 30 seconds behind the ninth-place boat.

The men's varsity lightweight boat had a difficult time, finishing 39th out of 40. Two of the lightweights, Rob Reed '85 and Dan Damstra '85, had to row the course again, this time with the heavyweights. That boat had a better row, but was inconsistent.

The novice women, rowing in the new youth eight division, rowed a strong race, although not up to their full potential. The team lost some time when they twice tangled oars with Slimmons, before eventually passing them.

Novice Coach Cindy Drinkwater '81 praised the steering of coxswain Carolyn Roska '87, who guided her shell through the tricky Elliot bridge while two boats that had crashed were hung up under it. The women finished seventh of eleven.

Freshmen show talent

was written thirty years earlier than "Interview" and reflects a different perception of society. The object of the individual's scorn and frustration remains the same, but the resulting reaction is manifested differently. Rather than pitting one individual against the whole of a repressive structure, Brecht illuminates the economic and moral disparities and conflicts of various classes.

True to Brecht's black humor, the cabaret style music, written by Kurt Weill with additions by Greg Pliska '84, provides an ironic complement to the violence and unhappiness embodied in the lyrics and poetry. This technique is best exemplified in the scene in which army recruits dance the Charleston and grin while singing macabre lyrics about the joys of butchering the enemy. Will McLaren '84 provides intelligent choreography for this and other sequences.

Unfortunately, Brecht's material remains elusive and difficult to interpret—the implications of his social sketches are manifold. Yet, the cast of "A Brecht Cabaret" (which was an altogether different cast than that of "Interview") reveals some outstanding voices and dramatic monologues. Because the cabaret was compiled from various Brecht poems and lyrics, and interspersed with musical numbers, the results were often disjoint, and left the audience with a choppy collection of themes. Part of this choppyness is due to the way in which these pieces were compiled by Mark Horowitz, and part is inherent in Brecht's style.

"holdover from fraternity days, undemocratic, and outdated." The Gargoyle Society also makes suggestions to the administration and Trustees, and its members are selected each year by the previous year's Gargoyles.

In an interview last Thursday, College President John Chandler suggested that one way for the Council to better represent student opinion on campus issues would be to have "a systematic provision for students on campus committees to report back to Council and say 'here's what we're talking about. I think Council doesn't know what the autonomous committees on its periphery are doing.'" Chandler was also at the meeting of the Council and trustees.

Committee liaisons

The Council then announced the formation of a new committee designed to make students who are appointed by the Council to serve on college committees more accountable to the student body, at their meeting last Thursday night.

The new Campus Review Committee will be made up of the College Council officers and all the Council liaisons to College committees. Each student liaison will be designated by the Council's Election Committee when that committee picks him or her to serve.

The liaisons will then be expected to report back to the Review Committee "as often as they have something to report," Paper said.

Ex-Officio, non-voting positions will be granted to Housing Committee and Gargoyle Society members, with whom the Council has no official link. Paper said there are already Council representatives to the CUL, and said he hopes the Council will communicate better with those representatives.

Paper said the new committee will make "the Council the focus of all events" so that "all students on student/faculty or student committees will be accountable to the general student body."

At the meeting with trustees, Paper also said there should be a formal, College-wide procedure for gathering student opinion on tenure decisions. Currently, it is up to individual departments to poll students about teachers up for tenure, and no students have a direct vote in the process.

Chandler said that "in every instance of reappointment or tenure, the department must gather student opinion through polls, interviews, or by writing to recent alumni. It would be a lot better if it were standardized," Chandler said.

Senior Jean Loew drives the ball past Tufts opponent in Saturday's loss for the Ephwomens (Finnemore)

Women's soccer

The Tufts women's soccer team secured a decisive 4-0 victory over Williams Saturday.

Williams goalie Laura Napolitano made ten saves in the game, including a number of outstanding ones under pressure. Tufts took a total of 22 shots on goal while Williams took six.

Coach Leslie Orton said that the team is currently striving to maintain the spirit which first established their winning record early in the season. The record now stands at 5-4-1.

The Ephwomens take on Mt. Holyoke Wednesday at 3:00.

Volleyball

The women's volleyball team took third place in the Vassar Invitational tournament Saturday. The Ephs were defeated by Fordham early in the tourney, but came back to defeat both Vassar and Manhattanville and split a match with Siena.

Against Fordham, Williams was slow to start and lost vital points on misfires. Co-captain Carol Dorfman saved many loose balls to put some points in Williams favor but they were not enough. Against Manhattanville, Williams came out strong and took two games rapidly due to effective net play by Lisa Jayne '86 and Caroline Teer '87. Powerful serves and smart off-speed drops instead of powerful hitting won points against Vassar. Co-captain Sara Griffiths' serves and sophomore Peggy Gentles' back row saves led the Ephwomens to the win.

Although Siena won the first game, Williams pulled together to win the second.

Williams, 5-3 on the day, was two points behind the second place team, losing due to point spreads. The Ephwomens are 12-5; they face Harvard and Yale at Cambridge tonight.

Sara Griffiths

Women's rugby

The women's rugby club defeated Boston University 4-0 on the Poker Flats Saturday.

The women played a powerful game, keeping the ball in the B.U. end for most of the game.

Dorrie Dewar '85 scored the game's only try in the second half, running down the sideline with the opponents at her heels.

Williams proved faster, stronger, and more in control of the game than the Terriers. The B.U. line was no match for the Williams line, which tackled or intercepted the ball consistently. Sunica Edelstein '85, co-captain Meg Holliday '85, and Suzanne Blemiller '87 excelled in running and kicking tactics in the line.

Tennis concludes season

by John Schafer

Ending on a somewhat down note, the women's varsity tennis team was dealt a resounding 9-0 defeat by Dartmouth last Wednesday, but they finished with a 7-5 record for the year.

Carrying a mark of 7-3 after wins over Union and Wesleyan, the team faced Amherst on October 15. The 6-3 victory by the Lady Jeffs clinched their first Little Three women's title. In the final match, Dartmouth simply overpowered the Ephs.

Fifth in New England I

With the regular season completed, the team went to Amherst for the Division III New England tournament this weekend.

Sophomore Susan Brown, playing number four singles, made it to the finals. Sophomores Betsy Shulman, playing top singles, Liz Peay, at number two, and Jenny Koski, at number six, all reached the semi-finals. The top doubles team of Liz Mangee '85 and Noelle Montgomery '87 lost in the consolation finals, finishing fifth in their bracket.

Seniors Stephanie Gates and Melissa George return an Amherst volley in Williams' loss to the Jeffs last Saturday. (Finnemore)

Altogether, the Ephs ended up fifth out of twenty-three teams. Trinity won, followed by Tufts, Middlebury, and then Amherst; all four of these teams beat Williams during the regular season.

With the strong showing in the tournament after two straight season-ending losses, Coach

Sean Sloane was pleased. "We had a good year given the material we had to work with," said Sloane referring to countless illnesses and academic requirements that claimed team members during the season. "For a team that is supposed to be twelve players, we had twenty-one play varsity matches. Considering all these substitutions, I think we did very well."

Sloane also noted that almost everyone improved, and the whole varsity except captain Marissa Guilino '84 will return next season.

The Williams scrum played expertly, supporting the line with hard rucks and mauls. Anne Melvin '85, Mercedes Diaz '86, Diana Roberto '86, and Joan Horgan '87 used all of their energy to continuously tackle and push the opponents back to their side of the field.

The women play Yale Saturday at Poker Flats at 1:00.

Women runners

by Lee Hatcher

The women's cross country team ventured to Northampton to compete in the Smith Invitational and wound up an impressive fourth place Saturday. Senior Lyn Vendinello romped to an eleventh place finish to anchor the female harriers.

Wesleyan captured first place with 36 points, followed closely by Smith with 55 points. Trinity was the only other foe to best the Ephwomens, by a meager three point margin.

Kate Pugh, the freshman sensation, wound up in second place for the squad with a time of 21:44. Close on her heels and rounding out the scoring five for the team were Susan Baer '85, Becky Konklin '87, and Cheryl Hall '87.

As the team prepares for the upcoming coveted Little Three Title, Coach Bud Fisher assesses the team's chances: "I am looking forward to the big meet. Wesleyan appears untouchable, but the struggle between Amherst and ourselves will be a veritable shootout."

Riding

Williams Riding Team captain Andrea Smith '86 placed second in equitation and Frank Huyler '87 took second in equitation over fences at Mt. Holyoke's intercollegiate horse show last Sunday. Equitation measures the rider's handling technique as opposed to the horse's performance.

Coach Sherron Knopp described the team's two ribbons as a victory. "We have a small team and we compete against schools with much stronger riding programs," she said. "So it's exciting when we do as well as we did." Smith also said was "extremely pleased with the group's performance." The team rides at U Conn next Saturday.

Chemists demonstrate their literacy

Professor James F. Skinner reports the following winners in the First Annual Chemistry 103 Dunkin' Donuts Chemical Elemental Sentences Contest.

In category I, Mary Lou O'Neill '87 produced 188 words using just the symbols of the chemical elements. Second and third places went to Christina Cervone '87 and Cindy Kiser '87.

In category II, Alak Chakravorty '87 wrote the longest single word, non-representationalism, using just the symbols, with Tom Mueller '87 and Sara Bolton '87 taking second and third place in a very close contest.

In category III, Debbie Wald '86 put together a 24 word sentence using just the elemental symbols. In second and third places were Rodolfo Ford '87 and Kristen Andrews '87. Dunkin' Donuts were awarded to all winners in class on October 21.

finish in the top seven three years in a row.

Behind him were Angle, 13th, Yort, 14th, Bo Parker '84, 16th, and Tom Pingree '86, 19th, to finish up Williams top five. Sixth and seventh for the Ephs were John Ellison '86, 25th, and Coyne, 31st. Bates is one of the top three Division III teams in New England, and after their fine performance at NESAC it could be that Williams is another. Brandels is the third Ephrunner look forward to this weekend where they will journey to Wesleyan to hopefully take their 15th Little Three title in a row.

Field Hockey beats Amherst to clinch Little three title

by Dave Paulsen

The field hockey team upped their record to 7-4 with three wins in four games in the last two weeks. The Ephwomens defeated Westfield State, Union, and Amherst, but were manhandled by Dartmouth. The win over Amherst clinched the Little Three Championship for the team under first-year coach Julie McHugh.

Saturday the team defeated Westfield State 1-0. The shutout was the sixth of the season for goalkeeper Jean Hakmiller '86. Allison Fuller '85 scored the lone goal off an assist from Carrie Cento '86. The goal was hotly disputed, as there was a question whether or not the goal had been tallied before the first half clock had expired. After official consultation, the goal was allowed to stand, providing the margin of victory.

McHugh cited the play of sweeper Lee Briggs '87, who saved the game with a beautiful defensive play. Sue Harrington '84, Lori Symanski '85, and Cento also earned plaudits from McHugh.

Upset Amherst

The Ephs 1-0 victory over Amherst a week ago may have been their best outing of the season. Again, the team's goal came with little time remaining in the first half. Emily Sneath

'85 tallied the goal with the assistance of co-captain Dorothy Briggs '84.

Goalie Hakmiller was especially impressive in the contest. McHugh noted that "Jean Hakmiller turned the whole game around." The team as a whole played exceptionally well in defeating an Amherst squad that was slightly favored to win the contest.

Earlier games saw Williams trounced by Dartmouth 6-0, while the Ephs inflicted similar punishment on Union 5-0.

The team will conclude their season with a home encounter with North Adams on Thursday.

14 points in 42 seconds: Gridders tie Tufts after gun

by Paul Meeks

Shades of Wesleyan 1982, the football team came from behind to score eight points with no time left to tie Tufts 35-35 at Weston Field Saturday in a miraculous finish.

With six seconds remaining, second down and ten on the Williams 28 yard line, the score Tufts 35, Williams 27, quarterback B.J. Connolly '84 completed a 51-yard prayer to split end John McCarthy '84. A Jumbo defensive back face-masked on the tackle giving Williams a final play with 0:00 on the clock 21 yards from paydirt. Football rules do not allow a game to end on a penalty.

Final play

On the game's final play, Connolly faded back to pass, scrambling for his life, hit McCarthy who hauled in a one-handed beauty in the far corner of the end zone, barely landing in bounds. Head Coach Bob Odeh called for a two-point conversion to tie with the Ephs down 35-33. Connolly found tight end Paul Coleman '85 on a crossing pattern tying the score and resulting in bedlam on Weston Field.

The final eight points capped a 14-point comeback in the last minute of the game. Williams gained control of the ball on the Jumbo 31 yard line with 1:25 left after Tufts failed to get a punt off. Three plays later Connolly completed a ten yard pass to McCarthy to bring the score to 35-27 with 42 seconds remaining. Williams attempted a two-point conversion but Connolly's pass to Coleman was incomplete.

Williams attempted an on-side kick, but the ball squirted out of bounds and Tufts retained possession. The Jumbos ran three plays to use up the clock, but Williams called time-outs after each play, and got the ball back following a Tufts punt.

The Williams celebration after the final touchdown resulted in a delay of game penalty, so placekicker Chris Chapman '85 had to kick off to a downcast and defeated Tufts team that failed to return the ball.

Air show

The Williams-Tufts clash was won through the air as was expected. Connolly had his finest collegiate outing as he threw for 383 yards and four touchdowns with 22 completions in 35 attempts. Tufts' quarterback Dave Piermarini had equally impressive statistics and remains one of the best passers in the division.

Williams receivers McCarthy and Coleman gave the Eph aerial circus a crucial one-two punch. McCarthy caught seven spirals for 161 yards and two touchdowns; he has four scores since moving to split end after senior Marc Hummon's injury in the Trinity game. Connolly found Coleman eight times including a touchdown and the game-tying conversion.

Offensive guard Steve Mazziari '85, an important link in the Eph line that Odeh calls "the best we have had since I've been here," was felled by a season-ending knee injury. The mark of a good football team is depth and the Ephs are secure with experience and proven ability in replacement Dan Keating '84.

The Eph secondary had trouble early when the Jumbo's Piermarini hit Steve Keohane on a 58 yard touchdown pass at 10:02 of the first quarter. However, the pass defense steadily improved with newcomer Frank Morandi '86 at left corner and yielded only a total 230 yards (as opposed to Williams' 383).

Strong safety Joe Markland '84 intercepted twice in the first half, leading the squad with five this season, and currently is among team leaders in "Thud Points," the coaching staff's evaluation of overall defensive play.

Paul Williamson '86, who scored two goals in the soccer team's 3-0 win over Tufts Saturday, scoots past two Jumbo defenders. (Lockwood)

Booters blast Jumbos for sixth without loss

by Mike Best
and Greg Leeds

On Saturday, the men's soccer team scored an impressive 3-0 victory over the Tufts Jumbos.

The Ephmen were clearly the better team, controlling the action throughout the entire game. They had numerous scoring opportunities, while allowing few serious threats by Tufts. In fact, the Jumbos had difficulty merely getting the ball out of their own end, much less mounting an effective offense.

The first half was marked by Williams' inability to capitalize on its scoring chances. The Ephs had eight shots in the half, but only one was on goal. There was too little aggressiveness on Williams' part, although Dan Aramini '84, David Wolf '85, and Clark Otley '86 kept the pressure on Tufts.

Williamson scores

Finally, at 30:30, the Ephmen scored. After a corner kick, the ball was kicked around in front of the Tufts goal until Paul Williamson '86 put it in.

Williams completely dominated the second half. The few times the Jumbos got the ball into Williams' end, the solid Eph defense put it right back out.

Meanwhile, the Ephmen launched wave after wave of offense at the Jumbo goal, displaying the aggressiveness that had been missing earlier. At 10:08, Williamson scored again off another corner from John Campbell '84.

Eighteen minutes later, sweeper Jon Deveau '87 made a good run toward the Tufts goal and put a beautiful shot just inside the left goalpost off an assist from Jeff McEvoy '86.

Bounce Bates

Last Tuesday Williams soundly defeated Bates, 3-0. McEvoy scored first with an assist from Otley. Later, Otley scored his first of the year, beating the goalkeeper with a hard, low shot to the corner. Twenty-four minutes into the second half, Heige Weiner '87 converted a Campbell corner kick into the final goal.

Bash Bowdoin

On Saturday, October 15, the Ephmen dealt Bowdoin a 1-0 defeat at Cole Field. Weiner again scored with a header off another corner from Campbell for the game's only goal. Williams was in control of the game both offensively and defensively, outshooting Bowdoin 17-7.

The Ephs are 6-1-2, unbeaten in six games, and ranked sixth in New England Division III going into today's match against Babson.

Goff's final team finishes undefeated

by Greg Keller

The golf team defeated Springfield and Babson on Tuesday, October 11, to finish the fall season with a 6-0 record in match play.

"The win was a fitting way to complete Coach Rudy Goff's twentieth and final season," said junior Chris Harned.

Although the Ephmen routed Springfield by 26 strokes, the match with previously unbeaten Babson was decided by the last two players on the course.

Williams was down by two strokes when junior Bill McClements shot a bogie five on the final hole. The Babson player would have finished the hole with a three-over-par seven, but he was penalized for raking a sand trap while his ball was still in it; this is considered illegal because players are not allowed to test the consistency of the sand in a bunker before shooting out of it. The crucial error cost Babson two strokes and gave the Ephmen a dramatic 411-413 victory.

Goff's career

The team's six wins this fall boost Goff's career record to a 219-78-1. During his 20 year reign, the golf team has won the New England Team Championships three times and has captured 12 Little Three Titles.

Two of his former players, Greg Jacobsen '81 and John Sutter '72, turned professional after outstanding careers at Williams. Goff says he is satisfied with his years of coaching but plans to devote more time to his sporting goods store. He says he gives a lot of credit to his players for his success.

Harriers beat MIT and Tufts; also finish second in NESCAC

by Chris Stearns

On Saturday, John Nelson '84 won his third race of the year turning in an impressive 25:06 to help the men's cross country team defeat highly touted M.I.T. and riddle a strong Tufts squad in what turned out to be the most exciting race of the year.

Williams, out to avenge last year's losses to these teams, was hoping to capitalize on the reputation of the Franklin Park course for turning out fast times.

The runners went out fast but by the three mile mark things were not looking good for the Ephrunners. Nelson, a finely honed running machine, was out in front but behind him were five M.I.T. runners hoping to pass him on any mistake he might make.

Break up pack

After the race Co-Captain Bennet Yort '84 said "I knew we had a hard week of training but I realized if we dug deep and were patient everything would fall into place."

In the last mile the Purple Wave showed their savvy as Yort, John Ellison '86, and Brian Angle '84 broke up the Engineers' pack to take fourth, fifth, and sixth places, respectively. Coach Peter Farwell said, "I was very impressed by the determination of this team. They knew what they had to do in order to win and they went out and did it."

Freshman Mike Coyne placed ninth to sew up the meet and Kevin Jenkins '85 and Tom Pease '85 finished 14th and 17th to round out Williams' top seven runners. Commented Farwell,

"This come-from-behind victory was one of the best that I've ever seen. We also had a solid J.V. race which we won with some of the best times we've had at Franklin."

Second in NESCAC

On the previous Saturday the team traveled to Amherst where they participated in the renowned NESCAC (New England Small College Athletic Conference) meet. This included Division III schools from all over New England and this year was the first time in the meet's history that the results were scored by team.

The Purple Wave placed second overall, losing only to Bates by ten points. Nelson placed fourth overall in 24:03, becoming the first Ephmen to

Williams grads get better jobs

by R. DeMott

The employment outlook for Williams graduates is becoming increasingly optimistic, according to Fatma Kassamall, director of the Office of Career Counseling. While last year's college graduates as a rule had a harder time finding jobs than in recent years, she feels that Williams grads were better off than most.

Last June, the largest number of college students ever to graduate in a single year—almost a million—flooded the job market. Victor R. Lindquist, placement director at Northwestern University said in the Oct. 18 Wall Street Journal that "It's devastating, the worst job market for college graduates since the Depression."

According to David Small, placement director at the University of Houston, the recent graduates did poorly because traditionally there is a lag between the start of recovery after an economic recession and the increased hiring of new college graduates.

"Companies first hire back the employees they laid off, then look for new people who are experienced, and then finally start hiring new college graduates again," said Small in the same Journal article.

However, the hiring scene is looking better in the next few quarters, according to a recent study by Manpower, Inc., the world's largest temporary service firm. Interpreting the results of a poll of over 11,400 employers nationwide, Manpower President Mitchell Fromstein said that "...rehiring activity has begun and job hunting should therefore become easier."

Training programs

Kassamall said that the flooded job market has been caused by a change in the kind of new employees companies are looking for. Companies are now less interested in hiring graduates with specialized knowledge and experience in a particular field, and instead are favoring on-the-job training for new employees, who then have the possibility of going on to graduate school later, she added.

College has funds available for student draft resisters

by Melissa Matthes

The College is offering a combination of loans and work to help students make up for the loss of funds some suffered because they refused to register for the draft and have lost their federally-funded financial aid money as a result.

The U.S. government began denying the funds this semester as stipulated by the Solomon Amendment, a rider to last year's defense appropriations bill. Although the amendment's constitutionality is scheduled to be reviewed by the Supreme Court this year, the Court ruled that colleges must still comply with the law in the meantime.

Six Williams students were affected by the amendment and lost their federal Guaranteed Student Loans, which range up to $2,500 a year. Two also lost federal Pell grants, which can be up to $1,800.

However, the College will not directly replace any federal grant or loan denied to draft registration evaders by the Solomon Amendment, according to Financial Aid Director Phil Wick.

Wick said the College is instead helping the students by offering them additional campus employment hours, the Williams Parent Loan Program, and commercial loans to students of up to $3,000 per year.

However, no one has yet used the commercial loans, Wick said, adding that the PLPs are not handled by his office. And David Yaskulka '84, who is one of the six affected, said that as far he knows none of the other non-registrants took out the PLP. The other five students were unavailable for comment.

Council funds new group, drops noise problem

by Meg McClellan

The College Council voted to approve funding for a new campus counseling service and discussed the campus noise problem in its meeting last Thursday night.

The counseling group, called "10 to 1" after its operating hours, was described by its organizer Jim Foley '84 as "a general counseling and information service" that provides counseling on all aspects of student life. He said the group is necessary because it will provide a wider range of counseling than does Peer Health, which counsels students on sexual concerns.

Foley said the group's counselors will have daily walk-in hours from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Chaplain's office in Baxter Hall, starting after Thanksgiving break.

The Council gave the group $375 to be used to complete the training of the group's 25 counselors, who will be coached by counselors from a similar program at Wesleyan University, as well as by campus concern groups like the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program and the Gay and Lesbian Union.

No noise

The Council also heard a report from its Noise Committee which proposed that house problems, including noise, should be handled within the proper political channels of each house. Although the College took no vote on the issue, Council vice-president Jan Van Eck '85 said, "I think the issue is dying, and if there's a noise problem, I don't think we should add our voice to it."

In other Council business, the Council formed a new Lighting Committee to examine areas of poor lighting on campus.

CUL debate

Student groups want more Baxter space

by Maritta Well and John McDermott

Various student organizations continued to vie for space in the planned renovation of Baxter Hall as they pleaded their cases before the Committee on Undergraduate Life last Tuesday, saying they needed either the same or more space than they currently have.

College Council President Tom Paper '84 said the Council needs to retain its first-floor office, near student traffic. "I would hate to see the CC relegated to the basement," he said. "We don't need more room, we need centrality."

Dean Colby questioned why the Council should get coveted upstairs space. "Why not the basement for you too?" he asked.

Paper added that the Council "removed the need for an all-night study area from any priority lists, because if it's anywhere it should be in the library." Additionally, the Council is satisfied with using the fourth floor of Hopkins Hall as a night-long study space, he said.

Supply store?

The Freshman Council, represented by John Booth, also suggested that a stationary store selling newspapers and school supplies be added in Baxter.

Economics professor Katherine McNally said that "there will be a uproar if the College starts competing with local stores," but Dean Mary Kenyatta admitted that "the merchants on Spring Street do gouge the students, because it is essentially a closed market."

Dean David Colby said he would like to see 300 to 400 more boxes put into the new Baxter mallroom to accommodate a growing student population.

Both the Outing Club and the Chaplain's Office told the CUL that their first-floor office spaces were crucial for generating student interest.

Coach Jim Briggs also opposed a proposal to locate the WOC offices in the planned extension to Lasell Gym.

WCFM, The Williams Record and Pottery Ltd., all of which have Baxter office space, and Purple Key, which has no campus office space this year, presented their space needs at an Oct. 11 CUL meeting.

More Record space

Record Co-editor-in-chief Jon Tigar '84 said the newspaper needs two-and-a-half to three times its current first-floor office space. Tigar suggested a move to the basement of Baxter, and said his dream is to see the Record in the Chaplain's office.

WCFM manager Lee Farberman '84 said the station is "perfectly happy" where it is in the basement.

The Purple Key lost its Jesup Hall office this year due to renovation in that building. Purple Key President Lance Rothstein '85 said the organization needed a room to house overnight prospective students.

The CUL did not act on the proposals. CUL chairman and assistant dean David Colby said the group would make its recommendations for Baxter around Thanksgiving and that architect John Jordan's drawings would be submitted to the trustees by January 20.

Majority opinion

Last week, the College Council established the Campus Review Committee to centralize the flow of information concerning student affairs. As the Council recently pointed out, the diversity of student input makes it difficult for the student body to articulate a majority opinion. The Campus Review Committee is a move in the right direction.

Students as a whole have felt for a long time that many decisions affecting the College's quality of life—such as library policy, house transfer regulations, and the removal of row house dining—are enacted in opposition to student desires. In fact, students sit on most of the committees which shape campus policy. However, those representatives are elected before important issues arise. They have no obligation or precedent to report back to the student body, nor any means to poll other students regularly.

The Campus Review Committee brings together the Council liaisons to every major committee and thereby can isolate upcoming decisions for student review. The Council can then communicate student opinion to the committees before changes in policy occur. While elected committee representatives would not be bound by such a vote, students would have a benchmark against which to judge committees and their student representatives.

We need a clearing house for student opinion and the Council has taken an important step towards that end. If the student body responds with input, the Council can really represent student opinion.

Dogmatism

To the editor:

The comments made by Professor Lynda Bundtzen about the upcoming arrival of Phyllis Schlafly were disheartening, if not surprising. While Mrs. Schlafly's views are often controversial, she does consider topics that are immediately relevant to a serious consideration of Women's Studies. Thus her appearance on campus should be regarded with more than the apathy granted it by the chairman (chairperson?) of the Women's Studies program. After all, if a renowned Marxist delivered a lecture on campus, one would expect that his presentation would be treated seriously by a professor of economics, even one with laissez-faire inclinations. Indeed, such a professor might well encourage his or her students to listen to an eloquent statement of an opposing viewpoint, offering perhaps his or her reasons for disagreement. Yet Professor Bundtzen is too narrow-minded to even acknowledge an opinion other than her own. She is mystified as to "why we have to hear (Phyllis Schlafly) speak at Williams." One doubts that Professor Bundtzen would be equally puzzled about an appearance by Gloria Steinem, no matter how often she has been mesmerized by Ms. Steinem's television image. Perhaps when Professor Bundtzen sees fit to take opposing viewpoints seriously, the student body may see fit to regard Women's Studies as a serious discipline and not as pure dogmatism.

Firecracker

To the editor:

Less than half an hour ago (12:30 a.m., October 25), many freshmen had the pleasure of hearing the Williams Octet sing in the Quad. They took their own precious time to come for the enjoyment of those freshmen still awake and created a pleasant divergence from the routine studying late at night. They were not offensive in any manner whatsoever. Instead many freshmen asked them to continue singing in their low tone which only those awake could possibly hear.

After a short announcement for their upcoming concert, the Octet agreed to sing another selection. As they began to sing, a firecracker burst about twenty feet away from the group. They continued to sing even as another landed only two or three feet away. Then a voice called out from Williams F, "Die you f---ing homos," and someone threw a firecracker or bottle rocket which hit a member of the group in the head, fell to the ground, and exploded.

It is quite obvious that an Octet was spared by sheer luck. What possessed one individual to act in such a malicious manner to endanger someone's livelihood when that person is trying to perform for entertainment on his own time?

Intolerance

To the editor:

As I laud The Record for its editorial "Wide Up!" in the Oct. 25 issue, I am appalled at the actions and attitudes of many in the Williams community toward Mrs. Schlafly's upcoming lecture. I decided to invite Mrs. Schlafly to Williams because I and many others on campus believe that too much play has been given to the ideas of liberal and radical feminism, and virtually none to conservative ideas on feminism. I hope that her lecture will be used to promote an intelligent discussion of feminism by exposing the Williams community to "the other side" of the issue.

Unfortunately, the "Women's Studies" Program does not feel this to be the case. When I met with Program Chairman Professor Lynda Bundtzen to ask for her program's support for the lecture, she responded with an unqualified "no." I guess Mrs. Schlafly's topic, "Feminism, Family, and Freedom," has nothing to do with women's issues. She went on to say that Mrs. Schlafly should not speak on campus because everybody already knows her views. She did not fill me in on the details of how everyone learned her ideas. Most people I've talked to admit to knowing very little about her, except that she was opposed to the Equal Rights Amendment. Indeed, during my conversation with her, Professor Bundtzen proceeded to misstate one of Mrs. Schlafly's arguments.

While I respect Professor Bundtzen's right (or anyone else's for that matter) to disagree with Mrs. Schlafly, I do not feel that any department or program of the College should discriminate against a speaker based upon his political views. Professor Bundtzen is apparently using the "Women's Studies" program to promote her own pro-feminist ideas. On the other hand, Professor Kurt Tauber, Chairman of the Political Science Department and an avowed Marxist, has agreed to support the lecture of Mrs. Schlafly (who has strong anti-Marxist views). Professor Tauber's support of the lecture indicates that while he may disagree with Mrs. Schlafly, he at least respects her right to be heard, and I laud him for that.

Further, I have heard that Assistant Professor Anne Margolis of the English Department encouraged students in one of her classes to boycott the lecture because of Mrs. Schlafly's "offensive" views. When it was suggested that people go and ask Mrs. Schlafly questions, someone responded that Mrs. Schlafly is "too smart." Hmm...On Thursday, I heard that Professor Margolis and others are leading a "silent walk-out" from the lecture, a walk-out which will be followed by a "teach-in" on feminism. When people go to a lecture with the intention of walking out, they close their minds to the ideas that will be presented.

Beyond the attitudes of these two faculty members, I have seen an incredible immaturity on the part of Williams students. Posters advertising Mrs. Schlafly's lecture were put up all over campus. Shortly thereafter, nearly every one had been mutilated or taken down. Indeed, posters were put up three different times in the Baxter Lounge and Mailroom, and yet not a single one remains. It shines poorly upon Williams when nasty slogans, obscenities, and derogatory artwork are scrawled on posters. While posters for other lectures have been taken down or damaged, in my two years at Williams I have never seen it done on such a grand scale. If these people really believe their ideas superior to those of Mrs. Schlafly, they need not respond in such a childish manner. Instead, they should challenge her with intelligent questions.

The attitude of many on campus, unfortunately, does not reflect the intellectual tolerance which The Record asked for in last week's issue. Everyone has a right to have and defend his own ideas. As such, it is disgusting that faculty have openly encouraged intolerance of Mrs. Schlafly's. Shouldn't the faculty serve to promote rather than to suppress intellectual freedom?

We invited Mrs. Schlafly to Williams to broaden the debate on feminism, more specifically to challenge the prevailing viewpoint on campus. If the opponents of Mrs. Schlafly believe their ideas to be superior to hers then they should relish the opportunity to have them challenged.

Reagan mires U.S. in continuing civil war

Marines back narrow faction in strategically unimportant land

by Philip Busch

History is repeating itself. In one day in Beirut, our armed forces lost more men than on any day of the Vietnam War except for the bloody first day of the Tet offensive.

The parallels between Lebanon and Vietnam are clear. Despite our status as "peacekeepers," America is becoming increasingly involved in a civil war in a far away land we do not understand. We are following the same path of escalation we followed in Vietnam.

President Reagan's response to the Beirut bomb blast is a disturbing echo of Kennedy's or Johnson's response to Vietnam twenty years ago. Once again, says Reagan, a war torn country appeals for our aid against a monolithic foe. Once again, we say we are aiding a legitimate national government. Once again, a small country is suddenly defined as a critical strategic interest because of its location in an important region of the globe. And American credibility around the world will suffer a devastating blow if we pull out of Lebanon, according to the Administration.

The facts once again belie Presidential assumptions. Lebanon is not of great importance to the United States. It has been in turmoil for years with no noticeable erosion of our security. We are supporting a faction rather than a true national government. The Amin Gemayel regime, however well-intentioned it may be, represents only Lebanese Christians. Moslem factions do not recognize Gemayel's leadership, and genuine compromise appears unlikely in the present climate of religious and political hatred. Lebanon seems to have lost its sense of nationhood, if indeed it ever truly had one.

Failed mission

The Lebanese situation has little to do with the superpower conflict. Despite Syrian and Israeli involvement, it is basically a civil war. We have little to gain there, and very much to lose. And dead Americans only make it harder to pull out as the vision of peace recedes. The stakes increase, and we are caught in the same trap we fell into in Vietnam.

The Marines were sent to Beirut in the fall of 1982 with fairly limited objectives: first to supervise the evacuation of the PLO, then to keep the peace until a Syrian-Israeli withdrawal agreement was reached and, increasingly, to help the Lebanese government get back on its feet.

The mission has failed, and there appears no end in sight. A Syria newly rearmed with Soviet weapons wants no part of a withdrawal agreement, and in fact may have masterminded the truck bombings. Israeli intransigence on the Palestinian question has not helped the situation. The Gemayel government has not gained the support of large groups within Lebanese society. The Marines can do little in their airport bunkers to keep the peace. The Lebanese army appears about as effective as was the South Vietnamese army, and American military responses to Moslem sniping and artillery fire only drag us deeper into the quagmire.

Solution: withdraw

International power depends on perceptions of will as much as on actual military force. America does not need involvement in Lebanon to show that the post-Vietnam era of timidity is over. Rather than lack of will, we now seem to have too much. The United States has vital interests around the world, many of which are worth the use of military force. This does not mean, however, that all places where force can be used are worth our commitment.

Leadership of a great power demands intelligent and realistic risk analysis.

achieves nothing; it is merely for show. We cannot "win," no matter how many troops we send. And our soldiers are dying.

Open-ended commitment

John Glenn said a few days ago that Reagan must now "fish or cut bait." The President chooses to do neither. His display of limited resolve may help him at the polls in the short run, but he risks the sort of open-ended, vague, escalating commitment that destroyed President Lyndon Johnson in the end. Reagan wants to maintain American credibility, but worldwide perception of a helpless

"President Reagan's response to the Beirut bomb blast is a disturbing echo of Kennedy's or Johnson's response to Vietnam twenty years ago."

The ends must be worth the means. Lebanon is not worth the cost of increased involvement. America cannot dictate peace to a nation at war with itself. The multinational peacekeeping force should withdraw.

Withdrawal is risky as well. It would be a clear admission of American failure. The danger of war between Syria and Israel would increase. The United States would send a signal to the world that terrorism can work in some cases. But these drawbacks are outweighed by the risks of our continued presence in Beirut. Ultimately, our presence giant mired at Khe Sanh or Beirut airport hurts our influence more than would a timely withdrawal.

The best time to withdraw has passed. Two hundred dead Marines constrain our choices in a wave of emotion. Their deaths hopefully will show us where our national interests lie. They do not lie in Beirut, as they did not lie in Saigon two decades ago. Presidents must learn from our national mistakes. President Reagan apparently has not.

Crossburning: three years after

Panel debates campus race relations

by John Calderon

Students, faculty and alumni examined the need for a heightened awareness of both black students and black faculty at Williams, at a panel discussion last Sunday in commemoration of the cross burning on campus three years ago this week.

Dalton Miller-Jones, a visiting professor of psychology, said that black students have been brought here for the education of the white majority, instead of for their own education. He said that the blacks on campus are here to simulate the society the white student will eventually lead.

"Black students are actors trying to survive within the context of rules set by the College," said Miller-Jones. "I don't think that black students on this campus are treated with respect or deference."

However, Miller-Jones said "Williams is doing a wonderful job in the context of what's going on in the world," referring to racism.

Reverend Muhammad Kenyatta '81, the husband of Dean Mary Kenyatta, said the College should set institution-wide goals, such as hiring more black administrators. He also said more black student involvement was needed. He denounced the attitude that having one black professor in a department was sufficient.

"Subtle racism"

Miller-Jones also expressed the need to expand the amount of black faculty members, currently at five. If "you want to show the legitimacy of blacks," He said he felt there is a stigma against blacks at Williams.

Though Mark White '84 said he has never heard outright racial slurs at Williams, he said the "subtle things of racism still have to be addressed." For example, White said he has met students who refer to certain black students as "not really black."

One student spoke of frustration when trying to get people motivated to discuss racial issues. "It always takes a crisis," he said, pointing to the cross burning which brought about a moratorium on classes and an all-college discussion on racism which 1300 people attended. About 60 people attended Sunday's discussion.

Kenyatta noted that some student efforts have been constructive, such as the hunger strike last January. Kenyatta said that without that crisis, the Trustees would not have examined the issue of divestment in South Africa. "We seem to have the notion that racism is okay beyond the border of the U.S.," said Kenyatta.

Some students at the meeting expressed their frustration at trying to make a significant difference at such an elite place as Williams. Kenyatta advised each individual to ask himself what he can do and stressed his own conviction that change is indeed possible.

More jobs for Ephs

According to Kassamali, the best way to get a job today is to have a solid liberal arts education. "A liberal arts degree is the best you can get. It will always be marketable," she said.

Another career counselor, Katie Case, said that Williams' extensive network of alumni is also a major asset to getting jobs for Williams graduates. "Many of them [the alumni] help counsel the students about how to get jobs and recommend the students to their colleagues as well as their own companies."

Kassamali denied that this alumni network reduces Williams to a prep school for New York banks, a charge made by many Williams students and by political science professor Robert Stiglitz in an interview in The Williams Record last year.

"Williams students have done better than students at other institutions because they are more ambitious," she said.

Fewer grad students

Because more students are going into such training programs, the number of students going directly on to graduate or professional school has dropped by close to 30 percent since the early '70s, a trend the OCC and the College are trying hard to reverse.

Case said students should seriously consider graduate studies to avoid entering the current job market. She predicts that "in three or four years, when they get out of grad school, it will be much easier to find jobs." She said another possibility is to get a job for a few years which one would enjoy but which paid relatively less.

Engineering future bright

One field already seeing major changes in hiring is engineering. According to physics professor Ballard Pierce, who advises pre-engineering students, college grads with bachelor's degrees in physics are now being considered for jobs which only a few years ago would have gone to professional engineers. "Employers now seem more willing to train people in a specific area or job," he said.

In addition, Kassamali sees the computer science and accounting fields gaining strength.

Yaskulka said "of course all of this is a great help." He said he is now working "50 to 75 percent more hours than I did in previous years."

However, Yaskulka said the College has not done as much as it should have to help, adding that it should have offered subsidized loans as well.

"A college that has dedicated itself to the availability to all regardless of income is going against those principles in not making aid available to people who exercise that element of their conscience," Yaskulka said. "We're talking about ten draft resistors at most. The burden is negligible."

The commercial loan which the College is offering goes at the same interest rate as the PLP, 12 percent. Wick said the primary difference between the PLP and the commercial loan is that the commercial loan requires that the loan agreement be co-signed by both the parent and student.

George Yamin '76 points out the similarity between Bruce Springsteen's songs about loneliness and the street and biblical tradition. (Khakee)

Springsteen and God

The lyrics of rock musician Bruce Springsteen are directly connected with Biblical themes, according to George Yamin '76 who spoke on "The Theology of Bruce Springsteen" last Thursday in a lecture sponsored by the religion department.

Yamin is a graduate student in religion at the University of Chicago and teaches at DePaul University.

"The music of Bruce Springsteen represents the continuation of the Judeo-Christian tradition...[and is] relevant to modern listeners," he said.

"His music may be seen as more than just rock 'n' roll," Yamin said. "It contains a religious and theological dimension which is overlooked, but should be explored."

Yamin began his talk by showing that although Springsteen's music is "pervaded with images from the highways and turnpikes of New Jersey, where he grew up," these images have religious significance for him.

Baldwin on black and white

Most people live in a world they did not make, and are victims because they do not dare to stop and understand it, said black novelist and social critic James Baldwin last Tuesday night, speaking before a packed house of nearly 750 people in Chaplin Hall.

Baldwin said that in order to understand the world in which they live, people must understand history. But, he added, history is distorted because it pertains mostly to white people and is interpreted by and for white people.

"When I say 'white people,' I am not referring to the color of their skin," Baldwin said. "I am referring to a state of mind."

"White people" are those individuals who, regardless of their own color, believe that it is best to be white and that whites have a monopoly on virtue, Baldwin said.

"Facades" in white world
Whites in many countries have trouble dealing with blacks in their midst, Baldwin said, but they do not consider that blacks have no choice but to put up facades to live in the white world.

Baldwin explained that as a child, he knew that when a white person looked at him they saw a black boy, and he knew how that white person expected him to act, so he learned to act that way. By the time he was an adolescent, he said, he was an expert in knowing how to behave.

During this process he learned to hate white people, he said, and to hate himself. He said the same phenomenon still exists in America today, and it is reflected in America's relations with the world.

Humans not doomed
Despite its problems, however, Baldwin said he does Continued from Page 6

Ferman plays with finesse

by Carl Leafstedt

Polly Ferman, a Uruguayan pianist, presented a program of music by South American composers last Tuesday night in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall as part of Williams' Young Artists Concert Series.

Slides of Uruguay

In the first half, Ferman seemed to be making a plug for her native country as she played music by Uruguayan composers and accompanied her performance with slides depicting scenes of Uruguay.

The setup worked well—the whole auditorium was darkened except for a small light by which you could see her hands while the slides were shown on the screen above and behind her.

"In Uruguay there are two types of music," she explained briefly before she began to play. "There is 'city' music and there is 'land' music."

Her slides helped to distinguish between the two. For example, as she performed Triste No. 2 by Eduardo Fabini, rock-strewn, mountain landscapes were shown. This was obviously "land" music—more somber and peaceful and lacking the strong rhythmic vitality that characterized the "city" music that she also performed.

Women's week stresses focus on interaction

by Martha Foley

This academic year is dedicated to a celebration of the arts at Williams, not—we would hope—as a token gesture of tolerance of creative focus, but as a tribute which will open up the arts to all members of the community and encourage wider participation in the continuing flow of artistic energy.

Similar goals inspired members of the Feminist Alliance to devote this week to a campus-wide "exploration of women in culture." In conjunction with other campus groups and individuals, the Alliance has scheduled various artistic, musical, theatrical and literary activities to be presented throughout the week by women.

The primary intent of Women's Week is to make the celebration of the arts more comprehensive, for the mutual benefit of women and men, not to the exclusion of men or in competition with their work.

Women's Week is an effort to establish a context for poetry, music and visual art which grows outside the neatly defined categories and genres. It is an opportunity for women to create their own vocabulary and to share the words, forms, tones and movements of female perspectives.

"By making this a given subject," explains Alliance member Margie Duffield '85, "we may go beyond women as an issue" to enjoy and learn from the artistic responses of women as accepted and essential sources of culture.

This week's events are structured not for the purpose of consciousness-raising, but for the encouragement of active participation in workshops and discussion, stresses Beth Byron '85, an initiator of Women's Week.

Participation will be spurred by events such as the collaborative and improvisational workshop on theater for social change. The workshop will be offered on Saturday by the Rhode Island Feminist Theatre. Participation is open to the first thirty-five people who sign up.

Reverend Talitha Arnold's program on "Feminism and Christianity," featuring discussion, will also encourage participation.

Since imported resources are not necessarily more valuable, many of the events will celebrate local talent. Taylor Pie, a bluegrass singer and musician from Pittsfield will appear in the Rathskellar. Williams dance instructor Sandra Burton has offered to lead an African Dance Workshop this week for people of all levels of expertise. Rosemarie Tong of the Philosophy Department will speak on rapelaws in the United States.

The organizers of Women's Week also plan to use resources in the student body. Several WCFM programs will focus on women, including specials on women of color, feminist music and contemporary women's music. A two-week exhibition of works by female art majors opened last night in the Goodrich Gallery, and tonight at Driscoll lounge five students will read their own poetry. While no similarity of style brings these artists or these poets together, Fran Toler '84 notes, "It is the supportive network which allows us to share and develop our personal modes of expression."

not think the human race is doomed. He said that many people, including himself, believe there is hope in America that doesn't exist anywhere else.

On an individual level, people have to begin by being responsible actors in their own society, Baldwin said. He urged the audience to work for change in the world because, although it may not seem so now, the forces which are now dictating one's life can eventually be removed.

"The people cannot be forever subjugated," he said. "Just because it has lasted for a long time does not mean it will last forever."

Physics can be fun

"Every time you start your car in the morning, you are verifying special relativity," said Harvard professor and Nobel laureate Edward M. Purcell last Monday night. His lecture, "Life in a Magnetic Field," traced the development of electric and magnetic theory.

Using a pair of jumper cables and a Sears auto battery, Purcell demonstrated the repulsion of two electric currents flowing in opposite directions, and began his talk with a shower of sparks as the cables leapt apart. "Magnetic force," he said, "is essentially a relativistic effect."

Purcell also explained nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) spectroscopy, a technique which he invented and for which he was awarded the 1952 Nobel Prize in Physics.

NMR imaging is now being used to produce cross-sectional images of the body which are far clearer than x-ray photographs.

The method currently used on human beings involves subjecting the body to a magnetic field roughly 800 times the strength of the earth's field. In discussing possible health hazards, Purcell, who said he has been in much stronger fields himself, explained that "fields of this size are perfectly benign and have no physiological effect at all."

NMR imaging research is now being used for biochemical research. Purcell said a phosphorus imaging technique now allows scientists to watch the body's basic biochemical reactions.

Nukes in space

Nuclear weapons in space may destabilize even more an already fragile peace in the nuclear age, according to Daniel Deudney, a representative of Worldwatch Institute.

According to Deudney, the United States is about to start placing destructive weapons in space. One such weapon is the anti-satellite, a mechanism which is able to strike a high percentage of Soviet satellites. Deudney calls this "an ominous development" because it will place strategic nerve systems in jeopardy.

This action will only serve to heighten tensions between the Americans and the Soviets and make war even more possible. "The whole idea of escaping obsolescence by nuclear weapons by placing weapons in space is an illusion," Deudney said.

Men's rugby

The rugby club traveled to Worcester last Saturday to play in the Holy Cross tournament and came away with four wins and one loss.

A-side splits
Williams looked rusty in its opening game. A penalty kick by Roger Merriam '86 was the only bright spot in a 13-3 loss to a good Babson squad. Williams came alive in its second game, however, defeating Holy Cross 7-0. Though Williams was in control the whole game, only Peter Aiken '86 scored a try. Williams other three points were scored by Joe Carey '84 on Williams' first drop kick of the year.

Killer Bs win it all

Williams won the B bracket of the tourney by beating Babson, 18-6 and Notre Dame, 8-0. Williams was led by sophomores Chris Toll and John Fetterolf, who both scored tries against Babson, with Drew Klein '84 engineering the attack. Chris Edwards '87 had two conversions and two penalty kicks to finish the rout.

Against the Fighting Irish, Toll and Fetterolf both scored again, supplying Williams with the only eight points of the game.

Volleyball

The women's volleyball team finished off their season seeded fifth in the NIAC tournament held at Skidmore on Saturday.

Although the Ephs missed a spot in the finals by one game, they defeated the third and fourth seeded teams to gain second place in their pool.

Williams was defeated by M.I.T., which then went on to win the tournament. But Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin was pleased with the two victories over Connecticut College and Bates, saying, "Williams ended this season strongly. All of them pulled together to make the last match one of their better games of the season."

Looking ahead

The team will lose two seniors, co-captains Carol Dorfman and Sara Griffiths. The core of the team will all be juniors and sophomores next year.

The peak of this season was an incredible upset over Division II Springfield. "That game proves how well we can play," said Hudson-Hamblin, "what we need is to maintain that level throughout the season and we'll come out undefeated." Their final record, including tournament losses, was 15-11.

Women runners

The women's cross-country team finished third in the Little Three competition Saturday at Wesleyan.

Coach Bud Fisher said, "The women ran well, and pushed the Wesleyan and Amherst ladies to the limit, but in the end the Cardinals proved that their reputation as one of the best teams in Division III is well warranted.

"Our performance against Amherst was a little less than stellar," Fisher continued, "but the superlative efforts of seniors Lyn Vendinello and Amy Doherty, who wound up in fifth and eighth places, respectively, compensated for the disturbing results in the team competition."

Course record

The Cardinals' Allegra Burton ran a brilliant race, and carded an impressive time of 17:44, which broke the existing course record by three seconds. Burton tore off at a wicked pace, and her win was secured by the first mile. Ashla Berit of Amherst came in a distant second with a time of 18:38.

Sixteen seconds back and in fifth place overall, Vendinello came scorching down the final stretch to lead the Williams contingent.

The tally of the individual performances resulted in a score of 23 points for Wesleyan, 42 for Amherst and 64 for Williams, respectively. Williams had hoped to fare better against Amherst, but they will have to wait to avenge the loss.

Williams finishers

Doherty ran superbly to nail down a respectable time of 19:20. When asked about the race, Doherty replied, "I had hoped to run a little better," which aptly summarizes the attitude of the squad. Susan Baer '85, Kate Pugh '87 and Becky Conklin '87 rounded out the top five with times of 20:05, 20:50, and 21:13, respectively.

JVs take second

In the J.V. race the Williams pack was woefully thin as they could not win the race. However freshman Chris Pasko's second place 16:20 for the 5000 meter course merits attention as do freshmen Mark Gilrain's sixth place and Tom Flitzgibbon's seventh place. Even though the J.V. was not up to par, they still crushed third place Amherst by 31 points.

Next the Ephs look forward to the IC4A championship on Tuesday and New England's next Saturday where they will prepare themselves for the upcoming Division III's.

strong Union squad, matching score for score.

Head Coach Bob Odell believes he has "three of the best receivers in the East" in these players, and the coaching staff put its cards on the table early with the aerial attack by moving McCarthy to a running back slot as an extra receiver complementing Hummon and Coleman.

The Ephs drove methodically down the field early in the first quarter, passing to set up the pass, mixing in a drive to dependable fullback Ted Thomas '85, and scoring on a Connolly-to-McCarthy strike from 23 yards out. Williams proved they could move the ball, as evinced in a 19-17 lead in first downs at the game's conclusion. The score was knotted at seven after the Dutchmen drove 76 yards for a touchdown on their initial possession.

Union rattled off the next 24 points. Quarterback Dan Stewart broke an NCAA Division III record in the second quarter when he hooked up with wide out Winston Britton '85 on a long score, the 17th consecutive game in which he has thrown a TD pass.

However, Union quarterbacks completed only seven of 16 passes for 109 yards on the day while Williams tallied 25 of 48 for 286 yards through the airwaves.

On the other hand, the Dutchmen stuffed the Ephs' running attack for -19 yards (including sacks) while they amassed 232 yards in 51 rushing attempts.

Defensively, the Ephmen shut out Union in the second half with a gutsy performance characteristic of the "never say die" Eph attitude in 1983.

Women ruggers crush Yale

by Heien Kaulbach

The women's rugby football club slaughtered Yale 16-0 this past Saturday. Not even the strong wind could help the Eli, as they were on the defensive the whole game.

The first try was scored by junior Allison Martin '85 from a scrumdown near the try line. Williams scored three tries in the second half. Missy Wilcox '87 touched down the ball after it had been passed down the line. Sunny Edelstein '85 then scored in a breakaway down the sideline. Junior Sara Harkness made the last try from a scrumdown.

The game, the third from the last in the season, was by far the best the women have played. Tackles were neat and efficient, and the scrum backed the line at all times.

Dorie Dewar '85, co-captain Meg Holliday '85 and Becky Haile '86 played expertly on the line, holding the ball despite the cold. Sara Keohane '84 and Sara Finnmore '87 anchored the scrum. Anne Melvin '85 and Joan Horgan '87 were driving forces in their last game of the season.

Ferman concert—

Unfortunately, Ferman's slides varied widely in interest—from beautiful landscapes and other indigenous scenes to rather catholic items such as a mud puddle and a tree stump. This did not detract from the general quality of the concert, though, which was very high.

In the second half, Ferman packed away the slide projector and performed some non-Uruguayan music. Ferman's playing was excellent. She obviously felt a strong attachment to the music and brought it out well. If the music required strong playing, she certainly gave it; if soft, sensuous tones were needed, she gave soft, sensuous tones. She was remarkably assured in all the difficult, technical passages.

Footballers succumb to nationally-ranked Union

by Paul Meeks

The Union College Dutchmen extended their unbeaten record in the 1983 season to seven games at the expense of the football team, 31-14, in Schenectady, N.Y. Saturday. Williams was outplayed by a team ranked nationally and vying for a postseason Division III playoff berth, but was by no means embarrassed.

The pregame strategy for the Ephs was to throw the football. The strong arm of quarterback B.J. Connolly '84 and the soft hands of Williams' receiving trio split ends John McCarthy

'84 (26 receptions for 390 yards and five touchdowns in 1983), Marc Hummon '84 (22 for 303 yards and one touchdown), and tight end Paul Coleman '85 (26 for 247 yards, one touchdown and one conversion), hoped to enable the Ephs to play with the

Olympians display talents

by Dave Paulsen

The United States Olympic Field Hockey team completed its New England Tour with an exhibition match against the Williams Field Hockey team last Monday.

The first half consisted of a match between the Olympians and the Williams squad. Showing the skill and teamwork that has made the U.S. team a top contender for a medal in the 1984 games, the National team trounced Williams 5-0.

The Olympic coach, Vonnie Gros, has continually emphasized team play, and this emphasis was apparent in the match. The second half saw the two opposing teams split up sides to provide a more equal contest. The match was followed by a clinic for interested high school players.

First Olympic team

This will be the first year that the U.S. will field a team in the Olympics. 1980 was the first year that field hockey was an Olympic sport, but the team was unable to participate due to President Carter's boycott.

The team, which includes Williams Coach Chris Larson Mason and alum Leslie Milne '79, has existed for seven years, participating in tournaments once or twice a year. Since February 1982, the women have been in residence training in Philadelphia. The team members take odd jobs to help support themselves during their time of training.

Gros and her team members have optimistic hopes for the squad's chances in the 1984 games. In international competition, the team has frequently finished in third place. The team was favored to win a medal in the aborted 1980 games.

Gros sees her team's main competition as the Netherlands and Australia, with West Germany and Canada competing with the U.S. for third place. According to Milne, however, it would not be out of the question for the team to win the gold medal.

Water polo Ephs sweep tourney

by Ken Irvine

The men's water-polo team, now 20-2, continued their domination over their Division II rivals last weekend as they swept their second league tournament.

The Ephs defeated Coast Guard 23-11 and Amherst 15-4. Their closest game was against Trinity who forfeited and thus lost by an official score of only 5-0.

Top division

Williams is at the top of the Western division of the New England league. This weekend they will travel to Harvard where they anticipate winning their second consecutive Division II New England Championship.

Crush Lord Jeffs

The Ephs were in top form against Amherst. While they still made a few mistakes, in general they worked both the counteroffensive and the offense well.

Williams' counteroffensive is designed to move the ball safely and quickly up the pool after a turnover—the first two men break out to the sides at mid-pool and the remaining men break through the middle and set up the offense.

The Ephs' defense was very tight. They will have to play that way this weekend too, since starting goalie Dave Scheibe '86 was injured prior to the Amherst game and will be out for the rest of the season. He will be sorely missed, but Williams is fortunate to have Rob Sommer '84, who played a good game against Amherst, to replace him.

Williams will also have to play without Rob Shatkin '84, another starter, at New England. Shatkin was injured in a vaillant leap during Williams' home tournament with the University of Rhode Island and Boston College, which Williams won handily.

Men kick Connecticut, fall to Babson booters

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

The men's soccer team solidly defeated Connecticut College Saturday, 4-1. They controlled play throughout the game and were particularly strong offensively.

During the first half the ball rarely entered the Williams defensive half, and the Ephmen scored three times within a ten-minute period.

The first goal came at 33:44 when Jon Deveaux '87 set up Paul Williamson '86 with a long ball through the middle. Williamson pushed it past the helpless Connecticut goalkeeper, who stood frozen in the net.

Several minutes later Clark Otley '86 went one-on-one with the goalie but was stopped. Jeff McEvoy '86 fed the deflected ball back to Otley, who scored on the open net.

Just 47 seconds later McEvoy again assisted as David Wolf '85 netted the Ephs' third.

Camels come back

Connecticut then responded, managing to put together a sudden drive against Williams' temporarily shocked and struggling defense. Goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 had a spectacular save on a hard, close shot.

Finally, with 5:47 remaining in the first period, Connecticut's Gary Andrews scored with a fast, curving shot over Murphy's head.

McEvoy scored the final goal exactly eleven minutes into the second half with Williamson assisting.

Lose to Babson

The team lost for the first time in seven games last Tuesday to a strong Babson team, 3-1.

The game started on a bad note for the Ephs, as Dan Caldicott scored for Babson 1:39 into the game, after Murphy mis-kicked a goal kick right to a Babson player.

Despite that goal, the Ephs played a good first half. Four minutes after the Babson goal, Dan Aramini '84 bent a direct kick around a wall of defenders and into the goal to tie the score.

Opportunities

From that point on, the Ephs had more of the play than Babson. In fact, they even had a goal called back when David Wolf '85 put the ball in but was called for obstructing before he shot.

Overall, Williams had three or four good scoring opportunities. One shot hit a defender who was standing in the goal, another hit the post and another missed by inches.

The second half, though, was a different story. Babson dominated the Ephmen, especially when their "very physically tough" midfield had the ball, according to Williams coach Mike Russo.

Twenty-six minutes in, Babson scored after a cross by Caldicott. Murphy initially made the save, but the ball bounced off him and Rob Nichols put it in. Six minutes later, Caldicott again crossed the ball, this time with Tim Nugent scoring.

Said Russo, "They capitalized on our mistakes, but we failed to capitalize on theirs."

The Ephs take their 7-2-2 record and sixth in New England Division III ranking into today's game at home against Siena.

Runners snag 14th Little Three crown

by Chris Stearns

A last minute surge by senior co-captain Bo Parker ignited the men's cross country team, as Williams held off the hard-kicking Wesleyan Cardinals to win their 14th straight Little Three title. It turned out to be the closest meet of the season for the Ephs as they tallied 28 points to the Redbirds' 30.

Amherst was never a factor in the race until the end where they unknowingly contributed to the Ephs' cause. A Lord Jeff outdistanced a Cardinal but unselfishly allowed Mike Coyne '87 and Brian Angle '84 to glide past.

The race began well for the Ephs as they quickly established a solid lead by placing a pack of runners in the front. Pacing all runners was Wesleyan senior Seb Junger, followed by Williams co-captain John Nelson '84.

Sense of security

At the two mile mark it appeared that the Ephrunners had the race all but wrapped up. But the Cardinals' strategy was to lure Williams into a false sense of security, and just past the three mile mark the Redbirds pulled out all stops in an attempt to overtake the Ephs.

Gaining momentum, the Cardinals saw their tactics working as the bewildered Ephrunners were losing contact with each other. However, Nelson and Parker sparked the Purple Wave in a comeback which led to the closest Little Three finish in the past 14 years.

Junger won the race in 24:27, tying the course record. Behind him was Wesleyan's Jeff Messer in 24:34. But leading the Ephs was Parker, who finished the race with a valiant effort in 24:37 to take third, despite coming off a hamstring injury which has plagued him all season long. Right behind him in 24:39 was Nelson, who also ran a strong race.

'We were better'

Although Wesleyan's Randy Accetta finished fourth, the Purple Wave closed in, sweeping the next four spots. In sixth place was cocaptain Bennett Yort '84 in 24:55. John Ellison '86 took seventh with a 25:08, followed by Coyne at 25:11 and Angle, who turned in a 25:12 to shut down the Wesleyan threat.

After the race Farwell said "Wesleyan ran a tremendous race. They were good but we were better. I was impressed by Bo's run and the talent and depth of the team."

Also running fine races in the Ephs' winning cause were Tom Pingree '86, 14th, Dave Grossman '87, 16th, Kevin Jenkins '85, 17th, College bulldozes famous Aycock sculpture

by Michael Govan

A well-known piece of outdoor sculpture built by contemporary artist Alice Aycock near the bottom of Spring Street was bulldozed last July by Buildings and Grounds to make way for a new storage building.

Art Professor Ed Epping said that when he went to check on the sculpture in early October he found that it had been demolished. Epping immediately made an appointment with President John W. Chandler to find out what had happened. Epping said that Chandler did not know that the sculpture had been destroyed. Chandler then spoke with Vice President William Reed who then talked to Winthrop M. Wassenar.

Director of the Physical Plant Wassenar said that when he gave the order to bulldoze the piece, he was unaware that it had any artistic significance.

Dirt mound

Aycock built the piece, known as the "Williams College Project," in 1974 when she was part of the Williams College Artist-In-Residence program. The piece consisted of a four-foot wide by six-foot long, two-foot high concrete block chamber covered with wood planks and dirt. The chamber could be entered through a 14-inch by 28-inch opening in one side.

This type of sculpture was not uncommon in the early '70s. Several artists worked with other "environmental" or "architectural" sculpture. Aycock has become known as one of the most important of these artists since building the piece in Williamstown.

Permanent collection

After being told of the significance of the piece, Wassenar sent a memo to Art Department Chairman Milo Beach about the protection of any other such works that might exist. Wassenar said, "There was no way that any layman, professor other than art (possibly), or any other rational person would have known that the dirt mound which was built several years ago and was now covered with grass and weeds was a 'valuable' piece of sculpture."

The piece itself, which was

Anti-feminist Schlafly fills Chapin, incites both anger and questions

by Jeffrey H. Brainard and Christian Howlett

In what was certainly the most controversial lecture of the year so far, anti-feminism activist and author Phyllis Schlafly told a standing-room-only audience in Chapin Hall last Wednesday that "feminism is irrelevant in the 1980's...it's gone out of style." She also explained why she thinks women cannot have both a successful career and family at the same time.

The audience of more than 1,000 students and townspeople was generally restrained but attentive throughout her speech, and although booing and hissing followed some of her more controversial points, no major disturbances occurred.

However, Schlafly fired up the students more than any speaker in recent memory has, and prompted heated discussions after the lecture including a teach-in held by the Feminist Alliance (see p.4)

Speaking on "Feminism, Family and Freedom," Schlafly said true womanhood consists of having a family as well as a career, and that feminism has increased the divorce rate and threatens to take away rights women already have, such as exemption from military service.

"No role models"

Schlafly said that feminism has grown unpopular among young women today because they see older feminist women as angry, bitter and negative. "Feminism has supplied no role models of women who have put it all together—who have a fam-

Plans drawn up for Baxter remodelling

by Christian Howlett and Angela Averitt

The first set of floor plans drawn up for the remodeling of Baxter Hall were presented for comment to the Committee on Undergraduate Life and the College Council this week by Dean David Colby and college architect John Jordan.

The plans call for moving the mailroom to the current student lounge area, while the current mailroom would become the lounge, with TV, study and meeting rooms adjacent in the current Outing Club space.

At last Tuesday's CUL meeting, Jordan suggested that offices involving full-time staff, such as the Chaplain's Office, Food Service, College Council and Outing Club coordinator Jim Briggs' office, remain on the first floor. Other offices, such as The Williams Record, the Outing Club equipment room and WCFM, will be placed in the basement, which is being devoted to more specific uses, Colby explained.

New features

Other new features in what Jordan called his "first shot at (planning Baxter)" include:

- Converting the present Record office to the College Council and Daily Advisor's general information center.
- Consolidating the Rathskeller as a "mixed-use space," including booths, pool and ping pong tables and pinball machines.
- Putting several copiers in the basement for general student use.
- Converting the two large windows in the present mailroom to doors, and possibly closing off the current entrance by Food Service and Briggs' office.
- Putting the Record office in the current Pottery Ltd space, a area twice the size of the paper's present office.
- Expanding the capacity of the mailroom to 2400 mailboxes in anticipation of larger class sizes in the future.

All-night study area?

College Council and CUL members raised several objections to the new plans. At the CUL meeting, Council President Tom Paper '84 said he feared the new lounge would be as noisy, busy and full of traffic as the present one.

However, at the Council's meeting last Thursday, Council members suggested the lounge might be used for a new all-night study area to replace the Van Alstyne Lounge in Sawyer Library, which the College began closing at 1 a.m. this fall.

CUL member Sara Gross '85 told the CUL that she feared the new TV lounge would make the study lounge noisy. However, replied

A social event

The crackdown announced this week on drinking at athletic contests is unjustified and counterproductive. Athletic Director Bob Peck, following a suggestion from the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program, has called out the guards to keep fans from drinking in the stands—most notably at the homecoming football game.

Peck gave two reasons for the change in policy: increased drinking poses the threat of "ugly incidents," and fans are too busy drinking to pay attention to the game. Peck gave no evidence of any such "ugly incidents" at Williams. He mentioned that drinking increases the possibility that fans will tear down the goalpost and be injured in the process, but goalposts commemorating past glories decorate many prominent campus areas. The goalpost pieces in the Log and Jenness House, which houses coaches' offices, testify that the game-closing ritual has more to do with tradition and enthusiasm than intoxication.

Peck said that people should be able to enjoy a game without having to drink while they watch. Many people do just that. Conversely, many people enjoy drinking at games. Inappropriate behavior sometimes accompanies social drinking, but since crowds here are generally restrained, they should not be deprived of a common, pleasurable, social activity. Peck should be allowed to watch the game without having to drink, and people who want to drink should be allowed that opportunity.

If the drinkers pose any threat to the crowd in general—and there has been no evidence presented to indicate that they do—they should be controlled separately, perhaps by being asked to leave the premises entirely.

Peck also said that eliminating drinking in the stands will make more people pay attention to the game. Football games are social events. Many people go to them with no intention of watching the game. They go to talk, meet friends and enjoy the fresh air in the Purple Valley. These people generally have very little, if any, idea of what's going on down on the field. Football games have been that way for a long time, and will probably continue to be, whether or not people can drink.

The rules will still allow people to drink in the tailgate party area at the football game, but not in the stands. This restriction divides the drinking from the game—putting greater emphasis than ever on drinking. People who would normally drink a great deal will feel compelled to drink enough at the tailgate to carry them until halftime, when they can tank up again.

The prohibition of alcohol at games has been on the books for a while, but the College used to turn a blind eye to what is a fairly prevalent social custom. The new enforcement of an old rule directs Security's energy in the wrong place. The College needs to distinguish between social behavior and problem behavior—not eliminate social behavior altogether.

Rest in Piece

The demolition of Alice Aycock's "Williams College Project" is a tragedy. The sculpture was an important piece of art. True, it was never meant to last forever. When it was built, many people, including the artist, probably didn't expect it to last this long. But it did. It was a teaching tool. It was a good thing for Williams to have.

Blame for the demolition cannot be assigned to any one person. The Museum and the Art Department should have sent a written record to Buildings and Grounds of the sculpture's existence, or marked it some small way. Buildings and Grounds should have gone to more sources than their own department before they bulldozed a structure that they could not positively identify. Hopefully more care will be taken next time.

But the issue, as Professor Epping has said, is larger than what happened. Perhaps the irony that the piece was destroyed in our "Year of Celebration of the Arts" need not be harped upon, but it's worth pointing out. A "celebration of the arts" should be more than a publicity stunt to advertise a museum, a theatre, and money for the arts. Publicity and money are valuable, but we should accept the challenge of art as well. Art by definition is not confined to museums, nor is it necessarily distinguished by gold-leafed frames or marble pedestals. The Aycock piece, among other things, meant to say that.

Yes, "art works," and we should make an effort to learn from art in a broader context than pleasure and entertainment. Art asks real questions about the way we see, feel, think, and act. We should think about what happened to the Aycock sculpture and what it tells us about the way we act and react.

Meager

To the editor:

In response to the letters from Mr. Perkins and Mr. Blatt:

1. The entire budget for the Women's Studies Program, including funds for lecturers, is considerably smaller than Mrs. Schlafly's lecture fee. These funds have been committed to scholars who will, we hope, enhance interest in the study of women on campus. Unlike Mrs. Schlafly, they are not political figures. In my conversation with Mr. Blatt, I tried to stress the meagerness of our funds, the fact that we have already committed most of this money, and most important, our concern for bringing Women's Studies scholars to campus.

2. What I do with my free time is, I have always assumed, my own concern. Indeed, it is my right. Likewise, if Mr. Perkins or Mr. Blatt does not wish to attend events sponsored by the Women's Studies Program, I assume they are exercising their own right in this regard. I will also not suppose this or that about their characters and then print these suppositions as proof of some overriding judgment I wish to make; e.g., Mr. Perkins is, one supposes, mesmerized by the media image of Bruce Jenner and therefore he is a this or that.

Misquote

To the editor:

While 10 to 1, the new information/counseling service, could be helped by getting publicity on the front page of the Record (Nov. 1), we can only be hurt by the misquoting with regard to (1) the service's hours and (2) our role relative to that of Peer Health Counseling.

First of all, 10 to 1 has nightly hours of 10:00 p.m. to 1:00 a.m. Part of the value of the service is to be open when friends or JA's may be at parties or at the library, and when other information and counseling services from the psychological and the Dean's Office, are not available (not to mention too formal to turn to sometimes).

Secondly, the statement about Peer Health which appeared in the article is an insult to that organization. Peer Health counselors are trained with general "listening skills," not just sex counseling. Our relation to Peer Health will be one of referral. That is, after talking with someone who calls our service, we may suggest that they call Peer Health, which has a staff of counselors with published numbers to call when 10 to 1 is not open, and who are better trained than 10 to 1 counselors at dealing with sexual concerns. It is hoped that referring people to Peer Health, and making people aware of their call-in/walk-in hours (Wed./Sun., 7:30-9:00), will help expand the use of Peer Health beyond their current stigma as sex counselors.

Misleading

To the editor:

The headline "College has funds available for student draft resisters," which appeared in last week's issue, is extremely misleading. To quote a Financial memorandum of last August, "Williams College does not replace any grants or loans denied to students for failure to sign the Selective Service Registration Compliance Form." This policy is unchanged.

But people have misperceived the headline to be evidence that the College has decided to do something in the face of the Solomon dilemma. Men who are affected read the headline with joy, only to be confused by an article telling them nothing has changed.

I even ran into some people who, having read only the headline, asked me what I thought of the College's bold and noble position, only to have me tell them that this was not the case.

It seems to me that the relevant issue for a College is whether or not to actively do something to counteract a law that goes against its fundamental principles. Some colleges, such as Yale, Swarthmore, Earlham, and others have taken positive action. Others have not. Williams belongs in the latter category; the headline implies otherwise.

The headline is also misleading in that it applies that draft resisters should be able to afford Williams, just like anyone in financial need. In fact, no draft resisters whom I know (including myself) find the College's existing programs financially feasible. I could not afford to remain here longer than this one year I have left. Two other non-registrants maintain that they could be forced to leave before the start of their junior years if something is not done.

The loans that the College is offering do not fit the traditional criteria for "financial aid based on need." In fact, the less you need these loans, the more eligible you are for them (as they are determined by credit rating, not by need).

What Williams College should do in regard to its philosophy of "education for all regardless of income" is another question, and one which deserves much consideration and debate. However, what the College is doing should not be misperceived, or misrepresented.

Distortion

To the editor:

In his recent letter, Mr. Blatt presents student gossip as "evidence" of my alleged intellectual intolerance, twice stating: "I have heard that Assistant Professor Anne Margolis" made comments urging her students to boycott or stage a walk-out from Mrs. Schlafly's lecture (emphasis mine). It is difficult if not impossible for me to impute any tolerance or open-mindedness to Mr. Blatt, for he had neither the intelligence nor simple decency to contact me and ask me what I said before proceeding to "quote" me in the Record. For this reason, I refuse to dignify his sweeping charges against the Women's Studies Program by responding to them.

I would, however, like to clarify what I did say. First, I raised the issue of the Schlafly lecture in my course on the social history of nineteenth-century American women. I compared her views with those of anti-suffragist Catharine Beecher, whose writings and whose biography we read in the course. Having heard Mrs. Schlafly speak on previous occasions, I told my students that I did not plan to attend this lecture; but I encouraged them to compare her views with those of Beecher, since neither woman was stupid and neither should be ignored. At my students' urging, I agreed to attend the lecture so that we could discuss it afterwards. I also said that because I found Schlafly's mode of presentation as well as her content misleading and offensive, I would not personally engage her in debate. I also asked students to channel and express their distaste for her views and tactics by quietly walking out after the lecture and attending a teach-in that would focus on Schlafly's presentational strategies as well as her views. In addition, I urged students to research Schlafly; one of them did put together a revealing selection of quotations from her writings.

Now that the facts have been established, I hope that Mr. Blatt will demonstrate tolerance, open-mindedness, and—dare I say it?—humility by publicly apologizing to me in the Record for his irresponsible distortion of my remarks and my position. Such misrepresentation strikes me not only as a sign of great immaturity but also as a serious threat to intellectual freedom at Williams.

Special-interest

To the editor:

Recent letters have conjured up words like "dogmatism" and "intolerance" in characterizing Professor Lynda Bundtzen's response to Phyllis Schlafly. Such judgments, however, are built on completely false premises.

First, did Daniel Blatt actually expect the Women's Studies people to fund Phyllis Schlafly? Women's Studies is neither a College-wide committee nor an omnibus department like Political Science. On the contrary, it is one of countless special-interest groups that exist at both faculty and student levels and moreover proliferate nationwide. (Call this "pluralism" if you wish.) The aim of special interest groups is to further their special interest. They don't go lending financial or moral support to any group that threatens their cause or threatens their special legitimacy. The Black Student Union will not fund anti-Black speakers. The Jewish Studies Committee will not provide a platform for an anti-Jewish publicist (however eloquent his/her oratory or glitzy his/her prose). Nor, for that matter, will the American Tobacco Institute ever give a single penny to an activist from the Anti-Smoking Coalition. It's as simple as that.

There is no logical or ethical reason why Women's Studies should behave any differently and spend its meager resources on a professional anti-feminist. To take it from another angle: If a campus leftist were to approach the Republican Club and request $500 for a lecture by a Marxist economist, with the argument that after all conservatives and socialists are both deeply concerned with the issue of "capitalism," as a self-deluded fool. (He most assuredly wouldn't get the $500.) Mr. Blatt is either being disingenuous or is strangely naive in his expectations.

Ultimately this false debate only reflects the Orwellian distortion and narrowing of political language in this country. For X number of reasons, such positive adjectives as "balanced" and "open-minded" have, in practice, come to mean a hearty willingness to honor the ideas of the Right, whereas the Right is rarely called upon to be "open-minded" to any politics left of George Bush. By contrast, "dogmatic" and "intolerant" are usually applied to anyone opposing racism or militarism or other reactionary evils. (When were Reagan or Pinochet last accused of "intolerance"? Like the old red herring trick, it steers all attention away from the clash of substantive issues, and focuses on a never-never-land of pure "openness" and "tolerance." If not examined within their concrete real-life everyday use, such noble slogans are nothing but air.

Women's studies

To the editor:

Because of my involvement in designing and overseeing the Women's Studies Program, I feel compelled to respond to the letters of Thomas Perkins and B. Daniel Blatt (Nov. 1).

Their letters reflect serious misconceptions of the relation between feminism and women's studies and of the Women's Studies Program at Williams. Feminism has certainly played an important part in motivating people to study closely both the roles and achievements of women and the diverse ideologies of womanhood, but feminism and women's studies are not the same thing. At Williams non-feminists teach women's studies courses, and even feminists in the Program disagree on major issues. Our introductory and subsequent courses (not to mention courses of related interest) present a variety of viewpoints about women and analyze those viewpoints through a great range of disciplinary methods. Conservative points of view find expression among scholars whose work is assigned in our courses (not in every course, to be sure, but then no one expects every economics or political science course to employ all possible modes of criticism). In fact, some teachers contributing to the Program may well have conservative perspectives on feminism and a variety of other issues in women's studies; I cannot say for sure, since a teacher's political orientation is not a criterion we use when deciding whether to include a course that he or she has submitted to the Program, and I have refrained as a matter of principle from interrogating anyone's politics.

Advice to lawmakers:
let 5-year olds drink

by John Clayton

Even though the Massachusetts legislature has wisely decided against raising the legal drinking age in the Bay State to 21, the issue is far from dead. The question pops up almost as frequently as the top of beer cans, if not at the state level than at the federal.

The debate usually centers on reducing drunk driving, and while this concern is commendable, it clouds the issue. As a result the debate always seems to miss the target on several key points.

First, there are the traditional arguments against a higher drinking age:

—20-year-olds (not to mention 18- and 19-year-olds) can go to war, they go to work, they pay taxes, they get arrested. At age 18 they get all the burdens and privileges of adulthood except this one.

—With an 18-year-old drinking age in Vermont, and 20 in most of the rest of New England, many undergrads will drive across the border to drink, and then drive home drunk.

—If undergrads are prevented from drinking in bars where they can be monitored, they must sneak to drink; and an easy and common way to sneak your beer is to drink it in the car.

Secondly, let me add these points: —Undergrads are going to drink, to some degree. A law declaring this illegal will not stop them; it will lower their respect for the law. And with lowered respect for this law goes lower respect for the law in general. —It is a core of wrongdoers who are committing the crimes. Most of us underage drinkers are responsible drivers given a bad name by the small percentage. But while the law will hurt the majority, the core—many of them alcoholic—will continue to get liquor illegally and continue to drive drunk. But my most important point is:

—Drunk drivers come in all ages. If we're going to fight drunk driving, let's do so at all levels.

A higher drinking age not only fails to fight drunk driving at all ages, but it seems to excuse the older drunk drivers.

Its logic is simply wrong: While statistics may show that 20-year-olds get in more drunk driving accidents, they also show that 21 to 25-year-olds and 21 to 40-year-olds get in more accidents than older people. Yet a proposal to raise the drinking age to 25 or 40 would be absurd.

Furthermore, using current logic, we should lower the drinking age to five, because 5 to 15-year-olds cause fewer drunk driving accidents than anyone. You laugh. Five-year-olds don't drive, you say. But that is precisely the point: it's the combination of drinking and driving that kills, not one or the other.

So we should penalize those who combine the two activities, not those who just drink or those who just drive, but those who drink and drive. And we should penalize them across all ages.

John Clayton, an underage drinker, is a junior at Williams College.

Both Perkins and Blatt mistakenly make attendance the sine qua non of intellectual tolerance. I fail to see evidence of intolerance in a professor's decision not to attend a lecture, especially when that professor already knows a good deal about the lecturer's views. Were I to ask students and colleagues whether they planned to attend Susan Gubar's upcoming lecture on lesbian interpretations of Sappho and they replied "no," I could not properly assume that they were being intolerant, particularly if they explained that their knowledge of her previous work led them to anticipate learning little new or interesting from Gubar. After all, none of us has the time to attend every lecture on campus, not even one-tenth of those from which we think we might learn much about subjects we consider important.

I hope that students and faculty feel free to disagree and to argue openly with Bundtzen about her views on Schlafly. But in the absence of evidence to the contrary, no one should impute such base motives as intolerance to her belief—and mine—that Schlafly's competence to present a good case for conservative views on feminism is inadequate to have merited either the support of the Women's Studies Program for her lecture or anyone's intellectual commitment to attend it. I did go to hear Schlafly's lecture, as it happens, but out of curiosity about a celebrity rather than out of intellectual interest or a sense of professional obligation.

Blatt himself is subject to the charge of intolerance because of his remarks about Professor Margolis. If a professor actively discouraged students from attending a lecture when those students had not, for instance, sought advice about how to register their disagreement with the speaker in a dramatic fashion, I might well endorse a charge of intolerance. But according to Margolis herself, she urged no one to boycott Schlafly's lecture or to engage in a silent walk-out. Blatt, however, did not even bother to

by Joe Ehlers

Students and faculty decried Phyllis Schlafly's lecture last Wednesday as overly simplistic and insulting to men and working women, at a teach-in sponsored by the Feminist Alliance following Schlafly's lecture last Wednesday.

The participants, who included both men and women, agreed they were up against a very difficult opponent. Many expressed difficulty in dealing with what they said was Schlafly's simple presentation of the issues surrounding the modern feminist movement.

"Her appeal is a fundamental, 'Oh, wouldn't it be better if things were simpler,'" said Fran Toier '84.

"We have to address the issues she is hitting and not give her the run of it," commented one observer.

"Yet, she deliberately avoided the issues," said assistant professor of English Anne Margolis. "She came across so sweet, never lost her temper. She was trying to undermine people's views of her."

Men insulted

Margolis added that men should be more insulted than women by Schlafly's presentation. "She has a very low view of men," she said. "She seems to believe that only deviant or wimpy men will take care of children."

"Yet self-sacrifice should be a virtue shared by men and women alike," Margolis said, adding that only then would equality at home and workplace be achieved. "The whole nature of the workforce should be restructured for men and women alike. Both partners must be able to spend time at home. The burden of raising children must be shared."

Other speakers said they felt Schlafly asked too much of women—raising a family, keeping the home together and pursuing their careers all at once.

Schlafly oversimplifying?

By separating the home from a woman's career the feminists felt that Schlafly was simplifying the issue too much and discoloring the Phyllis Schlafly said in her lecture Wednesday that the greatest achievement of the Industrial Revolution was to take women out of the factories and into a better standard of living in the home. (Eagon) facts.

"The dichotomy she kept making tonight," one woman said, "was career on the one hand, family on the other."

Others reaffirmed their dedication to the women's movement, both nationally and here on the Williams campus.

"Be a feminist, and don't be afraid to say it," said Toria Chester '85, but added that this was a difficult stand to take on the Williams campus. "It is easy to think, 'Oh, well, perhaps if I go along [with the feminists] my peer group would laugh at me,'" she continued."

But feelings such as these must be overcome, said the members, if the feminists are to push for more equal and just relationships between women and society. "A whole lot more work has to be done," concluded Margolis.

Schlafly speaks---

ily, success and happiness all in one," she explained.

Instead, the women now in their 30's who started the women's liberation movement in the 1960's have not found satisfaction in the sexual freedom which resulted, but instead are eager to start families, she said.

Schlafly stressed that every woman should have the choice of how to live her life, but she should be aware of the risks involved in feminism, such as the high divorce rate it has caused.

Because feminism preaches that women should pursue careers at all costs, "[it] tells women that home is a prison...and that liberation means easy divorce," Schlafly said. Thus, feminism causes situations like that depicted in the movie "Kramer vs. Kramer," she said.

"Story of liberation"

"That couple's marriage didn't have the problems marriages usually have," Schlafly said. "...But then women's liberation came into her life, and she walked out on her family...By the end of the movie, everyone is unhappy. And that is the story of women's liberation."

She said a woman could successfully have a career and raise a family, but only if she does the two at different times in her life. If she tries to have both at once, Schlafly said, chances are great that her husband will not be supportive. Her children may also be neglected in the process, she said, since young children need lots of "quantity time," not just "quality time," a fact Schlafly said feminists have overlooked.

In addition, Schlafly said, while a woman's role in the workplace has changed dramatically due to feminism, her duties in the home are for the most part unchanged. Figures show that working women still do about 90 percent of the housework, she said.

Women don't want to work

Schlafly also cited figures which she said show that given a choice, most women would prefer not to work full-time. "The greatest achievement of the Industrial Revolution was that men could take their wives out of the factories and mines and give them a better standard of life in the home. The feminist movement is trying to get them back in there," she said.

Schlafly also dismissed feminists' claims that women are discriminated against in the workplace and that they receive lower pay than men do for equal work. Schlafly said women earn less because they have on average less experience in the fields they work in, and because they choose not to enter higher-paying fields.

Schlafly was introduced by Kate Elliot '86 as the person "who almost singlehandedly brought about the defeat of the Equal Rights Amendment."

Schlafly said she objected to the amendment because its wording could be construed to force federal funding for abortions or military service for women. She said even prominent lawyers are uncertain how far the amendment could be taken.

During the question and answer period following Schlafly's remarks, Bill Hughson '86 asked her "why shouldn't women share in warfare when they reap the benefits of defense?"

Schlafly replied that "experience with history shows that the best armies are made up of young men, and until you can show me that [armies] should be made up of women, you have to go to experience with history."

Mildred Blake: 86-year old student reflects on Williams

by Vernon Squires

Mildred Blake is eighty-six years old, a Williamstown resident, and vice-president for the Movement for World Government. She is also a student at Williams—she audits courses. In a recent interview with the Record, Mrs. Blake offered her thoughts on Williams College, its students, and their place in the contemporary world.

Record: At age eighty-six you're mingling in an atmosphere with people 60-65 years younger than you. What is it that drives you to enter a community largely reserved for the twenty year old?

Blake: Well, I came here because my son is business manager of the college, and I wanted to be near him and his family; but I have greatly enjoyed being part of the Williamstown community. I have audited a course every fall...at least one course, and I have enjoyed them all. At present I'm auditing a course on the Middle Ages, a period I have never studied before, so I'm certainly on the same level as the student. I greatly enjoy the opportunity to go to class and be part of Williams. When I go across on a bright morning, across the campus, as I turn around the freshmen quad in front of Chapin, it's really a delightful scene and I'm so pleased to be part of it. It's a youthful and lively spectacle and not

"... unless we solve the nuclear problem, I don't think young people are going to live to old age."

many older people have a chance to be part of this morning festival.

Record: It's not something you outgrow? Blake: No, I don't think so...We're all actuated more or less by the same things, because in a course like history the students are not just there to earn some credits. They're obviously there because they feel it's an interesting subject, and they're there for the same reason I am, because it's a fascinating study...We all realize that what we are today is the consequence of what our ancestors were, all through the different periods. It throws a great deal of light on what we are today, and what is eternal in our problems.

Record: You seem to find enthusiasm in both yourself and the students.

Blake: I think that it does exist here. It's a privilege for an older person to be with a group that is working on life from that side of it—older people are said to live in the past, and keep looking backward. It's interesting to be with a group of people who are beginning on life and who face it with all kinds of opportunity ahead of them.

I am like everybody, however, worried about our present situation in the nuclear age. I am eighty-six and cannot reasonably expect to live much more than five more years, and I sometimes fear that none of you students are likely too either.

Record: Do you feel that the nuclear problem is the single greatest issue today?

Blake: Indeed I do. Although our economic problems are great, I think they too stem from a lack of any genuine political unity in the world. But certainly the handling of the nuclear problem can only be done by united efforts and organization.

Record: What can Williams College and Williams students do?

Blake: I think it's always possible that students can do a great deal...students in the next decade might have a lot to do in reforming our ideas of the world. Certainly there's no reason to look back with nostalgia at the fragmented state of affairs in world politics today. If they are once fired with a vision of what they could do, not only by growing up to be the active generation, but even as students, they might have a great deal of influence.

However, I do not really see it here at Williams; I think the political groups at Williams are not yet rising to the necessities and possibilities of world organization. But the interest they feel as to how we got to where we are is a good sign. It's a first step really. You have to know where we are in order to go forward to something new.

Record: Do you see apathy or unawareness here?

Blake: Oh yes. There's a great deal of that in any group, but it is not peculiar to students. In fact there is probably less in student groups than in people engaged in the pursuits of adult life. There is a student lifestyle in which you really are asking what it is all about, and where we are going, and how did we get there; this is conducive to real advance. I'm very hopeful of student communities.

Record: What is your relationship to the students here?

Blake: Well, I don't know that many students. I nod and say hello to the people in my classes when I pass them on campus...I do know some groups of students, with whom I talk, or have tea or dinner. But sometimes they're so busy they don't have time for anything, except for what they have to do in connection with their work. I'm always impressed by the amount of work that the students do; compared to the load of work that they carry, I carry very little.

Record: Has the "College Experience" changed noticeably since your years at the University of Michigan?

Blake: In outward ways it is quite different. Students today are so informal, very casual in their dress and their relationships. When I was at Ann Arbor, there were no first names in class. I also remember how we used to look in class: girls all wore hats and gloves, and even the men were more formally dressed than now.

Record: What about the attitude and outlook of students. Has it changed?

Blake: Well, my college career was both shortened and somewhat diluted and hurried by World War I. There were hardly any men in my class by the time we were finished—that makes a big difference. But I think it's the informality and general lack of stiffness that I find among students now. They are more at ease with each other and with everybody a great deal more than we were.

Record: What of the opportunities offered to you, as someone who is not completely integrated in the college, yet advantage of. I sometimes go to films over at Bronfman; some of my college friends have been very nice about inviting me to things. When I took the Shakespeare course I went to all the films that were shown in connection with it, and I go to occasional other films, and once in a while to an evening lecture. I've known quite a number of faculty in connection with the Elderhostel, which I go to in the summertime. That's a week of lectures particularly for older people. It lasts just a week, which means that you have just five courses in a particular subject. Over several years you get acquainted with faculty who you have not met before, and you discuss subjects you might not have time for during the year.

Record: Having spent a lot of time in the business world of New York City, do you feel Williamstown is the "ideal" college site that so many describe it as? Or is the college too isolated, and too far away from the "real" world?

Blake: Williams is not really away from the world. Physically it is somewhat remote, but I don't feel that I'm out of the world...people here are just as interested in what's going on in the country and the world as anybody I knew in New York. I don't feel it's remote in that sense. I think that just because Williams is quite a long way from any metropolitan center it has been obliged to make sure that there is a rich cultural atmosphere, and a great deal of cultural activity going on. It's necessary in order to keep the kind of faculty that makes Williams what it is.

Itself has a very fine art museum, and a most interesting rare book library. Because the town is primarily a college town, I think the level of it and its intellectual interest is pretty high.

Record: Can you see the "energy" of the college focusing towards solutions of some of the current problems?

Blake: I don't see it yet. I do not think that the college, as a college, is likely to take any great leadership in the formation of our immediate political future. In a way that's not the business of the college. Its job is to create the kind of citizens that can tackle the job of reorganizing world politics, and have a background for it that will make sure that we make use of what we've learned.

"Students today are so informal, very casual in their dress and their relationships."

Record: Is that the challenge for Williams?

Blake: It's the challenge for everybody, and it's certainly a challenge for young people, because unless we solve the nuclear problem, I don't think young people are going to live to old age. The human race has a very dark prospect.

Record: What can you relate that's optimistic? We cannot end it with that.

Blake: I do not end it with that myself. I really think that there is too much common sense and too much will to survive in people to be willing to go on in the course we are now heading. The only way to avert complete disaster is a real u-turn, a real decision to set up a world organization that can protect us all.

Record: So there is hope?

Blake: Yes, I think there is hope because people have a will to survive.

"I do not think that the College, as a College, is likely to take any great leadership in the formation of our immediate political future."

is very much a part of it? What else do take part in within the college?

Blake: There are more opportunities here than I have time or strength to take

You wouldn't keep them happy if the environment here did not have a good deal of stimulation in it. Although we're a village off in the mountains we have one of the great theaters and most respected art museums in the country. The college

Students can trust those of us teaching women's studies to be as fair and thorough in our presentation of points of views as professors at Williams gener-

If, however, some people believe that the sympathies of many faculty in the Program occasionally lead us to slight particular points of view on any aspect of women's studies, I encourage them to work constructively with us to address the short-comings they perceive. The Women's Studies Program is new and still in the process of defining itself. We actively desire assistance and participation from all interested members of the community.

Jordan, "It is possible to isolate the two spaces acoustically."

Not "aesthetically appealing"

Colby also raised objections before the CUL, saying "two things bothered me about the [proposed] mailroom area. One is that I didn't find it very aesthetically appealing. Also, the space in the diagram looks to me to be pretty small."

Jordan replied that the proposed mailroom would be about 20 percent larger than the present one. In addition, he said "by no means do we conceive this to be the final [proposed version] of the mailroom."

Jordan noted that little or no thought has been giving to costs or timing of the remodeling yet. "We haven't got into any type of phasing consideration yet," he said. "Until we develop a plan that we think is workable, it doesn't make sense [to plan phasing]."

Jordan and Colby will be taking student input on the plans until Thanksgiving, when Jordan will draw up a new set to be presented at an all-college meeting sometime before Christmas. The final plans will be taken before the Trustees Jan. 20.

Professor Thomas Jorling also told the Council at its meeting that Williams has a poor reputation for classrooms, and that other colleges' classrooms are considered more modern, effective and comfortable.

Jorling is chairman of a new, ad hoc, faculty committee set up by President John Chandler to study classroom space. When the Council asked him if the College might construct a new classroom building, he said, "It's too early to say if it would be a serious recommendation, but it's a serious consideration."

Octet mixes music and humor

by Kathi Rosenbaum

The Octet, a nine-man a cappella singing group (it defies the meaning of octet) mixes professionalism with tongue-in-cheek joking in its performances. Likewise, the Octet receives a similar mixture of serious respect and good-natured kidding from its audiences—both at concerts such as Saturday night's In Chapin and at more impromptu performances around campus.

A willingness to go along with the fun allows the Octet to laugh at such experiences as being bombarded with paper airplanes while singing "Blue Moon" before the showing of "An American Werewolf in London" in Bronfman auditorium.

Bottle rockets

However, the Octet did not take too kindly to being the target of bottle-rockets while singing in the Freshmen Quad on October 25. Chuck Goforth '86 admitted, "As a new member, I was disillusioned by it."

Gregg Walker '85, president of the Octet, offered a different perspective, noting, "I don't know if it was really specific animosity against us as much as that we were sitting ducks in the middle of the Quad for someone to fire at."

The groups, however, concerned with its campus image, Goforth stressed that "we don't like the image of being exclusive," and suggested that "people shouldn't be afraid to ask us to sing for them [for birthdays, parties, etc.]."

Walker pointed out that "we don't take ourselves all too seriously—we're hams."

Singing over joking

Musical director Mike Costantino '85 faces the challenge of getting these "hams" to act seriously during rehearsals. According to McElfresh, "Mike is the 'Hitler of the Octet'—he makes us work hard."

Costantino agreed that his job "is not to be the funny man" in building a solid musical program. He pointed out that despite the on-stage humor and off-stage jesting, the Octet is "an a cappella singing group, not an a cappella comedy routine."

Chapin packed

Both the singing and the joking were displayed in full force this past Saturday night at Chapin. The Octet performed a wide variety of songs, including "Put Your Head on My Shoulder," "Yes Sir, That's My Baby," "Bye Bye Love," "Maria," and Joe Jackson's "Is She Really Going Out with Him?"

"The Octet Evening News" was one of the hits of the show; its one-line "This just in..." news bulletins informed everyone about such events as that "after forty years of fighting, Elmer Fudd has finally murdered Bugs Bunny" or that "two Bacchus Club members were taken in by the police for trying to tap a Division III major."

The concert featured two visiting choral

Man on the Quad

What did you think of Phyllis Schlafly?

John Horowitch '87: I was surprised because I originally went thinking that Phyllis Schlafly would be a big jerk, and I was impressed by how well she expressed her views.

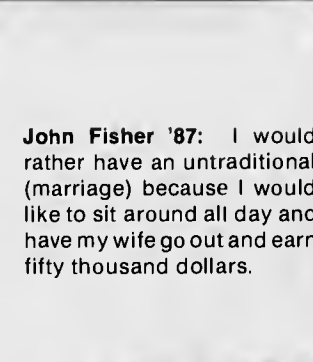

Libby Jeffrey '87: I don't think women should be drafted. I agree with her that the best armies are made up of men... I think there are a lot of physical differences between men and women.

Rick Dietz '87: I think women should be in the household. I think they should stay there and should accept their position and duty as a wife... I think God put us on this earth to have the men take care of the women.

Meredith Miller '87: I do think it was really brave of her to come to a college where she knew everyone would hate her, and make a speech like that.

John Fisher '87: I would rather have an untraditional (marriage) because I would like to sit around all day and have my wife go out and earn fifty thousand dollars.

Laura Seligsohn '85: I thought her almost exclusive emphasis on the legislative aspects of the feminist movement missed the more important, broader long-term goals which are attitudinal.

Graham Parker explores new sound

by Andrew Garfield

Without the Rumour, Graham Parker has moved away from his driving, electric guitar-dominated sound and incorporated new elements into his album, The Real McCaw.

"Just Like A Man," is reminiscent of Parker's old themes and old sound, with Brinsley Schwartz's powerful guitar returning to rule. Parker's frustrated vocals illustrate social claustrophobia in "Sounds Like Chains": "I got to break/This armor...They never let you/Out of school Well I got a gun/That's loaded/I wanna hurt some fool."

Violin funk

The larger part of The Real McCaw, however, explores new sounds and new themes. Sarah Larson's violin supplies the melody in "Life Gets Better".

Mel Collin's saxophone pervades "A Miracle A Minute". Parker even uses a hint of funk in "Too Late" The Smart Bomb" and "A Miracle A Minute". Schwartz plays an acoustic guitar and adds an intriguing Spanish tone to the rhythm in "Sounds Like Chains".

A central theme of The Real McCaw seems to be love and commitment—new things for Parker considering his recent marriage. He talks about them in the mystical "You Can't Take Love For Granted" and the sentimental "Anniversary": "Darling can't you see / How much I love you / On our anniversary."

"Life Gets Better"

"Life Gets Better" shows Parker's new-found happiness: "Life gets better, yeah / When she puts her arms around me / Just to know I'm not the average fella / I'm the one / I'm the one for her." His life, or at least his music, seems to have grown happier since 1979 when he sang "Don't bother with the local girls" and "You can't be too strong."

AMHERST

The "Issue is not whether we maintain fraternities forever but, rather, for how much longer."—Amherst President Julian Gibbs in "The Place of Fraternities at Amherst College", written shortly before his death.

Gibbs' commentary on Amherst's fraternity system has caused quite a stir in the past few weeks. The acting president of the college, G. Armour Craig, released the paper to the public after the Board of Trustees formed an ad hoc committee to examine the quality of campus life.

According to Craig, "The Trustees are deeply concerned with the quality of student residential and social life at the college. In particular the character of the fraternity system... It will not be until January...that there will be any declaration about the future of fraternities."

HOLY CROSS

Colby College has accused members of the Holy Cross Men's Rugby Club of causing damages at a recent Rugby tournament held at Colby. According to Holy Cross' Crusader, "Colby is accusing the Club of $1500 worth of damages, including torn-up shrubs, ripped out sinks and the accosting of two girls by throwing them in the mud and placing hands on their buttocks and breasts." An investigation is currently underway.

Voigt's poetry conveys subtle force

by Monica Fennell

The audience Thursday night in Griffin Hall listened attentively to catch the soft sing-song of Ellen Bryant Voigt's poetry reading. She read from her early book Claiming Kin, from the recently published book The Forces of Plenty, and from some newer poems. Like the bell in The Forces of Plenty, Voigt's unemotional rendering of her poetry belies the vitality of her vision.

In the Bavarian steeple, on the hour, two figures emerge from their scalloped house carrying sledges that they clup, in turn, against the surface of the bell. By legend they are summer and winter, youth and age, as though the forces of plenty and of loss played equally on the human soul, extracted easily the same love bronze note....

Standing at the podium last Thursday, she could have been the mother next-door. But how many middle-aged women speak of their fears for their growing child by deftly fusing baby-talk and cynical imagery? In "Pastoral" Voigt warns her boy, "No, No, I say. Yuck. Hurt." and then reflects, "The stick will break and stab you in the heart. The reckless wheel, the cool suggestive music of the pond."

Ambiguity and pain

For all the unassuming softness of her drawl, Voigt is no mother with, as she says, a "simple-minded equation for happiness like Phyllis Schlafly." She embraces ambiguity and pain. Her poetry effortlessly sweeps the listener up in the stream of words as those words rush over the stones of her life. In her poem "Blue Ridge,"

Voigt explores the isolated pools of the "explicit sadness" of being so physically close, yet so emotionally far, from an intimate friend. Later she describes a rocky experience at a seedy bus station in "The Last Class" where she wonders "how it felt to be without grief."

A woman in the audience cringed and gripped her husband's hand as Voigt described a kinsman eating a moccasin in "Talking the Fire Out." Voigt seemed to admonish her in the repeated line "Nothing is learned by turning away."

No romanticizing

Voigt has faced the music, and she has remained down-to-earth, both literally (in her poetic imagery) and figuratively (in her outlook). This is what saves her poetry from too much melodrama when she expresses her terror and numbness during a child's illness in "Year's End," or from too many abstract "in-jokes" in "Sweet Everlasting," a poem about a personal experience with the cyclical nature of death and life. Like the gawky girls in her recent poem "The Lotus Flowers," Voigt can wrestle the bloom of beautifully perceptive poetry from the slimy pond of ambiguity and pain.

There is no romanticizing for Voigt, no starving artist's garret (her plump cheeks witness that). "The notion of the Muse is nothing but service to the art, a discipline." Writer's block is a "vocational hazard. There are times when you are in touch with the mysteries and times when you are not. My life is checkered with times when I didn't and couldn't write poetry."

One-third of frosh get warnings

by John Calderon

Three out of every ten freshmen received academic warnings this semester, an increase of 6.6 percent over the average for the past three years, according to the Registrar's Office. But Dean of Freshmen David Colby said he is not too concerned with the increase.

One-hundred and fifty-four freshmen received warnings, and a total of 196 warnings were issued. Division III, the science departments, gave out 60 percent of the warnings, the highest of the three divisions. The biology department issued warnings to 32.4 percent of freshmen taking its courses, the highest of any department in the College.

The psychology department gave out the second-highest number of warnings, with 27 percent, which surpassed all other Division II (social studies) departments put together. The mathematics department was third, warning 19 percent of its students.

The English department, with more freshmen registered than any other department (379), did not issue one warning.

Dean of Freshmen David Colby said the overall increase in warnings was unusual but understandable. "We changed the way we processed the warnings this year," he said. Colby explained that in the past, warnings which were handed in late by professors were not processed. However, "we didn't stop taking them [late] this year from faculty," he said, so the total number of reported warnings increased.

Colby said he doesn't feel the increase had anything to do with the academic quality of the students. "I don't think there's anything going wrong in the class," he said. "The quality of the class is slightly better, in some respects, than other classes."

However, Colby did say that "we're taking the 30 percent seriously." For those students in need of more academic help, Colby said he's handling the situation in the same way as it has been handled in previous years. Some students with difficulties have sought out their faculty advisors or himself, Colby said, and he has suggested that they try to get additional tutoring from their instructors.

The rates of freshmen warnings for past classes were 22.3 for the class of '84, 22.5 for the class of '85 and 25.5 for the class of '86.

The Registrar's office also reported that of the 154 current freshmen warned, 118 of them received warning in only one course, 30 received warnings in two courses, and 6 received warnings in three classes. None received four warnings.

College to enforce ban on booze in football stands

by Sarah Abernathy

College Security will patrol sporting events this weekend to prevent spectators from drinking alcoholic beverages in the stands, said Director of Athletics Robert Peck. Peck said the crackdown was necessary because there has been an increase in the amount of drinking in the stands at previous games this season.

The prohibition is a College rule which Security has not vigorously enforced in the past, Peck said. The rule will be enforced at the Homecoming football, soccer and rugby games this weekend, said Peck.

"We will permit alcoholic beverages in the tailgate area of Weston Field, but not beyond," he said. A snow fence with two wide entrance gates will separate the football field from the tailgate party area this weekend, Peck said.

"We will try to stop transport of alcohol into the stands, and if we see it there, we'll tell people to get rid of it or leave the area," Peck said. He said the rule would be enforced among students and alumni alike.

In addition, security guards will also patrol the sidelines at the rugby and soccer games on Cole Field.

Preventative measure

Bill Leininger '86, president of the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program, said WAAP brought up the issue of excessive drinking at the games because the deans had said the crackdown at games would occur, but then it never happened.

The crackdown for Homecoming Weekend was then agreed upon jointly by WAAP, the Infirmary, the Dean's Office, Security and the Athletic Department.

Although WAAP has previously confined its activities to educating students and encouraging them to act more responsibly on their own, Leininger said the enforcement of the rule was necessary as a preventative measure.

"Homecoming is such a big thing that some people plan on drinking all day," he said. "Football becomes the sidelight and alcohol becomes central to going down to Weston. Some people end up drinking continuously throughout the game... We just hope that if we can cut down on alcohol use sometime during the day, we can cut down on serious health problems later on."

Leininger acknowledged that excessive drinking "isn't true for everyone." And he said each student will have to decide how much to drink himself. "If someone wants to get plastered, he'll find a way," he said.

"Ugly incidents"

Peck said the step was necessary because drinking is not appropriate at athletic events, but has nevertheless become more frequent at home games.

"At the Middlebury game there was too much attention to drinking and not enough to the game," he explained. "The purpose of athletic events is not for people to get drunk."

"There is a potential for all kinds of ugly incidents when people are drunk. We want to prevent irrational behavior by limiting where alcohol can be consumed," Peck added.

Peck would not say if there had actually been such incidents so far this year, saying only that the impetus for the crackdown was the increase in drinking itself. He did say one of the specific dangers associated with drinking at football games was that fans trying to tear down goal posts after the game could be hurt, and he said there is a state law against tearing down goal posts.

"We're trying to promote the social part of the athletic event," Peck said. When asked what he would say to students who consider drinking to be a part of the social event, Peck said "I think you can enjoy an event without drinking and that maybe you should go to the Log all afternoon if you can't."

Director of Alumni Relations R. Cragin Lewis said he was not aware of much drinking by alumni during football games. "Alcohol hasn't seemed much of a problem in recent years, but I'm glad to see the ban," he said.

Perry-Bascom President Tom Graham '84 agreed. "I don't think it's that big a deal not to drink in the stands. If people want to drink, they can do it at their tailgates."

Other house presidents said they think the ban is an overreaction.

"People will be upset, but I can see Security's point," said Drew Klein '84, president of Pratt House. "I think it's a bit of an overreaction, but it's not an absolute inconvenience."

"It's a bit of overkill to have guards there, and there's something about the atmosphere at Homecoming that you don't want people watching over you," said Helen Mango '85, president of Spencer-Brooks

Judge A. Leon Higgenbotham urged Williams students to take the initiative in fighting discrimination in his lecture Friday. (Glick)

Tong calls for tougher rape law

"I for one do not like to think that my husband is a live-in rapist," philosophy professor Rosemarie Tong told a lecture audience last Wednesday, "and that I'm a voluntary sadomasochist."

Tong, speaking on "Reforming Rape Law," defended the existing status of marital rape as a crime, but opposed the view of some feminists that "in this society all sexual intercourse is by definition rape." She also outlined some proposed reforms which would make rape laws stricter.

Some proponents of rape law reform say that juries should be allowed to convict a rapist without proof that the woman did not give the alleged rapist consent. Tong objected to the idea, often referred to as "institutional coercion," saying that it reflects stereotypes of male dominance and female submission, i.e. that a woman should not be expected to resist a man's sexual advances.

"It is one thing to claim that women's sexual wants and needs are shaped by their culture, and quite another to insist that no individual woman can ever break the mold which culture initially imposes upon her sexual wants and needs," Tong said.

Tong outlined three basic categories for most of the rape reforms being proposed. The first, the elimination of evidentiary rules, has taken place nationally on an official level, she said.

Sexual history a factor

Tong said that though 22 states have enacted rape shield laws, which make the rape victim's prior sexual history irrelevant to the rape conviction, even in those states a defense can influence a jury by citing the woman's sexual history and reputation.

Tong said she supports enacting shield laws in the rest of the states and making existing laws tougher so that testimony on a woman's sexual history will be thrown out of court.

The second wave of reforms, Tong said, focus the court's attention solely on the rapist. The new reforms would stipulate that when certain conditions of coercion are present (e.g., physical threats, the use of a weapon, a victim under a certain age), the court does not need to ask the rape victim any questions.

A third set of reforms which Tong said she supported would classify rape as an assault. "Rape is more a crime of violence than of sexual passion," she said. "Women should conceive of rape as they conceive of any assault—a frightening and possibly painful experience, but nothing to be ashamed of," Tong said, adding that rape is a very serious crime which should not be trivialized.

Judge: racism must be fought

Judge A. Leon Higgenbotham challenged students to take an active role in fighting racial discrimination in his lecture on "Race and the American Legal Process" last Friday.

"You have been particularly blessed to attend Williams, and you have a great obligation to prove that you're worthy to get involved in that treacherous path to ascertaining the truth," said Higgenbotham, author of In the Matter of Color and professor of law at Wharton Business School and Harvard University.

"People who are basically good can be insensitive on the issue of race. We can not see the cruelty which we impose on those around us," he said. "No one should ever feel guilty about having had privileges; the question is how you use them."

Higgenbotham urged the Williams community, and particularly the students, to "make certain of our human rights policy. We do not carry forward Martin Luther King's dream if we allow the alienation of poor and colored people."

"Each of you can make a difference if you're wise enough to care about the quality of life. There is no reason academicians and students should be impotent," Higgenbotham said.

Progress has been made

During the question and answer period following the lecture, political science professor Kurt Tauber questioned whether change was possible in a system motivated by "competitive individualism and lacking a collective ethos."

"My answer is history," Higgenbotham replied. "Having women on the court makes a difference, and having many blacks on a college faculty makes a difference."

The Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965, and the Voting Rights Act all had a great impact on society, he claimed. "I refuse to accept that what has occurred has been perfect, but it has made a profound difference."

Higgenbotham pointed out a paradox of American government by noting that in the same week, the U.S. Congress both condoned the entrance of troops into Grenada, a violent act, and honored Martin Luther King, a man of peace, by declaring his birthday a national holiday.

Such paradoxes existed long ago, he claimed, specifically in the practices of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. Both were slave-owners but are now hailed as symbols of freedom and liberalism in American history. To show this side of their practices, he said, we must "pierce the invisibility of our history books."

Central America reporting better

American media coverage of Central America has improved greatly in the last 20 years, with increased focus on the world balance of power and human rights, according to Dan Hallin, professor of political science at the University of California in San Diego.

In his lecture accompanied by news clips Oct. 29, Hallin illustrated the change in the American public's view on foreign policy by examining the early 1960's and the Kennedy administration. Americans then saw all foreign conflicts, such as early disruptions in Laos, Vietnam and South Korea, in "the global aspect of crisis," Hallin said.

Thus, he explained, the media fit every crisis into a cold-war scheme. Then, "American intervention was never doubted," he said.

Moving away

The American public moved away from its cold-war perception in the sixties and seventies, but in 1980 that was revived, he said. One of the first foreign policy moves of the Reagan administration, according to Hallin, was to use Central America, before it had surfaced as major news, as an "ideological conflict."

Journalists at the time still did not know much about Central America so they reported strictly what they heard at press conferences, with no analysis. In this way, Hallin said, the Reagan administration was "successful at putting cold-war interpretations in the news."

One-third of frosh get warnings

by John Calderon

Three out of every ten freshmen received academic warnings this semester, an increase of 6.6 percent over the average for the past three years, according to the Registrar's Office. But Dean of Freshmen David Colby said he is not too concerned with the increase.

One-hundred and fifty-four freshmen received warnings, and a total of 196 warnings were issued. Division III, the science departments, gave out 60 percent of the warnings, the highest of the three divisions. The biology department issued warnings to 32.4 percent of freshmen taking its courses, the highest of any department in the College.

The psychology department gave out the second-highest number of warnings, with 27 percent, which surpassed all other Division II (social studies) departments put together. The mathematics department was third, warning 19 percent of its students.

The English department, with more freshmen registered than any other department (379), did not issue one warning.

Dean of Freshmen David Colby said the overall increase in warnings was unusual but understandable. "We changed the way we processed the warnings this year," he said. Colby explained that in the past, warnings which were handed in late by professors were not processed. However, "we didn't stop taking them [late] this year from faculty," he said, so the total number of reported warnings increased.

Colby said he doesn't feel the increase had anything to do with the academic quality of the students. "I don't think there's anything going wrong in the class," he said. "The quality of the class is slightly better, in some respects, than other classes."

However, Colby did say that "we're taking the 30 percent seriously." For those students in need of more academic help, Colby said he's handling the situation in the same way as it has been handled in previous years. Some students with difficulties have sought out their faculty advisors or himself, Colby said, and he has suggested that they try to get additional tutoring from their instructors.

The rates of freshmen warnings for past classes were 22.3 for the class of '84, 22.5 for the class of '85 and 25.5 for the class of '86.

The Registrar's office also reported that of the 154 current freshmen warned, 118 of them received warning in only one course, 30 received warnings in two courses, and 6 received warnings in three classes. None received four warnings.

College to enforce ban on booze in football stands

by Sarah Abernathy

College Security will patrol sporting events this weekend to prevent spectators from drinking alcoholic beverages in the stands, said Director of Athletics Robert Peck. Peck said the crackdown was necessary because there has been an increase in the amount of drinking in the stands at previous games this season.

The prohibition is a College rule which Security has not vigorously enforced in the past, Peck said. The rule will be enforced at the Homecoming football, soccer and rugby games this weekend, said Peck.

"We will permit alcoholic beverages in the tailgate area of Weston Field, but not beyond," he said. A snow fence with two wide entrance gates will separate the football field from the tailgate party area this weekend, Peck said.

"We will try to stop transport of alcohol into the stands, and if we see it there, we'll tell people to get rid of it or leave the area," Peck said. He said the rule would be enforced among students and alumni alike.

In addition, security guards will also patrol the sidelines at the rugby and soccer games on Cole Field.

Preventative measure

Bill Leininger '86, president of the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program, said WAAP brought up the issue of excessive drinking at the games because the deans had said the crackdown at games would occur, but then it never happened.

The crackdown for Homecoming Weekend was then agreed upon jointly by WAAP, the Infirmary, the Dean's Office, Security and the Athletic Department.

Although WAAP has previously confined its activities to educating students and encouraging them to act more responsibly on their own, Leininger said the enforcement of the rule was necessary as a preventative measure.

"Homecoming is such a big thing that some people plan on drinking all day," he said. "Football becomes the sidekick and alcohol becomes central to going down to Weston. Some people end up drinking continuously throughout the game... We just hope that if we can cut down on alcohol use sometime during the day, we can cut down on serious health problems later on."

Leininger acknowledged that excessive drinking "isn't true for everyone." And he said each student will have to decide how much to drink himself. "If someone wants to get plastered, he'll find a way," he said.

"Ugly incidents"

Peck said the step was necessary because drinking is not appropriate at athletic events, but has nevertheless become more frequent at home games.

"At the Middlebury game there was too much attention to drinking and not enough to the game," he explained. "The purpose of athletic events is not for people to get drunk."

"There is a potential for all kinds of ugly incidents when people are drunk. We want to prevent irrational behavior by limiting where alcohol can be consumed," Peck added.

Peck would not say if there had actually been such incidents so far this year, saying only that the impetus for the crackdown was the increase in drinking itself. He did say one of the specific dangers associated with drinking at football games was that fans trying to tear down goal posts after the game could be hurt, and he said there is a state law against tearing down goal posts.

"We're trying to promote the social part of the athletic event," Peck said. When asked what he would say to students who consider drinking to be a part of the social event, Peck said "I think you can enjoy an event without drinking and that maybe you should go to the Log all afternoon if you can't."

Director of Alumni Relations R. Cragin Lewis said he was not aware of much drinking by alumni during football games. "Alcohol hasn't seemed much of a problem in recent years, but I'm glad to see the ban," he said.

Perry-Bascom President Tom Graham '84 agreed. "I don't think it's that big a deal not to drink in the stands. If people want to drink, they can do it at their tailgates."

Other house presidents said they think the ban is an overreaction.

"People will be upset, but I can see Security's point," said Drew Klein '84, president of Pratt House. "I think it's a bit of an overreaction, but it's not an absolute inconvenience."

"It's a bit of overkill to have guards there, and there's something about the atmosphere at Homecoming that you don't want people watching over you," said Helen Mango '85, president of Spencer-Brooks

This is what the Alice Aycock sculpture looked like before being demolished by Buildings and Grounds officials last July.

part of the Williams College Museum of Art's permanent collection, has been published in various art books and magazines including the textbook used by the Art Department's Advanced Painting Class. Each year Epping took some of his students to the site to study and discuss the piece. A request for information about the piece for publication was received by the College Museum as recently as last January.

"I regret that it was destroyed," said Chandler, "no one person can be blamed." Chandler said that he used to go down to visit the piece and had noticed that it was not well kept up.

"Look silly"

"We didn't realize it was a valuable art object," said Reed. "I'm really sorry—but what can you say. It made us look silly."

According to Wassenar, no one at Buildings and Grounds knew the "mound" to be an art work. "One of the workers remembered that [in 1974] a group of students came to us and asked us to dig a hole. Our people were under the impression that the students were building a mock-up of a fallout shelter as a Winter Study project," Wassenar said.

"When we begin to build the third storage facility this summer [two already existed], somebody saw it. Norman Quinn, Buildings Supervisor, asked me what it was. We asked throughout the Department and we got the story about the fallout shelter," said Wassenar.

"Bomb it"

"Bill Steuer of Campus Security remembered being told that it was a cover for a well. We climbed in, but there was no well. It wasn't well kept and it didn't appear that it was anything that anyone wanted. I take full responsibility. I told them to bomb it."

"There were no markings on the piece to identify it as a piece of art," said Wassenar. He said there is no written record of the piece at Buildings and Grounds.

The Art Department notified Buildings and Grounds about the piece a few years ago when the other two storage buildings were built near the sculpture. According to Art Professor E.J. Johnson, several members of the Art Department got together, fearing the piece might someday be inadver-

Artist responds

When informed by the Record that her sculpture had been destroyed, artist Alice Aycock said that she was "sad. I didn't know whether it had lasted, or whether anybody had cared. I didn't know that the Museum had taken it in. It's too bad that it was destroyed."

The Williams College piece was one of Aycock's early works. Aycock became known for these works. Few other examples of her early work have survived.

Asked if she intended the sculpture to be permanent, she said, "the whole idea was that it would become part of the landscape. I planted grass on the mound before I left so that it would survive the winter...My great expectation, I guess, my secret fantasy is that someone would come along and value those works—that someone would come along and keep them up."

"It was made out of earth partly for financial reasons and partly for aesthetic reasons," she said. "It didn't announce itself as a piece of art—that was one of its issues. But it did need something, a plaque or something."

"It was very important in my early work," she said. "It was architecture. It was house and tomb at the same time."

"I'm in shock," said Aycock. "I guess what you don't know won't hurt you. I'll be depressed. I'll be unhappy. It was one of the very first places [Williamstown] that I built in a public form."

Aycock told the Record that she might be interested in coming back to Williams to build another, perhaps more permanent, piece.

tantly destroyed because it was not easily recognizable as sculpture.

They decided to inform then-Director of the Physical Plant Peter Welanetz that it was a piece of art. Art professor Whitney Stoddard spoke personally with Welanetz about the sculpture.

Welanetz retired last year, apparently without leaving any written record of his conversation. Welanetz was unavailable for comment.

Williams College Museum Director Thomas Krens, who was involved in bringing Aycock to Williams, noted, "We selected a location on College property that was unused at that time—but we neither received nor requested from the administration or the Department of Buildings and Grounds assurances that the piece could be kept in perpetuity."

Art Department's fault

"I feel badly about the piece if it is of some significance," said Wassenar, "but the fault lies with the Art Department. They should have written a memo, or identified the piece with a plaque nearby. I don't think they were very responsible in maintaining it. A casual phone call doesn't show the importance they now say it has."

Wassenar's memo to the Art Department outlining ways that any other art like the Aycock might be protected suggests that works be clearly identified with signs or protected with fencing, and the Buildings and Grounds should be notified in writing.

Art professor Epping agreed that an inventory of works and their location on campus would have prevented the destruction of the Aycock, but sees the demolition as part of a larger problem. "They asked the right questions: What is it? Why is it here?" said Epping. "They asked all of the same things students ask about it. That questioning is central to the education that goes on here. I use the sculpture every year as a teaching tool and we discuss those questions. The sculpture asks those questions."

Larger questions

"If we decide that it's not functional then what do we do? Do we as a culture destroy things that we don't understand? It's a comment when we do," said Epping. "There's a larger issue that if something appears insignificant to me, do I have the authority to tear it down?"

"It shouldn't have been destroyed," said Johnson. "I think they should have checked farther than they checked, but it's impossible to blame one person."

Hallin said other media concerns, such as the current human rights perspective, came about from journalistic doubts about the administration.

Violence exaggerated

The media's exaggeration of violence grew out of journalists tending to present the crisis as irrational and barbaric, he said. In this way the journalist are challenging the predominant "fortress America" ideal in which the United States feels its duty is to bring civilization to the "barbaric world," he explained.

Hallin concluded by noting that although American coverage of the situation in Central America is an object of criticism, it is better than before. In the past, he said, the only way a Central American country could merit American coverage was by "coups, communism or catastrophes."

Author praises chicken kickers

Michael Mooney, editor of Harper's magazine, gave a humorous lecture last Monday on why writers must also be storytellers, saying "the writer's instinct is to notice not what someone said, but whether or not the person is a chicken kicker."

He explained by recounting his experience as a speech writer on President Lyndon Johnson's campaign. Mooney said he spent much of his time sitting on a train listening to Johnson make the same speech again and again to Southern railway station crowds.

In one particular town, Mooney said, Mrs. Johnson was presented with a chicken by two local children. She accepted the chicken graciously and held it while waving as the train left the station. As soon as the train was out of the crowd's sight, Mooney watched Mrs. Johnson drop-kick the chicken forty yards into the woods.

"I began to wonder about the Johnsons," he said. "Writers write down when someone kicks a chicken," he explained. "I collect notebooks full of chicken kickers. Know why? I like chicken kickers. You have to practice to kick a chicken."

Zeppelin had good lines

Mooney said he considers himself primarily a storyteller, but acknowledged he is a successful writer. He is the author of eight books translated into 22 languages. His book The Hindenburg was made into a movie starring George C. Scott.

"The film was horrible. The Zeppelin had all the lines," Mooney said.

Aside from storytelling, Mooney addressed the economic concerns of today's aspiring writer. He said it is possible to make money as a writer, but that success involves years of practice and a "love of craft."

Mooney sees poor writing skills and inadequate knowledge of mechanics as the greatest problem facing today's writer.

"Thirty out of 31 manuscripts written are by people who don't know the basic skills," he said.

Mooney also discussed the role of the writer, saying "the writer's task is to put into story form the sense that the community has of its own memory. I copy down the world as I see it, in paragraphs, one by one. I know nothing about the goddamn truth. I just write what I see."

Endowment growth will not affect tuition, faculty hiring

by R. DeMott

The College will not immediately cash in on the windfall it enjoyed when the value of its endowment increased by 50 percent this summer to $163 million, said Vice-President and Treasurer William Reed. He said the increase will not be used to lower tuition.

"This dramatic increase [in the College's endowment] isn't going to make a dramatic change in the College tomorrow, next week, next month, or next year," Reed said. "Only if it continues this way over the long term will we consider changing our spending policies."

Reed cited the unpredictability of the stock market as a reason to be cautious, and said the College has a responsibility to its donors not to take risks fiscally. He explained that Williams hasn't changed its spending policy during very bad years and won't change it during one very good one either.

Reed noted that the rate of increase in the tuition, which is $11,600 for the current 1983-84 academic year, has been above the national consumer price index (CPI) for the past several years. He said this is because Williams uses the Higher Education Price Index to determine the tuition. According to Reed, this rate has been above the CPI for the past several years and therefore tuition increases have also been above the inflation rate.

Five to six percent
"I would expect an increase of between five and six percent," Reed predicted for next year's tuition.

The Trustees' Finance Committee will meet in December to discuss any new matters which should be funded by the endowment, but Reed said there will be no major new projects in the physical plant or in faculty hiring. The most critical projects, such as the construction of the new gym, are already accounted for in the College budget and there is no need to take money from the endowment to cover them, Reed said. "We will not add superfluous things just because we have money," he said.

Every year Williams increases the amount of money it takes out of endowment and puts into general operating expenses by nine percent, Reed said. He said this year that amounts to $5.7 million. "The most they [the Trustees] will add at the December meeting would be an extra half to one million dollars" for incidental expenses which may arise, he said.

College Treasurer Will Reed explains why tuition will continue to rise despite the recent 50 percent increase in the College's endowment.

College plans construction of Spring Street building

by Stuart Smith and Joe Ehlers

The College has approved final plans for the new commercial office building which the College will build at the south end of Spring Street. Contractors are scheduled to submit bids on the project during the third week of November.

"If the weather holds, construction should be able to begin by December 1," said William Kirby, the Williamstown architect who designed the building. "If we can hold to that timetable, the building should be finished and ready for occupancy by late spring."

Winthrop Wassenar, Director of Physical Plant for the College, noted that whether or not construction can begin this winter obviously depends on the weather, but the College certainly is going to try. "It's just going to be a waiting game," he said.

"The building will contain five stores and a bank on the ground floor, and four offices on the second floor," Kirby explained. Goodman's Jewellers, which is being displaced by construction of the new gym, and Salvatore's, the Travel Store and the Berkshire Bank, will all move into the new building.

An unfinished parking lot has already been built behind the building site to provide parking for construction workers and a work area for the contractor. The lot will be paved and finished next spring when the building is completed, Kirby said.

"Common wall"

The Williams News Room,

which is also being forced out by the new gym, will rent Salvatore's present space. Billy Paradise, owner of the News Room, said the move will give him twice as much space. "It shouldn't hurt business at all," he said.

The retail space which the College is building on Spring Street "will be separate but immediately adjacent" to the gym, Wassenar said. "They will share a common wall, but they are physically connected only by a break in the wall on the second floor," he said.

Because of this, he added, "there is a lot of flexibility in the building process. It probably makes more sense to tear down the existing stores and build the new ones after the new pool and gym have already been built."

groups, the Dartmouth Aires, whose songs ranged from "I'm a Son-of-a-Gun for Beer" to "Tainted Love" and the overture to "The Barber of Seville", and the New Hampshire Notables (from the University of New Hampshire), who opened their set with the Andrew Sisters' classic "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy."

The capacity-crowd audience supported all the groups with tremendous applause and laughter (at the jokes that is); Octet member Andy McElfresh '85 described the audience as being "really fired up."

Whether singing or hamming it up on stage, the Octet projected tremendous enthusiasm throughout the show. "We try to convey to the audience that we're up there having a good time," Walker affirmed.

"Fine singing group"

Although the individual members are very different, the unity of the Octet as a performing group is a necessary priority. Costantino pointed out that to achieve cohesiveness within the Octet, members "have to submerge a little of their personalities in order to make the group work."

The result, he continued, is that the Octet is "a damn fine singing group." The members of the Octet, in addition to Costantino, Goforth, McElfresh and Walker, are: Paul Boocock '86, Bruce Daniels '85, Bill Galloway '84, Rich Miller '86 and Peter Pokrant '85.

Golf

Junior Mike Hennigan and sophomore Ellenore Knight captured the Williams College Golf Championship titles this past week at the Taconic Golf Club. Both players recorded scores of 68 in the final round of the match play event.

Hennigan, the number one player on the golf team, topped senior co-captain Eric Boyden in the final round after beating Bill McClements '85 and Timmy McKone '87 in the quarter and semifinals, respectively. Boyden reached the finals with a dramatic victory over Chris Harned '85 in the semifinals.

Hennigan's three-under-par round missed tying the course record by just one shot, and was the first round under 70 in his career.

Knight's victory capped a rapid rise to glory, as she has only played golf for a year and a half, according to Golf Coach Rudy Goff.

Skiing

The Nordic and Alpine ski teams won the Rossignol Nordica soccer tournament held at Middlebury October 30.

Williams, 3-0-1 in the eight-team tournament, defeated Middlebury 1-0 in the finals to gain the victory. Earlier, they beat Whiteface School 2-0, tied Dartmouth 0-0, and crushed Killington 10-0.

Ned Jeffries '85 garnered the shutouts in net for the Ephs. John Pier '85 scored seven goals, Crawford Lyons '84 had five, and Eric Russell '84, Steve Johansen '84 and Morten Moehs '86 also tallied for Williams.

"Now we don't have to worry about the ski season," said Pier, "because whatever happens we're still the soccer champs."

B's Complete Rout

The B-side came in to finish off the hapless team from Vassar. Mark Tompkins '87 scored a try around the end and Roger Merriam '86 converted to put the Ephs up 15-0.

Williams was in the Vassar zone most of the half, thanks to the fine play of standoff Matt Salisbury '87. Salisbury scored Williams' final points on a 25 yard run after breaking several tackles.

Williams' next opponent is Amherst. The game will be played on Cole Field Saturday morning at 11:00.

quick scores. Barringer caught a 44-yard pass at 3:22 of the third quarter; and halfback Mike Giliberto dove in from one yard out at 13:55 of the fourth.

Ephs to airwaves

As the Ephs have done all year, when the going got tough, they went to the airwaves. Williams drove with the short pass, utilizing Hummon and tight end Paul Coleman '85. Connolly tossed scoring passes to Crotty and receiver John McCarthy '84 within the game's last four minutes, setting the stage for another Williams come-from-behind miracle finish.

However, Wesleyan, due after last year's 27-24 last-second defeat, iced the game with a 62-yard Barringer reception at 2:26 of the fourth quarter; between the McCarthy and Crotty touchdowns.

Gridders lose on road again: Cardinals fly to 32-27 win

by Paul Meeks

The football team's travelling nightmare continues: weak pass defense, fumbles, penalties and generally sloppy play squashed Williams' hopes of sole possession of the Little Three Crown in 1983, as Wesleyan defeated Williams 32-27 in Middletown Saturday.

In the friendly confines of Weston Field the Ephs are undefeated at 2-0-1, but are a miserable 0-4 on the road.

Ironically, the Eph offense moved the ball on the Cardinals easily, but costly fumbles, mental errors and poor officiating halted key drives. Williams dominated possession: 20 first downs to Wesleyan's 12 and 81 total plays for 412 yards to 56 for 353 yards for the Cardinals.

Wesleyan's stellar split end

Bob Barringer was a thorn in the Ephs' side all day. He caught six passes for 253 yards (of the team's 353 total) and three touchdowns. The Cardinals rarely wasted time driving the ball downfield, looking for Barringer early and often for big plays.

Williams strikes first

After a scoreless first quarter, Eph fullback Ted Thomas '85 plunged over from the one yard line at 11:34 in the second period, with Chris Chapman's conversion making the score 7-0.

But with 2:44 remaining before halftime, Barringer pulled in a spiral from quarterback Dan Ross and raced 85 yards to paydirt. The conversion was blocked by Eph rover

Jack McGonagle '84; so Williams led 7-6 at the intermission.

Williams upped its lead to 14-6 at 6:16 in the third period on a 21-yard touchdown jaunt by Sean Crotty '84 and a Chapman conversion.

Bad bounces

The resulting kickoff epitomized the bad breaks Williams received all day. Dick Hollington '86 jarred the ball loose in tackling the Cardinal returner, only to have it fumbled to Wesleyan linebacker Joel Finnegan, who ran 61 yards for a touchdown. But Ross was sacked on a two-point conversion attempt to tally the score at 14-12 Williams.

The tide turned at this point, and Wesleyan rattled off two

Ruggers win one; Men beat Vassar tie Tufts/M.I.T. as sides combine

The women's rugby team beat Wheaton 14-0 and then tied M.I.T./Tufts 0-0 to bring their record to 5-1-2 Saturday.

Despite poor officiating and two injuries, the women ruggers had no trouble dismembering the sloppy Wheaton team. Scrum half Stephanie Jacon '87 scored the first try on a five-yard run from a penalty early in the first half. Liz Gardner '87 made the conversion to put Williams up 6-0 at halftime.

The second half was characterized by long easy runs by scrummies Allison Martin '85 and Sara Harkness '85 and beautifully set rucks by the Williams scrum. Sunica "Sunny" Edelstien ran in a try from a ruck on the Tufts five yard line early in the second half and scored again on a diagonal run from ten yards out late in the game.

Hefty ruggers

Fifteen minutes after the Wheaton game the tired Williams team faced a large tough club composed of hefty ruggers from both MIT and Tufts. Sarah Keohane '84, Sarah Murphy '86, and Franny Greenleaf '87 added new life to the scrum but in spite of a few close line-outs, Williams remained unable to score.

The second half revealed the Williams defense, as most of the period was played behind the Williams 22. Tough scrumdowns, great kicking by fullback Gardner, consistent tackling by the entire line, and a single-handed, body-sacrificing effort by hooker Diana Roberto '86 to prevent the ball from being touched down in the try-zone saved the tie.

On Homecoming Saturday the team plans to Beat Amherst in their final game, at 11:00 on Poker Flats.

by Tom Dumphy

The Williams Rugby Club continued its fine season with a 19-0 drubbing of Vassar on Cole Field last Saturday. Due to the last minute cancellation by the scheduled opponent, Vermont Law, Williams was forced to play all sides against one Vassar side. Each side played one half with the C-side half not counting toward the final score.

A's start fast 9-0

In the opening minute of play Williams took the ball deep into the Vassar zone on a long jaunt by senior co-captain Hugh Huizenga. Bob Aulsebrook '85 scored three points on a penalty kick soon after that and Williams had all it needed.

After spending most of the half in the Vassar zone only a few yards from scoring, Williams scored a try by Ken Deveaux '85. Aulsebrook converted the try to put Williams up 9-0 at the half. Mike Kolster '85 and Edmund O'Toole '86 kept Vassar

Booters tie Wesleyan; face Jeffs tomorrow

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

The men's soccer team played a tough game which ended 1-1 at Wesleyan Saturday. The Ephmen missed two or three good scoring opportunities early in the game. Coach Michael Russo said, "We should have won, but were not able to capitalize on their mistakes."

Offensively Williams started strong, scoring first. John Campbell '84 assisted Paul Williamson '86 on a pretty goal at 14:28 in the first period.

Wesleyan responded with a tough offensive drive towards the end of the first period. At 34:50, Isaac Shongwug chipped a 20-yard shot over Williams goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 to tie the score.

The remainder of the game was fairly even. Williams finished with 22 shots, 10 of which were on goal, as opposed to Wesleyan's 20 shots, with only 4 on goal.

Williams was playing without strong defenseman Mark Schroeder '86, who is out for the remainder of the season and the playoffs. Jamie Kornbluh '84 played well as his replacement.

Smash Siena

Last Tuesday the Ephmen beat Siena 3-0 in a sloppily-played and poorly-officiated game at Cole Field.

"We played well enough to win," said Russo, "but we didn't take advantage of all our opportunities."

Williams was clearly the superior team, outshooting Siena 31-8 and having 13 corner kicks to Siena's one. The Siena goalie was forced to make 21 saves, while Murphy needed just three.

Eph scoring

The Ephmen scored twice in the first half. At 14:50, Williamson put in a header off an assist from Schroeder. Six minutes later, Clark Otley '86 netted a goal with an assist from Campbell.

Nine and a half minutes into the second half, Campbell finished the scoring for the Ephmen.

The referees did not have good control of the game, and when they tried to take control, it was often controversial: Siena's Joe Ganzillo was ejected from the game merely for yelling after being tripped. Fortunately, the officiating was not a factor, due to the fact that the Ephs dominated so completely.

Playoffs look good

NESCAC (the New England Small College Athletic Conference) will have its own playoff for the first time this year. Four of the eleven NESCAC schools will be invited.

With their 8-2-3 record, Williams is looking good going into the playoffs.

The Ephmen, seeded second, will play third-seed Amherst (6-2-3) tomorrow at 2:00 at Cole Field, while Colby travels to top seed Middlebury (8-1-4). The finals will be at the higher seed on Sunday at 1:00.

Runners 27th in N.E.; place sixth in IC4A's

by Chris Stearns

This past Saturday the men's cross country team traveled to Franklin Park in Boston where they fared 27th overall in the New England. It was a decent showing since Coach Peter Farwell elected not to send his top seven runners.

Kevin Jenkins '85, who covered the five mile course in 26:42 to finish 135th overall, paced the Ephrunners. Next to cross the line for Williams in 173rd place was Chris Pasko '87 in 27:33, followed closely by the rest of the squad. Tom Fitzgibbon, ten seconds behind, finished 177th, beating out teammate and fellow freshman Dave Grossman (179th in 27:45). The final runner for the Ephs was John Fisher '87, who finished 185th in 27:45.

Farwell said, "We did as expected since we weren't running our top guys. Kevin ran real well in a field of over 200. The varsity was all freshman except for Kevin and they all ran well; since they were under a little bit of pressure."

The J.V.'s also ran with composure as Todd Sandel '86 led them in 28:24 to finish 95th overall. He was closely followed by Ephmates Jeff Cox '85, 103rd, Tim Pittman '86, 105th, and Mark Gilrain '87, 107th, all near 28:50. Setting his personal record for the course in his last race as an Eph was senior Jeff Brainard in 29:50 to finish 114th.

Sixth in IC4A's

Last Tuesday the varsity ran out at Franklin Park in the prestigious IC4A's and wound up in sixth place overall.

Leading the Ephs again was Co-captain John Nelson '84 who cruised to 17th place overall in a fast 24:52. Next was John Ellison '86 in high gear at 25:19 to finish 35th. Following closely were Co-captain Bo Parker '84, 44th, Brian Angle '84, 54th, and Co-captain Bennett Yort '84 in 77th. Wrapping up things for the Purple Wave were Mike Coyne '87, 94th, and Tom Pingree '86 in 95th place.

Commented Farwell, "We did as well as we could do. The five teams ahead of us were well ahead but we deserved to beat the teams close behind us."

Looking forward to this upcoming Saturday's Division III's when one of the most important meets of the season will take place, Farwell said "We're hoping for better times and that we'll have everybody in one big pack. We are ready and John Nelson could qualify for nationals with most of the other members of the varsity with at least an outside shot."

College may ban Chapin Hall rock concerts to avoid damage

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

The College is considering prohibiting the Student Activities Board from holding any more rock concerts in Chapin Hall. It says the audiences at recent concerts have damaged the auditorium and have behaved badly. Future concerts may be held in the Towne Field House.

According to Professor of Music Douglas B. Moore, the problem has arisen over several years, not from one concert only. He estimated that one out of three rock concerts causes some kind of damage to the building.

About 25 seats were damaged at the recent Marshall Crenshaw concert, Moore said. He said the chairs were damaged when people sat on the backs of them, thus fracturing wooden crossbars at the top.

Moore said the broken chairs will have to be shipped back for repair to the Michigan company that manufactured them, at a cost of about $100 each. It is possible that the colors of the repaired seats will not match the originals in Chapin because the repairers may have to use different upholstery, he added.

"I'm also aware of the existence of fires being set in the aisles, and drinks being smuggled past security," Moore said.

"Takes its toll"

Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said he knew of audience members "cutting seats, burning seats and spreading trash or broken bottles on the floor...Chapin has very delicate furniture and was not made for rugged use," he said. "All of that takes its toll in that kind of facility."

"We spent a fair amount of money to get Chapin in shape three years ago, and it's discouraging to see it go downhill," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

"I can see their point," said Arunas Gudaitas '84, chairman of the Student Activities Board, which sponsors the concerts. "The damage is real. But it would be a shame if pop concerts were taken out of Chapin. And I don't think that amount of damage will be repeated.

"There was some confusion between ourselves [SAB] and security as to whether people would be allowed to move in the aisles" at the Crenshaw concert, Gudaitas explained. As a result there was dancing there, including on the chairs, he said. Usually, dancing is not allowed at all.

Gudaitas also said that the damages Moore referred to have happened over a ten-year period, and that there hasn't been a fire in an aisle in at least four years.

"Non-Williams people"

O'Connor said he thinks the damage is caused because "a lot of non-Williams people come who don't care about the College at all. Of course the SAB says it has to admit non-students so it can fill the place and minimize its losses.

"One solution would be to stick the SAB with the damages," O'Connor said, but Chisholm hopeful for Jackson's candidacy

by Daniel T. Keating

Former U.S. congresswoman Shirley Chisholm predicted last Tuesday that "blacks and women are a political MX, capable in 1984" of making Jesse Jackson an important force in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Chisholm told an audience of 300 in Chapin Hall that Jackson's recent declaration reflects the rising political motivation of black people in this country, which she said is at an all-time high. She called Jackson's candidacy a continuation of what she began in 1972 when she was the first black and the first woman to run for president.

"Jackson's candidacy is not gonna make him president," she said. "We know that. If he can go to the Democratic Convention with 250 delegates, he will be a force to be reckoned with. Any white male that wants to be president will have to deal with Jackson."

If he has as many as 300 delegates, Jackson could be a vice presidential candidate, Chisholm said. She added she would have two roles in the Jackson candidacy: as a worker to gather women voters for Jackson and as a press spokesperson. Jackson's candidacy shows the inherent racism in this country, Chisholm said. White candidates have always counted on black support, she said, but a black candidate cannot expect any white support. She said Americans get caught up in words about equality, but they do not practice what they preach.

Chisholm stressed the importance of women joining with blacks to fight for progress.

"True equality is not yet an everyday reality for women and blacks in America," she said. The two groups have been able to wring some concessions from the white males in power, she explained, but they have done it separately as either blacks or women.

Chisholm said policies will not change until the minorities are represented in government, because items do not receive high priority until they are backed by specific advocates who also have the power to act.

"The bad old days are past, but the conservatives want to pry the lid off the coffin [of inequality]," she said. "We have come too far to be danced backwards into what others consider our place."

Shirley Chisholm, former New York Congresswoman, told a Williams audience Tuesday that Jesse Jackson will be a force to be reckoned with in the 1984 presidential election. (Ruderman)

ACSR winds down review, approves Goodyear, GM

by Sarah Abernathy

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility gave a general approval to the South African business practices of Goodyear and General Motors, but found Exxon's less acceptable, in its meeting last Monday.

The ACSR has been reviewing 24 companies in its portfolio concerning their employment, expansion and selling policies in South Africa. It sent out a questionnaire this summer to these companies and has sent out other letters since then to further clarify several of the companies' policies.

According to ACSR chairman and economics professor Stephen Lewis, the 24 companies include all the portfolio companies now operating in South Africa. The ACSR is still waiting to hear from three companies—Tenneco, Motorola and Echlin, an automotive parts supply company. If the three respond by the time the ACSR next meets, on Nov. 28, the South African review process will be essentially finished.

However, Lewis noted that the ACSR will still be responsible for evaluating the practices of new companies as they are added to the College portfolio, and will continue to correspond with companies which have not yet given a satisfactory response.

Arthur Little report

Lewis also said the ACSR will have to review the latest Arthur D. Little Co. report, which ranks how well American companies comply with the Sullivan Principles. Arthur D. Little is an international consulting firm and the Sullivan Principles are a set of guidelines which stipulate fair employment practices for companies operating in South Africa.

The Williams Record

Rock on

Although there are some problems with rock concerts in Chapin Hall, the current alternatives make improving Chapin concerts a better solution than banning them. Chapin is a valuable and delicate building, but the damage cited by the College could be remedied with better solutions than moving concerts to unsuitable sites.

The impetus for the ban arose from damage to 25 seats at the Marshall Crenshaw concert. But that concert was exceptional, and should not be used to formulate policy. A misunderstanding between the Student Activities Board and security led to a breakdown of decorum. Most concerts do not have any damage.

Music professor Douglas B. Moore said that damage happens at one out of three concerts. That ratio does not lead to the conclusion that all concerts should be banned from Chapin. As anyone who has attended rock concerts here would know, Williams fans are remarkably well-behaved. Given a choice between better behavior and stricter enforcement of rules in Chapin, or moving to undesirable sites, students would be likely to reduce damage even more.

If non-College fans are pinpointed as the source of the problem, prices for non-Williams students could be raised to reduce the number of outsiders and help cover costs. Additional security and expulsion could also be used to reduce damage.

The reason measures should be taken to improve the conditions in Chapin is that the alternatives are not good. The Towne Field House is the most common site mentioned, but it has several flaws. The tartan floor is easily damaged. With plans to put a new surface down in the near future, the floor would be a major problem during rock concerts.

The field house has a number of other problems. Renovations to improve the poor acoustics, if feasible, could be bulky and expensive. Because the field house is so large, bands may feel like they are playing in an empty hall, inhibiting performances. The flat structure of the building also makes it hard for people behind the front row to see the band. Other problems with the field house include the displacement of athletic teams and the labor cost of setting up and removing chairs and floor covering. Creating labor costs to save damage costs is not a solution.

Another alternative site is the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink, but the ice is down before Homecoming and all through the winter. The acoustics in that building, which resembles an airplane hanger, are also dubious.

Damage to Chapin Hall is not acceptable. If future destruction cannot be controlled or viable alternatives arise, such as the basketball court in the new gymnasium, a switch might be wise. But throwing rock concerts out of Chapin, largely because of one bad experience, would be a mistake.

Grow up

To those few irresponsible people attending parties in Mission Park:

Congratulations on making life in the Park very unpleasant for the many people who live there. Tipping over the Coke machines, uprooting the water fountain, throwing half-full cups of beer and pulling fire alarms is too much. Stay in your own rooms or just grow up.

Rare thought

To the editor:

Your editorial, "Rest in piece" (Nov. 8), included the line "we should make an effort to learn from art in a broader context than pleasure and entertainment." That's a rare thought on this campus, and I commend you. Williams, for years a Berkshire Institution of Social Sciences with an extended fringe of popular culture, could do with a little examination of the mysteries, hopes, greatness of the artistic experience. I hope someone listens.

Gargoyle

To the editor:

The members of Gargoyle would like to inform the campus of the issues we are discussing. Below is a list of issues discussed by this year's members and any proposals that we formulated in response to these issues. We would appreciate campus ideas, opinions, and suggestions.

Our discussions thus far fit under two general categories: 1) Center for Developmental Economics contact with campus, and 2) Freshman life.

In efforts to better integrate the experiences and activities of undergraduate students with those of graduate students at the CDE, Gargoyle proposed that a regular campus mail (calendars, etc.) be sent to the CDE, and (in conjunction with the Housing Committee) that CDE students be affiliated with upperclass houses. Both proposals are being carried out.

Many ideas with regard to Freshman life have been tossed around this year. Two ideas—J.A. training and course advising by students for students—had already been taken on by 10 to 1.

We began discussion of freshman life by discussing the possibility of fully integrated freshman/upperclass housing. No proposal was made to this end, but the discussion led eventually to a different proposal worked out in coordination with Housing Committee President Phil Walsh.

In this plan small groups of freshmen (grouped by suite or floor) from different parts of the campus could be brought together in affiliation with an upperclass house, attending snacks, parties and other events. The plan would facilitate better interaction between freshmen and upperclass students as well as bringing together freshmen from different parts of campus. The Housing Committee is working out the details of the plan.

One topic currently under discussion is the easing of course load pressure. Some ideas include: a drop option after nine weeks for all courses, and a Pass/Fail option for one of four courses only for first-semester freshmen.

We welcome suggestions.

Much ado

To the editor:

Regarding Buildings and Grounds removal last summer of the mound in Denison Park, which unbeknownst to them was art work (unlabelled, built ten years ago): the bulldozing of the mound was certainly unfortunate, and Ms. Aycock, the sculptor, has my sincere sympathy.

Similarly, however, I could stand a pencil on end on my dormitory stairs and call it "Rocket X-29," but, unlabelled, it would surely be picked up by my faithful custodian, doing his job. The site of the mound is now the site of a third, much-needed storage building; it is not as though B&G intentionally destroyed a piece of art. Thus do I feel that any complaints to the fine Department of Buildings and Grounds of this College are entirely unjustified, especially since no written record of the piece was ever received.

The superb job done year-round by the Department's staffs, I think, often overlooked. When the Groundsmen are out removing snow in the middle of a frigid February night this winter, I will be reminded that many here owe much to the few of the B&G staff.

Edward Coakley '85

P.S.: Or perhaps the mound really was being used as a fallout shelter by the campus's ubiquitous squirrels, who are in fact Communist Agents, planted here by the Party decades ago, to gradually infiltrate the College...

Woyzeck opens in Downstage to sell-out audience

by Justin Johnson

The Williamstheatre production of Woyzeck, Georg Buchner's avant-garde relic, demands first-hand viewing. You've got to see it to believe it.

Playing on the Downstage Nov. 17 through 19, Woyzeck is a relentless compilation of dramatic fragments.

Buchner, a vehement opponent of romanticism, religion and assorted palliatives for the soul, wrote this piece around 1830, never really finished it and dropped dead before anyone could accuse him of thematic overkill.

He did not develop his view of man as a product of civilization so much as posit it. Culture is unnatural. Love is a ruse. Virtue is a luxury. Woyzeck is a tirade.

It's about a man with few illusions, although as played by Marc Wolf, Woyzeck is manically deluded. Woyzeck is a self-acknowledged victim of doctors who experiment on him, a military captain who moralizes at him and a culture which has raised him solely for slaughter. His woman Marie is a devout tart, and she's cheating on him with a beefcake Drum Major.

Eph housing has seen radical change

by Martin Hildebrand

During the 190 year history of Williams, student housing has grown from one building to approximately thirty buildings of various styles, shapes and sizes.

The first dorm on campus was West College, built without central heating or running water. Students had small coal heaters in their rooms and had to go to Spring Street for well water.

Four years later in 1797, East College was built on its present site. Like West, East at first did not have a well, but one was soon dug. East College burned to the ground in 1841 but was rebuilt almost immediately. South College was added next to East at this time also. South College was originally two-thirds as long as East but was expanded and is now Fayerweather.

In the middle years of the nineteenth century, students increasingly favored rooms in village homes. Although dorm rooms cost $4.50 to $6.00 a year in 1836 and $9.00 a year in 1866, 18 percent of the students in 1840 and 47 percent of the students in 1859 chose to move into more expensive rooming houses in town, where rent was from $20 to $50 a year.

Mark Hopkins, then President of the College, was concerned about this trend. He wrote in an 1852 letter, "The effect will be to raise the price of rooms in town... and drive away poor students."

Class distinctions

In 1900, there was a definite class distinction in dorm rooms. Rent varied from $8 to $112 a year. The College Catalogue for that year says: "The rooms in College [demolished since then], Jesup, and Morgan Halls are heated by steam and cared for by janitors. These rooms accommodate one hundred and forty students."

"In East, South, and West Colleges are accommodations for one hundred and ten students.

These rooms are heated by stoves and cared for by the occupants. ... Students receiving scholarships are expected to room in East, South, and West Colleges."

In the 1910's and 1920's, the Freshman Quad was built. The entry system had been planned from the start of construction; the architect's blueprint had the and $125 to live in a single.

Opinion about walkways through the Quad was as varied back then as it is now. Original plans were so complicated that they make a modern freeway off-ramp style look simple. These elaborate plans were eventually dropped and until this year, the Quad had only its two diagonal walks.

In 1900, there was a definite class distinction in dorm rooms. Rent varied from $8 to $112 a year.

labels "A" entry, "B" entry, etc.

The first portion built was Williams A through D. E, F and Sage were built later. When Sage was first occupied, there were 16 single suites, 25 doubles, and 14 triples. Prices varied between rooms. On the average, it cost $175 a year to live in a double, $150 to live in a triple,

Not only rooms and walkways but also board has varied drastically over the years. For example, the 1940 College Catalogue notes, "Students for the most part take their meals in the fraternity houses and in the Garfield Club [located in Currier]. Freshmen eat in the dining room at Currier Hall the first three days of Freshmen Week

Springstreeters' style charms Chapin crowd

by Ned Ladd

The Springstreeters began Homecoming Weekend on the right note by filling Chapin with rich a capella melody last Friday in their fall concert.

Joining the Springstreeters were Miscellania, a female group from Bowdoin, and the world-famous Boston Common barbershop quartet.

The Common delighted all with strong voices and perfect harmony in their renditions of barbershop favorites from the 1920's and 1930's. Their style was clean and unassuming on both melodic ballads and upbeat tunes. The audience treated them well with long and loud applause.

If Miscellania looked slightly unprofessional, it was probably because of the act they had to follow. However, they proved themselves on songs from Grease and a wonderful arrangement of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow."

When their somewhat questionable humor wore thin, they depended on tunes like "The Boy From New York City" to win over the audience.

The Springstreeters' set primarily featured solo singing and background vocals. The ever-present and somewhat traditional "Rawhide" was of course performed, and quite well. New songs such as "Recording Contract," mixing humor and music, showed a new maturity that older slapstick concerts lacked.

Only on-stage motion would have added to an otherwise good performance. Entertaining without forcing humor, the Springstreeters were received well by an enthusiastic audience.

Alumni joined the Springstreeters for "Just My Imagination" and provided comic relief. Stage antics, however, began to lose their humor after the third refrain, although the choreography provided relief from a visually static concert.

The Boston Common joined the Springstreeters for the final number, "From the First Hello to the Last Goodbye." The singing was excellent even though the Common members' voices stood out from the ensemble.

a peacetime complement of 800 to 870 men."

After the war, there were many veterans on campus. The March 1948 College Catalogue says, "The College has eleven dormitories, ordinarily accommodating about 530 students. During the present emergency, the dormitories have been rearranged to house 750." Even as recently as 1948, the room charge did not include light; a separate fee of $2.50 was paid for lighting.

Award-winning

In the past two decades, there has been considerable expansion of student housing. Prospect House, the Greylock Quad, Mission Park and Tyler Annex were all built during that period. In the early 1970's the building that used to be the Williams Inn became Dodd House, and in 1979, the Music Department's move from Currier to Bernhard Music Center allowed for more students to live in Currier.

Two of the projects won awards. Mission Park won a Progressive Architecture Design Citation in 1970. A follow-up article in 1973 said, "Seemingly to forget its size, they (the students) like most the privacy it gives, its intimacy, and its noninstitutional aspect," and "In the basically white building, entrances, stairways, and halls are color-keyed to help orient the students and to give individuality to each of the houses."

The Greylock Quad received an award of honor from the New England Regional Council of American Institutes of Architects.

Expansion and change in student housing is still taking place. Recent problems with housing students in Mission Park living rooms and proposals to increase the student body by 400 indicate that new housing will soon be necessary. Whatever form future housing takes, it will certainly continue a colorful Williams tradition.

CC decries drinking ban, seeks grant

by Eric Adelstein

College Council developed proposals for using a $1,000 grant and urged the College not to enforce the ban against drinking alcohol in the stands during athletic events, at its meeting last Thursday.

The College passed a proposal written by Council Vice-President Jan Van Eck '85 asking the College to reconsider enforcing the ban, and asking it to consult students before taking similar action in the future.

The Council also developed a number of proposals for using a new $1,000 grant to the College from the Isaac brothers, one of whom, Paul, was a member of the Williams class of '72. The Isaacs intend the grant to be used to fund an original project which the College would not normally fund.

The Council considered recommendations from a subcommittee that the money fund a student sculpture contest, with the prize money going towards the costs of material and construction, to help commemorate Williams' Year of the Arts.

Other proposals included a week-long celebration commemorating Ephraim Williams' birthday (including a student-faculty ball), or a Latin American week.

Rotating grant

The grant rotates annually among Williams, Bates and Alleghany Colleges, the alma maters of the three Isaacs, according to Russell Carpenter of the Development Office. This is the first time that Williams has been eligible for the grant, he said.

According to Carpenter, Alleghany College used its grant to fund a seminar on Far Eastern studies, while Bates sponsored a lecture by a former Nobel Peace Prize winner with its money.

Carpenter said he will meet with Council officers to select the final proposals, and hopes the options will be submitted to the Isaacs by Thanksgiving, when the Isaacs will choose which proposal to fund.

The Council may come up with a fourth proposal at its meeting this Thursday, according to Council President Tom Paper '84, but will take a final vote on its top three choices at that meeting.

In other Council business, the Council:

- announced the start of Tuesday student-faculty coffees in Stetson. The coffees, which began today, will be held each Tuesday from 1:30 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. in the Stetson faculty lounge.

- The Council also discussed the role of the Gargoyle Society on campus. Council members discussed last week's Germinal article on the allegedly elitist nature of the organization and its influence on certain of the administration's decisions. The Council came to no conclusion, but appointed a subcommittee to further look into the issue.

In its meeting the ACSR said Exxon's response was less acceptable than those of the other two because Exxon has no policy stating whether it will allow or prohibit company investment supporting the South African government. The ACSR asks for such a statement although it does not stipulate that certain goods cannot be sold to the government.

"They are doing a good job in employment," said College provost Neil Grabois. However, Lewis said "I wish they would say something explicit about their expansion policy."

Goodyear and GM were generally approved by the ACSR, which will send out letters commending their policies and telling the companies to continue the good work. "If companies are doing well, it is worth giving them some positive reinforcement," Lewis said. He said all the other satisfactory companies will receive such letters as well.

"Good guy"

"Goodyear is a good guy—it's following the Sullivan principles," said ACSR secretary and College Vice-President William Reed. However, the ACSR will ask Goodyear to "please adopt a non-expansion policy" in South Africa, Lewis said.

"GM says they are not going to expand unless they see a substantial improvement in relations [between blacks and whites in South Africa]," Lewis said. "We can't ask for more."

"There's not much one can complain about," said student representative and Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition member Navjeet Bal '84. GM says it has to deal with the government or close up shop, she added.

In discussing how the ACSR has been conducting the review, the members agreed that the criteria used to analyze companies cannot be so specific that they prohibit all sales to the South African government. The ACSR members could not agree on what level of business involvement and what kinds of products sold end up furthering apartheid policies.

Bal, history professor Jim Wood and student representative Sue Reilly '85, also a WAAC member, all admitted that their opinions on the proper amount of a company's government interaction were different from what was reasonable for the ACSR to demand.

No involvement?

"I have one set of beliefs saying we should not be involved at all," said Bal. "We should work for no sales to the government because the government is the means through which the system is perpetuated and supported."

"We don't want companies to sell to the government, but as long as they're following U.S. guidelines with only a few exceptions, they're OK," Reilly said.

"There are certain products you don't want sold," said Wood, such as weapons. However, many of the companies under ACSR review sell to the government only products that would generally be available, not specialized technology, Lewis said.

"We're not interested in hurting companies unless it will further our particular objective," Grabois added.

Reed said the questioning process is useful. "The best thing we're doing is our involvement in the process," he said. "In the long run, communication back and forth [with the companies] is the most effective method" for Williams to try to change the apartheid system, said Reed.

Report planned

Lewis said he is preparing a report of the Committee's findings this fall. The short report may be delivered to all college mailboxes in an attempt to enhance communication with faculty and students, Bal said.

"It is important that people know what we're doing—or what we're not doing, depending on how you look at it," Lewis said.

Women Ruggers

The women's rugby club ended their season on a fine note, triumphing over Amherst Saturday, 4-0. In a separate third half the women beat the Lady Jeffs, 8-0. The Ephwomens' final season record is 6-1-2.

Despite the low score, Amherst was clearly no match for Williams. Their lack of practice and experience was evident in scrum down, rucks and mauls as Williams pushed the Lady Jeffs down the field.

Sunica Edelstein '85 scored the single try on a long line-out throw by Allison Martin '85 to the standoff position. Edelstein hurled herself through the defense near the try line for the score, bringing her tally to an amazing 16 points for the season.

Despite the freezing temperatures, snow, and numb hands, Williams managed to hold onto the ball for the majority of the game. In contrast to Amherst's fumbling, the Ephwomens' play was coordinated.

Dorle Dewar '85, co-captain Meg Holliday '85 and Becky Haile demonstrated their confidence and skill in tackling and running in the line. Sarah Keohane '84, co-captain Laei Luedtke '84 and Sara Finnmore '87 outplayed the Amherst scrum.

The third half, not included in the final score, was played by the B-side. Mercedes Diaz '86 touched the ball down for her first try as a scrummi. Eileen Holland '87 made the second try on a magnificent 50-yard run down the sideline.

Amherst refused to bet shirts on the game.

Men Harriers

Senior co-captain John Nelson paced the cross-country team to a fifth place finish in the New England Division III qualifying meet on Saturday. His 25:50 run also enabled him to travel to the national championships next week.

The Ephs ran together and proved their mettle against stiff competition at Southeastern Massachusetts University in damp and blustering weather. The Ephs were led by Nelson, who finished 16th overall and grabbed the last qualifying spot for the nationals.

Top Ephrunners

Next to cross the line for the Ephs was senior Brian Angle who ran one of his finest races of the season, finishing 22nd in a blazing 25:57, seconds behind Nelson.

Coming in third for the Ephrunners was senior co-captain Bo Parker who ran the course in 26:00, 23rd place, despite nagging knee and hamstring injuries hampering his performance all year long. Thirty-sixth overall and fourth for the Ephs was John Ellison '86, clocked at 26:23; Mike Coyne '87 was right on his heels, two seconds behind, good for 49th place in the race.

Rounding out things for the Ephs in 65th place was co-captain Bennett Yort '84, who ran a fine 26:56, and Tom Pingree '86 who covered the distance in 27:23.

Coach's thoughts

After the race Coach Peter Farwell said, "It's great that John qualified since these past two years he has just missed. This year he came up with it, and he deserves it. Brian ran a real gutsy race, one of his best ever. We were beaten by Colby by just one point and that had to hurt, but we beat Bates which is what we set out to do, so I think I could say that we ran well."

When asked about the season in retrospect, Farwell said, "All in all it was a good season. I'd have to say the best since 1980 when we went undefeated. We didn't put together a perfect meet, but we didn't ever have a bad meet—everyone picked up for one another. We came through in NESAC's, IC4A's and Division III's. There was a great deal of unity and friendship on the team. However, we'll miss our top four seniors. They were the mainstay of the team for the past couple of years."

Next week Nelson will travel down to Virginia where he will run in the prestigious Division III National Championships, thus closing out the 1983 cross-country season.

Women Harriers

Anchored by the consistency of Amy Doherty '86 and by the outstanding efforts of three freshmen, the women harriers managed a creditable 14th place out of 20 teams in the New England Division III championships Saturday.

Coach Bud Fisher commented, "The highlight of the meet had to be the freshman ladies, who each landed a spot in the top 100. They (Cheryl Hall, Kate Pugh and Becky Conklin) should form a solid nucleus for the team in the upcoming season."

Individual performances

As she has done consistently this season, Doherty blazed to 38th place overall in a time of 19:40. Then came the swarm of freshman. Hall, in what Fisher called a "remarkable race", cruised through the finish line in 84th place with a time of 20:59. Pugh and Conklin sneaked into the top 100 at 96th and 99th with times of 21:05 and 21:42, respectively.

Faced with the adversity of running without senior captain Lynn Vendinello and junior Susan Baer, who have been among the leaders of the women's team all season, the ladies ran undaunted and concluded the season in style.

Season review

Reminiscing over the season, Coach Fisher remarked, "The team was plagued with key injuries for a good part of the season, but the ladies hung in there and ran well. I look forward to the team's chances next season. We will miss Lynn, whose superb running has led the squad for the entire year, but this race proved that the talent is there for the years to come."

Tom Goodspeed '86, filling in at quarterback for injured senior B.J. Connolly, sends a pass over the Amherst line in Saturday's 14-13 loss. (Lockwood)

Gridders upended in mudbowl

by Paul Meeks

The football team lost its bid for a three-way tie for the 1983 Little Three Championship with a 14-13 defeat at the hands of Amherst Saturday at Weston Field.

The Ephs ended the campaign with a disappointing 2-5-1 record that Head Coach Bob Odell described as "not indicative of how good this team really is."

With 35 seconds remaining, Williams down 14-13, Eph quarterback Tom Goodspeed '86, a third-stringer forced into the game due to injuries, threw one pass too many. The Ephs turned the ball over on Amherst's 20-yard line with an interception.

Williams was driving on the short pass to set up a game-winning field goal, after missing an earlier two-point conversion attempt in going for the win.

Jeffs strike first

After a scoreless first half, Amherst halfback Bob Minicus broke away for a 65-yard touchdown at 8:46 in the third quarter.

Williams sustained a drive for the first time in the game on their next possession and Goodspeed (7 for 18 for 84 yards, three interceptions, and one touchdown) tossed a scoring pass to a leaping Marc Hummon '84 from nine yards out at 5:20 of the third quarter. Chapman's conversion was good, knotting the score at seven.

The Ephs' rushing defense lapsed in the fourth period, when the Lord Jeffs put together a textbook drive capped by a three-year touchdown by wingback Bob Sokol. Again, Minicus cleared the uprights, putting Amherst ahead 14-7 at 8:46.

Goodspeed, gaining confidence and composure with every down, drove the Ephs from the 50-yard line to the goal-line, mixing short passes with dives by fullback Ted Thomas '85 (101 yards rushing in 18 attempts). Thomas set up his three-yard scoring plunge at 3:19 with a 32-yard jaunt.

Two point conversion

Williams' coaching staff decided to attempt a game-winning two-point conversion with just minutes remaining, with confidence in their defense to hold for the final three minutes.

Williams called a traditional play in which Hummon lines up wide right and feigns slipping to lose the cornerback and catch a short pass over the middle. The Amherst back was not fooled by the play, an old Williams favorite, and covered Hummon, forcing Goodspeed to find a secondary receiver. In the delayed confusion, Goodspeed was sacked from the backside.

With 3:19 remaining, the Ephs held and forced Amherst to punt to their 40-yard line. Williams had nearly two minutes to drive and set up a Chapman field goal for the gamewinner.

The Ephs moved the ball in scoring position with a crucial first-down catch by Hummon (five receptions for 73 yards). However, Williams was too greedy, throwing another long pass instead of running Thomas to set up the kick. Amherst intercepted Goodspeed to seal the win with 0:35 on the clock.

Injuries hurt

Quarterbacks B.J. Connolly '84 and Kevin Morris '86, one and two on the depth chart, both were sidelined after the Wesleyan clash.

Up front offensively, tackle Bernie Krause '84 was felled and replaced by Taylor Watts '87. Defensive end Greg Norton '86 and linebacker tri-captain Mike Hawkins '84 were also lost for Amherst, with Jim Franz '87 and Mike Coakley '85 filling in.

Williams graduates 20 seniors from their roster of 80 this year. Each of the seven seniors on offense played starting roles at one time during the season, as did nine of the 13 on defense.

Punter John Delorenzo (44 for 1765 yards, including a boot of 77) has led the New England Small College Athletic Conference again in 1983 and has been nominated for defensive player of the year.

Soccer tourney finalist, beats Amherst twice

by Greg Leeds and Mike Best

The men's soccer team ended an outstanding season on a depressing note Sunday as Middlebury defeated the Ephs 2-1 for the 1983 New England Small College Athletic Conference title.

Williams got to the finals by defeating Amherst at home Wednesday on penalty kicks after two overtimes still yielded a scoreless game. In between the two NESCAC games, the Ephs beat Amherst again 3-1 on Saturday.

From the start of Sunday's game, Middlebury came out strong, asserting themselves offensively. Panther Rick Makin put in the game's first goal on a steal at 13:29 of the first half.

Pretty play

The Ephs started an offensive drive in the second half, including a beautiful play by Clark Otley '86. Otley, while running below a long air ball towards the goal, turned his head and headed the ball behind him, then kicked a picturesque low corner shot. However, Panther goalkeeper Bart Lombardi made the save.

However, with 16:56 remaining, Otley tied the score with an assist from Jeff McEvoy '86. But the tie was short-lived: less than two minutes later Middlebury's Bill McFadden scored on a one-on-one which resulted from a defensive breakdown.

It was Williams' first loss in five games, a rather unfortunate ending to the most successful season in Williams history. Key players during the game were Denny Wright '87, Dan Aramini '84, Jon Deveaux '87, McEvoy and Otley. Doug McKenney '85, Mark Schroeder '86, and Paul Williamson '86 were all out with injuries for the Ephs.

Little Three crown

The Ephs were quick to grab the lead in Saturday's victory over Amherst which clinched the Little Three title. After Amherst missed a scoring opportunity three minutes into the game, the Ephs rushed down the field. A fine pass from John Austin '87 left Deveaux behind the defense, one-on-one with Jeff goalkeeper John Lawless. Deveaux calmly slid the ball into the right corner of the net.

At 13:35, Otley scored on a breakaway. After getting the ball from McKenney, Otley beat two Amherst defenders and broke toward the goal. He put a hard, low shot past Lawless to make the score 2-0.

Inside the penalty box, Helge Weiner '87 passed the ball to Wright, who put it in for the third goal at 15:45. Lawless had committed himself too early, and Wright rolled the ball by him.

Murphy's shutout bid was lost with only 2:16 left in the game, as a defensive breakdown left him alone facing four Lord Jeffs. He deflected the first shot, but the ball bounced right to Amherst forward Tom Cromwell, who scored.

Williams Coach Michael Russo, his voice filled with emotion, said afterward, "Everyone pulled together and played a super game. This is the greatest victory we've had since I've been here."

Beyond overtime

When Wednesday's game went through regular time and two overtime periods with the score remaining 0-0, it had to be decided by each team getting five penalty kicks.

Aramini, Welner, and John Campbell '84 all scored for Williams but were matched by Amherst scores. But after Deveaux scored, the Jeff shot went high and right of the goal. McEvoy scored the fifth Eph goal to clinch the game.

Williams ends the season at 10-3-3. Sunday's game was the last for seniors Aramini, Campbell, Jamie Kornbluh, Austin Lehr and Sullivan.

Men's rugby ties one, wins two

by Tom Dumphy

The Williams Rugby Club finished its season last Saturday against Amherst. The A-side tied the Jeffs 10-10 in a game that was still even after a period of sudden death overtime. The B-side rolled 13-3 over a larger and unjustifiably cocky Amherst squad. Rounding out the day, the C-side shut out a hapless band of Jeff C-siders 13-0.

A-side not satisfied

Williams survived the elements and the solid play of Amherst to come away with a 10-10 tie. Williams opened the scoring early in the first half when Ed O'Toole '86 and captain Hugh Hutzenga '84 worked a two-on-one perfectly, resulting in a try for Hutzenga. Roger Merriam '86 converted to make the score 6-0. Amherst scored because of Williams' sloppy play late in the half to make the score 6-4 at the half.

Williams was in control much of the second half but the Ephs couldn't convert their best scoring opportunity. Merriam was denied three points when the ball fell over just as he was making a penalty kick. The ball struck the crossbar, to Williams' dismay.

Amherst capitalized on Williams' sloppy play once again late in the second half to take a 10-6 lead. The Williams scrum came right back and scored on a great individual effort by prop John May '84. The score remained 10-10 until the end of regulation play.

The sudden death overtime went scoreless without any real scoring opportunities. The Williams defense was led by the inspired play of wing forwards Steve Zlotowski '84 and Blake Martin '84. Williams will have to wait until Spring before taking the shirts off the backs of the Infidels from Amherst.

Klein guides B's

Williams left no doubts in the B game as to who had the superior team. Williams rolled to a 13-0 lead before Amherst put a feeble three points on the board at the end of the game. Senior Drew Klein started the scoring with a try that was rightly contested by Amherst, but the four points held up.

Klein later added a penalty kick, another try and the conversion to account for all the Williams points. Playing admirably for the B's were standoff Matt Sallsbury '87, fullback Duncan Haas '85 and scrummies John Skavlem '84 and Tim Fasel '86.

C-side takes shirts

The C-side came away with a 13-0 victory over the boys of Amherst. The team was ably steered by Jeff May '85 who touched down Williams' first try. Chris Edwards '87 made the conversion to put the Ephs up 6-0. Edwards added a penalty kick to make the score 9-0 at the half.

With Williams firmly in control, Cole Thomson '86 put in the final points of the day. The big Texan rumbled over the try line from five yards out to guarantee the passing of Amherst shirts into the waiting hands of the Williams side.

Co-captain Joe Carey '84, in his final game as a Williams rugger, dives for a Jeff kicker in the A-side's 10-10 tie. B- and C-sides won Saturday. (Khakee)

Students rally at OCC, protest Marines on campus

by Daniel T. Keating

A group of 17 students last Tuesday protested the presence of two U.S. Marine Corps officers on campus to interview students and give information about their officer training program.

Although the protesters carried signs outside the Office of Career Counseling during a 12:30 p.m. demonstration, they did not disrupt the Marine Corps officers inside. However, the Marines cancelled plans for an information booth in Baxter Hall because of student temperament.

The Marines generally use the Baxter booth to distribute literature and attract students, said Master Sergeant Mark Morse of North Adams. This year, however, the College advised them simply to hold one-on-one interviews at the OCC, he said.

"We appreciate the College sensing the temperament of the student body," Morse said. "We don't want egg on anyone's face."

Student organizers Mark White '84 and Jeff Sultar '84 said the protest had two facets. According to Sultar, the Marine Corps should not be allowed to come to Williams because they discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

Sultar said a letter protesting the Marines being allowed to come to campus, signed by 60 students, was given to President John W. Chandler the day of the protest. He said the letter was sponsored by the Williams Coalition Against Militarism and the Central American Concerns Committee.

Sultar also said the students were protesting the way the Marines have been used, both recently and throughout history.

"These people [the Marine Corps officers] aren't evil," he said. "We're protesting what they're used for."

White and Sultar carried a sign which read "Grenada: Dress Rehearsal for Nicaragua?" The 17 students marched in front of Stetson Hall, then moved behind Stetson to the OCC entrance, where they marched for about five minutes.

Interviewing continued inside the OCC during the protest. Jack McGonagle '84, who passed the protest on his way to an interview with the Marines, said "I place no value in their protest. These are the same students who protest everything on campus. Last week, they wanted to impeach [President] Reagan."

Morse said he had never personally encountered an organized student protest in three years of campus recruiting in Connecticut, Rhode Island and Western Massachusetts.

"The latest action [in Grenada and Lebanon] has stimulated interest on both sides of the coin," he said.

Sultar and White went inside the OCC after the protest ended, but First Lieutenant Clarke Schiff told them that he and Morse were booked up until 2 p.m., when the planned to leave. Schiff told them that if they waited in the office, they might have an opportunity to speak with the officers.

College policy is that any organization that interviews at OCC is required to answer questions if student protesters demand to see them, said OCC director Fatma Kassamali. She said organizations understand this when they choose to come to Williams.

Seven students, all men, signed up to interview with the Marines, and several others dropped by to ask questions. Morse said the Marines typically do not get many students to apply from a college like Williams, but those who do are "exceptionally well qualified. They depict what fathers dream of and mothers are proud of," he said.

Broken power line browns out campus

by R. DeMott

A tree fell and broke a power line on North Street early last Tuesday morning, causing an electrical "brown out" which plunged several Williams dorms and numerous Williamstown residences into an eerie dimness for several hours until power was restored.

At approximately 1:30 a.m. Wednesday, a tree on North Street in the area of Simons Road fell on a 13,800 volt power line, said Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar. The broken wire crossed several other lines as it fell to the ground and caused a fuse to explode on a nearby pole, he said.

The explosion lit up the night sky over most of the campus. "It looked like there was a red pulse, followed by a blue pulse," said Chris Burton '84, a Dennett House resident. "It flashed for awhile. It lit up the sky because the clouds were low."

The fallen wire was live and lying in the street, so the Williamstown Fire Department was called out, and the Massachusetts Electric Co. was forced to shut down service on the line for about six hours. This left around 900 Williamstown customers with partial power for a time.

Three power sources

Wassenar said Mission Park, the Freshman Quad, most of the Row Houses and several administrative buildings lost partial power. He explained that the College is fed off of three separate power sources and only those areas operating off of the North Street line were affected.

The affected areas were quickly shut down by the College electricians in order to protect the College's equipment and to make it

39 students call for Reagan's resignation

by Christian Howlett

A resolution calling on Ronald Reagan to resign his presidency "due to the illegal invasion of Grenada" was passed 39-29 by a group of students at a College town meeting Sunday afternoon. There were four abstentions.

The motion which was originally proposed stated that "the students of Williams College" call for Reagan's resignation. A quorum of 100 students, needed to make the town meeting's vote representative of the entire student body, was not present, so the wording was changed to say that 39 Williams students support the resolution.

The College Council also noted in the Daily Advisor last Friday that the meeting would not officially represent the student body since it was not called by the Council.

The meeting opened with statements from Jeffrey Sultar '84 and Daniel Blatt '85. Sultar noted that seven members of the U.S. House of Representatives have asked Congress to impeach Reagan. He also called the Grenada invasion a violation of international law, of the Constitution and of the First Amendment.

"No longer represents" "The main reason behind asking for resignation is, as far as I'm concerned, whether he's done something worthy of impeachment or not Ronald Reagan and what he's done no longer represent what we want the United States to represent," said Sultar.

"We will not stand for any more invasions of sovereign nations," he said.

Blatt responded by saying that, according to foreign journalists, the majority of Grenadians supported the invasion and "the people of Grenada are much happier now than they were... If we ask President Reagan to resign, we are throwing it in the face of the praise of all those people."

Discussion following the remarks centered on whether the Americans in Grenada had actually been in danger, whether keeping out journalists had violated the First Amendment, and whether the invasion had broken international law.

The speakers were almost evenly divided in their opinion of the invasion and the resignation proposal.

"Moral authority"

"International law only has a sort of moral authority to follow it, not a legal authority," said Brett McDonnell '85. "There seems to be no way we can call for a resignation on the basis of

Speak for Yourself

Sunday's town meeting, and similar meetings last year, raise the question of who can and should speak for the entire student body. These meetings, or student assemblies, are a valuable asset to the community, but they need to be restructured before they can play so important a role in the student voice.

The required quorum of 100 students is small enough to allow a special interest group, with strong feelings but few adherents, to decide the official sentiment of the entire college. Certainly it would be impossible to attract all 2000 undergraduates to debate one issue—but it is equally wrong to suppose that a mere 100 can represent the entire campus.

Recent meetings have also diverged from the College Council constitution, which requires that student assemblies be organized and supervised by the Council's Information Committee. This qualification allows for more formal preparation and the incorporation of assembly decisions into the rest of the decision-making process. The constitution also provides that a Council vote or student referendum can overturn the assembly's decision, yet students seem unaware of their own veto power.

Town meetings can serve two beneficial functions. The first is to encourage debate on an issue of popular concern. Assemblies can serve this purpose well with any number of people.

The second is the expression of student opinion, and that should require a quorum. The quorum required should be high enough to demonstrate deep student feeling, but not so high that no meeting will ever attain a quorum. An assembly of at least 400 students would meet that criterion.

The constitution stipulates that there should be one student assembly per month. This rule has been generally ignored, and with good reason. It makes far more sense to call meetings only when student interest is high. The ability to call such meetings should lie with the Council, but a petition with 150 signatures, presented to the Council, should also generate an assembly. In either case, the meeting would need a quorum to represent campus opinion. Also, the Council should bear the responsibility for setting the agenda and choosing a moderator, duties it already has under the constitution.

Some of these proposals require changes in the Council constitution, which would entail a referendum. Referendums traditionally get little student response, and they require effort to initiate. The rewards, however, outweigh the costs. Speaking up now ensures that we can speak for ourselves later.

Dreaming

To the editor:

It would have been more considerate had the Record made a more determined effort to contact me regarding the ill-fated Aycock sculpture.

Professor Whitney Stoddard must have been dreaming, since he remembers a conversation with me which never took place. In fact, I have not discussed art work in any form with Whit. It is always easy to pass the onus onto someone else to get the monkey off one's back.

Tom Krens gave the correct version when he was quoted by the Record as saying, "...but we neither received nor requested from the Administration or the Department of Buildings and Grounds assurances that the piece could be kept in perpetuity."

Despicable

To the editor:

I am writing in response to items which appeared in The Daily Advisor Monday and Tuesday, Nov. 14 and 15, regarding the presence of recruiting officers of the United States Marine Corps at the Office of Career Counseling on Wednesday, Nov. 16.

As an American and a person who has had friends and relatives in the Marine Corps, one of whom was killed in action, I was extremely offended at these statements and felt obligated to respond publicly.

Since its founding, the purpose of the Marine Corps has been to protect American lives overseas; countless thousands have died with this in mind, selflessly giving of themselves for the sake of American lives and institutions. To attack the integrity of those currently serving and those who have served, and the memory of those who have died for their country, based merely on the fact that the Corps' present duty involves carrying out controversial White House military policies, is despicable and unfair.

A clause I found especially offensive read: "they wipe out non-white foreign governments." Not only is this untrue in that the Corps' function is purely military, not political, but the inclusion of the word "non-white" constitutes the worst kind of racism, in that while apparently advocating the cause of "non-white" groups, it injects an inflammatory race question where none exists. This type of preposterous and unfounded innuendo panders to racists, both white and black, and sadly tries to cause unnecessary friction between the races.

Finally, my response to the ridiculous generalization "The USMC makes a living of invading Third World nations" is to wonder how those Marines who fought and died in two World Wars, Korea, and other operations, or their families, might react to same.

Robert M. O'Connell '87

Thanks, but...

To the editor:

I would like to thank the College Council for its quick response to my letter in which I expressed concern over the biased rhetoric regarding the Marine Corps interviews on campus printed in The Daily Advisor of Nov. 14, 1983. I think the policy outlined in the Advisor of Nov. 18 will serve the student body very well and will work to alleviate the problems I have already delineated.

My only concern now centers around the section of the policy that states, "These slots can be filled by whatever is deemed appropriate...by The Daily Advisor." What criteria will be used to determine appropriateness? If only profanities will be disallowed, I still fear the presence of inappropriate items in the Advisor. I think it would be better to have extremely biased announcements delivered in an individual mailer rather than the Advisor, yet I understand that the Office Services and the Mailroom have made this an impossibility. Thus I laud the College Council for establishing a compromise for organizations that wish to reach the Williams student body. However, I again warn the Council of the dangers of such an open policy and suggest that more consideration be given to the question of how appropriateness will be determined. It seems to me that the present policy opens itself to, for example, the submission of racial slurs to the Advisor in the name of free speech. How will the College Council deal with this problem if it arises, for without a more formal policy, the Council will have no recourse but to snuff free speech in the name of their values. I recognize the difficulty in establishing a fair policy, but I think the College Council should consider the problems of the alternative.

Winter Study deadline stifles freedom of choice

by Jim Church
and Vernon Squires

The Winter Study Program "is intended to provide students and faculty with a dramatically different educational experience" in which students can "explore new fields at low risk...develop individual research projects, or work in a different milieu." So states the Williams College Bulletin. In reality, however, a significant number of students will not be studying what they wish to this January because they failed to submit "99" proposals prior to an October 15 deadline.

This deadline is intended to both facilitate the processing of 99 proposals and to force students to think about their projects long before they actually begin. But the deadline also illustrates an administrative rigidity which is contrary to the Winter Study spirit and ideology. Students who discover opportunities for January study after the deadline in October will be disappointed; the deadline serves as a brake to intellectual vigor and creativity. For this reason the policy of the Winter Study Committee must be made more amenable to worthy change.

The current policy is inadequate, as an example reveals. Jacquie Mitchell '86, a students had been abroad during Spring registration. Otherwise, regardless of circumstance, late 99s were rejected. Such a policy is not only excessively rigid, but it is contrary to Williams' avowed educational philosophy. In effect the WSC policy says that ingenuity after Oct. 15 is not worth consideration. Professor Greene admits that the present system discourages late ideas, because a decision is rendered irrespective of a proposal's merit.

"If someone comes to me on Nov. 5 with a great idea, I have to ask myself why he couldn't have done so on Oct. 5 or in the spring...Great ideas cannot always be accommodated," Greene explained.

The validity of the WSC's immutable stance on late 99s is worth scrutinizing. Why are exceptions so difficult to deal with? Granted, the administrative logistics of enrolling nearly 2000 students in a preference-ordered structure is taxing. Over-enrollment, under-enrollment, dropped courses and other problems strain the process. But the question of priorities remains. Can administrative efficiency legitimately preempt educational opportunity?

When the Winter Study Review Committee issued its report in April 1982, it course in order to pursue a 99, we may have lost a space that otherwise could have been given to another student as their first choice. It wouldn't be fair to the other student. And for sophomores and juniors, they could do the 99 the following year."

Nevertheless, Professor David Dethler, a member of the WSC, acknowledged that "the registrar only likes to run things once." Sarah McFarland, also a committee member, suggested that "some cut-off point had to be made."

Such an attitude is well-and-good for the persons who must process registration, but it is simply too inflexible. Extenuating circumstances that justify a late proposal are reduced to trivial status by the deadline. And new opportunities lose their opportunistic nature in a system where an unyielding deadline belies the "freedom of choice" at its foundation.

Because the system is still new it remains amenable to change. Dean Daniel O'Connor, who served on the Review Committee, explained the diffi-

...while a deadline is understandable, it should not be used as a bastion for defending bureaucratic efficiency...

Jamaican native, initiated a WSP 99 in which she would study the 1976 and 1980 presidential elections in her homeland. She formulated a plan, and received the necessary sponsorship and department head approval. When funding became a problem, her plan seemed infeasible, so she did not submit the proposal. Unexpectedly, funds became available soon after the deadline, so she quickly submitted her 99. The Winter Study Committee, however, informed her that the deadline prohibited their approval. Not surprisingly, Mitchell was upset.

Apparently Mitchell is not alone. According to Professor Fred Greene, Chairman of the WSC, some thirty students approached him claiming to have "opportunities of their lives" in the form of 99 proposals. The proposals were scotched almost universally, however, because allowing exceptions "messes up the registration process." Only two late 99s were allowed, and in both cases the recommended that the College "preserve...the variety of offerings and the freedom of choice that so many students and faculty single out as the most distinctive and admirable features of the January term." Indeed, these aspects of Winter Study (especially in 99s) serve as a vehicle for unique opportunity. Unfortunately for students, the opportunity must rear its head prior to Oct. 15; otherwise it overwhelms the computer. Chairman Greene admits that the administrative parameters are a thorn in the system.

"Late 99 proposals have gotten us into a lot of trouble with the registrative process," said Greene. "So we just say we cannot do it."

Greene also gave other reasons why new 99s cannot be accepted, explaining that a consistent and fair policy would not necessarily allow changes.

"You also have to view the change in the context of the whole system," said Greene. "If we let a student drop out of a culties of harmonizing structure and flexibility.

"No one wants a system that disavows the freedom of choice, but you must understand the process," declared O'Connor. When asked about the desirability of a committee to review late proposals, he added that "it seems reasonable."

Chairman Greene, too, cited the intricacies of the processing as a major hindrance to acceptance of late 99 proposals.

"We make the policy, and they [the Registrar's office] must execute it," noted Greene. "It takes time. If I call up with a late proposal, they say 'we cannot do it, the machine is already running.'"

Registrar personnel declined comment concerning their role, saying they were "too busy." Ironically enough, they were at the time processing new 99s for students who were not admitted to any of their selected four courses. In this situation, when a student finds himself with no WSP, the policy is relaxed, and the deadline no longer applies. Professor Greene explained that in this circumstance the administrative work is less formidable, because class size is not altered. Therefore, these late 99s do not poison the system.

What appears to be a decisive factor, then, is class size. Imagine telling a professor that he could expect to have thirty students in January, and then only twenty-five show up! From the bureaucratic standpoint, such an occurrence is intolerable. The possibility that five students might find more rewarding educational experience in a 99 is dismissed as bucking the system.

The system, with its intransigent policy, should be changed. The fundamental purpose for Williams College is education; while a deadline is understandable, it should not be used as a bastion for defending bureaucratic efficiency at the expense of valuable opportunity. Winter Study offers a unique chance to Williams undergraduates for exploring new ideas and curiosities. An arbitrary date must not prohibit such exploration.

Vernon Squires and James Church are sophomores at Williams College. Church recently submitted a 99 proposal past the deadline which was denied on that basis.

Sinister

To the editor:

It was satisfying to learn that the Gargoyles Society has placed the Center for Development Economics on the agenda of its concerns (Letters, Nov. 15). The Center is a peculiar institution. It is part of the College, but not of it; mixing with Williams, but separate and distinct from it.

My Third World friends and colleagues who have visited the campus, as well as several CDE students, have, in their bewilderment, suggested several "paranoid," "cynical," and "sinister" explanations for the "nether fish nor fowl" status of our economics graduate students. They talk of covert racism, cultural apartheid, the North-South gap and fear of the contaminating influences of poverty and socio-cultural "backwardness" on the "civilized" and privileged.

It would be nice if one could authoritatively dismiss these comments as having no basis in fact. So, we will follow very closely the progress and ultimate results of the excellent proposals for affirmative integration made by Gargoyles. Based on what happens, we will be in a better position to determine just how sinister sinister really is.

My son

To the editor:

In reference to the Williams students who picketed the U.S. Marine recruiters, a new low has been reached in a highly-touted intellectual school.

Williams College, one of the finest small colleges in the country, academically, culturally, and liberally second to none, takes issue with everything from sexual orientation (gays) to migrant workers to the KKK to fruit flies and those who pick lettuce in California.

I'm not worried too much about the 17 Williams students who picketed the Marine Corps officers. If trouble ever starts for America, protestors often seek sanctuary in Canada.

What bothers me is that President John W. Chandler and staff bowed to the wishes of this intellectually disoriented minority when they could have told the protestors, "You don't need placards. The students at Williams are educated enough to make up their own minds and, like the protestors who have the right to picket, the fine Marines have a right to recruit."

Marine Sgt. Mark Morse said it very well.

"Typically, we don't get many students to apply from a college like Williams, but the ones who do are exceptionally well-qualified. They depict what fathers dream of and mothers are proud of," he said.

Sgt. Morse also reported that he had never personally faced an organized student protest in three years of campus recruiting in Connecticut, western Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

When the ideals of the 17 protestors and the College can ring as loud and clear as the Marines theme song, which includes the line, "First to fight for right and freedom and to keep our honor clean, we are proud to claim the title of United States Marines," you at Williams will have received a fine education.

By the way, my son, Francis P. Babeu, joined the Marines [last] Monday and I'm very proud. Raymond F. Babeu

Physics

To the editor:

In the Nov. 13 Sunday New York Times, a full page ad was printed as part of a plea to the President and Congress to halt further development and deployment of U.S. nuclear weapons. Interestingly this ad was not sponsored by any of the usual antinuclear groups but instead was signed by 1500 physicists from across the U.S. The list included the names of six members of the Williams College Physics department.

The idea of scientific responsibility in the nuclear arms race has recently received a great deal of attention globally, especially with the scientific convention held by Pope John Paul II and his subsequent plea to Catholic scientists to discontinue research on nuclear weapons. The issue of nuclear disarmament may prove to be a central focus of College activities this year with the showing of "The Day After" and the major conference "The Arms Race and Nuclear Conflict" to be held at Williams on Jan. 13 and 14.

The conference is to be hosted by the Williams Disarmament Forum but the long list of sponsors so far ranges from the Chaplain's Office to the President's Office along with 16 departments, seven residential houses and a host of other College organizations. The only department so far to decline sponsorship is Physics. When questioned on the reasons for this move, Physics department chairman Ballard Pierce stated that he and his colleagues believed that "departmental funds should be used for topics specifically related to physics." He also said that the issue seemed more political than scientific. When asked if the forum was not more pertinent of physics than to other sponsoring departments, Professor Pierce said that the point was "irrelevant." Pierce agreed that the conference was worthwhile and said that he would probably attend but remained firm on the fact that the Physics department would not be a sponsor on principle. In response to this decision, spokesman for the Williams Disarmament Forum David Yaskulka said, "Certainly, we were very surprised to find out that the Physics department did not find it appropriate to support this educational event. However, please be clear about the fact that we in no way expect money from everyone."

NEWS BRIEFS

Education series to begin

In an effort to stimulate education and discussion on the state of education in America, the Lecture Committee has announced the beginning of a year-long lecture series titled "Educating America."

The series will be important to the Williams community because the "quality of education here depends on the quality of that at lower levels," according to English professor and Lecture Committee Chairman Stephen Fix.

Fix said the series will concern itself not only with higher education. Its goal will be to get "people talking about education at all levels," because the levels are interrelated, he said.

There will be a total of five speakers. The first will be William J. Bennett '65, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, on Nov. 30. Bennett was also the Baccalaureate speaker at last June's Commencement exercises.

The second speaker will be Theodore Sizer, former Dean of the School of Education at Harvard, on Jan. 24. Fix said the Lecture Committee is now negotiating with three additional prominent political and education experts for lectures later in the year. Fix said he hopes the five speakers will present a "very good spectrum of opinion."

Fix also said that the Committee will extend "relatively soon" invitations to all the presidential candidates to speak as a part of the series.

The lecture series will focus on last year's report from the National Commission on Excellence in Education, "A Nation at Risk," because, according to Fix, the report is "galvanizing a public debate on the prospects for education in America."

Fix said students can obtain copies of the "Nation at Risk" report for free, starting this week at the College Council office in Baxter Hall. The copies have been provided by President John Chandler's office.

The sole sponsor of the series is the Lecture Committee, Fix said. "The series will not be terribly costly," he added.

ACSR releases progress report

Indicating that "certain patterns have become clear," although "we need further information," the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility today released an "Interim Report" to students and faculty summarizing its activities during this semester.

Of the 24 companies the ACSR has reviewed this term, only IBM and Eastman Kodak are mentioned by name. Instead, the ACSR focused on the issues it has addressed in its five meetings this fall.

The report covers compliance with the Sullivan Principles, corporate support of the South African government, and the expansion of corporate activity in South Africa. The report also mentions the wide disparities among different companies' position and the differences of opinion among the ACSR's membership, although neither companies nor members are explicitly listed.

ACSR Chairman Stephen Lewis, a professor of economics, said the Committee did not purposely omit the names. "We have nothing in particular to hide," he said. "I guess my feeling was that since we're talking about 20 to 25 companies, to have mentioned only some of them would have raised more questions than it answered."

The report discussed extensively the debatable points of each issue, such as the difficulty in determining which goods aid apartheid and therefore should not be sold to the South African government.

Lewis said the ACSR would not release a more explicit report later, since Record articles have followed the progress of specific companies, and the meetings are open to the public. "There's a limit to the amount of time and energy we can spend on these things," he said.

The ACSR has urged companies not to expand business activity in South Africa, but has not urged them to withdraw, citing a report from the Thomas Commission. Lewis said "the problem is that withdrawing means selling to someone else: the jobs are there, the physical assets are there," so that withdrawal by one company has no effect.

The report said that ACSR members "are quite diverse in their general approach to issues of shareholder responsibility," but, said Lewis, had "a pretty good set of working relationships" in spite of their differences.

CC approves Baxter plans, eyes new rock concert sites

by Lee Wierdsma

College Council approved the newest set of plans for redesigning Baxter Hall and discussed locations other than Chapin Hall for holding rock concerts, at its meeting last Thursday.

The Council endorsed without objection the latest plans for Baxter (see Baxter story, p.7), which were drawn up partially in response to Council suggestions about the first set. However, several members did suggest allocating an area on the first floor for coat racks and cubby holes.

Student Activities Board president Arunas Gudaitis '84 told the Council that in order to retain use of Chapin Hall, the SAB will have to prove that Towne Field House is unsuitable for rock concerts and that the damages that occurred at the Marshall Crenshaw concert were not routine events.

"All that we want is an acceptable, suitable place for concerts," he said.

Acoustics expert

Gudaitis also said the SAB plans to hire an acoustics expert to determine the cost involved in renovating the field house. "The acoustics are really poor there," he said. "[The field house] would also be difficult to set up, and concerts would be less enjoyable because of the big space."

He said he feels it would not be worthwhile to hold concerts in the field house. However, the alternative would be to continue using Chapin under strict guidelines and regulations, possibly removing seats as an added precaution. "We really don't have a leg to stand on, though," Gudaitis said.

The SAB plans to present its case to President John W. Chandler in the near future, he said.

Daily Advisor guidelines

The College Council also passed a series of resolutions concerning the role the Daily Advisor should play in the printing or censorship of political statements. Some students had complained about recent issues of the Advisor that had included statements about the Marines' interviews at the Office of Career Counseling and the recent invasion of Grenada.

The Council decided the Advisor will print a daily disclaimer, disconnecting the newsletter from any of the editorial statements it publishes.

X has More Fun in the New World

by Brett McDonnell

Reaganism dominates the cultural landscape. Britain turns out one boring synthesizer band after another, and the great remnants of that nation's glory days—The Clash, the Gang of Four, John Lydon, Elvis—all seem to have become musically stagnant.

In this country the boring British synth groups dominate the radio, making it hard for good new bands like the Violent Femmes and R.E.M. to get mass exposure.

In these bleak times the cavalry comes, if not to the rescue then at least to help us get by, in the form of X's new album More Fun in the New World.

X's three previous albums have already established them in my mind as the best band in the country (including E Street). More Fun is every bit as good as Los Angeles and Under the Big Black Sun, though it is not quite at the level of their masterpiece, Wild Gift.

X consists of drummer B. J. Bonebrake, guitarist Billy Zoom, singer/songwriter Exene Cervenka and singer/songwriter/bass player John Doe. Bonebrake plays a wild, sometimes shuffling and sometimes slamming style of drums.

Zoom's guitar playing does just that. Exene has a screech and scream delivery. Doe has one of the best voices around—muscular and much purer than most vocalists in rock. Together they play music influenced by rockabilly and by their beginnings in the L.A. punk scene.

X stretches its stylistic bounds in More Fun. Best of all is "I Must Not Think Bad Thoughts," a song that begins as a smooth, finger-snapping that moves up and down several times to a rocking climax. Lyrically, the song has a section on American involvement in Latin America and a section on the refusal of American radio to play new American bands. The idea that we refuse to notice things that disturb our cozy little world unites the two. Williams students take note.

Also surprising from X is "True Love, Part Two," a funky theft from all sorts of sources, including a guitar riff from an old Doobie Brothers song and lyrics from "Land of a Thousand Dances," "Burning Love," "Black Betty" and "Skip to Ma Lou," among others. It's great fun.

Doe shows off his vocals on the melodic "Poor Girl" and "Hot House." The former is especially beautiful and deserves (and could conceivably get) substantial air play.

X does not forget its traditional stuff either. They remember that they can have more fun by making the music go bang on songs like "We're Having Much More Fun" and "Make the Music Go Bang."

"It was better before, before they voted for what's his name/This was supposed to be the new world." (from "New World") The new world has stagnated in rock as in other ways, but don't lose hope. Along with several other groups, X is keeping the spirit and music alive. You probably won't hear them on your local FM station (though they may occasionally make WCFM), but they're there and keep going for those who need them.

Middlebury

The Kappa Delta Rho fraternity at Middlebury College has been accused of sexism because of its "little sister" program.

The Middlebury Campus reports that Dean of Students Erica Wonnacott asked that the program's name be changed because "little sister" is "a put-down term."

KDR's "little sister" program allows women to become social members of the frat by paying only half of the normal fee for men. They may take part in all social activities but do not have voting privileges.

Fraternity president Todd Hunter called the name "an accepted Greek term" and felt that it was not sexist. He explained that the program was designed to include women in fraternity activities rather than to discriminate against them.

Lynne Bears '86, a KDR little sister, said, "I don't think it's sexist. It's a social alternative."

Holy Cross

The first in a series of Blind Date Balls took place last week at Holy Cross. According to The Crusader, the Ball gives students (mostly freshmen) an opportunity to meet other students.

Everyone attending the Ball must come with a blind date, arranged by his or her roommate.

The Ball has caused some controversy on campus. Many women feel that male students choose a date on the basis of looks, usually by consulting the "meat sheet," or Freshman Register.

Normally the men ask women, but when asked whether it is acceptable for women to be asking men to a dance, Pete Jensen '87 said in The Crusader "Sure, my number is 1036."

Wheaton

Four cases of sexual harassment and a potentially racial incident have forced students, faculty and the administration at Wheaton College to question their security system.

In the most recent incident (October 7), a student at the all female school was abducted by an unknown male who tried to rape her in his car.

The rapist was able to drive the screaming student past a guard station located at an exit from the college.

Purple Key president Lance Rothstein '85 was also asked to set up a specific set of guidelines separating the sections of the Advisor. Daily events will be printed first, with editorial statements appearing at the bottom of the page.

College Council president Tom Paper '84 also discussed the idea of making the Rathskellar dog house available to all students. The dog house provides an alternative lunch menu every day in Baxter Hall, consisting solely of hot dogs and condiments. Currently the dog house does not accept cash or chits, limiting use to students on board plans.

Paper said he plans to investigate changing the dog house policy, as well as creating more available subdivisions in the College board plan.

Tastes like it never left Germany.

Steinhauser Bier has authentic German taste. It is brewed and bottled in Germany according to the Purity Law of 1516, which allows only natural ingredients. The Steinhauser is shipped to America. Unchanged. Uncompromised. Next time you're thirsting for authentic German beer, ask for a Steinhauser, the one beer that tastes like it never left Germany.

Panel assess JFK years

Almost twenty years to the day after John F. Kennedy's assassination, Williams professors George R. Goethals, G. Robert Jackall, Roger E. Bolton and James MacGregor Burns discussed the former president's image, successes and failures last Wednesday night in a panel discussion titled "Kennedy Remembered:

Implications for the Eighties." Political science professor Burns, who knew Kennedy personally, said Kennedy failed to achieve all his political goals because he did not always have the courage to face the political realities of his day.

Kennedy's early hard-line military stand was ironic, Burns said, because he also pledged himself to peace in his inaugural address. Burns said Kennedy felt he had to appear tough because Democrats were reeling from Republican charges during the '50s that they were soft on communists.

Kennedy also failed to take much initiative in improving civil rights because "he thought he would offend Southern congressmen, who would in turn oppose passage of his economic policies," Burns said. Kennedy always thought lowering unemployment would help blacks more because it would help their standard of living, Burns said.

"Group think"

Goethals, a professor of psychology, criticized Kennedy's handling of the Bay of Pigs incident, particularly the process by which the invasion of Cuba was approved.

"The behavior of the decision-making group was designed to protect each others' egos and not disturb the consensus," he said, calling their behavior "group-think."

In contrast, he said, the decision-making process which occurred during the Cuban missile crisis was a much more careful and wide-ranging exchange of alternatives and allowed Kennedy to achieve a more realistic solution to the crisis.

Jackall, a professor of sociology, examined Kennedy's style and success with the media. "Whether consciously or not, it seems that Kennedy understood the crucial importance of television, and how it had been utilized," Jackall said. This explains his ability to project the graceful image known as the "Kennedy style," he said.

"Youthful, cool, detached, confident, articulate, witty—a markedly-restrained but clearly restless energy" epitomized the Kennedy style in Jackall's view, he said.

Economics professor Bolton said Kennedy's main economic policy was to achieve full employment. "A recurring theme in Kennedy's 1960 campaign was the need to get America moving again," he said. "By this [Kennedy] meant three things: first, restore full employment; second, expand the limits of the economy outward at a faster rate; and third, to do these things in order to increase human freedom.

JFK wouldn't approve
"Today, Kennedy would be appalled at our present record," Bolton said. "Surely he would not readily accept that our recent severe recession and massive unemployment, from which we are now gradually recovering, was the only acceptable way to break the vicious cycle of inflationary expectation."

Bolton said Kennedy's growth-orientated policies were successful mainly because he had discipline to carry them through. This gradual growth served to expand the economy while keeping inflation down, he added.

However, Bolton said, Kennedy's acceptance of high federal deficits in his growth program contributed to our tolerance of greatly larger deficits today. Because Kennedy had made deficits a tolerable part of economic growth, presidents that followed him were less afraid to allow them, Bolton explained.

South Korea is in danger

The United States' role in South Korea is now a critical one, said Kyung-Won Kim '59, South Korea's Ambassador to the United Nations, in a lecture Friday. "If the U.S. withdraws, chances are that North Korea would try something," he said.

President Reagan's recent visit to South Korea was significant as well as symbolic, he added, "because in this case symbolism was more important than substance."

Kim served as National Security Advisor to former South Korean President Park before assuming his post at the U.N. last year.

The policy of North Korea is largely an independent and unpredictable one now, he said.

"When the Russians controlled the conduct of Korean unification policy, they did so in the framework of big power calculation," he said. "Now, with more freedom of action, North Korea is less rational and predictable than it was before."

This freedom of action, Kim noted, resulted from North Korea's ability to exploit the differences between China and the Soviet Union. "The Soviet Union refused to bail out the North Korean leader in the Korean war, and instead Chinese 'volunteers' rescued him from defeat. This led North Korea to attach itself more closely to China, and to reduce its dependence on the Soviets," he explained.

"Continuing threat"

Kim added that the recent Rangoon bombing, in which a number of South Korean cabinet ministers were killed, "shows the continuing threat from North Korea we have to face."

The bombing, he emphasized, was "not part of Soviet global strategy, but the act of a fanatical, paranoid, and self-absorbed government. It resulted from North Korea's tendency to look at South Korea through the prism of their own experience."

With their own "ridiculous personality cult of President Sung, they thought that if the South Korean president were killed, the system would collapse," he said.

However, he concluded, "the future is an optimistic one. In the competition between two models of economic development, South Korea is clearly winning. If we persevere, and maintain a steady military posture, we will come out on the winning side."

"Though North Korea refuses even to talk to us now," he added, "hopefully when the North Korean president dies some change will be possible, and since North Korea is so bad now, that change cannot be for the worse."

Invasions linked to nuclear war

The recent American military involvement in Lebanon and Grenada is closely linked to nuclear war, political science professor Raymond Baker said Thursday.

"There is a deadly connection between those Third World interventions and the possibility of nuclear war," Baker said at a dinner-discussion last Wednesday sponsored by the Williams Disarmament Forum.

He said the reassuring presence of detente has been replaced by a military assertiveness on the part of the United States and the Soviet Union, especially in the Third World, which makes escalation to the use of nuclear weapons more possible.

"We're going to be surprised again," Baker said. "Another distant country which we've never heard of and can't pronounce the name of will become a symbol of American hunger for Third world power."

First rung

"There is a very clearly laid-out ladder for the escalation of conflict to the superpowers" in the Middle East, Baker said. "We are on the first rung of that ladder."

Baker said he opposed the stationing of U.S. Marines in Lebanon because their presence has brought the United States closer than ever to conflict with the Soviet-backed Syrians, and even with the Soviets themselves.

"What was presented to us as being a peacekeeping force is now linked to the survival of a particular government, he said. "The nature of the conflict is important."

Reagan's Interest

Baker called the America action in Grenada "idiotic. It's not in our interest, it's in Ronald Reagan's interest."

"We think we can reconstruct other nation's governments the way we want them," Baker said, adding that the United States has undergone "a militarization of foreign policy in the broadest sense of that term."

"We ignore our economic resources, our diplomatic resources, and our political resources. I think its creating a weaker U.S." Baker added that the U.S. invasion of the Island was a violation of international law and was immoral.

The universe in your skull

George Washington University philosophy professor Peter Caws explained the ontological separation between the material world and the perceived one last Wednesday afternoon in a lecture titled "Yorick's World, Or the Universe in a Single Skull."

In his attempt to place the universe into a single skull, Caws began by discussing the role of the perceiver in the world. "Coming to think of things existing independent of human presence was a frightening moment for the Western mind," he said.

Caws differentiated between those things which can be conceived of as existing without the mind and those which cannot. The existence of a dollar—a physical piece of paper with markings in green and black—is possible without human consciousness to perceive it, but the commerce and purchasing power a dollar bill implies is impossible without the conscious mind to interpret it, he said.

Caws said the perception of the entire universe is placed inside the skull. In other words, what someone perceives to be real is his only reality.

"Where's the projector?" "You are living in a world that is your private sensorium," he added. "The sensation of outness—of there being something beyond what you sense—is truly illusory. You are in a private movie." The question that arises, said Caws, is "where's the projector?"

The mind, he explained, creates a holographic movie using bits of perception and patching them together. "We live in what I call a flat region, a non-relativistic region, a non-quantum region," he said, and thus objects appear to us to maintain their mass as they travel, time does not slow down in one's car and energy appears to be continuous. However, Caws added that no one really lives on a day-to-day basis using these principles.

CUL unveils newest Baxter plans, seeks spot for all-night study space

by Marilla Well

In response to student reaction to the initial plans for the renovation of Baxter Hall, architect John Jordan unveiled a revised set of plans that provide new space for student organizations in the basement, at the Committee on Undergraduate Life meeting last Tuesday.

The CUL also discussed other places to put an all-night study area, either in the new Baxter lounge or the basement of Hopkins, and Jordan described how the new Jesup Hall computer center will have a word processor available in that building so that students can use it 24 hours a day.

The newest set of Baxter plans contain several major changes in the basement, including a new darkroom and one collective office for all student publications. The publications will share one room in the current Pottery Ltd. space.

The Outing Club would also have an office and an equipment room downstairs, and WCFM's offices will be centralized off one long corridor that will have locked doors at each end.

"The idea is that the radio station will be isolated and locked off" in an attempt to increase security, said Jordan.

On the first floor, one small office has been removed and a larger one added to accommodate the College Council.

Media downstairs

"The [planned] Williams Record office will serve as a general publications office, which might need further subdivision," explained Dean of Freshman David Colby. "I don't see a problem in moving the darkroom [so that it's opposite the publications office] but I'm not sure that we can convert the current darkroom into bathrooms for the radio station" to avoid wasting space, said Jordan.

Economics professor Roger Bolton expressed hesitation about putting Outing Club coordinator Jim Briggs' office on the first floor, away from the rest of the Outing Club. "I didn't know where else to put him," responded Colby.

Citing the lack of windows and the fact that if Briggs' office were in the basement he would be the only all-day resident of that floor, Jordan asked "Would you want to be in the basement?"

The revised plan also called for the mailroom to be enlarged. The present room has approximately 800 square feet of space containing 2000 boxes, compared with a planned 1200 square feet to contain a maximum of 2400 boxes.

In order to save space in the mailroom, Jordan suggested making the individual boxes bigger. Currently, the boxes are smaller than postal service regulations, and making them larger would cut down on the number of items the package room must sort and store, Jordan said. The working space inside the mailroom could thus be reduced, he said.

Economics professor Kathleen McNally recommended inserting slots in the boxes, so that students could get messages even when the mailroom was closed. "I hope you're following up on that idea," College Council President Tom Paper '84 told Jordan.

All-night lounge

The CUL also reexamined the issue of replacing the Van Alstyne lounge with space in Baxter. The College started an all-night study center in Hopkins Hall this semester after it closed the downstairs library lounge.

"I don't think that Hopkins space is sufficient, a lot of women don't feel secure," said Chris Harrington '84. Others said the lounge should be in Baxter.

"I thought the feeling was that Baxter wasn't the place for it," said Jordan.

As an alternative, approximately 800 square feet in the basement of Hopkins Hall, which will be freed when the new phone switching system is installed this January, was suggested.

"It makes a lot of sense to put it in the basement of Hopkins—vending machines, security and bathrooms are already there," said Colby.

The concern about all-night space prompted questions about word processors, and whether the new lounge will have machines for students to write papers on late at night. Jordan said it probably wouldn't, saying, "there will be a 24-hour word processor in Jesup. The building is designed for 24-hour access." Jordan is also overseeing the Jesup renovation.

violating international law."

Fran Toler '84 disagreed. "I think that Grenada more than anything feeds the Cold War mentality. We just annihilated the identity of that country. I think the invasion is abhorrent enough to call for his resignation."

However, Sultar said after the meeting that "the most important thing that happened [with the meeting] was getting people here to take a stand. Taking the vote was almost silly.

"Even though [the vote] was symbolic, we were taking some sort of action," he added.

"I thought it went really well," agreed College Council vice president Jan Van Eck '85.

Water polo wins tourney to end season with bang

by Ken Irvine

The men's water-polo team coasted to its second consecutive division II New England championship on Nov. 5 and 6 at Harvard. They defeated Boston University, the University of Rhode Island and Amherst by scores of 10-4, 12-5 and 11-4 respectively.

Though the Ephs had a few problems at first adjusting to the larger pool (20m x 30m), they consistently outswam and outplayed their opponents. The offense was led by sophomore Will Andrew, Williams' most valuable player throughout the season. The defense centered around goalie Rob Sommer '84 who was especially tough against Amherst, carrying a shut-out into the last quarter. Ross Wilson '85 played a good game in the hole, and with six seniors graduating this year, he could be an important man in this position next year.

Fine season

The Ephs finished off their season at 23-2, and they added a victory over the alumni during Homecoming. They were led this year by captains Mark Schmitz '85, John Gould '84 and Jeff Mills '84.

Other seniors are Sommer, Tom Potter, Rob Shatkin and Todd Morgan. Their departure will hurt next year's team, but Williams may be able to draw on its depth and repeat as New England champions next year.

Soccer success

"I was so happy with the season...These are quality soccer players and quality people. It was an enjoyable year...other teams must know that we will be strong in the future. However, we can't be complacent, we must work all the harder."

Sophomore Jeff McEvoy was selected for the New England

Intercollegiate All-Star game, and received the team's Most Valuable Player award for the 1983 season. Most improved player awards went to Dan Aramini '84 and David Wolf '85.

Sullivan was the recipient of the Fox leadership award. Next year's captains are Murphy and Doug McKenney '85.

of Williams' top stickholders, will join assistant captain Greg Pachus '84 and Rich Jackson '85 (ten goals, five assists last year) in making up the only line not featuring a rookie.

The Ephs will compete for one of eight playoff berths in the ECAC East Division along with 14 other squads, including powerhouses Holy Cross, Babson and Norwich. Previously Williams competed in the Western Division.

Williams starts regular season play as hosts of the Williams Invitational tournament over Thanksgiving weekend. UConn, Hamilton and Lake Forest will be the competition.

Nelson races to 63rd in Div. III Nationals

by Chris Stearns

This Saturday cross country co-captain John Nelson '84 ran a 25:16 over a five mile course at the Division III Nationals to finish 63rd overall. Nelson's finish out of nearly 200 of the nation's top runners was the second highest in Williams history.

The race was run at Christopher Newport College in Newport News, Virginia, under fair skies and balmy conditions. Said Coach Peter Farwell "It was a flat, fast course in general, but the bunching up of runners slowed it down. John got a good start, but he was in a huge pack of the 30th to 100th place finishers. At the end, the runners came in bang-bang-bang, like a machine gun, just inches apart. I would have to say that it was one of John's best races, but then again, he's run a lot of good races this year."

Nelson pleased

"The course was winding, with lots of corners," explained Nelson, "but my main problem was the jostling and all the elbows that were thrown. Everyone came out fast because we all knew we had to in order to stay out of trouble."

"I was looking for NESCAC [New England Small College Athletic Conference] people to pass, but I couldn't quite pass Seb Junger [Wesleyan's star runner who finished only two places in front of Nelson]. The pack was very even. I'd pass a man, then the next thing I knew he'd be passing me. But it was my last cross-country race and I was happy with it."

The individual winner was Tony Buell of Northcentral and the team champion was Division III powerhouse Brandeis.

Bill Couch '86 led the swimmers to an easy scrimmage win over R.P.I. last week. (Pynchon)

Swimmers set to win again

by Greg Keller

It's difficult to predict whether the swim team will be able to match the accomplishments of last year's squad. The women's team captured the National Championships while the men's team came in third, and both won the New England Championship. "Last year's performance is a tough act to follow," said Coach Carl Samuelson.

Although both squads lost key performers, the Ephs are not known for having rebuilding seasons. They have consistently placed in the top three at the nationals and have defended their New England title for the past four years.

This season a strong group of freshmen and transfer students should make up for the loss of last year's seniors.

Potential for success

According to senior co-captain Rob Sommer, this year's team has an additional two to three swimmers with the potential to be point-scorers at the nationals. Samuelson also noted that the squad is "able to handle a little bit more in terms of intensity."

Sommer predicts that the toughest meets of the season will be with Kenyon, Claremont and Colgate (who edged the men's team last year by one point). The Ephs will open the season against U.Conn on November 30.

Soccer successful, no regrets

by Greg Leeds

When the clock reached 00:00 in the men's soccer New England Small College Athletic Conference final a week ago Sunday, Middlebury Coach Ron McEachen and Williams coach Michael Russo agreed that the two teams were of equal quality despite the outcome.

Middlebury was prepared for the game, having defeated Colby 4-0 the previous Wednesday. Williams, however, was at a disadvantage, having played a tough Amherst team the day before. After their 3-1 victory, they had exactly 24 hours before taking on the 9-14 Panthers. Losing 2-1, they were naturally upset but had every reason to be proud of their outstanding season, ending 10-3-3.

and Ted Murphy '85 had nothing but praise for their team's accomplishment. After the game, Murphy stated "I'm very proud to play with this team."

Captains' comments

Sullivan added "We played with a lot of character without Doug [McKenney], Paul [Williamson] and Mark [Schroeder], and after yesterday's game. We matched the best winning record ever, won the Little Three...there were injuries early and late in the season, but we still came back. It [the game] was disappointing in the result but not in the effort. There couldn't be a better group of guys."

The Ephmen had indeed come back. During the second half they matched Middlebury's aggressiveness. McEachen said after the game, "These are two very comparable teams. Williams didn't look like a team that had played the day before."

Coach's thoughts

Russo had a great amount of pride in the team's success. He said, "Things came together after the Dartmouth game. The freshmen became more confident, and the seniors lent character and stability to the team."

"Our goals in the beginning of the season were to win the Little Three and the Eastern College Athletic Conference. After beating Amherst in the shootout game, I was confident that we could beat them again for the Little Three. Unfortunately we were not allowed into the ECAC playoffs."

Pucksters rebound with frosh shoot for ECAC playoff berth

by Paul Meeks and Chris Harned

After a disappointing and injury-marred 8-15 season last year, the hockey team rebuilds this year with a talented freshman class and a surviving nucleus of veteran talent.

Head Coach Bill McCormick is guardedly optimistic about Williams' chances of returning to its position as an Eastern College Athletic Conference playoff contender.

Five freshmen

The freshmen will be counted on heavily to give the Ephs added scoring in the absence of graduates Bob Brownell, Sam Flood, Mark Wysocki and Ed Finn—four of the Ephs' top five scorers last year. McCormick added, "If the freshmen forwards can score, they may set the tone for a great season."

Five of the freshmen McCormick expects to play are forwards. Right wing Guy Kurtz scored the game-winner in the Ephs' 4-3 scrimmage win over Dartmouth Wednesday, while left wing Mike O'Connell followed with two goals in the 8-2 defeat of the alumni Saturday.

Dave Caswell, Craig Cheevers and Cris Traggio are other freshmen scorers expected to play important roles.

John Booth and goaltender Rick Dietz are freshmen who will bolster Williams' strong defensive unit. Dietz looks to be the perfect backup to captain and All-American hopeful Dan Finn '84. Last season Finn saved an amazing 760 out of 833 shots in 18 games for a 91 percent save percentage. He was at his best in Williams' season-ending five game winning streak when the Ephs upset Princeton, Middlebury and Babson.

Anchoring the defense are juniors Mike Uretsky (an assistant captain), Mark Winters and Paul Coleman as well as sophomores Chris Pappas, Dave Fritz, Erik Knutzen and Brad Ball.

Offensive set-up

McCormick looks to assistant captain Brian Rutledge '85, Williams' scoring leader and Most Valuable Player last season (18 goals, 19 assists in 23 games), for a repeat performance. McCormick said, "There is no question that Rutledge is the standout player on the squad. He's as good as anyone in Division II, and he's getting better by the day."

New coach, new hope as hoopsters prepare

by John Clayton

First-year Coach Harry Sheehy is bringing fresh attitudes, perspectives and ideas to the men's basketball team. But with the changes come adjustments.

"Our biggest problem this year will be adjustments," Sheehy said. "Most importantly will be a change in the style of basketball we're going to play. We're going to push the ball up the floor much more than we have the past few seasons."

"We plan to have a different offense than last year," Sheehy said, "with a lot of people touching the ball. Artie [co-captain Art Pidori-ano '84, 19.4 points and 5.8 rebounds per game last year] will score a lot, but others will also get the ball."

"In a spread-out offense, we should have three or four people who are capable of scoring in the teens on any given night," Sheehy cited center Dave Krupski '84 (7.2 points, 5.5 rebounds last year), co-captain John McNicholas '84 (6.2 points, 3.5 rebounds) and forwards Russ Howard '84 and Mike Meadows '86 as those type people.

Short

Having lost six-foot-six center Steve O'Day and six-four forwards Scott Olesen and Andy Goodwin to graduation, the Ephmen lack height. "We're short," Sheehy jokes, "but we're slow."

The guard play, however, is a strong point, with the return of Pidori-ano and sophomore Tim Walsh (10.1 points per game), two quick players with explosive scoring potential. Sheehy also praised juniors Pete Griffith and Jeff Goodell and senior Greg Lockhart. Sheehy, the College's all-time leading scorer, graduated in 1975. He replaces Curt Tong, who became Athletic Director at Pomona-Pitzer in California.

Empty stands

"When I took the job in March," Sheehy said, "I took a look at some of the films, and at some of the games I saw less than 40 people in the stands. I was shocked, because when I was here the gym was full for every game, not just Amherst."

"I hope that with the exciting brand of basketball we'll be playing this year, the fans will come back and then stay back, because we're playing hard. I'd like to bring back the enthusiasm that goes with the history of Williams College basketball."

The tallest Eph on the basketball court this season will be Coach Harry Sheehy '75. (Eagon)

Tenure awarded to Tong, Spear, Ockman, Allston

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions awarded tenure to two women and two men last week, the Record has learned.

Philosophy professor Rosemarie Tong, art professor Carol Ockman, economics professor Lee J. Allston and history professor Thomas Spear were awarded tenure.

Although neither Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor nor Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley would comment on the individual decisions, the Trustees usually approve the CAP's decision automatically when they meet in January. At that time, the announcements will be formally announced.

English professor Anne Margolis, who was also up for tenure, did not receive it, and studio art professor G. Timothy Cunard withdrew himself from consideration.

Tong "very happy"

Of the decision Tong said, "I'm very happy. I'd like to continue on interdisciplinary topics and on strengthening the philosophy major. Basically, I hope to continue doing what I've been doing—working on areas of philosophy which intersect other interests, particularly the professional interests of many students."

Tong's specialties are the philosophy of law, ethics and public policy, and feminist theory.

In her role on campus, Tong said she hopes "to continue the progress that has already been made towards making Williams a place where women can develop as fully as possible."

Tong has served on the Committee on Undergraduate Life, the Colby Committee (an ad-hoc committee on sexual harassment) and the Political Economy Committee, and currently serves on the Women's Studies and Faculty Steering Committee.

Allston is a specialist in economic history, and has done research on the farm mortgage market in the 1920s and 30s, as well as the growth of government. He said he was "very pleased" with the decision.

Allston has served on the Library, Afro-American, Research Funding and Athletic Committees.

Specialist on Africa

Spear is a specialist in African history and politics, especially sub-Saharan Africa. He has also done research on East Africa, particularly the pre-colonial era.

He declined to comment on the decision.

Clayton, Govan take over as Record editors-in-chief

Five seniors leave staff

The cold snapped at their faces and the ice played havoc with their footing, but in the end experience won out over youth. Seniors Jon Tigar and Daniel Keating beat out juniors John Clayton and Michael Govan in a basketball game held atop the Thompson Memorial Chapel bell tower last weekend. As a penalty for losing, Govan and Clayton will become the Record's new editors-in-chief beginning in January.

A crucial third editor, Blinky, fell to his death when Tigar slammed his head over the side of the chapel for the winning goal. His head had been used for the game because of its uncanny resemblance to a basketball. Had he survived, Blinky would have become managing editor.

Out to pasture

Clayton and Govan are the vanguard of yet another new staff of budding and ambitious young journalists who are moving up the ranks and putting their aging masters out to pasture.

Clayton has been sports editor since September 1982. Before that he was a sports writer.

"I picked John for the sensitivity, insight and inspiration behind his opinion pieces on drinking and Captain Crunch," said Tigar.

Govan, currently managing editor, was a lay-out assistant who became lay-out editor his freshman year. Single-handedly responsible for introducing the clean and compact modular style of lay-out to the Record, as well as bolder, rounder headlines and snappier graphics, Govan transformed the Record's appearance from the stodgy, stigmatism-producing rag it used to be to the slick, professional rag it is today.

Govan's other journalism credits include co-editor of Williams Life, a short-lived feature section of the Record, during fall 1982, and editor of The Arts at Williams College brochure.

Chandler bans Chapin rock concerts, relegates rock concerts to hockey rink

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

College President John W. Chandler decided last week to ban future rock concerts from Chapin Hall and hold them instead in the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink. Student leaders related to the decision said they were not adequately consulted before the decision was made, and said it will hurt students.

Arunas Gudaitas '84, who is chairman of the Student Activities Board that produces the concerts, said moving them to the rink would involve production costs too high for the SAB to shoulder.

"I wouldn't be surprised if you see fewer rock concerts as a result," he said.

Chandler's decision stems from damage done to Chapin at the Marshall Crenshaw concert in October. According to Music Department Chairman Douglas Moore, 24 seats in Chapin were damaged and will cost about $100 each to be repaired.

Chandler said he made the decision because "there has been a long and steady history of abuse of Chapin" during rock concerts. The College will still allow jazz and folk concerts to be held in Chapin.

The choice of the hockey rink means that concerts cannot be held between the end of October and the beginning of April, when the ice is down. At other times, the College lays down a surface for indoor tennis in the building, which will have to be protected, according to Athletic Director Robert Peck.

The decision was announced at a meeting last Tuesday, attended by Gudaitas, College Council President Tom Paper '84 and College officials. Chandler was not present.

Paper said that at the beginning of the meeting, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor presented him with a set of new guidelines for holding the concerts in the hockey rink. However, Gudaitas said it was his understanding that the meeting with Chandler was supposed to be only a discussion of the issue, not its resolution.

Chandler told the Record in an interview Sunday that he "didn't know that the decision was communicated at the beginning of the meeting," but said, "It was my presumption that the concerts [in Chapin] would be forbidden" at that meeting.

"I think they could have been a little more flexible in the decision-making process," Paper said.

Gudaitas said that although he and SAB Business Manager Gary Selinger '84 were surprised by the announcement, they were resigned to the fact that they would lose Chapin for the concerts.

Gudaitas then told those at the meeting that there would be serious acoustical problems with the rink, and that the increased production costs might be prohibitive. He asked that the College look into the possibility of improving the acoustics by installing sound bafflers in the ceiling.

NASC frat pledges charged with Williams thefts

Eight North Adams State College students associated with a fraternity there pleaded not guilty Nov. 16 in court to charges that they allegedly stole money and other valuables from three Williams dorms on Friday Oct. 21 as part of their initiation rites to the fraternity.

The suspects were caught when two Williams students noted the license plate of a car the suspects drove away in. Most of the stolen property has since been recovered.

According to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, six pledges to the fraternity Pi Epsilon Pi—also known as "The Pines"—and two upperclassmen who were their pledgemastrs allegedly stole $1,600 worth of goods from three rooms in Williams A and Armstrong House.

"They were apparently sent over to bring back something with a Williams insignia on it, and just got carried away," O'Connor said. Among the things stolen were a stereo, typewriter, camera, guitar, fire extinguisher and assorted clothing.

One of the Williams students, Michael Curtin '86, a resident of Armstrong House, said he was entering Mission Park from the western, Park Street entrance at about 10:50 p.m. that night with Richard Hollington '86, another Armstrong resident.

Suspects ran

"There were two guys who were going out and they said 'hi, how're you doing?'" Curtin said. He said he didn't recognize the two, but noticed that one was carrying a cassette-tape carrying case and the other had things stuffed in the pocket of his coat. "So I yelled, 'hey, come back here, and they took off,'" Curtin said.

Curtin said he and Hollington then chased the two. Curtin chased the one with the tapes up through the wooded section in front of Mission, towards the Freshman Quad. He said he saw the student drop the tapes, but couldn't catch up to him.

However, Curtin said Hollington chased the other fugitive up Park Street and followed him onto the drive north of the Freshman Quad. There the suspect got into a waiting silver Datsun 280Z, whose driver began to drive away. Curtin said Hollington jumped onto the car, but rolled off, and the car drove away. However, Hollington did see the first three digits in the car's license plate, Curtin said.

Curtin said he and Hollington then ran back to Mission to get into a friend's car and tried to drive after the Datsun, but by then it was too late and they could not find the Datsun.

"We went to Security, and they drove us to the [Williamstown] police station" to describe the suspects, he said. The two then returned to Mission, picking up the tapes en route.

Hollington could not be reached for comment.

The Day The Music Died

Disregarding student input, the College has taken a step which will diminish the number and quality of rock concerts on campus. If not end them altogether. Following an unusual amount of damage at the Marshall Crenshaw concert this fall, due largely to a misunderstanding between the Student Activities Board and security, the administration announced that rock concerts could not continue under the old system in Chapin Hall.

Eager to keep concerts in Chapin, students prepared plans to improve the situation. But when they arrived to discuss their ideas, they were informed that the decision had already been made: concerts would be held exclusively in Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink. So much for the myth that student input matters.

The student voice did intrude, albeit ex post facto. Students were allowed to suggest improvements in the rink's acoustics and to present their ideas about Chapin and its alternatives—after the decision had been made.

The hockey rink has several flaws, the worst of which is its unavailability from November to March, when the ice is down. That constraint is unavoidable. Also, since it is built of cement and shaped like an airplane hanger, the rink has poor acoustics. The College is reticent about spending money for a thorough acoustical study (a study completed six or seven years ago did not account for concerts), much less the improvements that such a study might recommend.

Finally, the rink's seating capacity is far too large. Many band contracts base the performer's fee on the size of the venue, money the SAB simply does not have. One solution would be to bring in a larger off-campus audience—which might increase the likelihood of damage. Another would be to rope off a portion of the rink or roll back the bleachers and put folding chairs on the floor, neither of which is likely to be attractive to a good band.

Without trying to be melodramatic, that leaves us with an unpleasant scenario: second-rate bands in a half-filled, noisy hall, during the first or last two months of the year. If attendance declines, which seems possible under those conditions, rock concerts here could become infeasible. Dean O'Connor has already said that students may have to consider the possibility that there will be no more rock concerts at Williams. The new regulations already preclude concerts at Homecoming and Winter Carnival.

Rash or abrupt student action, such as the hunger strike during the divestiture debate last year, has traditionally led the administration to call for studied, rational discussion. Perhaps after doing just that with the SAB, the administration would have had a persuasive case. But ignoring student input, when that input involved thought and the expectation of an audience, destroys student faith in discussion.

Somewhere on campus or within the College purse lies the solution to the problem. Relegating concerts to the ugly duckling of the physical plant is unacceptable, but so is uncompensated damage to Chapin. Students may be able to offer a compromise, but the administration must be willing to listen.

LETTERS

Objective facts

To the editor:

The decision of the Physics department not to support financially the upcoming conference on the arms race is far more reasonable than Bob Rolander's letter (Nov. 22) would suggest, principally because he overlooks the distinction between science and politics. The purpose of science is to determine the laws of the world around us: laws that hold for all time, for all experimenters. The purpose of physics departments funds is to support such research. Funding discussions of the interpretation of such objective facts toward formulating public policy should be left to departments like political science. No matter how balanced the panels may be, they will be discussing public policy issues, something outside the realm of scientific inquiry.

The scientific responsibility movement must be seen as a group of individuals united by a common aim—opposition to nuclear arms—and a common profession—science, no different from a group like "Economists for Eagleton" might be. No doubt the signatories of the New York Times ad bring to the nuclear debate their perspective of a more thorough familiarity with the technology involved in nuclear weapons; nonetheless, they cannot speak for all of physics, or even all physicists, for no matter how concerned certain scientists may be about nuclear policy, science as an institution must not become concerned with nuclear policy. Clearly, many of the physicists at Williams are opposed to nuclear arms: six of them signed the New York Times ad opposing development and deployment of U.S. nuclear weapons. Nonetheless, when political advocates, such as Rolander, try to influence how funds for the advancement of physics are spent, they threaten the independence which academic, and particularly scientific institutions must have. To preserve the integrity of the scientific method, political activism by scientists must be a leisure-time activity.

The leading question about whether "the forum was not more pertinent of physics than to other sponsoring departments," suggests that Bob Rolander has assumed that today's physics community is somehow responsible for the chain of events that led forty years ago to the first nuclear explosion. Not only are few people from the old Manhattan project still doing research, nuclear weapons are a consequence of theories that had developed earlier, and would have been invented sooner or later anyhow. The laws of science and history are clear that the Bomb simply cannot be un-invented, no matter how many physicists sign petitions. To pressure the Physics department to atone for the sins of Hiroshima is both brash and unreasonable.

QUOTATION OF THE WEEK

NEWSBRIEFS

Former Williams dean Lauren Stevens has sold his interest in the Williamstown Advocate, although he will remain as editor indefinitely.

Three profs get named chairs

Professors Peter Berek, Andrew Crider and William DeWitt have been awarded named professorships by the Trustees. The appointments are effective January 1.

In other personnel announcements, Earl McFarland was promoted from associate professor to professor of Economics, and Peter S. Willmott '59 was named a permanent member of the Board of Trustees.

Berek, an English professor, was named the Morris Professor of Rhetoric. Crider was made the Mary A. and William Wirt Warren Professor of Psychology. DeWitt was dubbed the C. Carlisle Tiplitt Professor of Biology.

Tiplitt, a 1942 graduate of Williams, endowed the chair in June of 1982, and DeWitt is the first professor to hold it. Professor Emeritus Fred H. Stocking, who retired last spring after more than four decades of teaching at Williams, was the former Morris chair holder, and Richard A. Rouse, who retired last spring after 35 years at Williams, was the former Warren professor.

Berek, who is currently the chairman of the English department, served as Dean of the College from 1975-1978 and has chaired various committees since coming to Williams in 1967. A 1961 graduate of Amherst College, he earned his M.A. and Ph.D. from Harvard University in 1963 and 1967, respectively.

Berek's publications include essays on 17th century poetry, Shakespeare and Shakespeare's contemporaries in the theatre.

Stress specialist

Crider has been a member of the psychology department at Williams since 1968. He served as associate Dean of the College for the 1972-1973 academic year and as acting Dean of the College the following year. A 1958 graduate of Coe College, he earned his Ph.D. from Harvard in 1964.

A specialist in stress and bio-feedback therapy, Crider is on the Board of Directors of the Berkshire Mental Health Association, and is a consulting psychologist at Berkshire Medical Center in Pittsfield.

DeWitt is a 1961 graduate of Williams. He earned his Ph.D. from Princeton University in 1966. Since coming to Williams in 1967 he has served as chairman of the biology department, published a textbook on cellular biology and had a variety of articles on genetics and biochemistry published in scientific journals.

McFarland has been on leave from Williams since June 1982, working in Botswana as chief economist of the macro division of the Ministry of Finance and Development Planning. In that position he has been responsible for overseeing the nation's five-year development plans and analyzing the annual budget. He will resume teaching at Williams next semester.

McFarland received his bachelor's and Ph.D. degrees from Columbia in 1958 and 1974, respectively.

Willmott, a resident of Memphis, Tennessee, is president of Carson Pirie Scott and Co. of Chicago. He earned his MBA from Harvard in 1961. A 1959 graduate of Williams, he has been president of his class and chairman of the Alumni Trustee Nominating Committee.

Four students awarded grad grants

The College has awarded four seniors graduate fellowships for two years of study in England.

Jonathan Hay was awarded the Herchel Smith Fellowship for study at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in the Division I-II category. Hay, a Russian major, said he plans to study social and political theory.

Amy Frost and James Voelkel were both awarded Smith fellowships in the Division III category. Frost, who is double majoring in religion and chemistry, said she will study chemistry, but is not yet sure what specific topic. Voelkel, an astrophysics major, said he plans to study physics and the history of science.

Joel Hellman was awarded the John Moody Fellowship for study at Exeter College, Oxford. Hellman is a contract major in Soviet studies, and will continue that study at Oxford.

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships selected the four seniors out of 29 total applicants.

Allison Tucher was named the first alternate for both the Moody fellowship and the Smith Division I-II fellowship. Amy Smith is the Smith Division III first alternate.

Eric Stein was chosen as second alternate for both fellowships.

Michael Katz goes to Texas

Associate Professor of Russian Michael R. Katz, who has taught at Williams since 1972, will leave at the end of this semester to become the chairman of the Slavic Languages department at the University of Texas at Austin.

Katz, who is tenured at Williams, said he did not actively seek the new position. "They called me," he explained. "I hadn't thought much about moving before that."

In recent years the University of Texas, with its large endowment from oil companies, has been able to hire many big-name professors from prominent Eastern universities. However, Katz said his hiring is not a part of this trend. "The humanities are different from the sciences," he noted. "It's not like they're buying a Nobel Prize winner."

Katz said that he decided to accept the offer both as an opportunity for change for himself, and as a career opportunity for his wife, Mary Dodge, who has a Ph.D. in early childhood education.

Although Katz said he will be receiving a higher salary at the University of Texas, he said "[the salary] was not a major consideration. In fact the salary negotiations took place after I had made my decision."

He added that because there is a higher cost of living in Texas and fewer fringe benefits, "I am not yet sure if the higher salary will raise my standard of living."

Katz's new job will be more of an administrative position than his present one. He will teach only one course. The rest of his time will be spent preparing a Ph.D. program in Russian for the University, which currently only has a masters program in Slavic Languages.

He added he is looking forward to the challenge of a new type of job and to working in a bigger department. "There will be a bigger audience within the department so we can share our enthusiasm about our subject," he said.

Katz graduated from Williams in 1966 and was second in his class. He obtained his Ph.D. at Oxford University, and then returned to Williams to teach. He has been living in the Williamstown area for about 20 years. "I have enjoyed Williams a great deal," he said, "but I'm ready for a change."

Advocate sold to NY couple

Former Williams Dean Lauren Stevens, founding publisher of The Williamstown Advocate, has just completed the sale of the paper to a New York City couple, William P. Densmore, Jr. and his wife, Betsy E. Johnson.

He said he sold the Advocate because, "although I enjoyed the paper, the income isn't enough, particularly now that I have college-bound children."

Stevens said the sale has been in the works for over one year. The Advocate is published weekly and distributed at no cost to Williamstown residents. Its sole source of revenue is thus commercial advertising and what Stevens calls "voluntary subscription for ten dollars."

Stevens declined to speculate whether the new owners would try to institute paid subscriptions. But he did say he believes that the change will be good for the paper.

"Bill and Betsy's enthusiastic interest in the Advocate guarantees the future health of a publication that has become so much a part of the local scene," Stevens said. "Particularly, Bill's professional training in both the newspaper and business world will strengthen the Advocate's position."

An article in the Advocate reported that Densmore is a 1975 graduate of the University of Massachusetts. He was a correspondent for The Berkshire Eagle while in college and has worked as a reporter for the Associate Press. Most recently he was New York bureau chief of "Business Insurance," a weekly trade journal.

Densmore told the Advocate that "this is a dramatic change from writing for something like the Associated Press. What I've missed for years is the kind of feedback and spirit you get from serving a smaller group of readers."

Stevens was a member of the Williams English department from 1965 to 1981 and served as Dean of Freshman for eleven of those years. He will continue as editor for the remainder of this year and as associate editor thereafter. He said he hopes to return to a job in academic administration in the near future.

Arms race forum in Jan.

Blitled as "the most significant issue of our era," the Williams Disarmament Forum is sponsoring a major conference titled "The Arms Race and Nuclear Conflict," on Jan. 13 and 14. The conference will include two full days of workshops, panel discussions and debates featuring a variety of experts on nuclear weapons and policy.

Featured speakers will include Henry Catto Jr. '52, recently retired Assistant Secretary of Defense under President Reagan; Franklin C. Miller '72, currently Director of Strategic Forces Policy with the Defense Department; Williams Miller '53, a negotiator of the SALT and ABM treaties and Associate Dean at Tufts University; Captain James Bush, a retired captain of a USN Polaris submarine; and Randall Kehler, national coordinator of The Nuclear Weapons Freeze Campaign.

The conference will run from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. both Friday, Jan. 13 and Saturday, Jan. 14. Both Friday evening and Saturday afternoon speakers and faculty members will conduct workshops on "everything from

ACSR approves three companies, sets January forum for College

by R. DeMott

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility approved the South African business practices of three more companies in the College portfolio at last Monday's meeting, all but wrapping up the extensive review of 24 such companies which the ACSR has been conducting all semester.

In addition, ACSR members reported on an investors conference in New York City and planned an all-College panel discussion for next year detailing ACSR actions and policies.

ACSR secretary and College vice-president William Reed indicated that the review process cannot be entirely completed until several companies in the portfolio, notably Borden, Borroughs, American International and Eckland, respond to his requests for more information.

Westinghouse, American Express and General Motors were congratulated for their high Sullivan Ratings. ACSR chairman and economics professor Stephen Lewis said that the book should be closed on these companies. "My feeling is that we've gone as far as we ought to write them off," he said.

'Give them a shove'

International Business Machines' reply prompted more discussion. The ACSR found most of IBM's business practices acceptable but called several of its policies into question.

"I'd be inclined to pat them on the back and urge them to set explicit non-expansion policies," said Lewis. Mathematics professor and College provost Neil Grabis added, "What we're trying to do is give them a shove."

In an interview with the Record last week, Navjeet Bai '84, an ACSR member who is also a member of the Williams

Anti-Apartheid Coalition, said the semester-long review process had been "useful. Any way to put pressure on a company is a good thing—you're saying that you're watching them," she said.

But she also said "the ACSR's goals are to keep working within the system there, for positive change. That doesn't question why the companies are there in the first place."

'Frustrated'

Bai said she was "frustrated" when ACSR members decided not to take a stand on whether sales to the South African government were appropriate. Bai said she thinks there should not be any such sales. However, at previous meetings ACSR members could not decide which products, if any, should be sold, and thus decided not to take a general stand.

At last Monday's meeting, Bai reported that she attended a New York conference sponsored by the Investor Responsibility Research Center, a group which publishes information on the situation in South Africa and the approach of banks and other colleges to the issue of responsible shareholding.

Bai said she learned that the South African government wants American businesses to help the country's economic growth and train skilled black workers, but does not want U.S. businesses to challenge its segregated housing and education policies.

"I don't think the ACSR's goal is to challenge anyone's hiring policies," Bai told the Record. "That is the point of divestment—that the companies should leave South Africa because they would never make any change there, because they are not allowed to."

All-College meeting

The ACSR concluded the meeting by setting up an all-College meeting panel for next year to show the community the complexity of ACSR issues, and to give the ACSR an idea of where the community stands.

"We should perform an educational function, [and] talk about what the issues are," said Lewis. "I've been struck by the complexity this fall because each company is so different."

"We could get a sense of where the community is," said Susan Reilly '85. "What do they think that we should be doing?" "We're not going to get that much guidance, but maybe some useful insights," Lewis replied.

Faculty extends Christmas break by one week

by Joe Ehlers

An amendment to the 1984-85 academic calendar lengthening Christmas vacation from two weeks to three was passed 49-41 by the faculty at its meeting last Wednesday. The new calendar was then approved with no further substantial changes.

Political science professor James MacGregor Burns also recommended that the Thanksgiving recess, which he referred to as "absolutely worthless" be abolished because it disrupts the semester too much.

The amended calendar, proposed by chemistry professor William R. Moomaw, came in response to the one proposed by associate provost David A. Booth and the Calendar and Scheduling Committee. That calendar would have started classes a week later next year while extending exam period until Dec. 22.

In compensation, and to avoid a conflict with New Year's Day, Booth's calendar set the beginning of Winter Study at Jan. 7. This date was also included in the Moomaw calendar which was finally passed, the major change being that Moomaw's calendar returned the beginning and ending of classes to their current dates. In the process, Christmas vacation gained an extra week.

Booth said he and the Calendar and Scheduling Committee proposed their calendar because "for the last three or four years students have consistently argued that the thing that most disturbs them about our calendar is that they do not have enough time for reading period and exams. Our calendar enables us to get 11 days total for reading period and exams as opposed to the nine we get in the present year."

However, Moomaw objected to Booth's calendar concluding exams only three days before Christmas. His amended calendar, while not having the longer exam period, "provides a tremendous benefit to the Committee on Academic Standing, which has to make judgments on students as early as possible, while promoting faculty-domestic tranquility, an unquestionable benefit," he said.

Fewer athletic events?

The main objections raised to the calendar which finally passed were that it once again placed the start of Freshman Days before Labor Day and that by extending vacation, it eliminated a week of activities during the winter.

Athletics department chairman Robert R. Peck in particular objected to the extension, arguing that it would interfere with the scheduling of winter athletic events.

"We have the most restrictions on our scheduling of any other college in the East," Peck said. "When we are to shave that by another week during the winter that's another problem for us....it makes our situation less attractive to our students and less attractive overall," he said.

As a sidelight, Booth explained that next year's calendar has been totally secularized, a longstanding goal of the Calendar and Scheduling Committee. "You will find no mention in the calendar any place of any kind of religious holiday of anybody's religion," Booth said. For example, he said Christmas recess will be known simply as "vacation."

Abolish Thanksgiving?

Political Science Professor James MacGregor Burns took the floor with a motion he said was "so shocking that I will offer it and then withdraw it." The motion was to eliminate Thanksgiving vacation completely because of its poor timing and disrupting effect on the semester, Burns said.

"I withdraw the motion," he stated, "in the hope that if someone on the Williams campus really wants to do something radical, say in the year 2003, that somebody here today will remember my thought concerning this absolutely worthless recess, and, I might add, this worthless Thanksgiving ceremony."

NASC students charged

O'Connor said the suspects were arrested after the police traced the license back to NASC, with the cooperation of the NASC security force.

Not guilty plea

The eight pleaded not guilty in Northern Berkshire Trial Court Nov. 16. Charged with larceny from a building over $100 were: Lee M. Carrara, 18; Brian W. Keefe, 18; Craig T. Drinkwater, 19; Jeffrey D. Jerveh, 18; Jeffrey W. Ell, 18; and Mark A. Connelly, 20. Connelly was also charged with possession of stolen property.

The maximum sentence for such larceny is two-and-a-half years; for stolen property, two years.

The two pledgemastrs, Michael R. McDermott, 21, and John A. Strzepek, Jr., 20, were both charged with possession of stolen property.

The cases were continued to December 14.

Jeffrey Less, the vice-president of the Pi Epsilon Pi fraternity, said he had no comment on the case.

"Typical prank"

The Vice-President for Student Affairs at NASC, Robert Summers, declined to comment on the specifics on the case, and did not say whether the college would take disciplinary action against the suspects.

He did say "we are not taking this lightly." Asked if the thefts were indicative of an unhealthy rivalry between the two schools, Summers said no. "This is a typical fraternity prank that escalated into something more."

O'Connor said most things of significant value were returned. Some of the recovered items had already been sold.

Don Weed '84 of Armstrong House, who had his guitar stolen, said the police recovered it and plan to use it as evidence before they return it to him. However, he said his suitemate Eric Stein '84 had a camera stolen from him and that it has not been recovered. "The police told Eric that he might get some restitution," Weed said.

Weed said he and Stein had not locked their doors that night, and still don't except on weekends.

The freshman in Williams A who was also robbed declined to be named but said he had not locked his door that night either. He said he locks it now.

Ockman is a specialist in nineteenth-century French art. She currently serves on the Committee on Academic Standing. She was unavailable for comment on the decision.

Margolis was unavailable for comment and Cunard declined to comment on why he withdrew from consideration.

Ockman, Tong and Alston have all been at Williams since 1978, when they were put on the six-year tenure track. Spear came to Williams in 1981 and was immediately placed on three-year consideration for tenure. He formerly was a tenured professor at La Trobe University in Melbourne, Australia.

More women profs

Oakley did discuss recent trends in the tenuring of women at Williams. He said that, excluding the two new candidates, 6.1 percent of the 98 tenured professors are women. Of the total voting faculty—182—33 percent are women.

However, he said women are coming up for and receiving tenure at the same rate as men are at Williams. The difference in overall number is due to the fact that women have traditionally entered the profession in smaller numbers.

Ennis-Dwyer masterful in Berkshire premiere

by Christian K. Howlett

Assistant Professor of Music Paula Ennis-Dwyer gave a masterful performance of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 with the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra Friday evening. The program, made up entirely of twentieth century works, also included Respighi's "The Pines of Rome" and Frederick Converse's "Flivver Ten Million".

Ennis-Dwyer, making her debut with the Berkshire Symphony, held the audience enthralled with her singularly beautiful performance. Opening the concerto with a dramatic yet light chord progression, she gracefully and effortlessly walked the line between the ostentatious and the understated.

The gentle and expansive adagio movement, with its familiar melody, was nearly flawless in its profound expressiveness. This movement in particular highlighted the fine playing of the first violin section and of clarinetists Susan Hohenberg and Elise Brown '85.

Russian-folksy theme

In the scherzando finale, Ennis-Dwyer remained firmly in command of the brilliant, Russian-folksy main theme, shifting gears with almost perfect control to the highly dramatic and lyric second theme. Although the cellos were a bit weak and the gong player a little overenthusiastic, the concerto ended convincingly, bringing the sizable audience to its feet in admiration.

Perhaps the most pleasant surprise of the evening for the audience was Frederick Converse's Impressionistic 1927 work "Flivver Ten Million," described by the composer as "a joyous epic inspired by the familiar legend 'The ten million Ford is now serving its owner.'"

Conductor Julius Hegyi directs the Berkshire Symphony in its second concert of the 1983-84 year. (Scheibe)

Although at times vastly expansive passages seemed almost to overwhelm both the orchestra and the hall, the piece remained thoroughly enjoyable. Its interesting orchestration included an auto horn, a factory whistle and an anvil, effectively performed by the percussion section in the balcony.

The concert continued with a more famous impressionistic program work, Respighi's 1924 tone poem, "The Pines of Rome." Unfortunately, in this wonderful piece the Berkshire Symphony gave its weakest performance of the evening. The frolicking first movement was played at a breakneck pace, far too loud and blaring, completely ignoring any of the music's nuances.

The slow and melodic second movement and the long and lyric third were handled much better, with an excellent muted trumpet solo by David Levy '85.

Instant crescendo

However, the triumphant finale, the gem of the work, completely lacked clarity. The grand crescendo suddenly appeared out of nowhere, instead of building slowly by degrees. In addition the violinists particularly looked as though they were trying to saw through their instruments instead of play them.

Part of the problem lay in the fact that conductor Julius Hegyi was too nebulous a director. His movements lacked definition, consisting usually of large arm swings instead of precise beats. During the Respighi he looked downright pixyish.

On the whole, however, the Berkshire Symphony's second concert of the year was an interesting and enjoyable one, elevated to the exemplary by the fine playing of Ennis-Dwyer.

New exhibits at WCMA

The Williams Studio Faculty show now on view at the College Museum bears little resemblance to ordinary faculty shows. None of the works are larger than 7" by 7", and are viewed from a high powered telescope at the opposite end of the huge 1954 Gallery. All of the works were done specifically for the show of the new Museum addition.

Art Professor Ed Epping described the show as "having a context larger than 'faculty show.' The group of faculty got together in agreement on a concept."

INSET: One of the faculty works by Lee Hirshe: a miniature construction made with an egg shell. (Scheibe)

"I paint not what I see but what I saw. Illness, insanity, and death were the black angels that hovered over my cradle and have followed me ever since through my life," said Edward Munch in 1890. The turbulent art of the Norwegian artist is on display at the College museum until Feb. 12. (Scheibe)

Bowdoin

R.P.I.

It seems that we are not the only college whose pub has trouble with pitchers. The Bowdoin pub, the Bear Necessity, now serves beer in 22 ounce cups instead of using pitchers. Students purchase the cups and then can get refills at reduced prices.

The Bowdoin Orient reports that the three year old establishment is gaining in popularity. Besides offering the 22 ounce glasses, manager Fred Tuggle has purchased extra chairs from the Maine State Prison and plans to start showing movies on weeknights.

While the Bear Necessity has become more crowded this year, it still caters primarily to upperclassmen. New state drinking laws coupled with Maine's 20-year-old drinking age have cut down on freshman and sophomore participation.

Students at R.P.I. competed in the school's first airband competition on November 18, sponsored by the Office of Housing and Resident Life. The Polytechnic reports that bands of one to five people competed for the $100 prize.

An airband usually consists of a lead air guitar, air drums, air bass, and an optional air keyboard. Students acted out all the movements of a rock band without actually playing instruments. The real music was supplied by the college radio station WRPI.

The concept of an airband competition is not new. R.P.I.'s contest was modeled after similar ones at the University of Vermont and the State University of New York at Albany.

LECTURE NOTES

William Bennett, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, said that a drop in standards for educators and students has resulted in poor student performance.

Bennett: Standards fall and $ wasted

William Bennett '65, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, opened this year's new "Educating America" lecture series last Wednesday by claiming that while money has been pumped into public schools and opportunities have been opened to children of all backgrounds, misguided policies have sent educational quality plummeting.

Bennett was also the Baccalaureate speaker at last June's Commencement.

"We've done a good job of getting everybody involved, but now we've got to work at excellence," he said, adding that most of the changes made to American schools in the last 20 years have made them less effective. As an example he cited figures which show that on the whole candidates for teaching jobs are less intelligent than most professionals.

"We have to change fairly dramatically the kinds of expectations we have for who is going to teach," Bennett said.

Reasons for decline

"As money has gone in, quality has gone down," he added, citing nine reasons for the decline in the quality of education:

- Those responsible for education have lost confidence.
- Educators have forgot the answers to the questions, "Why are people in school?" and "Why study?"

- Students have an attitude which questions authority.
- The rate of youth crime has risen.
- The status and honor of teaching have declined.
- Intellectuals have made vicious attacks on the schools, labeling principals as "prison guards."
- Methodological theories have been used, including the open classroom idea, which Bennett said "didn't hold water."
- The family unit has declined.
- The public is generally suspicious of standards.

"We do know now what makes for good schools," Bennett said, explaining that they must have strong leadership, high expectations of performance for students and teachers, straightforward discipline and a definite ethos or character.

Bennett said he supported merit-based pay for teachers and salary increases to attract better teachers, as well as tuition tax credits for private school parents, which he said would offer the public schools more competition.

"I am at this point guardedly optimistic," he concluded. "We will see some progress."

IQ test not dependable

Because of years of data misrepresentation and misleading claims on the part of many intelligence quotient researcher IQ tests cannot be considered valid, said Jerry Hirsch, a biology professor at Indiana University, last Monday night.

Hirsch, speaking as part of the IBM lecture series, also said that the impossibility of separating genetic from environmental factors means that IQ tests can never be a measure of an individual's inherent intelligence.

Hirsch, who is currently an editor of the Journal of Comparative Psychology, took particular issue with other researchers, most notably Arthur Jensen and William Shockley, who claim that differences in IQ test scores between races indicate corresponding differences in "racial intelligence."

Hirsch cited numerous instances of both cultural bias and outright fraud in various IQ studies. "If the scientific community will not unfrock the charlatans," he said, "science and the nation will suffer," as the injustice of flawed testing is carried on throughout society.

The long-term effects of such biased testing are as harmful as the short-term, according to Hirsch. Individuals falsely labeled as having "low intelligence" are actually only victims of socially biased research and researchers, but will bear the weight of those tests for the rest of their lives.

Hirsch illustrated this point by citing as a humorous example Lee Cronbach, a noted scientist, who was one of the first "gifted" individuals tested by the Stanford-Binet children's test in the 1930's.

According to Hirsch, Cronbach said that the early researchers were "looking for high IQ's and the assistants provided them. [In light of recent studies] it turns out that I have lived my life with an IQ that was ten points too high."

Hirsch added that the nation, as well as the individual victims, will be harmed by biased IQ testing, because potentially productive members of society will be denied the chance to realize their potentials and society will then be robbed of their possible contributions.

Lebanese situation explosive

A major catastrophe will inevitably occur in Beirut unless the United States alters its present futile course of trying to stabilize the region with a Marine presence, explained Raymond Baker and Daniel Connell in a panel discussion last Tuesday.

Baker, a professor of political science, and Connell, founder of Grassroots International, an organization helping the victims of the war in Lebanon, both emphasized that drastic changes are needed to avoid further war.

"The present situation is totally untenable," Connell said. "The Marine presence will not solve the problem. The Marines are sitting ducks waiting to be picked off one by one or one hundred by one hundred until they are gone."

Baker said the June 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon brought about the reestablishment of Israel as a regional superpower while still showing the resiliency of the Palestinian people.

In addition, he said, the invasion highlighted "the caution and soberness of the Soviet role contrasted with the remarkable complacency of the U.S. with the invasion," as well as "the ambivalence of the U.S. position in the area. Out of the invasion comes the peacekeeping role of the Marines. Originally their role was to allow for the exodus of the PLO."

"The situation is extremely dangerous," Baker said. "The Day After" showed a political scenario leading up to the nuclear war. In many ways that script is being written in the Middle East."

Connell, who was in Beirut during much of the war, noted that U.S. actions seemed to be leading in the wrong direction. "On the ground there was the feeling that withdrawal of the PLO fighters would lead to a massacre of the Palestinians, as it did, because there had been a long history of this," Connell said.

"Israel admitted indirect responsibility, but who is asking the question of American responsibility for the massacre? We signed agreements guaranteeing their safety, then we pulled out," he said.

Connell predicted that the U.S. presence in Beirut will increase. "The U.S. is propping up a minority government," he said. "What is needed instead is a restructuring of the whole political process bringing on a government representative of the interest of all people in Lebanon. Real economic and social development must take place. It can be done through large scale redevelopment at the grass roots level."

Software to replace programmers

A quotation from the Wall Street Journal: "Today, it is almost impossible to find a good programmer at any price. In ten years it will be almost impossible to find a bad programmer at any price," was chalked up on the blackboard behind Damon Hart '67 as he predicted the decline of the programmer in the oncoming computer age in a lecture last Wednesday.

Hart strongly criticized what he saw as the media-generated image of the computer future in which everyone would have to become a programmer in order to hold a decent job or to attend a college. In particular he cited television commercials such as those of Apple and Coleco computers which try to convince parents that without computers, their children will have little educational future.

He said that while "the computer will be built into every part of our lives, it will become invisible, it will be transparent to us. Instead of becoming a race of computer programmers, we will become a race of computer users." This is mainly because one does not need to know how to program a computer in order to use it, he said.

According to Hart, the future will see the decline of programmers because of their high price and to the amazingly fast deflation of hardware prices and sizes. In 1978, the cost of the software in a computer surpassed the actual cost of all the hardware, the physical machinery, of the computer, he said. It has now become more economical for most manufacturers to design more software for a computer than to pay a programmer to write it individual programs.

"Though there is a lot of bad and expensive software being written now," he said, "in the future, it will be economically infeasible" not to use software.

In the computer future, said Hart, "a liberal arts education has a real role to play" because it will help us choose "the social values as to where we should go with this technology," he said.

TRAVEL, GLORY, FAME, ROMANCE FORGET IT!

We won't promise any of that. All we offer is a good job on campus and a chance to try your hand at supervising others while working with your classmates and college staff members.

The Williams College Food Service Dept. is now taking applications for positions as Student Supervisors (Headwaiters) for this spring semester through the next fall semester.

If you're a Williams College student on the 14 or 21 meal plan, you're interested and have had some experience that you think might qualify you for the position, please come to the Food Service Office in Baxter Hall and fill out an application.

The application deadline is Monday, Dec. 12. For further information see any dining hall manager or call 2121.

A week of pink Bermuda beaches and warm Bermuda sun. Are you tough enough to take it?

Bermuda College Weeks
March 3 to 31 and April 14 to 21

One of our previous college visitors described this event as "a week of wretched excess." An exaggeration perhaps, but not altogether inaccurate.

Your week begins with a Sunday night Get Acquainted bash at one of our hotels, clubs or discos—meeting old friends, making new ones. The next morning, the tough part begins.

Spending day after sun-drenched day on soft, pink beaches. Swimming, tanning, body-gazing. Imbibing our special libations. Enjoying free beach buffet lunches, free calypso and steel band waterside concerts, even a free cruise—all courtesy of the Bermuda Department of Tourism.

What will you do with your free time? What won't you do! Bermuda is famed for its snorkeling and sailing, tennis and golf. For its fine restaurants, discos and British pubs. And for its fabulous mopeds—everybody's favourite way to tour the island.

Think you can handle a week of this? Talk to your campus friends, and see your Campus Travel Representative or your Travel Agent for complete details.

Concerts moved to rink—

 that," Gudaitas said. "I don't think we'll get it."

Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar, who was at the meeting, told the Record that installing the bafflers would be very expensive.

Chandler said he wanted to take things "one step at a time," and said he would prefer to try to reduce echo in the rink by putting a large curtain inside the south end of the building. O'Connor said the College is only tentatively planning to install the curtain. Gudaitas said a major drawback to holding the concerts in the rink is its capacity of 3000, an increase over Chapin. He explained that many rock groups charge fees on the basis of how large the capacity of the hall is, whether or not the promoters fill the seats.

He said the SAB would thus be forced either to rope off part of the seats and find a band who would accept that—a prospect Gudaitas thinks would limit the SAB's choice of groups—or to heavily promote off-campus to fill the rink.

"I think a shrewd manager should be able to find a group hungry enough to want to play here," O'Connor told the Record.

Gudaitas said the latter option would mean that most of the audience would be non-Williams people. He said he wasn't in favor of that, and that such concerts would pose more risk and work for the SAB. Chandler said he would "like to reserve judgement" on larger concerts because he said they would pose greater security and parking problems.

Gudaitas also said some groups will not play on a stage made only of risers, but require a permanent stage. He said it would cost the SAB $1,200 per show to rent a stage. Gudaitas thus asked the College to invest in its own portable stage.

"I'm willing to check into that," said Chandler. "It does seem desirable to have some place on campus where we can have such concerts."

Gudaitas said he was skeptical that the College would make the improvements needed to make the rink suitable for rock concerts because he says College officials think students aren't interested in the shows. He said students should consider whether they would want money spent on such improvements, or whether the SAB should instead devote all its resources to producing only jazz or folk concerts, which could be held in Chapin.

Basketball wins Berkshire Classic, beating Westfield, Bridgewater St.

by Dave Paulsen

Exams started a bit early for the members of the men's basketball team. First year coach Harry Sheehy put his team through a grueling pre-season practice schedule, and introduced a new offensive style of play for his squad.

But after winning the Berkshire Classic Tournament, it appears that the Ephs have passed their tests with flying colors.

Beat Bridgewater

Williams defeated Bridgewater State 78-63 in the finals of the tournament, behind the 22 points of co-captain Art Pidoriano '84. Tim Walsh '86 added 16 points, while center Dave Krupski '84 had 13 points.

Walsh was named the Most Valuable Player of the tournament, while Pidoriano made the all-tournament team.

First-round win

The Ephs gained entry in the final by trouncing Westfield State 84-60. That game was never close as the undisciplined bricklayers from Westfield played horrendous offense, and precious little defense.

Six players scored in double figures in that contest. Krupski led the way with 16 points and Pidoriano netted 12, while Walsh, co-captain John McNicholas '84, Mike Meadows '86, and Brandt Johnson '87 added 10 points apiece.

The Williams running game was in high gear in the two tournament games. Walsh was a master at leading the fast break, continually providing his teammates with passes for easy baskets.

Coach happy

Sheehy praised the play of Krupski, "who should have gotten some votes for MVP." Sheehy also cited the play of McNicholas and forward Russ Howard '84 in the small forward position.

Sheehy was happy with the team's play. "We eliminated the costly fouls and turnovers which had plagued us against Hamilton. I was happy because we improved over the last game."

Williams has won the Berkshire Classic, held at North Adams State College, three of the past four years.

Lose to Hamilton

In the Hamilton game, cold spurts at the ends of each half led to Williams' demise in the 87-80 loss.

Williams had jumped out to a 28-21 lead in that ballgame, only to be outscored 22-4 in the last four minutes of the half. The Ephs climbed back into the game in the second half behind Pidoriano's patented jumpshot, Walsh's inspired play, and three clutch jump shots by Howard.

With 4:24 left in the game, Williams held a 75-74 lead, but Hamilton capitalized on some Eph turnovers and poor shot selection to regain control of the game.

Pidoriano hits 1000

Pidoriano's 26 points in that game put him over the 1000 career point barrier. Sheehy said, "I'm really happy for Art. Now he can go after old Coach's record." (Sheehy, class of '75, holds the Williams career scoring record.)

Also scoring in double figures in the Hamilton game were Walsh, with 20 points, and Meadows and Howard with 10 points apiece.

In J.V. action, the Ephs defeated Hamilton 73-67 Tuesday, but lost to Albany State 91-86 Saturday. Jeff Roth '87

Co-captain John McNicholas '84 goes up for a shot in Williams' 87-80 loss to Hamilton Tuesday. The Ephs rebounded to take the Berkshire Classic this weekend. (Ruderman) poured in 20 points in the victory. Pat O'Malley '87 added 19 points, and John Clulla '87 chipped in 15 points. Clulla pumped in 30 points in the loss to Albany, while O'Malley added 24, and Roth 15.

The varsity travels to Norwich for a Wednesday night contest.

Pucksters bang North Adams, AIC

by Chris Harned

The hockey team (3-1) won the bragging rights in the Purple Valley with an impressive 4-0 victory over North Adams State (3-2-1) in a physical battle Saturday. Last Wednesday they defeated American International College 6-3.

Junior Rich Jackson put the Ephs ahead to stay at the 5:51 mark in the first period Saturday and passed off for assists on the Ephs' two third-period goals.

Jackson's power-play goal was set up by linemate Jeff Potter '85 and defenseman Paul Coleman '85, and Jackson slipped the puck under the pad of Mohawk netminder John Pasquale to secure the tally.

With 16:45 gone in the period, right wing Dan Finneran '84 intercepted a pass in the Williams zone and outmaneuvered two North Adams defenders through the Mohawk zone before slipping the puck past Pasquale to put Williams up 2-0.

Potter put the Ephs up by three at the 2:20 mark in the third after Jackson centered to him in the slot.

The teams accounted for nearly 60 minutes of penalties resulting from aggressive defensive tactics around both nets. The Ephs were able to stifle two third-period North Adams power plays, and one five-on-three series.

Goalie Dan Finn '84 played a flawless game in his first shutout this year, venturing far out of the net several times to turn back the Mohawks on breakaways. Five times in the fast-paced third period, Finn stopped shots at point-blank range.

The Ephs' final tally came at the 12:13 mark when left wing Chris Traggio '87 beat Pasquale to the upper right corner after Jackson moved the puck down the ice following freshman John Booth's break-out pass.

Crush A.I.C.

Assistant captain Brian Rutledge '85 and freshman Guy Kurtz each tallied once and passed off for another score to pace the Ephs Wednesday.

Williams broke on top early in the first period as Rutledge intercepted a pass and scored under goalie Don Morthouse's left pad with just 42 seconds gone in the game. Traggio put the Ephs up by two less than a minute later on another unassisted breakaway.

Kurtz recorded his first goal of the season at the 12:48 mark as he directed home a pass from classmate Mike O'Connell and Rutledge.

A.I.C. got its first goal of the game with just under two minutes remaining in the period to pull within two of the Ephs at 3-1.

Insurmountable

Williams continued to outskate the Yellowjackets in the second stanza and goals by Jackson (from Traggio and Erik Knutzen '86) and Potter (from Booth) put the Ephs up by an insurmountable 5-1 spread halfway through the period.

The Yellowjackets fell behind 6-1 on defenseman Mike Uretsky's slapshot just 52 seconds into the final period before they rallied with two goals against an increasingly sloppy Eph squad.

The team travels to Norwich Wednesday.

Ephs bounce past Bates, Middlebury

by Peggy Southard

The women's basketball team won their first two games of the season, beating Bates 64-58 Saturday and downing Middlebury 51-39 last Thursday.

Sunday, in a closely contested battle that came down to the last two minutes, the women held onto a small lead and stayed on top to beat Bates 64-58.

Despite Williams' halftime lead of 38-25, Bates took advantage of the Ephwomen's foul trouble to take a 57-56 lead with only 3:37 left in the game. But a steal on the in-bound by Denise Saunders '87 and fine outside shooting by tri-captain Tracy Burroughs '84, who ended with 20 points, recaptured and sealed the win.

Guard Liz Kellison '87 added 12 points, and junior tri-captain Kay Lackey had 10 points and 10 rebounds.

"In the second half we got into foul trouble," said Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin. "With four people on the floor with four fouls each, we could not play as aggressively as we wanted to. Consequently, Bates could come back. Still, we stayed poised, ran our offense, and maintained a three to four point edge to the end."

Mash Middlebury

At Middlebury, Williams' penetrating zone and man-to-man defenses, in addition to a full-court press, held the Panthers to one point in the first seven minutes, pacing the Ephs to a 26-15 halftime lead.

According to Hudson-Hamblin, the successful execution of the man-to-man press contributed to several Eph steals and to a 25 point lead late in the second half.

New faces

Lackey led Williams with 11 points. The 5'10" forward is one of four returning players. Several new faces, including six freshmen and 5'11" sophomore center Jean Hakmiller, have bolstered the team. Kellison made her college debut as she pumped in 10 points for the game. Hakmiller, also a first-year starter, led the rebounding

Undefeated squash team sweeps own tourney

by John Clayton

The squash team handily won the Williams Invitational tournament this weekend, beating all ten teams, as the top six players went undefeated.

"Our closest game was against the Naval Academy, which we won 6-3," said Coach Sean Sloane. "We blew everyone else's doors out."

The top six players—Greg Zaff '84, Bill Nau '84, co-captains Tom Harry '84 and Jamie King '84, Doug Roble '86, and Ben Thompson '85—were all undefeated for the weekend.

Everyone plays

"We got 24 different players into play (there are nine positions per match), and still were able to blow teams out," said Sloane. "This was good for team morale, and also for player development."

"That's why it's good to play this tournament at home, because we couldn't take 24 players on the road."

Following Williams, in order of finish, were Navy, Cornell, Colgate, Columbia and Bowdoin (tied for fifth), Fordham, Hamilton, Babson, and Colby and Vassar (tied for tenth).

Best ever?

Sloane said he expects this team to be one of the best ever at Williams, if not the best. "Zaff is one of the top three collegiate players in the country, and our top three all have an excellent chance to be All-Americans."

"The sky's the limit in terms of how far we can go," Sloane said. "We're looking forward to the University of Pennsylvania and Yale in January. The only team on our schedule we can't beat is Harvard, and they're number one in the country, so after them..."

Number two Bill Nau '84, shown here clobbering a Bowdoin Polar Bear, was undefeated this weekend, as were five of his teammates and his school. (Ruderman)

College cancels plans for Spring St. building

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

The College has decided not to construct a commercial building at the end of Spring Street after it discovered that the building would cost twice as much as was originally projected and would violate Williamstown zoning laws if built according to the original plan.

The College planned to use the building to temporarily house two Spring Street merchants whose stores, which they rent from Williams, will have to be demolished to make way for the new gym. Construction on the gym, which will be located south of the existing squash courts, is scheduled to begin this spring.

The proposed commercial building would also have provided much-needed retail space for other merchants interested in locating on Spring Street, College officials had said. The building would have been located between the American Legion and the Travel Store.

Because the building will not be built, the College is now considering where to house the Williams News Room and Goodman's Jewelers, the two merchants to be displaced.

Mobile homes

According to College Vice-President and Treasurer William Reed, one option would be to house the two businesses in mobile homes on the lawn in front of the squash courts. The College could also house them in a temporary structure that the College would build, or in existing College-owned floor space on Spring Street.

"This is not for two years—a lot can happen in that time," Reed said. "Another store might become available."

The Berkshire Eagle recently reported that Penny's Place, a woman's clothing store located next to The College Bookstore, will go out of business at the end of this month, possibly making room for the two businesses.

Director of Physical Plant

Winthrop Wassenar said the earliest the businesses might be disrupted would be summer 1985 and the College might wait until spring 1986, by which time the gym will be nearing completion.

After the new gym is finished, the College will then build a new two-story retail building on the present site of the News Room and Goodman's. Those two businesses will be located in that building, which will back directly into the gym.

(The merchants affected were not too upset about the change in plans—for their reactions, see accompanying story.)

Pappa Charlie's razed

Pappa Charlie's Delicatessen will join them in the new building. Wassenar said the College plans to tear down the brick addition to the Williams Bookstore which houses Pappa Charlie's, and renovate the older bookstore building (see story, p. 4).

The College had been planning the commercial building at the end of Spring Street since last spring, in conjunction with the gym project. According to Reed, the estimated cost of the building was $500,000.

However, when the College received bids on the building last Nov. 22, the low bid was $882,000 for the building alone. The architect's fee and the costs of the parking lot and exterior landscaping brought the total cost to just over $1 million, Wassenar said.

"We wanted to build a building that would be attractive and a real asset to the street," Reed said. "We kept adding desirable features and eventually the price just went out of range. The tenants couldn't have afforded the rent."

Reed said the College currently leases commercial space on Spring Street for, on average, $9.50 per square foot. In the new building, the average would have been $12 to $13.

Store owners react to shifting locations

A number of Spring Street businessmen told the Record last week that the cancellation of the planned commercial building at the end of the street and the resulting space shuffle (see story, p.1) would be somewhat inconvenient, but not harmful to their businesses.

The Williams News Room and Goodman's Jewelers will be affected the most because the College must demolish their current stores, which it owns, to make way for the new gym. The College may temporarily house the two in mobile homes on the lawn in front of the squash courts. The two businesses could be displaced for as long as eight months to a year before the College rehouses them in a new building on their current site.

"It shouldn't affect business at all," said Billy Paradise, owner of the News Room. "We have a certain trade which should keep coming—we cater to the students."

"Naturally it will be an inconvenience but in the long run it should turn out to be very nice," he said. "We're supposed to have double the space in the new building. We'll be able to offer more things to students."

"Rather be up here"

Dick Goodman, owner of Goodman's Jewelers, said "any move is going to affect me. But I would rather be up here than down there," he said, referring to the site of the cancelled building at the end of Spring Street. He said that because his merchandise is small he will not be too disrupted by moving out of his store. However, he has voiced concern to the college about security problems in a mobile home or temporary building.

Goodman said he hopes the construction can take place during the summer. "My busiest times are around May and December—for graduation and Christmas," he said. "It would be good if it was done by then."

Salvatore's, the shoe store, was going to move into a larger space in the cancelled building. But Tony Chojnowski, the store's manager said he "wasn't too crazy about moving down there to begin with...I wasn't pleased about the mix of stores there. We are going to remodel here instead."

"I am happy where I am," said David Dickey, owner of the Travel Store. His store was to have been demolished to make way for the commercial building next door, and he would have moved into it.

"I was prepared to make the switch," he said. "It would have been an inconvenience, but I was prepared to do it for the sake of the town and the College."

Officials of the Berkshire Bank, which was planning to start a branch with a drive-through in the building, could not be reached for comment.

New phone system causes hassles for students and administrators

by R. DeMott

This week, students returned to campus to find a new telephone system installed at the college. The new electronic system, Dimension, replaces the old Centrex system which the college has had since 1972. Since the change-over on December 16, AT&T and New England Telephone workers have been on campus constantly trying to iron out bugs in the system.

"Every day I go home with a headache," said Charlotte Marlowe, who oversees the telephone system and has listened to dozens of student complaints every day.

She estimates that there are problems with as many as one quarter of the student telephones on campus. She added that the problems seem to be concentrated in certain areas of the campus, such as Tyler Hall, where some phones are still completely inoperative.

During the vacation, spot-checks of the various dormitories did not turn up many problems, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden. However, Marlowe said, "the ones they spot-checked worked fine, it's the ones that they didn't check that are the problem."

She explained that with so many telephones it was impossible to check each one and therefore the problems wouldn't become apparent until the students began using their telephones.

Administration first

"The priority has been to deal with the administrative phones (first)," said Marlowe. "We've been concentrating on the administrative offices, but when they fix a few more things, we'll switch to the students," agreed Riorden.

He added that if the problems cannot be rectified quickly, student service may be shut down and the students refunded that part of their term bill which covers telephone service. Or, students could be taken off the system and given new telephone numbers from the 458-Williamstown exchange, he said.

However, these are drastic measures which would only be taken as a last resort, Riorden said.

New Billing Procedure

With the new Dimension system students will no longer get a telephone bill from New England Telephone every month, according to Marlowe. Instead, they will be responsible directly to the college for their toll calls.

In addition, the new system

Williams second best says college survey

by John McDermott

Is there any truth to a recent U.S. News and World Report survey of college presidents which listed Williams as the second best liberal arts college in the nation behind Amherst? "The whole poll is a bit bogus and I'm not taking it seriously," Dean Daniel O'Connor said, adding that the presidents' judgements were based on "hearsay."

The magazine sent questionnaires to 1,308 four year college presidents, asking them to name the top five schools from a list of schools with sizes, programs and geographical ranges like their own.

U.S. News published the results November 28. Of the 662 respondents, 43.9 percent named Amherst College the top liberal arts school for undergraduates. Williams and Swarthmore tied for second place, with 36.6 percent of the first-place votes. Carleton and Oberlin colleges finished third and fourth, respectively.

"It's rather ridiculous to try to rank colleges on a very refined scale," College President John Chandler said. "People hear the name Amherst with much more frequency (than Williams)."

Chandler, who declined to name the other four schools he selected in the survey, said he did list Williams first.

More business grads

"We're tops in business leadership," he said, citing Standard and Poor's 1982 Executive/College Survey which listed Williams first of 219 liberal arts colleges in the number of graduates working as officers or directors of major U.S. com-

The Williams Record

Welcome forum

Eleven students attended last Thursday's all-college meeting on Baxter Hall.

This turnout would seem to indicate student apathy toward the Baxter Hall renovation design. It does not indicate lack of desire to renovate Baxter Hall. Most students seem pleased that their 12:15 mail rush will be much less frenzied.

The meeting's low attendance simply indicates that the issue is not controversial. Certainly the renovations will be an improvement for the student union, and hopefully those students who had complaints and special interests have already made an input into the designs.

This kind of meeting would be an excellent forum for somewhat more controversial issues. There are issues each year when students are upset about not only the administration's decisions but lack of opportunity for student input into those decisions.

Rarely when such decisions as banning rock concerts in Chapin Hall, changing housing transfer rules, or ending row house dining are made are all-college meetings held. It would be welcome if when these issues came up there was a dean who would explain the pending proposal and ask for student reaction and suggestions.

The College could hope for a better turnout on these issues.

Second to none

Our own Williams was ranked runner-up to the Defectors of 1821, Amherst in a recent U. S. News and World Report survey of college presidents. Frankly, we find this hard to believe.

In our own Record poll of six students at the Log, all responded overwhelmingly that Williams deserves number one. On the basis of this survey, we urge the College to conduct a more comprehensive, more scientific nationwide survey of Williams alumni to exonerate our tarnished reputation. The Record feels confident that such a poll would put Amherst in its place.

If this fails, we should, following the advice of Dean O'Connor and President Chandler, change our name to make it earlier in the alphabet ("Billiams"?), and trade our football team for the one at the University of Miami. Furthermore, if all else fails, we can adopt a catchier fight song. Maybe something like "Surfing USA."

Brrrrring! Brrrrring!

by John Clayton
I answered my roommates' phone the other day. (That was because it rang, which is more than you can say for some phones on our floor.)

"Hello."
"O.K., please hold on and I'll connect you with Mr. Reardon."
Wow! I'd heard that this new phone system could do a lot, but I didn't know that handling conversations with secretaries was part of it.

The only problem was that I didn't know who Mr. Reardon was, or why I wanted to talk to him.

"Hello," I said again.
"Hi, Shane. It's Don."
This phone had remarkable capabilities! It turned me (or maybe my roommate) into someone named "Shane". The first thing that came to my mind was the old movie and the little boy screaming "Shane! Shane! Come back, Shane!" As I remembered, Shane was a pretty cool guy, even if he did end up with a shirftful of ketchup after being shot in the last scene.

However, I had no clue who Don was, so I just mumbled something.

"Hello," said a third party.
You probably envision each new subsection of this article to begin with a "Hello," while I talk with luminaries like Shane, Mr. T, Cap'n Crunch, and Chris Harned.

While that might make an amusing story, that's not what really happened (not that this is really...well, sort of).

What really happened was that Don and the third party started carrying on a conversation about phones. I wasn't paying very close attention, because I was still trying to figure out if I was, or was talking to, Shane, or Don, or the secretary, or Mr. T (although I soon ruled out that last possibility).

Eventually, I figured it out: I wasn't Shane; Mr. Reardon was Shane; indeed he was Shane Riorden; and he didn't have ketchup on his shirt; because he was the College's Bussiness Manager and not an actor named Alan Ladd.

"Am I supposed to be in on this conservation?"

Furthermore, Don was calling Shane Riorden about the phones because our phone system was screwed up, which probably had something to do with my roommate's phone ringing.

"Excuse me, am I supposed to be in on this conversation?"

That's an odd thing to say; it must be even odder to hear, especially if you're talking about something secret or illegal or embarrassing. (Phones, the topic of this conversation, are none of the above).

"Who are you?" they asked—a natural response, although who I am probably had little relevance to my belonging in the conversation.

"I'm in West College, and my phone rang."

"Aha," said Shane with a sigh, "we have another problem," and then I realized that it was he who was the gunslinger in the old movie, and bad guys were popping up in phones all over campus, and by the end of the month he would probably have a shirftful of ketchup, too.

NEWSBRIEFS

By the end of the school year, this two-story brick garage in Eph's Alley off Spring Street will house Williamstown's newest restaurant, the Tulip Cafe.

Most failures In 20 years

More students failed to meet their academic requirements last semester than at any other time in the last twenty years, according to figures just released by the Registrar's Office.

Twelve students were required to resign and 31 were placed on academic probation. The total of 43 failing students is almost double the 22 of last semester. Of those 43, 24 were sophomores. Eight sophomores were asked to leave, as opposed to 2 freshmen, one junior and one senior.

The average number of students disciplined by the Committee on Academic Standing each semester is about 22. However, Dean Daniel O'Connor attributed this semester's dramatic increase to a "statistical blip. You get one every once in a while," he said.

O'Connor did note that for failure rate "there is a direct correlation to class attendance. Practically everyone who was in trouble (academically) simply didn't go to class," he said. "It simply reflects a lack of motivation. I don't think it's a long-term trend."

To be placed on academic probation, a student must fall below the minimum requirement of three C minuses, O'Connor said. Students are asked to withdraw if they are on probation and continue not to meet the requirement, or in some cases simply if they have failed two or more courses in a semester.

O'Connor said students who withdraw typically study elsewhere for a semester or two and then return to Williams.

He said he was not surprised by the large proportion of sophomores disciplined, noting that every year that class leads the others.

"It's the typical sophomore slump pattern," he said. "It's mostly not yet being in a major or knowing your strengths. The charm (of freshman year) is gone and a student can often become confused. This often leads to a pattern of cutting classes and before they know it, they're in trouble."

New cafe to be In Eph's Alley

Construction should begin within the month on the new Tulip Cafe behind Town and Country Flowers in Eph's Alley, according to Scott Van Hensburgen, owner and operator of the new restaurant.

"The cafe should be finished by April when the tulips come up, or at least by graduation and alumni weekends," Van Hensburgen said. "We'll offer good quality cooking at a good price."

"While the menu is not yet finalized," he noted, "it will revolve around daily specials. We'll cater mainly to students and townspeople and will be open from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., offering lunch, dinner, and late night fare, as well as a Sunday brunch."

Designed by local architect Ann McCallum, "the cafe will be high-tech in design and will have seats for 30 people," Van Hensburgen said. Upon completion of the building, which is currently a two-story brick garage, will also house Van Hensburgen's catering firm, Panache Catering Services.

Van Hensburgen, a Williamstown resident, was manager of the College Faculty House for four years before resigning last year to pursue his private ventures.

Briggs trades WOC for alums

James R. Briggs has resigned his positions as director of the Outing Club and head coach of the varsity baseball team to become Executive Director of Alumni Relations, a new position created to coordinate the work of the Development and Alumni offices' fund-raising efforts.

"My job is to make sure the Alumni fund continues to be the best in the United States. I will help coordinate everything with Alumni relations as well as help solicit major capital gifts," explained Briggs.

Briggs had been director of the Outing Club since 1982. His wife, Mary Lou, who has been involved in the club for 12 years, will run it through Winter Carnival, he said. After that a new director will be appointed.

Students showed little interest Thursday in the plans to renovate Baxter Hall as only eleven showed up at the all-campus meeting to present the proposed changes.

Dean David Colby, chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life, presented the plans for Baxter, which he said was "designed for an era we are no longer in and a type of college that doesn't exist anymore."

Colby summarized the changes by saying that four basic rules were used in redesigning the building. "The first floor should be a common floor," he said. "Specific functions should be kept to the basement, the Food Service should Briggs said he will especially miss coaching the baseball team, which he has done since 1974. "I loved every minute of it," he said. He explained that the athletic department is currently interviewing outside candidates for the coaching job, and hopes to fill the position in the near future.

"I think Williams is the best college in the country," Briggs said. "It has the best students around. It's worth making sure it stays in the best shape. I was asked (by President Chandler) to do this job and I think I have something to offer. It is really important that it gets done."

Briggs, a 1960 graduate of Williams, returned here in 1968 as an assistant director of alumni relations, responsible for the College's Annual Fund and Parents Fund. In 1973 he was named Director of Annual Giving, a position he held until 1979.

"Jim Briggs has demonstrated an unusual capacity to organize, direct and motivate volunteer fund-raisers," President John W. Chandler said. "Williams is fortunate that a person with his experience and ability will be assuming the important responsibilities which the new appointment entails."

Clark to sort Art of brothers Prendergast

Carol Clark, curator of paintings at the Amon Carter Museum in Fort Worth, Texas, has been named the Maurice and Charles Prendergast Executive Fellow at the Williams College Museum of Art, and Adjunct Curator of American Art at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.

In mid-January Clark will assume responsibility for the day-to-day work on a systematic catalogue of the art of Maurice and Charles Prendergast, two early twentieth-century American painters. The project is expected to take four or five full-time researchers about three years to complete.

The catalogue, funded by the Prendergast Foundation, will include an introduction and essays by scholars detailing the life and work of the Prendergasts, and a full entry for every one of their works.

Clark plans to offer a course or colloquium to introduce students to important aspects of methodology and to integrate the project into the life of the College, she said. "It is important for students of art history to have an example of how research is conducted on this type of project," she added.

Reichert new Dean of Faculty

English professor John Reichert will replace history professor Francis Oakley as Dean of the Faculty beginning July 1, 1984. Reichert will continue teaching during his term as Dean.

According to Oakley, who has held the position of Dean since January 1977, the job entails dealing with such things as "appointments, promotions, tenure, and leaves of absence." Additionally, the Dean of the Faculty is involved in generating curriculum and in the professional development of teaching and scholarship. Oakley said.

As Dean, Oakley sees himself working to "stimulate and invigorate the intellectual life of the faculty." Reichert voiced no specific plans for the job, stating that "I'm on leave right now, so I try to think of it as little as possible."

Oakley will be on leave in Williamstown during the first semester of next year. He will return to teaching second semester, although Reichert will remain Dean of Faculty.

Pasachoff's New star guide

Astronomy professor Jay M. Pasachoff, director of the Hopkins Observatory, is the author of the new version of "A Field Guide to the Stars and Planets." Pasachoff, whose astronomy textbooks are the most widely used in the United States, was asked by Houghton Mifflin to revise the original Field Guide written 20 years ago by professor Donald H. Menzel, director of the Harvard College Observatory.

The heart of the book is a set of 52 charts covering the entire sky, drawn by Wil Tirion, the well-known Dutch celestial cartographer. Pasachoff and Tirion also invented a new type of display for monthly star maps, each showing the sky as it looks at a given time of night.

The book describes how to observe the sky and what newcomers to astronomy can hope to see. The guide can be used by beginners in sky observation, although the tables and sky charts are thorough enough for professional astronomers.

have few changes, and offices in use frequently should be kept on the first floor."

Students at the meeting voiced concern over telephone service in the remodeled building, and whether or not there would be a piano in the lounge. The possibility of leaving part of the building open all night for a study lounge was also brought up, but Colby said that "as of now, I believe a portion of Hopkins or Sawyer would probably be left open during the night (instead)."

Colby said later he was not surprised by the tiny student turnout. "It's simply that there's no controversy surrounding the plans we've developed," he explained. "All the groups seem to be relatively satisfied. If we'd done something like throw the Outing Club out, we'd have had a major controversy."

Colby disagreed that the lack of attendance reflected student apathy about the Baxter renovations. "I think all the way along we got a lot of great ideas from students," he said, noting that members of CUL, College Council and many other student organizations had already seen and discussed the plans.

Outside of the meeting, some students expressed favorable reactions to the plans. "I like the idea of the mallroom being switched," said Jeff Yegian '87. "That room has to be changed." "I think it's about time the college utilizes this space to its proper potential," added Chris Pasko '87. "This is probably one of most wasteful places in the world. For example, the inter-campus mail envelopes. It's about time they got their act together."

Upperclassmen, who are less likely to be affected by the changes, seemed more apathetic in their reactions. "It may not be that good of a student union, but is it that big of a deal?" they asked.

"I don't even know anything about it," said one upperclasswoman who asked not to be named. "There was information in the paper, but it didn't really interest me. In the end, the school is going to do whatever they want anyway."

Baxter Hall All campus Meeting Draws 11

Pappa C.'s to be razed

The College plans to restore the building which houses the Williams Bookstore and rip down Pappa Charlie's Delicatessen, located in the brick addition to the book store. Winthrop Wassenar told the Record last week.

Wassenar, who is Director of Physical Plant, said Pappa Charlie's will be relocated to the retail building which the College will construct north of the Adams Block (on the present site of the News Room and Goodman's Jewelers) in conjunction with the new gym project.

Wassenar had previously said the building housing the book store might be demolished, and the book store would be moved to the planned commercial office building at the end of Spring Street, which has since been canceled. (see story, p.1)

"That was my dream—to stay here," said Joe Dewey, owner of the Williams Bookstore. "This is a nice building, an excellent location for students and tourists."

Deli "looks lousy"

Dewey said he would not be sorry to see the brick addition which houses the deli go. "I don't think the building needs it. I think it looks lousy." He also said the deli creates cooking smells which seep into his store, which he won't miss either.

Wassenar said the College will spend up to $100,000 to restore the building.

"We need to do work on the roof structure," he said. "It needs additional support in order to meet present [building] code requirements." Wassenar said the College will also do work on the building's bathrooms, internal stairway and outside porch, which he said is rotting away.

Historical significance

Wassenar said one reason the building will be restored is that it has historical significance. According to art professor emeritus Whitney Stoddard, the building was built in 1810 and is in the Greek Revival style.

"There's not much Greek Revival still left around town, so I'm glad it's being saved," Stoddard said.

The building served a number of functions, and sat in a number of locations, before assuming its present appearance. According to Stoddard it was, at one time, a general store, a post office and a bathhouse for the College. He said it was first located on the site now occupied by the First Congregational Church and was then moved to the corner of Spring Street, where Lasell Gymnasium is now, before finally ending up in its present location.

Dewey said the book store began operation in 1848.

Michael Nikitas, who helps his father Charlie run Papa Charlie's said it "doesn't really matter if our business is here or there," but said that the current store is "a huge building—I hate to see it go." He said he hopes he can move the wooden benches in the store to the new location.

Nikitas said the move will be inconvenient because he has a lot of kitchen equipment to move. He also said he hopes the deli will not have less space in the new location than it presently has. He currently uses the basement of the entire building for storage.

"A financial loser" "The College wasn't prepared to subsidize the cost," Reed said. "The building would have been a financial loser, and I couldn't justify building it."

The College decided not to go ahead with the building in mid-December, he said. The College had no obligation to any of the merchants who were to move into the new building because no leases had yet been signed, Wassenar added.

However, by contract the College must pay 80 percent of the architect's fee, which will be about $40,000, Reed said. The architect was William Kirby of Williamstown.

Parking lot crossed boundary The College also decided not to go ahead with the commercial building because a Williamstown resident pointed it out to the town Zoning Board of Appeals that the proposed parking lot behind the building would have extended into College-owned land in a residential zone, a violation of the town zoning law, Wassenar said. The lot would have extended over the zoning boundary by about 70 feet, he said.

Wassenar said the College would not have been permitted to settle for a smaller lot because the zoning law also requires that parking lots of commercial buildings be large enough to accommodate the number of cars likely to need parking space.

Reed said that the mistake was "an honest oversight. I have no complaints about Mr. Kirby."

College officials declined to name who had pointed out that the lot would cross the zoning line, but said the person was a Williamstown resident.

Recycled parking lot

Wassenar said the College had already begun to prepare the proposed site for construction. "We had cut down trees and laid gravel so that it could be paved," he said. He said the College will probably build a new, larger parking lot on the site. The College already ripped up an existing parking lot to prepare the site.

Wassenar said the College may apply to the zoning board to redistrict the zone so that when the College rebuilds the parking lot, it can make it bigger.

Regardless of the size of the proposed lot, if it is built the College will probably let the town use it as a municipal lot, free of charge, as it did with the original lot, Wassenar said.

College construction and demolition may temporarily force the Williams News Room and Goodman's Jewelers into mobile homes on this lawn in front of the squash courts. (Scheibe)

Cap and Bells kicks off 1984:

Dogg's Hamlet in DownStage

by Ned Ladd

Something's happening on DownStage this weekend but they're not speaking our language. Well maybe they are, but it doesn't make any sense. Actually it's Tom Stoppard which may be a little bit of both. Cap and Bells presents Dogg's Hamlet in its first production of the new year.

The play takes place in what appears to be an English pre-prep school, only the actors don't have British accents and don't speak English. They communicate in Dogg, a language whose words are identical to their English counterparts except that they mean entirely different things.

One can imagine the results when one English-speaking person enters the world of Dogg. Stoppard cleverly uses the language, milking the lines for their humor potential.

Stoppard plays with Shakespeare (as he often does) in the middle of the work by presenting a fifteen minute condensed version of Hamlet. Stoppard parodies works like the Reader's Digest Condensed Novels and the USA Today by eliminating the "unnecessary" elements.

Director Scott Todd '86 brings this comedy to life. "Language is an arbitrary set of conventions we all agree to share," he said. When those conventions are broken down, the language becomes useless. "There is nothing inherent in a word itself," he said. "It takes on meaning as soon as you decide to interpret it."

The communication barrier, both literally and figuratively, permeates the play. "Language can be a wall between people," said actor Chris Varrone '85.

The set consists of planks, slabs, bricks, and cubes on a blank stage. Varrone called Dogg's Hamlet "exactly the right kind of play for DownStage." Because of the intimacy of the theater Scott said, "The audience is an integral part of our performance."

Dogg's Hamlet will be performed Thursday through Sunday night at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are free and are available at the DownStage box office one hour before the performance.

Acconci sculpts "Body Walls"

by Michael Govan

Contemporary sculptor Vito Acconci completed his most recent work, "Body Walls," at the Williams College Museum of Art last November. The work was commissioned by the Museum for $5000 and will become part of the Museum's permanent collection.

Acconci became known in the late 60's and early 70's for performance and body art, but in the mid '70's turned to site-specific sculpture. His recent works employ recurring architectural motifs such as walls, rooms, stairs, tables and chairs.

His interest in architecture generated the piece at Williams, which consists of huge walls and stairs. Up the stairs and inside the walls are doors which when opened reveal chairs. It is meant to be looked at, walked on and sat in.

Unlike any of Acconci's previous work, however, the architecture is subordinate to figurative images. The billboard-size walls are in the form of a horse, a dog, and a reclining female nude (the nude is painted vivid pink). Carved out of the 'reclining nude' wall is a plexiglass mirror-lined mouse, and on the inside of each door is a mirror with a painted fetus image. On the side of the nude's leg on a background of clouds and blue sky are written the words "BURN BABY."

Most of Acconci's sculptures were intended for temporary installation and consequently almost none are owned by museums. The function of a museum, says Acconci, is to support painting rather than sculpture—because sculpture must be re-built each time it goes up, while a painting can simply be hung on a wall. Acconci has never done a painting himself, but sees much of his interest in figurative image as a response to today's trends toward neo-expressionist painting.

"A wall in a museum," says Acconci, "is used to support an image, a painting. An additional wall, then, might be an image."

The image itself is suggestive if not somewhat controversial. "'Wall' means 'image' means 'myth' means 'monument.'" In the back of my mind there was the notion of a painting that can be walked through," says Acconci, "If the walls can be used, by people, then the myth might be brought down to earth."

"Once the blatant sexism is there, then the sub-

Sculptor Vito Acconci and his most recent work, "Body Walls," commissioned by the Williams College Museum of Art. (Govan)

version of it can be there. I hope those words (BURN BABY) will subvert it. I hope the baby images could, in some way—I mean the fact of a woman being loaded with these things—of being burdened by them.

"I would hope the people who support the myth, once it's made so big and cartoon-like, would feel a little embarrassed."

Acconci intends the piece to take a feminist point of view, but not without challenging that same point of view. "I would want the piece to challenge those people too—those people who feel so sure that they're right....Maybe sexuality is a little more complicated."

"What do you do with things that don't fit into your intellectual scheme of things yet you feel some sort of desire toward them? Do you say, 'I can't feel desire for them because they aren't politically correct,' or, 'I feel desire for them, therefore I obviously am incorrect, or is there some way to use all those things at the same time?'"

"In saying so much there's not one side or the other—the plot is always a little more thickened than that. I think that's been true about all my work," says Acconci.

Arts in View

The life of noted jazz conductor Paul Whiteman has been chronicled by Williams graduate Thomas DeLong '57 in his book Paul Whiteman, King of Jazz. Whiteman led the country's most popular jazz orchestra in the Twenties, Thirties, and Forties and did much to legitimize and popularize the genre. In the early part of this century, Williams was closely connected with jazz and Whiteman. The Whiteman Collection in Stetson Hall represents one of the most extensive libraries of his life and work....Dance choreographer Blondell Cummings will be in residence until January 24 providing instruction and preparing a piece that Williams students will perform. An original member of the notable Meredith Monk's "House", Cummings has toured the United States, Europe, and Asia as a soloist. According to Dance Society Co-President Ted Thompson, Cummings "will provide Williams dancers a chance to work with a professional in her own area....Music in the Round will perform works by d'Indy, Prokofiev, and Beethoven in concert Friday night in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall at 8:00 P.M. The quintet consists of Julius Hegyl, Lisa Hegyl, Janet Rowe, Susan St. Amour, Douglas Moore, and Charlotte Hegyl....A fifteen piece bronze collection from contemporary artists entitled Six in Bronze will open Sunday at the College Museum of Art. The six artists, primarily New York-based, have experimented in various genres of art and have only recently discovered bronze, according to the Museum's assistant curator, Vivian Patterson. "This is the first time this type of group has been seen in the Berkshires," she said. There will be a preview Thursday night. The show will be on display through February.

Jonathan Hay wins Rhodes scholarship

by Sarah Abernathy
Jonathan Hay '84 recently became the 26th Williams student since 1905 to win a Rhodes scholarship. Hay, along with 31 other American scholars, will study at Oxford University in England next fall with all expenses paid.
Hay has completed his graduation requirements and has left Williams. He was a Russian language and literature major and plans to study philosophy, politics and economics when he begins at Oxford in October, he said.
The Rhodes Scholarship is awarded on the basis of literacy and scholastic abilities, leadership capabilities, and athletic interest and achievement. Of the 1,214 students who applied only 75 were chosen worldwide.
The last Williams student to win a Rhodes scholarship was Christopher Suits '81, and before that Karen Walker '79, the first woman to win from Williams.

Hay took a leave of absence his sophomore year and traveled in the western United States working as a farm hand and on an oil crew. He spent the first semester of his junior year studying in the Soviet Union.
In November Hay was awarded the Williams College Herschel Smith fellowship which provides for study at Cambridge University. He has declined it in favor of the Rhodes. The fellowship now goes to first alternate Alison Tucher, '84, who is still awaiting news of another Oxford fellowship, the Keasbey fellowship.
If Tucher receives another fellowship, the Herschel Smith will go to second alternate Eric Stein '84.

CC to reexamine constitution, seeking greater student input

by Michael Govan and Chris Howlett
In an attempt to bring policy closer in line with current practice, leaders of the College Council are forming a committee to examine the organization's constitution and propose needed revisions.
The committee, which is being organized by Council president Tom Paper '84 and Council vice president Jan Van Eck '85, will include a dean, at least one faculty member, and several students, including members of the Council, CUL and Gargoyle, the two said.
According to Paper, outdated constitutional provisions such as the ones calling for all-campus meetings once a month and placing the Housing Committee under Council control need to be revised. "We hope to streamline the constitution and make it usable by the Council," Paper said, noting that too often the Council simply sidesteps the constitution instead of working with it.
Currently the constitution stipulates a myriad of standing committees under the Council. Paper said he believes the Council would operate much more efficiently with temporary sub-committees drafted for particular issues at particular times.
Paper and Van Eck said that they also hope to make constitutional changes which will make it clearer to the administration and Trustees that students are part of the decision-making process.
For example, said Paper, "We would like to propose a student co-chair for the CUL. If it is really a student-faculty committee then it should be headed by both students and faculty."

The revisions will also, according to Van Eck, clarify the relationship between College Council and such student groups as Gargoyle and CUL. However he emphasized that the revisions will not make any major changes in the basic operations of student government.
Van Eck hopes the committee can present its proposed changes to the Council for approval in time to place them on the general election ballot February 27-29.
The greatest difficulty in affecting the constitutional changes, according to Van Eck, will be gaining the approval of 50 percent of the student body necessary for passage under the present constitution.
In other business, the Council will sponsor its second student-faculty dinner Thursday, January 19.
Recently the Council received the $1000 Isaac grant which it plans to use for a major celebration of Ephraim Williams' birthday March 7. Although plans are not yet final, a student-faculty ball may highlight the festivities.
In addition, the Council is currently taking nominations for recipients of the Grosvenor Award, given annually by the Council to the junior who "best exemplifies the traditions of Williams College," Paper was last year's recipient.

panles. Williams had 355 such corporate leaders while Amherst had only 263.
"Academicians tend to rate colleges in terms of the production of scholars," Chandler said. "We do better at contributions to the nation, and to the world."
"I think it had a lot to do with the alphabet," O'Connor said, noting the magazine also listed Swarthmore's name above Williams.
"I don't think our national reputation is strong enough," Director of Admissions Philip Smith said, but he added that being seen among the top five will have a positive effect on admissions.
"If you're in the top five, that's fine," he said. "The better students will look longer and harder. But where I think we belong is number one."
O'Connor agreed that Williams probably would not lose promising students to Amherst because of its rating in the survey. "Our loss is to Harvard, Princeton, Yale, and Stanford," he said.

"A popularity poll"
English department chairman Peter Berek called the survey "a kind of popularity poll among college presidents."
Berek, a 1961 graduate of Amherst, said that school attained its "present high level of quality" in the 1950's, while Williams reached a similar level in the following decade. "The reputation of a college is often based on what the college used to be like, rather than what it is like," he said.
Samuel Banks, president of Dickinson College in Pennsylvania, said in U.S. News and World Report that he chose Williams first because of its "joyous, unswerving devotion to the very roots of the liberal arts."
Chandler suggested one of the reasons Amherst may have edged out Williams was that "they have a catchier school song." However, he said he was not concerned about the survey. "The (Williams-Amherst) football game was a more serious loss."

Solomon in "Who's Who"

Associate professor of psychology Paul R. Solomon has been selected to appear in the first edition of "Who's Who in Frontier Science and Technology."
His most recent work has been on neural aspects of learning and memory, particularly damage to the hippocampus, a structure in the brain which affects memory. He is co-author of an introductory psychology text and is currently writing another book titled "Scientific Writing: A Student's guide to Research Report Writing in Psychology."
"Who's Who in Frontier Science and Technology" is published by the same company that produces "Who's Who in America" and is patterned after that publication.

Phone problems

provides the college with a mechanism to restrict telephone usage so that students who do not pay their bills could be limited to local or campus calling only, she said.
As an added incentive for students to pay their bills promptly, Riorden said that bills will be discounted by 10 percent if they are paid within 10 days. Marlowe asked that students be prepared to pay by check if possible.
Students will not be getting new "Touch-tone" phones as many had anticipated. According to Riorden, this was judged too costly. He said that sometime in the future each student may be provided with a modular jack and required to provide his or her own telephone.
Riorden added that the installation of the phone system was delayed because of the divestiture of the Bell System.
"We had great difficulty getting basic financial figures out of anybody," said Riorden. He reported, however, that the split had saved money for the college, since AT&T, who is now contracted to work on the system, does not charge as much as the Bell System would have.

Another factor which Riorden said hinders the operation of the new system is peoples' unfamiliarity with it. He noted that many of the reported problems on the administrative phones are simply the result of people using them incorrectly. "By and large, I find that people learn to use them if I sit down and talk to them for a little while."

A week of pink Bermuda beaches and warm Bermuda sun. Are you tough enough to take it?

Bermuda College Weeks
March 3 to 31 and April 14 to 21

One of our previous college visitors described this event as "a week of wretched excess." An exaggeration perhaps, but not altogether inaccurate.

Your week begins with a Sunday night Get Acquainted bash at one of our hotels, clubs or discos—meeting old friends, making new ones. The next morning, the tough part begins.

Spending day after sun-drenched day on soft, pink beaches. Swimming, tanning, body-gazing, Imbibing our special libations. Enjoying free beach buffet lunches, free calypso and steel band waterside concerts, even a free cruise—all courtesy of the Bermuda Department of Tourism.

What will you do with your free time? What won't you do! Bermuda is famed for its snorkeling and sailing, tennis and golf. For its fine restaurants, discos and British pubs. And for its fabulous moped—everybody's favourite way to tour the island.

Think you can handle a week of this? Talk to your campus friends, and see your Campus Travel Representative or your Travel Agent for complete details.

For more information, including a Bermuda College Weeks brochure, contact your Campus Travel Representative or your Travel Agent.

Couldn't you use a little Bermuda this spring?

New golf pro

Richard Pohle has been named the new golf pro and varsity coach at the Taconic Golf Club. Only the third pro in the course's history, Pohle replaces Rudy Goff, who retired after twenty years of work at Taconic.

Pohle, 33, has been working at the Gorham Country Club in Maine since 1977. He explained his new position as a primary duty to Taconic with a role coaching the Williams golf team and teaching some physical education classes.

The search committee was looking for a man who would make a strong commitment to stay at Taconic for a long time, and Pohle, himself wanted a stable situation in which to work and live with his wife and son. When asked how long he would stay, Pohle answered, "Forever, I hope."

He said that with Taconic's strong membership support, the job of course pro becomes easier. The attitude of the members toward their course was one of the strongest reasons why he wanted to work at Taconic, he said.

Taconic is rated as a championship caliber course, and though it is not in a densely populated area, and the season is relatively short, the club estimates that 30,000 rounds are played over a year.

Pohle said, "Primarily my job is to promote the game of golf through teaching, playing, coaching or speaking at a function."

Grid Awards

At the annual Sideline Quarterback Club Banquet, the Williams football team gave four awards and announced the captains for next year.

Senior John McCarthy won the prestigious Dr. Edward J. Coughlin Jr. bowl honoring "the member of the team who, in spite of adversity or injury, has made an outstanding contribution to the team." McCarthy, who doubled this season between tight end and split end, grabbed 32 catches for 445 yards and 6 touchdowns. "John would catch passes I thought uncatchable," said Coach Bob Odell.

First year

Defensive tackle Brian Nixon, a sophomore transfer, won an award for significant contribution from a first-year varsity player. Despite not getting much playing time early in the year, Nixon had eight solo tackles, 20 assists and three quarterback sacks.

Senior linebacker Chris Woodworth won an award for "play of the greatest credit to the College." Woodworth was the team's leading tackler, with 33 solos and 50 assists, and he was the leader of the defensive unit.

Tight end Paul Coleman '85, was the most improved offensive lineman, possessing "superior qualities of leadership, aggressiveness and determination."

The defensive captain for the next year will be linebacker Mike Coakley '85, and the offensive captain will be guard Steve Mazzari '85.

Fencing

Fencer Gordon Leeds '86 qualified last month for the 1984 Junior Olympics to be held in mid-February in Portland, Ore.

Leeds, in his final year of eligibility for the under-19 event, qualified by taking second place in men's foil in a United States Fencing Association regional meet held in Woodstock, N.Y.

Also competing in the meet, which included fencers from all over eastern New York and western Massachusetts, were Donna Carpenter '85 and Steve Theodore '87. Carpenter took first place in the women's foil open event.

Pidoriano leads hoopsters to 72-66 win over Union

by Dave Paulsen

Behind the thirty points of co-captain Art Pidoriano '84, and a disciplined offensive and defensive game, the men's hoopsters defeated Union College 72-66 Thursday night at the Union Fieldhouse.

The Ephs entered the contest minus the services of starting guard Tim Walsh '86 and battling the effects of the long holiday layoff. Coach Harry Sheehy felt that it was important for his squad to be patient and penetrate inside the zone defense that Union deployed throughout most of the game. This patience was exhibited in the first half, and the Ephs went into the locker room at halftime with a 29-23 advantage.

Arching jumpshot

In the second half, Williams continued to play well, consistently passing the ball inside for easy hoops, or swinging the ball to Pidoriano for his arching jumpshot. Center Dave Krupski '84 contributed two key baskets late in the game to help solidify the Williams lead.

The Ephs held a 65-60 lead after two clutch free throws by Russ Howard '84, and an amazing block of a Dutchman shot by Pidoriano. At that point, Union was forced to foul, and Sheehy's squad converted the foul shots.

Individual performances

The Ephs received fine performances from Krupski, who netted 12 points, and forward Mike Meadows '86, who hauled down 10 rebounds. Guard Jeff Goodell '84, who came off the bench when Peter Griffith '85 was in foul trouble, added a solid performance in his most extensive duty of the season.

Goodell converted four of five free throws and a basket to go along with his floor leadership.

Pidoriano turned in another vintage performance, converting on ten field goals and ten free throws to tally his 30 points.

Sheehy was pleased with his team's ability to attack the Union zone defense, and draw numerous fouls. On the other end of the floor, the Ephs were able to stop Union penetration, and control the defensive rebounds.

The squad travels to Skidmore on Tuesday, before returning to the friendly confines of Lasell Gymnasium for a Saturday night encounter with Springfield.

Ephwomen hoopsters lose heartbreaker to Skidmore

by Mike Best

In a game that was not decided until the final seconds, the women's basketball team lost to Skidmore on Thursday, 51-50.

The first half was close, with neither team establishing a significant lead during the first fifteen minutes. For the last five minutes of the half, though, the Ephwomen's strong zone defense shut down Skidmore, and the Ephs led at the half 26-21.

The Ephs increased that lead in the second half, because they were shooting well from the floor: 44% for the game and 50% in the second half. Led by point guard Lynne Jaycobs '85 and her shouts of "motion", they moved ahead by nine.

Skidmore fights back

With about thirteen minutes left in the game, though, Skidmore switched from a zone to a man-to-man defense, and the Williams offense was stopped. For a six-minute stretch, the Ephs did not score a point. Behind guard Tania Fernandez, who had 12 points in the second half (19 for the game), Skidmore slowly caught up. With 6:45 left in the game, the score was tied at 45.

The score remained close the rest of the way, with neither team able to maintain a lead. Both sides now played man-to-man defense, and there was not much scoring.

In the final minute, Skidmore gained a 51-50 lead, but Williams had the ball. After turnovers by both teams, only nine seconds were left, and Williams had time for just one more try. Jaycobs' shot hit the rim, and Skidmore grabbed the rebound.

Personal performances

The loss overshadowed some fine personal performances. Forward Kay Lackey '85 shot 67% from the floor and had 12 points and seven rebounds. Leading Williams in both points and rebounds was center Jean Hakmiller '86 with 13 and nine respectively. Hakmiller shot 63% from the field and 75% from the foul line in what Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin termed a super performance.

With regard to her team's overall play, Hudson-Hamblin said, "It's tough to lose a game when you shoot that well." She added that she had "no excuses. We should have won."

The Ephwomen, now 2-1, play at Dartmouth on Tuesday.

Pucksters beat Hamilton, but Crusaders catch up

by Paul Meeks

The men's hockey team started 1984 with a 3-2 victory over the Hamilton Continentals and an impressive 2-2 tie with the powerhouse Crusaders of Holy Cross (7-6-1).

The Ephs record now stands at 4-2-1 with the only setbacks coming at the hands of UConn and Norwich by scores of 4-2 and 6-3, respectively.

Saturday, the team gave up a 2-1 lead to Holy Cross with 42 seconds remaining in regulation, and the two squads fought through a scoreless overtime to end deadlocked at two goals apiece.

Junior defenseman Paul Coleman was the biggest star for the Ephs as he assisted on classmate Rich Jackson's powerplay goal early in the first period and tallied the second score himself at 12:50 in the third period. Coleman is Williams' second leading scorer with one goal and six assists on the season.

Goaltender Dan Finn '84 turned back 38 shots in a stellar but routine performance for the captain. He single-handedly makes a solid team a Division II contender.

Assistant coach Seth Johnson was nevertheless disappointed that the victory slipped away. "You can never be really happy with a tie. We had several opportunities to pull it out, but we failed to capitalize, primarily due to some sloppy play-making."

3-2 over Hamilton

On Wednesday, the Ephs played well below their potential but managed a 3-2 victory over Hamilton. Christmas break hampered both team's performances.

Freshman Chris Traggio led Williams with two power play goals in the first two periods. Joe Sciacca '86 scored the game-winner with ten minutes remaining when he tipped junior Brian Rutledge's slapshot from the point past the outstretched Hamilton goalie, Mike Cassier.

Finn great again

Finn was again spectacular in the net as he recorded 32 saves. He has saved 215 of 235 this season for .914 save percentage and a 2.76 goals against average.

Sophomore Bill Couch notched two pool records to set the pace for a 90-22 men's swim team win over Hamilton Saturday.

In the 200 IM, Couch started out in front and stayed strong to break his own 1983 record of 1:59.49 with a time of 1:59.30. He then returned four events later to stroke to a 4:49.34 in the 500 free and break the 1980 record held by Clark from Colgate of 4:50.06.

In addition to Couch, the swimmers displayed their depth of ability as they took first and second in every event except for the 200 backstroke (in which Williams' Dave Shedd '85 came from behind and out-reached his opponent).

Mills standout

Senior co-captain Jeff Mills captured two individual events, the 50 and 100 yard freestyle races. He then joined with Scott Robinson '87, Will Andrew '86, and senior co-captain Rob Sommer to lock up the meet with a 400 free relay win in 3:15.46.

The Williams women swam away to a 113-27 victory over the Hamilton Continentals Saturday in their only home meet of the Winter Study period.

Freshman Joan Horgan paced the victors (3-0) with three individual wins. She displayed her prowess in the backstroke events, capturing the 100 (1:03.72) and the 200 (2:19.45), and she added to her list of sprinting successes with a 26.37 in the 50 free.

Senior co-captain Celia Ciepiela and junior Kim Eckrich joined with Jennifer Raymond '87 and Rachel Stauffer '85 to open the meet with a winning 400 medley relay.

Double winners

Ciepiela and Eckrich also joined Kathy Kirmayer '86 and Jennifer Campbell '87 as double individual winners for the day. Helping out in the middle distance events, Ciepiela proved victorious in the 200 IM (2:22.31) and the 200 fly (2:24.82).

Huge two-day nuclear conference brings range of experts to Chapin

by Christian Howlett

Last weekend's huge Disarmament Forum conference on the arms race and nuclear weapons marked the culmination of more than a year of work for several students, particularly Joseph Alfano '83, David Yaskulka '84 and Jackie Lanzarone '86.

An event of ambitious proportions, the conference packed two dozen workshops, six lectures, two debates and two panel discussions into Chapin Hall in the space of two days. Several of the debates and panels drew as many as 500 people.

The line-up of speakers was also impressive. Represented were the Defense Department, the U.S. Navy, the clergy, the nuclear weapons freeze campaign, several public interest groups and several universities. Speakers discussed everything from nuclear missile policy and nuclear war to non-violent activism, Communism and Central America.

In spite of these, Yaskulka noted, "the student turnout was amazingly small. The only reason I can possibly think of was lack of interest in the subject matter." However, he added that he was "surprised at how many people came from the town and surrounding area."

"In my four years here I've never seen any event sponsored by the college or by students of this size," Yaskulka said. "At least a few of the participants talked about the conference in superlative terms, which of course made us very happy."

However, he noted that "the workshops were fairly underattended," and in addition that "questions (asked after lectures) would indicate that there was an amazingly small turnout of the more conservative students on campus or in the community."

Yaskulka said that while he was generally pleased with the conference, he has no plans to duplicate the event in the future.

The following are write-ups of two of the most important events of the conference, a Friday-evening panel discussion on the relative importance of nuclear arms, and Saturday evening's concluding one-on-one debate of the nuclear freeze movement.

Panel discusses uses, wrongs of arms race

by Charles P. Goodwin

The panelists in Friday night's discussion "What Do Nuclear Arms Do for the U.S.?" characterized the present nuclear situation as everything ranging from "truly psychotic" to a struggle against a Soviet "night of tyranny."

"None of this is within reason," said Harvard psychiatrist Dr. Margaret Brenman-Gibson. The rising insecurity over nuclear weapons has created a "clinical pathology on a social level" which results in an inability to make long term commitments such as marriage or altruistic service for causes, she said.

"We are living in a kind of death and have lost a sense of the future" due to the constant image of total devastation, she said, adding that many people

Bush, Miller debate nuke freeze push

by Stuart Smith

The Williams Disarmament Forum's conference on nuclear weapons and the arms race concluded Saturday night in Chapin Hall with a debate between Captain James Bush of the Center for Defense Information, and Franklin Miller '72, Director of Strategic Forces Policy in the Defense Department, on the question of whether or not the nuclear freeze serves U.S. military interests.

In his opening statement Bush argued that the freeze would serve American interests if it was bilateral and verifiable. "It would stop production, testing, and deployment of all nuclear weapons immediately," he emphasized, adding that the greatest advantage of the freeze is that it is

Andrew Young predicts trouble for Jackson presidential bid in '84

Talks of civil rights in U.S. and abroad

by Jeffrey Brainard

Andrew Young, mayor of Atlanta and former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said for the first time publicly that he is opposed to the presidential campaign of Democratic candidate Jesse Jackson, before a capacity crowd in Chapin Hall last Wednesday.

Young stated his position in response to a question following his lecture, titled "Civil Rights at Home, Human Rights Abroad."

"I think it (Jackson's candidacy) is a mistake," Young said. "I did my best to discourage Jesse from running." He added that he thought Jackson had little chance of doing better than Ted Kennedy did in the 1980 Democratic primaries. Kennedy won one-third of the total delegates that year but divided the party.

Young praised Jackson's recent diplomatic mission to Syria and his success in securing the release of captured U.S. Air Force pilot Robert Goodman, calling it "very useful...it was an amazing piece of diplomacy."

"He was successful because he brought the religious elements in," said Young. "He brought other clergy with him from America and they started However, Young said in a press conference after his talk that Jackson's chances of success in the Democratic race are still limited.

"Jesse didn't announce his candidacy until December," Young noted. "There's not

Freshmen warned

35 false fire alarms trouble Quad, deans

by Sarah Abernathy

Thirty five fire alarms have gone off in the Freshman Quad since the beginning of the school year, 21 in Williams Hall and 14 in Sage Hall. Most were caused by people pulling an alarm when there was no fire, College officials report.

"We're very disturbed about the situation. The concentration of alarms pulled in Williams and Sage is very unusual and very high," said Dean of Freshmen David Colby.

"It started as sort of a fun game between Sage and Williams, but the rivalry got out of hand," Colby added. "Fireworks and little battles escalated to fire alarms being pulled."

"There's a competition between dorms and among members of an entry to see who can get away with pulling an alarm the most times," said Dawn Nolan '87, a Williams D resident.

"Also, some alarms are pulled by people who are drunk," said Colby.

Alarms are electronically reported to Security if a smoke detector is activated, a fire alarm pulled or a fire extinguisher set off.

Only one fire

Since September, one alarm was caused by a water fight, three by smoky fireplaces, six by firecrackers or smoke bombs, three by extinguishers shooting off and 20 by people pulling them. Only one was legitimate, when a burning poster set off a smoke detector, Colby said.

The Williams Record

Good show

The Williams Disarmament Forum has recieved praise for their impressive weekend nuclear conference, and it is well deserved. The conference was well-organized and balanced, providing a wide range of notable speakers of different experience, backgrounds and viewpoints. The speakers were informative in lectures and accesible on campus (although unfortunately few students took advantage of their opportunities).

This enormous effort was carried out entirely by students. It was an unusually positive, constructive and rational forum for educating the community on a controversial issue—a worthwhile Winter Study event.

Let's dance

Dance at Williams is making its mark. Enthusiasm for the program is growing with the number of students interested in it—despite lack of publicity and inadequate facilities.

Much of this enthusiasm has been inspired by Coordinator of Dance Sandra Burton, who came to Williams this year after having worked as a dance movement specialist for the National Endowment for the Arts. Burton is building a program that takes advantage of students who are willing and able to handle academic pressure and dance as well. This year for the first time Williams will be represented at the New England Dance Festival.

The currently inadequate dance facilities ("I hit my arms on the ceiling when I jump," remarked dancer Ted Thompson '85) are to be improved with the construction of the new gym. As the details of the plans are worked out, we urge the College to match its recent commitment to theatre and music by providing dance with quality facilities for practice and performance.

The new facilities coupled with increased student support should permanently establish a strong program for dance at Williams.

LETTERS

Fulminations

To the editor:

I see from the (NewYork) Times of December 29, in its report of the bizarre fulminations of Professor Gene Bell-Villada at the MLA annual meeting, that the long-suffering Williams student body is still afflicted with moral and intellectual illiterates posing as liberal arts faculty members.

When a Williams College faculty member is chided by a Menshevik like Irving Howe (for crying out loud!): "One mark of intelligence ought to be to distinguish between the crimes of a society like ours and the evil of a totalitarian regime", then it seems to me it's time to hoot the fool out of town.

Things don't seem to have improved much at Williams in the last twenty-two years. If this mope is representative of the Williams faculty.

Sincerely,

James Campaigne, Jr. '62

Op-Ed

To achieve peace we must reject freeze

by Mike Weber '87

As a conservative here at Williams, I would like to commend Mr. Franklin Miller for his participation in the final debate of the forum held here on January 13th and 14th. His ability to calmly and eloquently address a perhaps not hostile but very skeptical crowd was very impressive.

In Miller's speech, he succeeded in showing that when it comes to national security, the arms race, and arms reductions, there is a very valid and logical conservative view that is not merely the dogma of warmongers, generals in the Pentagon, and manufacturers of military supplies.

I would like to draw special attention to four points Miller brilliantly made, as well as to the scary way that many members of the freeze movement mocked them as unimportant, when they are the most important facts of the situation, and are not the deserving objects of ridicule for the "ban the bomb" crowd. Unfortunately, their emotionalism has interfered with their ability to grasp the importance of the real issues.

During the question and answer period after the debate, a student roused tremendous support from the crowd when he, for all intents and purposes, called the defense of America "child's play" for ignorant generals. I do not consider it play at all and value the right of citizens to stand up and pose such a question. Miller said to the student that (the student) must have taken different classes from Miller himself because Miller saw the defense of the United States, whether it be with a nuclear arsenal or not, as a noble and worthwhile effort; I took the same classes as Miller did and I worry that bright young students here do not passionately feel the same way as we do.

Secondly, Miller mentioned that at the conference "deterrence seemed to be a dirty word." Why this sentiment has developed is something I cannot understand. Granted, it is not perfect, but it is certainly the best policy available and we must pursue it perforce. Of course, this in no way eliminates the concept of arms control, and this is what many of the fanatics of the freeze movement fail to realize when they talk of deterrence as dirty. What they also fail to recognize is that this policy has kept the peace during a period of heated antagonism between the two greatest world powers that have ever existed.

Next, I would like to praise Miller's description of why we are building tactical nuclear weapons even though the United States Government does not see a limited nuclear war as a possibility. Those who support the building of these weapons are called warmongers who "don't understand the world of nuclear weapons." This is an unfounded charge, and his point proved that. Miller said that we must prepare for a limited war so that we have a flexible response to the variety of possible attacks on the free Western world. I agree entirely, as the military policy of preparing for all possible scenarios so that they can deal with all the situations most effectively is simply common sense. The standard argument that we do not need more bombs because we can already kill every citizen of the Soviet Union twenty times does not hold up to the test of simple common sense and good military policy.

Finally, I want to praise Miller's description of why we must "think with our minds and not just our hearts." I, like any sane person, do not want nuclear war and seek its prevention. However, I do not blindly follow a movement that claims FREEZE in bold letters, but actually jeopardizes the security of the United States and lessens the stability of the nuclear theater. Miller summed it up beautifully when he said that in order to bring about the espoused goal of the freeze movement, that is to say world peace and security, we must reject its specific program. This seems contradictory, but of course it is not. Again, we see the danger of the emotionalism of the freeze movement: a fear of nuclear war that causes many people to think with their hearts and overlook the unappealing facts (of reality) that force us to take a hard line in our dealings with the Soviet Union and in assessing our policy of nuclear deterrence.

Again, I thank Mr. Miller for his eloquent presentation and I encourage him to continue speaking publicly whenever possible. Although it did not seem overly apparent at the debate, there is support for his views at Williams as well as around the country.

Dance at Williams

Growth by leaps and bounds spurs on student dancers

by Vernon Squires

They don't compete in the Little Three, although they spend many hours in Lasell Gymnasium. They don't tackle, shoot, dunk, hit, steal, or score. They don't even have uniforms, but they practice daily, and this year had their first "away game." They are the dancers of Williams College, a small band of uncommon athletes.

You say you know dancers: they're the ones who prance across campus wearing funny looking fuzzy things on their legs. They play weird music while staring in the mirror and spooning cups of Dannon Yoghurt. From time to time they splatter posters on Baxter wall or show up in the Daily Advisor. This is dance at Williams, you speculate. What else could there be? Lots.

Dance at Williams exists in two basic groups, the ubiquitous Physical Education department and the peripheral Dance Society. The former arena of dance, which consists basically of classes, is headed by Sandra Burton. From ballet to jazz to modern dance, the upper gym at Lasell resounds with shuffling feet and rhythmic tunes. Dancersize, the leotard's answer to Richard Simmons, draws individual students and athletic teams alike, who discover the rigors of continuous coordinated movement.

In the P. E. department, students are introduced to the various dance styles and are encouraged to pursue them, either in future classes or with the Dance Society. "I would like to see dance become a stronger unit in the department," says Dance Coordinator Sandra Burton. "We could use more sections so we can produce more quality dance. Ideally, dance could become as exciting and as viable as the other artistic programs at Williams."

Already this year new steps were taken toward expanding dance and Williams' reputation in the New England dance community. In December over a dozen dancers ventured to Mount Holyoke to audition for the New England Collegiate Dance Festival. Marzia Habib '85 was chosen to represent Williams in the festival at UMass in March.

"The audition was a tremendous thing for Williams Dance," said Burton. "The enthusiasm was amazing—there were more interested dancers than I could even use, and the audition was held during finals. They had to study on the bus rides, then perform at an audition, which was a first for most of them. Dance Society and dance in general are really coming together."

The Dance Society as an autonomous body only auditions and puts on dance concerts, but it also sponsors guest artists, who give lectures and classes. "Our main function is to expose dance to Williams students, and hopefully involve them with it," says Co-president Judy Lewis '85. "We try to bring in as many good artists as we can for performances."

This year the Dance Society has brought a Seattle based group called Solo/Duets to campus, as well as the Joffrey II Company, an affiliate of the Joffrey Ballet, which drew five hundred people. Currently, the Dance Society is sponsoring the residency of choreographer Blondell Cummings, who is preparing a piece for Williams students during Winter Study.

"I hope Blondell will bring more people into dance," said Society officer Valerie Anastasio '86. "She's a strong, vibrant performer who does not put any limitation on dancer's potential."

Blondell Cummings sparks dance interest

Blondell Cummings is best known for her solo performances and her membership in Meredith Monk's House. (Ruderman)

Blondell Cummings seems to be dancing even when she talks, though she bristles at such a description. "I don't consider myself a dancer," Cummings corrects. "I'm a performer, an artist. Dancing is merely one part of a much bigger craft."

Cummings the artist, choreographer, dancer and performer is currently in residence at Williams, preparing a piece for performance.

An original member of Meredith Monk's House, she has toured the world as a soloist. From Hong Kong to Paris, Cummings has performed to rave reviews.

"Teaching is part of the artist's craft, in my opinion," said Cummings. "My job is to do whatever I have to do to be respectful of the craft."

Cummings was "trained traditionally" in modern dance, African dance and ballet. Adherence to convention ends with her training, however, for Cummings prepares her own acts now, whether in dance, theater or in life.

"My material for shows is based on contemporary social issues," she said. "But life is not performances. Life is movement, which can come from anything, be it work or play. Dance, that is performance, is merely one way to get ideas across."

Getting ideas across is the motif of Cummings' stay at Williams. She is teaching classes and running workshops while choreographing the performance piece. She prefers elaborate productions, which draw from all aspects of communication arts.

"Dance in itself is far from all-encompassing," she said. "It helps create a desired image, which as an artist I must do. I try to see relationships between a lot of things, and to explore new relationships. Finally, I try to help people see things they might not have seen before."

She takes the universal, often unseen, and makes it individual, prompting the audience to think "of course, why didn't I think of that?" At Williams, Cummings hopes to allow the dancers to find in themselves what they have taken for granted or overlooked.

"As a teacher I want to share ideas," she explains. "The performance will not be a traditional dance movement. I'll work with what the students

Whirling seniors dance Tarantella

"I get the feeling that's the way the human body should move," says Will McClaren '84 as he watches Williams students dance to his direction. "I just love to watch people dance, and I've always wanted to make dances myself."

McClaren, secretary of the Dance Society is choreographing his own production this winter. "Tarantella", a concert in dance theater, will be performed on Feb. 23-25 in DownStage Theater, as the culmination of months of work by McClaren and the seven other dancers in the production.

The concert's title is derived from Greek folklore, in which a dance—the Tarantella—was performed as an antidote to a lethal spider bite. A quality performance allowed the bitten person to live. McClaren's Tarantella, though performed for lesser stakes, is as energetic and meaningful as its predecessor.

"I see it as a metaphor for human aspiration in art," explains McClaren. "It's a testament to the possibilities of human redemption."

In working toward this goal, McClaren spends up to ten hours per day on dance activities — choreographing, taking dance classes, or leading rehearsals. And to him it is all more than worth the effort.

"Doing the project itself is the reward," resounds McClaren, who spent last summer working at the American Dance Festival in North Carolina. "I enjoy the challenge of trying to create choreography for each dancer according to his or her individual talents."

The dancers appreciate McClaren's encompassing style, which includes ballet, jazz, modern dance, and theater. Valerie Anastasio '86, who dances in "Tarantella", believes McClaren creates an energy between the dancers and the audience, captivating both.

"Will has a very good eye, helping him understand the way we move," Anastasio relates. "His choreography allows communication—we give to the audience and they give back to us. It's a kind of catharsis, a cleansing."

The cathartic emotion is precisely what McClaren is after in "Tarantella", for he believes dance is not durable art form.

"True dancing cannot be handed down from performance to performance," explains McClaren, "because it's a celebration of movement itself, of ephemeral and transitory beauty."

Arts in View

The Latin American Arts Festival starts Thursday, January 19, with a dance featuring Junior Vega and his Latin American All-Stars. The festival, sponsored by the Student Activities Board (SAB), will include a dance performance and a concert with jazz artist Paquito D'Rivera. Thursday's dance will be held in the north Baxter dining room and tickets cost $2.50. Paquito D'Rivera will perform at Chapin on Monday January 23. D'Rivera was a member of the Cuban National Jazz Group, Irakere, until he defected to the United States in 1980. Since then he has cut several records with CBS-Columbia. SAB Business Manager Gary Sellinger calls the concert, "a unique opportunity to see someone who's going to be big in jazz in the next few years." Tickets for D'Rivera are $3.50. Friday night a Latin American modern dance group, Barrunto will perform in Lasell Gym. Barrunto is a multi-ethnic network of political dancers and choreographers which creates dances about people's struggles against oppression. The 8:00 p. m. concert is free of charge. There is a combination ticket available for both the concert and the dance for $5.00. Mummenshanz January 24. The Swiss mime and mask troupe, known for its amazing costume design and dancing ability will perform at the Adams Memorial Theater. Tickets went on sale yesterday. Thursday night marks the opening of First Assault, a two-act play by David Latham '86. Latham is directing the play which will be performed in the Studio Theater at 8 p. m. January 19, 20 and 21.

Not surprisingly, the only real limit on dancing at Williams is the competition of other activities; finding time to pursue dance is a task in itself.

"Dance is a major commitment when groups come in," said Michael Constantino '85. "And when dance concerts are scheduled, we'll wind up spending two or three hours every day in the studio and gym."

"It's a very big commitment," explains Rumi Kurosaki '85, "but you get a great deal out of it."

Performances are rare, occurring this year in January, February, and later in the spring. The Spring Dance Concert is an eclectic performance, featuring pieces of many styles and from many sources. Students and faculty alike are invited to contribute pieces to the concert, which is the traditional highlight of the dance year.

Another dance tradition is the senior dance concert. This year Will McClaren '84 is creating "Tarantella," a performance in dance theater. The show, which features seven student dancers in addition to McClaren, is the choreographer's "testament to the possibilities of human redemption."

In January, resident Cummings plans to put together a piece on "strategies". The piece will be performed Tuesday, January 24 at 7:00 p.m. in the upper Lasell gym.

As a weak sister to the other more established art departments, dance has often been left out of campus programs. To compensate for this, dancers have been trying to organize cooperative performances. "I'd love to work with the Theater and Art departments," said Burton. "We're moving in the right direction now, working with the strong foundation that (former Coordinator) Joy Dewey laid here. The students are very interested in learning—it's a positive atmosphere for growth."

With Burton's tutelage and the Dance Society's enthusiasm, the leotard is taking leaps and bounds at Williams. Though small in number, lacking adequate facilities ("I hit my arms on the ceiling when I jump in the studio," laments Dance Society Co-president Ted Thompson '85.), and starved for publicity, the dancers move spritely onward.

"It comes down to personal initiative," says Lewis. "There's not much status, and there's a lot of work, but there's spirit and good times, too."

Pomilla prioritized transfer system ready to go for sophomores, juniors

by R. DeMott

This year when upperclassmen ask to transfer their house affiliation, they will find that a new system has been implemented to accommodate transfers. Passed last year by the Committee on Undergraduate Life, the new system is a prioritized lottery system which awards points for various housing circumstances. Students are then given priority by the number of points that they have.

"The prioritized lottery system is something that was student initiated, and we see it as a positive influence," said Dean Mary Kenyatta. Known as the Pomilla Proposal, the prioritized lottery system was suggested by a group of students organized by Paul Pomilla '84.

"When CUL adopted the system, they decided that the first class to use the new system would be the Class of '86," Kenyatta said. She added that it had seemed unfair to include the Class of '85 since they had not known of the change in systems when they went through freshmen inclusion. This means, however, that the old system will have to operate alongside the new one this year to take care of transfers from both classes.

Within the Pomilla Proposal, points are awarded on the basis of class and freshman inclusion results. Sophomores will get one point, compared to four for juniors. Students stuck in their fifth choice house will get eight points, those in their fourth choice six points, etc.

Computer set to go

The computer program which directs the new system was written by Mark Rice '84. Rice said that his program is divided into three parts. The first files the students who wish to transfer and the housing available. The second part takes account of the students' preferences. This part also arranges group transfers, which have been limited to pairs of students this year. The final part calculates each student's points and transfers them to the new housing.

Some special features built in by Rice will not be used immediately but can be added at the discretion of the Deans and CUL. These include a method of regulating the sex ratio and class ratio of each house.

Asked about the fairness of the system to a student who wishes to transfer out of a high inclusion choice, Kenyatta replied, "It's risky, but no more risky than the old system. We assume that the people who want to transfer are really in a bad situation and they want to get out."

Changed frosh inclusion

Kenyatta also related the change in preference at last year's freshmen inclusion to the new transfer system, which was passed before inclusion. Statistics show that last year the popularity of Mission Park as a first choice dropped substantially, while that of Dodd-Tyler and the Berkshire Quad went up.

The popularity of Mission as a fifth choice almost doubled, however, while the Berkshire Quad dropped tremendously as a fifth choice. Another notable difference was that last year 7 percent of students received their last choice, compared to 1 percent for the year before.

Kenyatta said that part of the reason that this change took place is because students actually put down their choices in the order that they desired, and did not count on transferring later. "Now we assume that the places they choose are where they really want to be," she said. "The numbers picking Mission is a true indication we think."

Before the new transfer system passed, students did not worry as much about their inclusion choices, Kenyatta added.

OCC introduces students to social change careers

by John McDermott

Nearly one fourth of the Class of 1983 was employed in business by Thanksgiving, just five months after graduation, a survey by the Office of Career Counseling reported. Trends show that the percentage will increase as time goes on.

This week, OCC's newly-formed Social Change Committee goes to work to make students aware of other, non-traditional careers. On Friday and Saturday, Baxter Hall will be the center of the committee's conference, titled "Different Futures: A Conference on Careers in Social Change."

"It will offset the misconception that we are channelling students into banking jobs in New York," said committee coordinator Cindy Drinkwater '81, an OCC counselor.

The conference will also give seniors and summer job-seekers opportunities to interview with organizations such as 9to5—The Organization for Women Office Workers, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and the Peace Corps.

The committee was organized in response to an all-campus survey on the subject of social change late last year. Drinkwater said that more than 100 of the 125 responses were positive about social change careers.

"Not surprisingly, there has been a decline of interest over the last few years, but the interest is still there," she said.

This weekend's conference, the first of its kind at Williams, was planned by the committee and funded by OCC. Rhoda Karpatkin, executive director of

False alarms rile freshmen

"At first, people just got a kick out of seeing other people come out all the time," said Sage C resident Geoff Smith '87. "People don't realize how serious it is; it's a problem of stupidity," said Carol Riccardi '85, a JA in Williams D.

Only one person has been caught for pulling an alarm. The student will probably be placed on probation, Colby said. "I want to catch somebody. If I catch somebody, my presumption would be to ask for dismissal from the College," he said. "Several years ago someone was expelled for a fire safety infraction," he added.

Sage B and C fined

During the semester Colby wrote two letters to freshmen and JAs about the issue, and had a meeting with Quad JAs after two extinguishers were shot off between Sage B and C. Several people became ill and one was sent to the infirmary because of that incident, Colby said.

"Refilling the two extinguishers and the massive cleanup cost $270.54," he added. The entries were each assessed fines of $50, the automatic fine for unnecessarily setting off a fire alarm, Colby noted. The two entries will pay the entire $370.54.

After so many false alarms students stopped leaving the buildings, so Security was forced to begin knocking on doors to make sure people went out, Colby said. He added that he will call students in for a discussion and "may well take dis-ple choose hedonism in response to these psychological pressures.

"Deterrence is a state of mind that has never failed," declared Capt. James T. Bush of the Center for Defense Information. "The Soviet Union has not attacked the U.S. We think that our nuclear arsenal has stopped them."

Bush, recently retired from the Navy, pointed out that we do not know exactly what has deterred the Soviets, and that if they do attack, we will never know why.

The new U.S. weapons systems are less deterring than the old, Bush said. The MX missile is destabilizing because the Reagan administration has not made the missiles invulnerable to a first strike. This creates an impression that we are not trying to survive a first strike because we are going to strike first, Bush explained.

A necessary threat

Former Assistant Secretary of Defense Henry E. Catto Jr. '52 said that the Soviets must be checked by the threat of nuclear annihilation.

"We must be able to respond appropriately to aggressive action and keep our forces strong so that our actions will not be interpreted as a bluff," Catto declared.

He said that the Soviets are currently in a position analogous to that of the Axis of World War II.

Young views rights

much room left in the field, not much uncommitted territory out there."

Since Jackson has never run for a government office before, he needs to work hard for funds and delegates, as Jimmy Carter did in 1976, Young said. "There's a certain charisma that's not transferable without organization," he added.

Young also said he doubted Jackson's campaign would help spur a successful voter registration campaign among blacks. "I haven't seen it," Young said. "A presidential campaign is not a way to organize people to vote."

Young said he wants to remain uncommitted to any one of the Democratic candidates but "will be friendly to all...I'd be happy to see any of them as President."

When asked if he himself had any aspirations to the Presidency, Young said "no, I don't think I have those kinds of hallucinations."

Rights struggle mirrored

In his prepared lecture, Young said the civil rights struggle that occurred in the 1960s in the United States is being duplicated in other countries around the world, including El Salvador, Nicaragua, Lebanon and South Africa.

"When people begin to get confidence in themselves, when they begin to see themselves as somebody, as God's children, then you've got problems," Young said.

Young said that racial tensions have been eased in the South because whites were eventually made willing to recognize blacks' civil rights and right to participate in the economy, thus ushering in a new age of prosperity for both.

Likewise, revolutions in Lebanon, El Salvador, Nicaragua and Zimbabwe (formerly Rhodesia) have all been expressions of a similar desire for peace and basic human rights, Young said. He said the U.S. government has often thwarted such movements because of ill-founded suspicions that they are solely Communist-inspired.

Religious revolutionaries

He said this overlooks the fact that the Rhodesian revolution was led by Protestant, U.S.-educated intellectuals and that the Central Americans have been led by the Catholic Church.

Young said he was confident that negotiated political settlements and non-violent activism would ultimately be most successful in securing peace and democracy, especially in Lebanon and Poland.

"There have been 100 new nations formed since 1948, and all but a dozen happened non-violently," Young said.

Young also said he was confident about the U.S. role in the world. "Overwhelmingly the freedom of the world is something we have advanced. Occasionally we get bogged down."

The Soviets, according to Catto, view nuclear weapons as "militarily and politically useful tools" while the U.S. sees them as purely defensive.

"Devastating" effects

The spiritual and economic effects of the Arms race are "devastating our society and distorting our economy...permanently," said Reverend John A. Collins, a director of Clergy and Laity Concerned. He condemned the current administration for putting us on what he called a "war budget" by transferring money from social programs to military ones.

The military spending also creates jobs that are capital intensive, as opposed to labor intensive, and money spent for such things as ammunition, A-bombs and nerve gas is not recycled through the economy, he said.

"The arms race is bringing out the worst in both the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.," Collins said. "It's ridiculous to think that a pornographer's job does not affect him; it is ridiculous to think that a pimp's does not affect him; and so it is with an arms race."

Stephen T. Ross '59, a professor of strategy at the Newport Naval War College, argued against a nuclear freeze, saying that it is not true that "beneath a KGB agent or a Marxist Beaucrat does beat the heart of an Iowa Republican."

Dean Colby has warned freshmen and JAs that anyone caught doing this will be placed on probation and possibly dismissed. (Ruderman)

College hopes to rescue old farm from developer

by Stuart Smith

Williams College has been informed it has 30 days to try to block the proposed sale of Mount Hope Farm, a 1000-acre tract formerly owned by the college, to an outside developer.

August E. Mansker informed College officials on Jan. 6 that he intended to sell the property, which he purchased from the College in 1978 for $850,000, to Carley Capital Co., a development group based in Baltimore, Md.

Under the terms of the 1978 sale, Williams has 30 days in which to decide whether or not it wishes to repurchase the property, which encompasses over 1000 acres on the south side of Williamstown.

According to College Vice-President and Treasurer William S. Reed, the administration's next move "will be in court to get the 30 day clock on the sale stopped." Reed said the College expects a decision on its request for a court order on Tuesday or Friday.

An extension of the 30 day period, which began on Jan. 6, "will force the other group to spell out what it intends to do with the property before Williamstown's Zoning Board," Reed added. Both the College and Williamstown residents have been concerned about the possibility that development of the property could alter the rural atmosphere of Williamstown.

The College first purchased the farm and mansion (which it used for conferences and special receptions) in 1963, but sold it to Mansker later because its operating expenses were generating an annual deficit of $100,000.

President Chandler pointed out in a Jan. 11 letter to faculty and staff that "the College's principal purpose in acquiring Mount Hope was to prevent uses...that could have diminished the attractiveness of Williamstown as a setting for the College."

If the College does decide to buy back the property, Reed said there are "differing opinions on what price the College would have to pay. If Carley's offer is legitimate we would have to match it, but there is some question as to whether or not it is."

A group of alumni made a bid for the farm, which they planned to donate to the College, but at the last minute they were outbid by the developer, Chandler said.

Mount Hope Farm owner August Mansker has told the College it has 30 days to try and save the mansion and 1000-acre farm from being sold to an out-of-town developer.

OCC presents social change

Consumers Union, (publishers of Consumer's Reports) will give the keynote address Friday. A total of 17 social change organizations, from the National Council of Senior Citizens to the New Alchemy Institute, will be represented. Drinkwater said the conference will become an annual event.

"Social change is not an overtly political thing," said committee member Doug Hoffer

'85. "It's an attempt to spend your life or part of your life working directly with people, rather than removing yourself." The Social Change Committee consists of ten upperclassmen with various majors, backgrounds and career goals. Hoffer, a political science major, is considering working in public interest law. At 32, he has worked with many social change organizations.

"There isn't a lot of exposure to misery and poverty," Hoffer said of Williams. "We live in a society that values money. We must inject a degree of humanness into it. It's just a matter of priorities."

"One group of students is active politically, as evidenced by the Disarmament Forum and what they're doing this weekend. It's a very good example of politics in action," he said.

Bush, Miller debate freeze

"the only talk that doesn't require definition. All other arms control measures require that definition to determine what will be included."

A freeze, he said, would also "freeze the thinking that goes into the building of these weapons, and thus prevent the wasting of the talent of this country."

Freeze is bad policy

Miller argued the opposite stance, saying that a freeze is bad nuclear weapons policy, bad arms control policy and bad for American national security interests. "The U.S. must be able to, and be seen to be able to retaliate against any aggressor," he said.

"We have an adversary capable of a wide range of attacks, and deterrence thus must be based on the idea that the cost of aggression exceeds its benefits," he added.

The freeze, he argued, would quantify the existing strategic imbalance in favor of the Soviet Union. "Two of the three legs of our strategic triad—air and land based weapons—would be checkmated, and the Soviets would be able to concentrate on anti-submarine warfare" thus reducing its effectiveness and credibility.

Asked later if there was not now strategic parity between the two superpowers, Miller said there are several significant areas where there are imbalances. "Strategic parity is a point in space," he added, "our weaknesses if undressed would leave us in an inferior position."

"Seal existing imbalance"

Miller also emphasized that the freeze would "irreversibly seal the existing nuclear imbalance, and hence leave the Soviets with no incentive to negotiate reductions. Only when they are convinced we are committed to equality will they negotiate."

The challenge, he concluded, is "to our heads as well as to our hearts. The intentions of the freeze are noble, but the U.S. must have an accurate and credible deterrent."

In rebuttal Bush said he was confident that American negotiators would achieve a freeze that was in America's best interest, adding "I have faith that the Senate would not ratify a treaty that did not protect the security of the U.S."

In response to another question from the audience, Miller said he does not think the U.S.S.R. feels it must deter the U.S. "The current U.S. military buildup in response to the Soviet Union's first strike capability is not nearly enough to pose a first strike threat itself," he said.

Differing outlooks

Pershing Two missiles, he added, cannot reach Soviet missile silos and thus are not a first strike weapon either. Miller emphasized that the differing outlooks of the two sides are reflected in NATO and the Warsaw Pact as well. "The Warsaw Pact doesn't fear an attack from NATO," he said. "NATO is arranged on defensive lines of battle, while the Warsaw Pact constantly practices offensive maneuvers."

Miller said in conclusion "we seek no conquest, we seek no war. We do seek to prevent those who threaten our values with military force. Deterrence may be the worst way to keep the peace, except—as Winston Churchill said of democracy—for the alternatives to it."

8 students selected as Washington Mead interns

Eight students have been chosen to participate in the 1984 Mead Fund for Government Internship Program, the Office of Career Counseling announced this week. Given as a gift to the college in 1951, the fund is "used to improve the quality of leadership in service to government," according to the college catalogue.

The students were chosen by a faculty committee organized by OCC, which administers the Mead Fund. The award consists primarily of a letter of recommendation, used by recipients to help get a job in some arm of government. Monetary awards are also available for students who demonstrate financial need, either by being on financial aid or by taking a volunteer job and qualifying for a grant to work.

The award is available to sophomores and juniors only, and is administered annually. Michele Colocci '85, Timothy Franks '86, Christopher Harned '85, Allison Holt '86, Richard Miller '86, Susan Narkevich '85, Franz Schneiderman '85, and Floyd Short '85 are this year's winners.

Women pucksters take second Track—

by Tom Dumphy

The women's hockey team placed second in the Molly Stark Tournament held at Middlebury this past weekend. The showing brings their season record to two wins and two losses. The strong performance surprised many, but not coach Dave Scheibe '86. Scheibe credited Williams' success to the team's ability to pull together at key times.

Hamilton Upset 4-3

In the opening game of the tournament, Williams beat Hamilton 4-3 on the strength of two Jeanette Hazelton '85 goals. Williams opened up a 2-0 lead on scores by Lisa Marr '86 and Hazelton. Hamilton responded with a goal to cut the lead to 2-1. Beth Ebel '86 put Williams back up by two late in the second period. Hamilton pulled within one goal, only to be scored upon by Hazelton once again. Laura Ryan '85 and Ebel assisted on the goal which put the game out of reach. Hamilton scored a meaningless goal late in the game to make the final score 4-3.

Colby Takes Title

Williams' success was cut short by Colby College in the final game 9-0. Williams fell behind early and never recovered against New England powerhouse Colby. Williams goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86 was outstanding in the net, repeatedly denying the onslaught of the Colby skaters. Despite fine performances by Alice Comiskey '84 and Marr, Williams could not get onto the scoreboard.

Williams will face a physical RPI club at home on Tuesday at 7 p.m. and MIT at home this Saturday.

SQUASH

Men's squash still unbeaten, post two wins

The men's squash team won twice this week, making them 12-0 on the season. Counting the final matches of last year, their undefeated streak is fifteen matches, which is the longest in collegiate squash.

This weekend the team beat Franklin and Marshall 6-3 on Friday, and then destroyed the University of Pennsylvania 8-1 Saturday.

The Ephs' Greg Zaff '84 is the number one ranked player in the nation, and he, along with James King '84, Thomas Harrity '84, and Ben Thompson '85, the top four players, are all undefeated.

The Ephs next host Yale at 4:00 on Friday.

Women's squash outlast Panthers to win a thriller

At Middlebury on Saturday, the women's squash team won what coach Renzie Lamb called a "nerve ending, nail biting" match 4-3. An earlier match at Dartmouth was postponed until Wednesday, January 25 at 3:00.

Top player Cassie Fisher '84 won as did Amanda Griggs and Carrie Cento, playing number six and seven respectively. With the score 3-3, the final match between the team's fifth players was the tie-breaker. Lisa Scot '84 lost the first two games before fighting back to take the third 17-14. She breezed through the fourth game to tie the match and then struggled to a 17-16 final game, final match win which gave the Ephs the victory.

The team's next match is this Wednesday at home against Hamilton.

Springfield downs Ephs 64-54

Dave Krupski '84 goes in for a layup in the basketball team's 64-54 loss to Springfield Saturday. (Khakee)

by Dave Paulsen

Though the men's basketball squad could have won, it was remarkable that they even had a shot at beating Springfield Saturday night. A nationally-ranked Division II team, Springfield manhandled the Ephs on both the offensive and defensive boards en route to a 64-54 win in Lasell Gymnasium.

Springfield, who entered the contest with an 8-1 record and ranked ninth in Division II polls, exhibited a disciplined, balanced offensive attack and a swarming, tenacious defense.

The Ephs were unable to mount any sustained offensive attack against Springfield and then compounded their offensive woes by continually allowing their opponents second and third shots on the other end of the floor.

Yet, the Ephs went into the lockerroom at halftime only down by seven points, 32-25. While the Williams ballplayers were receiving coach Harry Sheehy's instructions, the partisan Williams crowd was treated to an outstanding performance by an unknown "Junior Eph".

Ephs come back

In the second half, Sheehy's squad started playing better man-to-man defense, and gradually narrowed the Springfield margin.

Co-captain John McNicholas '84 hit a jump shot, center Dave Krupski '84 scored inside, and then co-captain Art Pidorianno '84 hit from the outside to knot the score at 47-47 with 7:10 left in the game.

At this juncture, however, the Ephs let the game slip away. Trailing 48-50, they missed two shots and two free throws. Sheehy commented "We had our chances with the score 50-48, but those missed shots changed the whole complexion of the game. We could have gone up 54-50 instead of being behind."

After the Williams scoring drought, Springfield coach Dr. Edward Bilik put his team into the four corners delay game. Forward Dan Czerapowicz ran the delay, and continually penetrated on his bigger, but slower opponents.

The Ephs were forced to foul, and Springfield converted at the free throw line, while Williams' shots just would not fall. When Pidorianno fouled out with 1:34 left in the game, and the score 60-52, the game was, for all purposes, over.

ECAC honor

Senior co-captain Art Pidorianno was named last week's E.C.A.C. Division III Player of the Week for his effort in the basketball team's impressive win over Union on January 5th.

Pidorianno, a 6'2" guard, hit 10 out of 16 shots from the floor and 10 of 13 from the free throw line for 30 points in the 72-66 victory.

"Just a bit short"

Sheehy characterized his team's effort as "just a bit short in all aspects of the game." He pointed to the extraordinary athletic ability of the Springfield squad as a factor in the game, but also noted, "We didn't get good games from some of our players...We didn't shoot very well." He continued his evaluation of his team's performance, "On defense, we were a step slow, and we got an old-fashioned butt-kicking on the boards."

Pidorianno once again led Eph scoring with 22 points. Krupski chipped in 13 while Tim Walsh '86 added 10. On the other side of the scale, all five Springfield starters were in double figures.

The Ephs will try to regain their winning ways when they host Trinity tonight at 8:00.

Pucksters nip N.E.C.; fall to Panthers

by Paul Meeks

The Williams hockey team played poorly in a 3-2 loss at Middlebury Wednesday, but recovered on Saturday afternoon at Chapman Rink for a 2-1 victory over New England College.

Head Coach Bill McCormick said the home win was the, "best game we've played all year." The Ephmen also enjoyed a revenge factor in raising their record to 5-3-1, as New England had embarrassed Williams last year with a 14-2 drubbing.

Second period action

New England, usually a finesse team, changed their strategy and pounded Williams in the early going. Their lone goal came midway through the first period.

Williams dominated the second period, scoring twice and shutting down the New England offense. Brian Rutledge '85, who has been under pressure to equal his fine performance of last season, ended his drought with a beautiful backhanded goal late of the period. Joe Sciacca '86 was given an assist on the goal.

Three minutes later, Jeff Potter '85 stuffed in a rebound, assisted by Chris Traggio '87 and Rich Jackson '85.

Senior Dan Finn looked sensational in net, stopping 34 New England shots. Time and again he was challenged on breakaways and turned them away.

The game was a physical battle, featuring 26:13 in penalties, and junior defensemen Mark Winters and Paul Coleman each spent four minutes in the penalty box.

McCormick cited the play of Rutledge, Jackson, Potter, and Finn as key to the victory over New England. The defense killed 12:00 in penalties without allowing a power-play goal, including some instances when Williams had to fight off a two-man advantage.

Panthers win 3-2

On Wednesday, the squad travelled to Middlebury; after the game was delayed a day due to heavy snowfall. The Williams-Middlebury clash has always been a bitter rivalry. This year, however, Williams fell to a weak Middlebury team, not the traditional Division II hockey powerhouse they have faced in the past.

Middlebury scored first at 3:54 of the first period. Junior defensemen Mike Uretsky evened the game less than a minute later assisted by wingers Traggio and Jackson.

The Panthers broke the deadlock at 15:41 of the same period, and added an insurance goal at 2:08 of the third. Left winger Dave Fritz '86 scored for Williams with 8:10 left to play, with assists credited to Rutledge and Sciacca. The 3-2 loss clearly disappointed the coaching staff.

McCormick sees the next few games as an uphill climb for the team. The Ephmen must maintain a .500 average to make the playoffs at the season's end.

Williams continues its homestand on Wednesday against Salem State.

Hoopsters rout Panthers to finish third in tourney

by Mike Best

The women's basketball team destroyed Middlebury on Sunday, 72-36, to take third place in the Molly Stark tournament at Middlebury.

The Ephwomen played strong defense and simply ran away from Middlebury, a team that has not won a game this season. The Ephs had already beaten the Panthers earlier this year.

Williams was lead by another strong game from center Jean Hakmiller '86. Hakmiller scored 12 points on 66% shooting, after shooting 63% against Skidmore in the team's last game before the tournament (last Tuesday's Dartmouth game was cancelled).

In addition, Hakmiller combined with tri-captain Kay Lackey '85 for 21 rebounds to help the Ephwomen control the boards. Tri-captain Tracy Burrows '84, a forward, also pitched in 12 points.

Loss to Hamilton

In Saturday's first round action, the team lost to a strong Hamilton squad, 59-46. The Continentals pulled out to an early lead, but Williams, led by Denise Saunders '87, pulled to within five to end the half down only 24-19.

Hamilton was able to control the Ephs in the second half and build upon their lead until they blew the game open in the late going. The loss spoiled a solid effort by Lackey, who had 15 points and eight rebounds, leading the team in both categories.

The Ephwomen take a 3-2 record into Wednesday's rematch with Hamilton at home.

Runners beat Hamilton, Union

Co-captains lead come-from-behind victory

by Chris Stearns

The Men's Winter Track team took the lead with only three events left and held on to notch victories over Union and host Hamilton on Friday. The Ephs racked up an impressive 59 points to Hamilton's 52 and the Dutchmen's 49.

Senior co-captains Bo Parker and Ted Leon stood out, turning in stellar performances. Parker qualified for the Division III New England's with a sizzling 1:06.8 in the 500 and anchored the winning 3200 meter relay.

Leon placed second in the 400 with a 51.5 and then returned only four events later to take another second in the 300 and collect a desperately needed three points to keep the Ephs' hopes alive. Leon then came back a mere two events later to boost the tracksters to a second place finish in the grueling 1600 meter relay.

Despite a second by Brian Angle '84 in the mile, Kendall James' third in the highs, a victory by Bernie Krause in the shot put, and Leon's second in the 400 the Ephs were in last place.

Meanwhile Parker and Mark Rice finished first and fourth respectively in the 500 followed by a fourth place by sophomore Clark Otley in the 60 to keep the Ephs in the running.

Ephs spring to life

However, the Ephs' forte lies in the distance events and they sprang to life after the 800 as Kevin Jenkins '85 and Tom Pingree '86 cruised to a first and third finish. Senior Bennett Yort coasted to victory in the 1000 with freshman Mike Coyne grabbing fourth.

Leon then netted second in the 300, and in the next race, John Ellison '86 and John Neilson '84 handily finished first and second in the 3000. Williams then landed second in the 1600 meter relay and then stormed back to win the 3200 meter relay, leaving Hamilton in the dust.

Parker said after the race, "The way that we all performed tonight under pressure was tremendous. We all came through when we had to. Coach Dick Farley instilled a competitive quality in us all tonight."

Farley said after the meet: "I think the team did a fine job, especially considering that without the field house's training facilities they've led a spartan existence and also that we didn't know much about these teams going into tonight. This win should be a good springboard for us in the upcoming meets."

Fire heats up Dennett, students face discipline

by Stuart Smith

Two Williams students will face disciplinary action following an early morning fire in Dennett House on Wednesday, according to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

The fire appears to have started in the third floor living room when a wall bracket holding lighted candles began smoldering and set the wall on fire, according to Stephen Trattner '84, a third floor resident.

A sofa under the candles then ignited and was destroyed, according to Gale Hose Company Chief Gordon E. Noble. The rest of the room was blackened and singed by intense heat and heavy smoke from the fire.

College rules prohibit the burning of candles in residence halls, O'Connor said, adding that Assistant Dean of the College David Colby will decide what disciplinary action is appropriate. "Dean Colby will take action on his own," O'Connor said, "and the students could then appeal his decision to the discipline committee."

Must pay damages

Trattner, who along with Steven Zlotowski '84 is facing disciplinary action, said the two met with the Deans but "they haven't made a decision. We'll definitely have to pay part of the damages, but hopefully it won't be too much."

"Obviously there was no malice or intent on the part of the students," O'Connor said, "they're sorry that it happened and accept responsibility."

The fire began in the early morning hours, when the candles, which had been used at a party the night before, ignited the wall and sofa. It triggered a smoke alarm at 6:55 a.m., according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks, and "an officer was dispatched to Mission Park... he saw the fire and called the Security switchboard and told them to phone in an alarm to the Fire Department. That was done at 7:02 a.m."

The house was evacuated at that time, Jenks said. Three trucks and twelve firefighters responded to the alarm, and they were able to extinguish the fire in only five to ten minutes.

Student efforts failed

Andrew Grimes '84, who lives on the fourth floor of Dennett, said he smelled smoke at about 7 a.m., ran downstairs and tried to douse the flames with a fire extinguisher. "It got too smoky though and I had to get out," he said. Only one of the three students who lives in the third floor suite was there at the time of the blaze.

According to Wendy Hopkins, Director of Student Housing, "It will take a while longer to estimate the cost of the damage caused by the fire." A professional cleaning company was brought in after the contractor removed everything from the room. The contractor will return next week, Hopkins said, to begin to replace the things wall guards, carpet and Candles left burning after a party were responsible for a fire which destroyed a Dennett House living room early Wednesday morning. Williamstown firefighters managed to save the third floor suite by throwing a smoldering couch out of the window.

Trustees decide

Baxter revamping to begin this summer

The Williams College Trustees, meeting on campus this weekend, formally approved Phase I of the Baxter Hall renovations, which are scheduled to begin this summer.

Phase I will include all proposed renovations of the Baxter basement, including revamping the Rathskeller and building a new darkroom and student organization offices.

The Outing Club will be given an equipment room and office in the basement and another office will house student publications, including the Record. Those offices will be located in what is currently the basement game room and Pottery Ltd. space, and the pool and ping pong tables games will be moved to the Rathskeller.

In addition, WCFM will have its offices expanded and centralized off one long corridor which will have locked doors at both ends.

Phase II next year

Phase II, first-floor changes, including moving the mallroom to the present Baxter lounge, is tentatively set for the summer of 1985, according to College Treasurer Will Reed.

"It would be virtually impossible to do both this summer and have Baxter ready for fall," explained College president John Chandler.

The total cost of Phase I is set at $357,300, including $209,300 for construction, $29,100 for new furnishings, $37,500 for a new fire alarm system and $31,500 in fees for architect John Jordan. Phase II will be similarly budgeted and should cost a total of $379,500.

Tuition rise slowing?

In other business, the Trustees gave formal approval of recent tenure appointments and of the proposed construction of the new gym. They also began preliminary discussion of next year's college budget and tuition increase, which will be voted on at their April meeting.

Next year's tuition increase is "likely to be somewhat lower (than in past years) in percentage terms, reflecting lower inflation," Chandler explained.

The Trustees were also notified that the College has been successful in obtaining a court order to halt the proposed sale of Mount Hope Farm to an out-of-state developer. Under the order, the would-be purchaser must produce more specific plans about proposed development of the 1000-acre Williamstown estate.

Chandler said the College will then have 30 days to make some kind of alternate offer, although he added that the Trustees did not seem interested in having the College repurchase the farm, which it owned from 1963-1978.

The Trustees were on campus last weekend. Pictured here at their general meeting Saturday, they formally approved tenure decisions and new Baxter and gym construction. (Scheibe)

Court orders NASC pledges: pay back Williams thefts

by Christian Howlett

Six of the eight North Adams State College students charged with thefts from Williams dorms Oct. 21 appeared in Northern Berkshire District Court Wednesday and were ordered to make restitution, according to Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zolito.

Zolito said the six "submitted to the facts" of the case, meaning they agreed to let the judge decide simply on the basis of police evidence in hopes of obtaining a lighter punishment. "The facts warranted a finding of guilty," and the six students have been placed on informal probation for a year, Zolito explained.

If they get into any other trouble before then, the cases could be reopened, Zolito noted. Otherwise, the court will probably dismiss them next January and the students will not get a police record.

In the meantime, the students will be forced to make reparations for all stolen property which was lost or damaged. Some of the property had been sold but was recovered with the help of the students themselves, Zolito said. A probation officer will be placed in charge of the repayment process.

"Beyond a prank"

"The court understands it went beyond merely a college prank (but if restitution is made) it is the intention of the court to dismiss the case so that they won't have any records or spoil their futures," Zolito said.

According to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, the thefts began as a prank on the part of six pledges and two pledgemasters of the Pi Epsilon Pi fraternity. "They were apparently sent over to bring back something with a Williams insignia on it, and just got carried away," he said.

Approximately $1,600 worth of good were stolen, but the majority have been recovered. Zolito said the police do not yet know how much the students will have to pay in remunerations.

Charges lumped

In addition to charges of larceny against all eight, the two pledgemasters were originally charged with possession of stolen goods and being an accessory before the fact. However, Zolito said, the various charges were overlooked and "the court took into consideration everything as one action. In effect, (the court said) everybody did everything."

Two of the eight students, who could not be in court Wednesday because their attorneys had other commitments, will go to court Feb. 1. Zolito said he expects the court to deal with them in the same way as the other six.

Regarding the students' original plea of not guilty at a Nov. 16 court appearance, Zolito said such a plea is a standard initial procedure before defendants get legal counsel and are better informed about their legal options.

Working

The battle two years ago to save Winter Study was hard fought. We won; we still have Winter Study, and the revisions the program underwent have improved it.

The freshmen seminars, the main component of the revision, are well on their way to achieving their stated goals—giving greater coherence and more intellectual rigor to the Winter Study program.

While some freshmen may grumble about the workload or class time, they also say that they are learning something. When they're not, they don't usually attribute it to the idea of the seminars, but to aspects of their particular seminars. Even those who brag that they have little work admit that the seminars have educational value.

The seminars are a new idea, and like most new ideas, they have bugs. The most vocal complaint from freshmen is the lack of choice. The diversity of course offerings does not match the diversity of student interests. A few more choices could be offered.

Many students complain that the seminars are too ambitious. The seminars become diluted in their attempt to offer several viewpoints. Interdisciplinary courses on innovative topics by nature face the problem of losing focus—a problem compounded by the unusual structure of team-teaching.

The seminars set out to give the freshmen a more structured January schedule. They certainly accomplish this goal, although even some of the most conscientious students dislike five classes per week. Students feel that their class schedule prohibits them from taking advantage of other recreational, educational, and social benefits of Winter Study. The workload, on the other hand, does not trouble most freshmen. The seminars might work more efficiently and be more appealing if blocks of free time were left open while some further outside work were required.

Certainly, the time and energy being put into the seminars by faculty is commendable, and the seminars can only improve in coming years. Perhaps the more successful seminars could be repeated in future years, and benefit by experience.

Winter Study requires a great commitment on the part of faculty: it adds to their already taxed schedules, but Winter Study is unique and valuable, a feature that justifiably attracts many to Williams.

Play Ball

Winter Study allows students to take advantage of many College facilities which they are too busy to utilize during the semester. However, recreational athletes find their interest constrained by the short hours at Lasell Gymnasium. The gym closes at 6:00 on weekends and 9:50 on weekdays. Varsity and J.V. teams and physical education classes use the main gym, pool and squash courts for over eight hours per day, including the prime late-afternoon and evening hours.

The new gym complex should help solve the problem of finding space for recreational athletes, but no facility can be fully utilized if it is not available during prime hours. Extended hours for student gym monitors and slight alterations in Security rounds are relatively small costs.

There is a great demand for facilities from recreational and off-season athletes—even after 10:00 P.M. The College should extend gymnasium hours to midnight every night.

Rejecting reactionary arguments

by Philip W. Holmes '85

Mike Weber's deification of nuclear freeze opponent Franklin Miller in the Op-Ed column of the January 17th issue of the Record (To Achieve Peace We Must Reject Freeze) simply cannot be allowed to pass by unchallenged.

In his article, Weber reiterates Miller's position in the terms of four points, and concludes from this exposition not only that the Reagan administration is pursuing the correct nuclear weapons policy but that those who oppose this policy are just not being realistic.

I resent being called over-emotional (I suppose that is a step up from being a tool of the KGB) . . .

I am replying to Weber's comments not because I, a proponent of the freeze, resent being called over-emotional (I suppose that is a step up from being a tool of the KGB) but because the seriousness of the nuclear dilemma impels us to reject simplistic and reactionary arguments such as those propounded by Miller during the WDF Conference, and repeated by Weber in this newspaper.

Those who attended the conference (and I am aware that I am now addressing a very small percentage of the college population) may have noticed that the opponents of the freeze (i.e. Mr. Miller and Mr. Catto) frequently began their presentation by remarking to the audience how wonderfully American it was to see students gathered together and asking questions. This forum reflects, they said, the inherent goodness of the American system of government. I do not mean at all to diminish the crucial importance and necessity of free speech. Yet, it seems clear that Mr. Miller and Mr. Catto were trying to silence those employing the First Amendment by loudly and incessantly proclaiming the virtues of the democratic system that provides for the First Amendment. It stands to reason that if a speaker often praises the American system, and it is indeed a praiseworthy system, then those with the most justifiable criticisms and questions might be hesitant to speak out against the administration. Both Catto and Miller swaddled themselves often in Old Glory; it is not surprising, that Mike Weber too waves the flag in the discussion of his very first point. Implying that calm acceptance of the current government's stance means that one "(sees) the defense of the United States...whether it be with a nuclear arsenal or not, as a noble and worthwhile effort," and that one should wonder why "bright young students here do not passionately feel the same way as we (Miller and Weber) do" is plainly an attempt to place, on the basis of one question, one group of people on one side of the American flag, and all those who disagree on the other.

In his second point, Weber decries the current tendency to view deterrence as a "dirty word". He adds that deterrence does not eliminate the concept of arms control and has kept the peace during a period of "heated antagonism", the exact length of which Weber declines to mention. A good reason why Weber does not provide us with the number of years deterrence has worked is that, as Captain Bush noted at the conference, no one really knows if our actions have deterred the Soviets. If our nuclear weapons policies do indeed deter the Soviets, no one knows precisely which facets do, or when these facets began to do so.

In his third point, Weber has kind words for Miller's stated defense of U.S. production of tactical nuclear weapons. Weber does not see that Miller's defense proves the coming to pass of at least one warning from George Orwell's "1984"—the evolution of doublespeak. We must ask the question: can there be such a thing as a limited nuclear war? The standard line today (adopted, no doubt, to pacify those who were horrified by the government's unpardonable ignorance or dismissal of the ramifications of nuclear war) seems to be that nuclear wars cannot be limited. Yet, we are told it is imperative that we spend millions of dollars on the weapons of limited nuclear wars. In other words, we are preparing for a war our leaders insist we cannot fight.

Weber's final point is patronizing and typically reactionary. Pro-freeze people, he declares, are thinking with their hearts and not with their minds. That is absurd and demeaning. One cannot divorce emotion from the freeze move-

OP-ED

A Degrading Experience

by Charlie Mitchell

Your father remarks that there is too much money going out for the grades that are coming in.

Your mother asks you what all those little numbers and letters mean.

Your grandparents, who still praise you for being able to tie your own shoes, congratulate you on your fine performance.

Your interviewer laughs at them, and then asks about your work experience.

Your friends think that you are stupid if you did worse than them, took all guts if you did better, and are just plain lucky if you did as well.

Graduate schools do not trust your grades as an accurate measure of your potential if they are good, and reject you outright if they are not.

Professors argue that it is not the grade that counts, and then give them to you anyway.

The administration will not rest until grades are deflated.

And you just become neurotic and hate them.

So why, if I may be so humble as to inquire, are grades allowed to continue to exist? Well, after having undertaken an extensive investigation, I have discovered that grades are maintained by secret and illicit alumni contributions. Yes, grades belong to the same species as secret fraternities: dangerous and vile institutions that threaten the very fabric upon which Williams was built, and which will not rest until everything and everyone we hold dear is either destroyed, or falls out.

The effect these grades have on our daily lives is devastating. People lock their doors and refuse to talk to one another, or else they run off and hide in the library where talking isn't even permitted. Red-eyed and delirious from sixty hours without sleep, less dedicated students who haven't seen an egg for months suddenly appear for breakfast three days before exam week. Some plan terrorist attacks against Dean's list students in order to lower the class average, while still others suspiciously contract horrible diseases, and die from them. And all this to someday work for a bank. The time has come to put a stop to this situation.

The fight against grade inflation is a good start, since the higher they are, the harder students will fight for them. But more needs to be done. Perhaps the deans, during the off-season of fraternity hunting, could dedicate some time to uncover those responsible for the current plague once and for all. Then, every student could relax in his own room, secure in the knowledge that, once again, he can relate to his neighbors in a peaceful and straightforward manner. Learning could once again be combined with living and loving, rather than preventing it. And then, perhaps, peace on earth and good will toward men (and women) would be wished to each other before the end of finals week.

Freeze proponent responds —

ment, but to dismiss it as melodramatic fluff is ridiculous. We read reports on "nuclear winter", and the accounts of the Nagasaki and Hiroshima bomb blasts which describe the frightening loss of life which follow in the wake of even the smallest nuclear explosion. We read reports from our government on civil defense, and we get the awful feeling that many people in power simply do not know what they are dealing with.

It is strange that Weber tells us to think with our minds, for he does not follow his own advice. His article (which is essentially a parroting of Miller's words) reflects Weber's inability to look beyond the platitudes of his conservative ideology and see the poverty, danger, instability, and neuroses that attend the superpower's devotion to violence and the bomb.

Major changes on the horizon for math, comp. sci. department

by Lee Weirsdma

The Committee on Educational Policy recently approved initial outlines for substantial revisions in the math and computer science department curriculums. These plans will go into effect next fall if approved by the faculty in March.

"Basically the department is just trying to keep up with advances in math and computer science," explained Kim Bruce, assistant professor of mathematics. "They're moving away from calculus in their major courses to other kinds of math."

The mathematics department is introducing a new course called "Discrete Math" which will replace Math 202. This class will provide an introduction to all aspects of math concentrating on graphing, networks, logic, reasoning, and probability, according to Bruce.

Bruce noted that the first few courses presently offered in the math department are not representative of the entire math arena.

"This will give students a better outlook," Bruce said, "especially for those who don't really know what math is all about. It is also a good idea to get a course like this in at a low level for all those potential majors."

Changes for majors

In the new curriculum the math department will require all majors to take Computer Science 135, a new introductory course. Majors will no longer be required to take a complex analysis course but will be given the option under a one year sequence program that the department will require.

There will be a variety of courses available under this sequence system, including a new abstract algebra course, Bruce said.

The computer science curriculum is undergoing even more drastic changes. Computer Science 231 is being replaced by three lower-level introductory courses, including one in Pascal, the language currently taught in 232.

For computer science majors, course options and flexibility are increasing, according to Bruce.

A wider range

"Because of the increasingly varied student backgrounds and the increased enrollment," he said, "the mathematical sciences department has felt a need to offer more flexibility to satisfy the needs of a wider range of people. Before, the computer science major was much too rigid. Now we can really strengthen the major."

The Mathematical Sciences department has also decided to differentiate degree titles. Starting next fall, there will be a math and computer science degree.

According to Bruce, Williams is one of the first small, liberal arts colleges to introduce a math and computer science curriculum like the one proposed.

"This is more comparable to large universities where more mathematical, fundamental principles are emphasized," he said. "By emphasizing these techniques, we feel students will always be able to adapt to ever growing changes in the fields."

Historian Dodson: King legacy alive in Jackson

by John McDermott

Jesse Jackson's presidential candidacy is a fulfillment of the visions of Dr. Martin Luther King, and whether or not Jackson occupies the White House, the American political system will be unalterably affected, said black political historian Howard Dodson in a lecture last Tuesday.

"There are two coherent bodies of political thought in American society today: Reaganism and Jacksonism," Dodson said. "The other candidates fall somewhere in between."

Dodson, a former executive director of the Institute of the Black World, served until 1982 as special assistant to the chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Dodson called Jackson's opponents for the Democratic nomination "varying shades of Reaganism. All of them were moving further and further toward the Reagan line until Jesse Jackson entered the race."

Reshaping platforms

Dodson said that Jackson's presence is reshaping the platforms of the Democratic party and of the individual contenders, and that any Democrat who wins the White House will have to answer to the coalition Jackson is building.

He cited an Iowa caucus, attended by all of the frontrunners except Jackson and former Vice President Walter Mondale, in which all the candidates discussed racism and militarism in a state with a very low minority population.

"It's not a question of whether Jesse Jackson or John Glenn or Walter Mondale or Fritz Hollings occupy the office of president. What's critical is that the politics being articulated by Jesse Jackson are represented."

Dodson called Jackson "a clear and principled alternative to the views being articulated by Reagan," and "a bearer of a more mature set of political ideas."

"Revolutionary potential"

"For the first time, black people are beginning to put forth in the national political arena a platform of goals for the society

This scruffy bunch of Williams men aren't being lazy this Winter Study, they're raising money for the Williamstown Youth Center by taking pledges for growing beards. (Scheibe)

Beards bring charity funds

Have you noticed an unusual number of scraggly-looking young men around this month? These people have declined to shave in January, not out of laziness, but to raise money in an unusual fund-raising effort called Growth for Youth.

Growth for Youth, conceived by Bill McClements '85, is a project in which sponsors pledge the participants money for each day they let their beards grow. A 10¢ per day pledge, for example, over the course of the 25 days of Winter Study, will result in a $2.50 contribution. All of the money raised will go to the Williamstown Youth Center (formerly the Boys' Club) on Cole Avenue.

McClements says that students, faculty and friends from Williamstown have already pledged almost $500, and the beard-growers are still seeking retroactive pledges and flat-rate contributions.

The other non-shavers in Growth for Youth are juniors Brian Kilcoyne, Floyd Short, Jeff Cox, Kelley Murphy and John Irwin, and freshmen Clifford Favrot, Keith Goldfeld, Steve Urquhart, Jeff Hellman, John Shaw, Rick Lipsinski and John Deveaux.

The participants have been pleased with the project's success, noting that it is not very difficult and is a good excuse for not shaving. As Short pointed out, "I had been planning to grow a beard during Winter Study anyway."

Asked whether this lack of grooming hurt their social lives, McClements responded, "No. We were never very popular to begin with."

Murphy agreed, "before Growth for Youth, girls never used to talk to me. Now they come up to me and tell me I'm ugly. I think that's progress."

Ray Boyer off to Beantown

Raymond C. Boyer, Director of Public Information at Williams for seven years, will leave the college Feb. 3 to become assignment manager at WCVB-TV Channel 5 in Boston.

Boyer said in his new job he will be responsible for assigning stories, coordinating the news staff and making sure that stories are ready in time for the six o'clock news. WCVB is the biggest station in Boston, which is the nation's sixth largest market, Boyer said.

He added that he was first approached by the station two weeks ago and offered the job last Monday. Although he said he will miss Williams a great deal, "that's the way the business is. When something opens up and the opportunity comes, you've got to go after it. I'm very interested in TV management."

"Williams is a wonderful place to represent," he said. "I don't exactly feel like a fossil but seven years has gone by like lightning."

Boyer, who received his masters degree in Journalism at

Penn State, has worked in radio news for the past three years. Before coming to Williams he was news director at a radio station in Pittsfield. In addition, he and his wife, Mary Jo, run a freelance video service.

Boyer said the college has not yet begun looking for a replacement as Public Information Director.

20/20 comes to the Valley

Television journalist Barbara Walters visited Williamstown briefly last Tuesday to interview Empress Farah Diba, widow of the Shah of Iran, for a March segment of the ABC newsmagazine show "20/20."

Although Walters left town Tuesday after the interview, her ABC film crew remained through Wednesday shooting additional film of the Empress shopping in the Williams Coop. They also filmed her on parts of the Williams College campus, where her son, self declared Shah-in-exile Reza Pahlavi, studied for one year.

The interview took place at the family's heavily guarded Georgian mansion on South Street, across from the Clark Art Institute. The family bought the house in 1979 for $225,000 when Reza Pahlavi was a student at Williams. Pahlavi now lives in Egypt, but his three younger siblings, who attend area schools, still live in the house.

Williams-TV on the way

Williamstown and the Cox Cable Company have struck a deal in which the town will expand its current local cable system to include public access to broadcasting, according to a recent article in the Williamstown Advocate.

Return lines installed on the Williams College campus will allow broadcasting from Adams Memorial Theatre, Chapin Hall and Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Mt. Greylock High School and the Williamstown Municipal Building will also have return capability.

A snag in negotiations with

Cox Cable Company arose when Cox Cable rejected the town's proposal to put return lines at Mt. Greylock High School. The company stated that the high school was too far away for practical installation, according to Russell Carpenter, Assistant Director of Development at Williams.

Broadcasting from the high school remained essential, however, because numerous public meetings and activities take place at the school, Carpenter said.

To resolve the conflict with Cox Cable, Williams College offered to bear the direct cost of installing return lines on campus if Cox would agree to install lines at the high school, said Carpenter. Cox Cable accepted the deal and set a construction deadline for the end of 1984.

Because the contract is so new, the music and theatre departments have no definite plans for broadcasting. However, Carpenter noted that the possibilities are enormous and the college will be able to broadcast lectures and performances, like the Berkshire Symphony, from its halls.

In addition, Carpenter said student-initiated programs could expand the current broadcasting abilities of WCFM, the college radio station.

Lingo earns a Marshall Scholarship

Stuart Lingo '84 has received a Marshall Scholarship, which provides for study in Britain for two years and is renewable for a third. Under the program, Lingo will receive funds to cover tuition, living expenses, plane fare and a small spending and travel stipend.

Although he has not yet heard whether he received his first choice for place of study, Lingo hopes to begin studying art history next fall at the Courthold Institute of the University of London.

The British Inaugurated the Marshall Program in the early 1950s as a way of repaying the United States for aid received under the Marshall Plan.

New security super named

Security supervisor Charles W. Smiarowski, who resigned several weeks ago for personal reasons, has been replaced by Jean Thorndike, a former Williams security officer, according to Security Director Ransom Jenks.

Thorndike was a security officer for more than three years before she left last year to become security supervisor for KB Toy stores. She oversaw a total of 62 stores in the Midwest, Jenks said.

While at Williams, Thorndike ran the student security monitoring program, a duty she has once more assumed.

Smiarowski, who had been security supervisor for only one year, did not state the "personal reasons" which prompted his resignation Dec. 17. However, as he lives in Sunderland, Mass., (near Amherst), Jenks cited his long daily commute as a possible reason for resigning.

CES gets new intern funds

Relatives of W. Conant Brewer '18 have contributed $10,500 to support an endowed student internship in environmental studies in his memory. The gift will help match funds that the Center for Environmental Studies recently received from the Mellon Foundation.

The income from the gift will be awarded each year to a student for work on an environmental problem relating to ocean resource management or a problem that is international in scope.

The internship honors Brewer, who served in the U.S. Navy during World War I and had a long career in the international shipping business following the war.

The CES will use the endowment to match part of the $60,000 grant recently received from the Mellon Foundation to support undergraduate research. The CES hopes to use matching funds such as the Brewer Internship to build a total $180,000 endowment for internships.

windows, which were destroyed in the fire.

Asked whether the students responsible would have to pay for all the damage, Hopkins said that was still under discussion.

"These things are done on an individual basis," she said, "and we can't decide until next week when we get a firm estimate of the cost."

Tragedy prevented

O'Connor credited the quick response of security and the design of Mission Park with preventing a tragedy. "The response time was very good on the part of security," he said.

Freshman give seminars mixed review

The future of Winter Study was thrown up for grabs two years ago. Winter Study survived, but not without modification. The major change in the program was the institution of freshman seminars—designed to revitalize Winter Study by giving the freshmen a more structured curriculum while still allowing them the freedom to pursue more unconventional academic interests without grade pressure.

The seminars are now a reality. Reaction to the seminars is divided: some freshmen have complaints about the workload or subject matter while others desire more work or praise the seminars.

"There is a heavier workload than I thought," said Doug Krehbiel '87, "but it's certainly do-able. It's easier than the regular semester work, and I don't mind doing it." Some freshmen find the seminars too ambitious. "They're trying to have us do too much in too short a time," says Lynn Gerwig '87.

Others don't feel challenged enough. "The workload so far is less than what I expected. Sometimes I almost feel like I should have more work," states Scott Lundgren '87.

The most vocal complaint from freshmen is the lack of choices for the seminars. "For a school priding itself on small classes," said Adam Ifshin '87, "why do they only offer six choices?"

Interdisciplinary approach

The six freshmen seminars, designed to expose students to different aspects of a subject, are team-taught by faculty members of related departments. The seminars are structured around lectures, discussion groups, and films; they usually meet for a couple of hours four or five times a week.

Professor Fred Greene, chairman of the Winter Study Committee, sees freshman seminars as a means for providing an interdisciplinary approach. The seminars allow freshmen to experience different subject matter and teaching styles in one course. He feels that freshmen are not able to select courses in October because they have been on campus only one month. "These seminars are tailored for freshmen problems," he noted.

Biology Professor William Grant, however, disagrees with the committee's findings. He feels that Winter Study has deteriorated over the past five years and that freshman seminars are not the solution. "With this last committee revision I think we are doing another patch-work job and it (Winter Study) will come unstuck again," he said.

Mixed reaction

The content of the seminars has met with mixed response. "Too much is thrown at you at once," observes Nancy Friellcher '87, who is taking Idea of the Modern in the Arts. The seminar emphasizes collaboration among the different art departments, namely literature, theater, art, and music.

Doug Krehbiel, also taking the Arts course, finds the seminar successful. "The 'modern period' and 'art' are both not clearly defined terms and so it's good to have different approaches and to bring in more viewpoints," said Krehbiel.

Scott Lundgren '87 says, "My seminar, 'The Invisible World,' is good for me in that I have not decided which branch of science to major in, and this will give me a good overview."

"As overviews go, the seminars are well done," says George Prescott '87, "but it would be better to single out only one aspect of a subject."

Rudy Ford '87 would also prefer a more focused approach. "It would be much better to zero in—each professor just seems to be doing his or her own thing," he said.

Time consuming

Some students feel that the seminars require too much time. As a result, they cannot participate in activities outside of the classroom.

"The course takes up too much time, and it's just not interesting. We have to spend time doing readings that I just don't give a damn about," said David Frellach '87 who is taking "The Idea of a Hero."

"I'd enjoy my seminar more if it met three times a week instead of five," says Steven Skavlem '87, "because it would leave more free time for other aspects of Winter Study such as Free University and P. E." Skavlem's seminar, The Invisible World, deals with exploration in the various sciences.

Professors have found that leading the seminars has required a great deal of time and effort on their part as well. Professor Jay Pasachoff, who teaches The Invisible World, says "It's cutting very severely into the time I have for other activities, but I'm glad the students are enjoying it so much."

"...more students are using the library and less are climbing on the ski bus."

Fuqua, who leads Idea of the Hero, agrees that heading a seminar is "more demanding than I had expected. I'm finding that there is a great deal more work involved for the professors than I had thought. I have had no time to do any preparation for my second semester classes," he said.

Isolation

The fact that freshmen are isolated from the rest of the campus in the seminars causes some concern. Martha Hoopes '87 says that "the seminars don't provide an opportunity for freshmen to meet students of other classes."

Sara Gross '85, a member of the Winter Study Committee, interprets the decision to create freshman seminars as a means "to get a more unified class in an educational situation and to have freshmen trade experiences besides parties."

"It's nice to have all freshmen in there," agrees Suzanne Blumiller '87. "People aren't as afraid to speak up in class."

Winter Study best pick for January

by Kathi Rosenbaum and Martin Hildebrand

Despite the controversy that has surrounded it, students overwhelmingly support Winter Study over any alternatives. "If I had the whole month of January off, it would be a waste and the alternative of having finals after Christmas would ruin what vacation we do have," says Andrew Canning '85.

Greg Smith '86 notes, "I find it worthwhile to do the things I don't normally do, like social interaction or skiing or Disarmament Forum and Committee Against Militarism or sleeping."

"I'm getting to read newspapers—I find I don't have time to do so during the regular semester," observes Tim Conley '85.

Jessie Gearson '84 finds that "you can actually have conversations without someone rushing off. Some of my best conversations are during Winter Study."

Pat Connors '85 believes "Winter Study is good because you finally have the opportunity to get to know the people you've been living with for four months. You don't really get to know them until you're all bored out of your skulls."

An important aspect of Winter Study is the informal atmosphere it provides. Junior Mark Van Norman points out,

"Winter Study is great because everyone relaxes—you can just hang out without having to worry about it."

According to senior Robert Kent, "The perfect Winter Study course is one that's challenging but not all-consuming."

Apparently Tim Conley has found such a course in The Reality of the Psyche. "My Winter Study course is less academically challenging but more personally challenging; because the course is something I'm personally interested in, it's a challenge to get as much as I can out of it," he says.

Greg Smith is also pleased with his course, The Physical Basis of Music, noting, "Academically it's definitely worthwhile—this year it gives me a chance to bring together two things I enjoy: physics and music."

Chemistry Professor William Moormaw is happy with the way his course is proceeding this year. He remarks that "It seems the students in my Winter Study course are interested in studying technology assessment, and we have had some good discussions."

In addition to the regular courses, informal courses offered through Free University provide students with further opportunities. "Free University is a superb idea. It gives a chance for students to learn from other students and it gives a chance to meet new people," Story Reed '84 states.

Jim Foley '84, coordinator of Free University, has found that "attendance is bit down from last year. Not as many people who signed up showed up, perhaps because Winter Study is harder this year, especially on freshmen."

These various aspects of Winter Study—unusual course offerings, extracurricular activities, Free University, and informal discussions, combined with a relaxed atmosphere—all add to the program's general appeal. "Winter Study is a change of pace—it's nice to be in a school atmosphere without all the pressure," remarks Junior Steve Willey.

Paul Noe '85 believes that Winter Study is an essential part of Williams, observing, "There's so much to do that we need Winter Study. Give us a chance while we're here to have more time than during the regular semesters—there's too much to learn from other people and on your own here."

President Chandler also strongly supports Winter Study, pointing out that "it's a highly distinctive, very attractive feature of the Williams curriculum. Winter Study has retained a structure and substance here, where at most other colleges similar programs have fizzled out."

According to President John Chandler, the seminars have created "a more purposeful atmosphere" among freshmen. He believes that "more students are using the library and less are climbing on the ski bus."

Nevertheless Story Reed '84, a former J. A. observes, "Freshmen still seem to have some free time and they're getting to ski."

CC officers to be elected on single ticket

by Ken Cooper

If proposed revisions of the College Council constitution are approved, next year's president and vice president will be elected as a single ticket.

This and other changes were recommended to the Council by its Constitutional Review Committee at Thursday's meeting. Jan Van Eck '85, Council Vice President and chairman of the committee, explained that in the past "there has been trouble between the president and vice president in coordinating their efforts" and that the proposed rule change would enable them "to get to know each other beforehand, which would help them work together well."

Council President Tom Paper agreed, commenting that currently "two people can be elected who don't have the same things in mind and this stratifies the council."

Other proposed constitutional changes include the abolition of all standing committees with the exception of the Finance and Elections committees, and the raising of the number of votes needed to remove a student from any student-faculty committee from a simple majority to three-fourths of the College Council.

According to Van Eck, the revisions are basically "housekeeping chores designed to make the constitution a more workable document." All of the proposed changes are subject to approval by two-thirds of the general student body. If the Council approves the revisions, students will vote on them as part of general elections in late February.

"There will be lots of publicity," says Van Eck, in order to make students aware of the proposals and their implications.

On a related note, Paper informed the Council of a plan for "aggressive elections in which ballots will be distributed in all dining halls." Although some concern was voiced over the possibility of students voting more than once, that is not seen as a major problem.

As Secretary Matt Dodds '86 noted, "there is an honor system at Williams and people won't vote twice." In the past, balloting has taken place exclusively in Baxter Hall.

NEWSBRIEFS

This scruffy bunch of Williams men aren't being lazy this Winter Study. They're raising money for the Williamstown Youth Center by taking pledges for growing beards. (Scheibe)

Beards bring charity funds

Have you noticed an unusual number of scraggly-looking young men around this month? These people have declined to shave in January, not out of laziness, but to raise money in an unusual fund-raising effort called Growth for Youth.

Growth for Youth, conceived by Bill McClements '85, is a project in which sponsors pledge the participants money for each day they let their beards grow. A 10¢ per day pledge, for example, over the course of the 25 days of Winter Study, will result in a $2.50 contribution. All of the money raised will go to the Williamstown Youth Center (formerly the Boys' Club) on Cole Avenue.

McClements says that students, faculty and friends from Williamstown have already pledged almost $500, and the beard-growers are still seeking retroactive pledges and flat-rate contributions.

The other non-shavers in Growth for Youth are juniors Brian Kilcoyne, Floyd Short, Jeff Cox, Kelley Murphy and John Irwin, and freshmen Clifford Favrot, Keith Goldfeld, Steve Urquhart, Jeff Heilman, John Shaw, Rick Lipinski and John Deveau.

The participants have been pleased with the project's success, noting that it is not very difficult and is a good excuse for not shaving. As Short pointed out, "I had been planning to grow a beard during Winter Study anyway."

Asked whether this lack of grooming hurt their social lives, McClements responded, "No. We were never very popular to begin with."

Murphy agreed, "before Growth for Youth, girls never used to talk to me. Now they come up to me and tell me I'm ugly. I think that's progress."

Ray Boyer off to Beantown

Raymond C. Boyer, Director of Public Information at Williams for seven years, will leave the college Feb. 3 to become assignment manager at WCVB-Channel 5 in Boston.

Boyer said in his new job he will be responsible for assigning stories, coordinating the news staff and making sure that stories are ready in time for the six o'clock news. WCVB is the biggest station in Boston, which is the nation's sixth largest market, Boyer said.

He added that he was first approached by the station two weeks ago and offered the job last Monday. Although he said he will miss Williams a great deal, "that's the way the business is. When something opens up and the opportunity comes, you've got to go after it. I'm very interested in TV management."

"Williams is a wonderful place to represent," he said. "I don't exactly feel like a fossil but seven years has gone by like lightning."

Boyer, who received his master's degree in journalism at

Penn State, has worked in radio news for the past three years. Before coming to Williams he was news director at a radio station in Pittsfield. In addition, he and his wife, Mary Jo, run a free lance video service.

Boyer said the college has not yet begun looking for a replacement as Public Information Director.

20/20 comes to the Valley

Television journalist Barbara Walters visited Williamstown briefly last Tuesday to interview Empress Farah Diba, widow of the Shah of Iran, for a March segment of the ABC newsmagazine show "20/20".

Although Walters left town Tuesday after the interview, her ABC film crew remained to interview Wednesday shooting additional film of the Empress shopping in the Williams Coop. They also filmed her on parts of the Williams College campus, where her son, self-declared Shah-in-exile Reza Pahlavi, studied for one year.

The interview took place at the family's heavily guarded Georgian mansion on South Street, across from the Clark Art Institute. The family bought the house in 1979 for $225,000 when Reza Pahlavi was a student at Williams. Pahlavi now lives in Egypt, but his three younger siblings, who attend area schools, still live in the house.

Williams-TV on the way

Williamstown and the Cox Cable Company have struck a deal in which the town will expand its current local cable system to include public access to broadcasting, according to a recent article in the Williamstown Advocate.

Return lines installed on the Williams College campus will allow broadcasting from Adams Memorial Theatre, Chapin Hall and Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Mt. Greylock High School and the Williamstown Municipal Building will also have return capability.

A snag in negotiations with

Cox Cable Company arose when Cox Cable rejected the town's proposal to put return lines at Mt. Greylock High School. The company stated that the high school was too far away for practical installation, according to Russell Carpenter, Assistant Director of Development at Williams.

Broadcasting from the high school remained essential, however, because numerous public meetings and activities take place at the school, Carpenter said.

To resolve the conflict with Cox Cable, Williams College offered to bear the direct cost of installing return lines on campus if Cox would agree to install lines at the high school, said Carpenter. Cox Cable accepted the deal and set a construction deadline for the end of 1984.

Because the contract is so new, the music and theatre departments have no definite plans for broadcasting. However, Carpenter noted that the possibilities are enormous and the college will be able to broadcast lectures and performances, like the Berkshire Symphony, from its halls.

In addition, Carpenter said student-initiated programs could expand the current broadcasting abilities of WCFM, the college radio station.

Lingo earns a Marshall Scholarship

Stuart Lingo '84 has received a Marshall Scholarship, which provides for study in Britain for two years and is renewable for a third. Under the program, Lingo will receive funds to cover tuition, living expenses, plane fare and a small spending and travel stipend.

Although he has not yet heard whether he received his first choice for place of study, Lingo hopes to begin studying art history next fall at the Courthold Institute of the University of London.

The British inaugurated the Marshall Program in the early 1950s as a way of repaying the United States for aid received under the Marshall Plan.

Mummenschanz mimes Stiglicz, Nietzsche come back in WSP film at the AMT tonight

by Karen Philipps

Broadway is coming to Williamstown. Not the singing and dancing, but rather a silent show. The Theater department, Cap and Bells and the Clark Art Institute are co-sponsoring the performance of Mummenschanz tonight at the Adams Memorial Theater.

Mummenschanz, a Swiss mime-mask troupe opened in 1977 at the Bijou Theater on Broadway. The opening of the troupe's three year run also opened up a whole new world of mime.

The show begins with a large brown blob . . .

The pantomime of Mummenschanz is not conventional, according to Ann Eakland of the Theater department. "It's not a mime on the street corner stuck in a box," she said. Unlike the traditional pantomime in which the mime's face is visible, the faces of the two male and female mimes in Mummenschanz are always masked.

In fact, the name Mummenschanz is derived from the German "mummen," meaning game or play, and "schanz," meaning chance. Players of games of chance during Medieval times wore masks to hide their facial expressions.

The masked Lydia Biondi, Peter Gerber, and Alejandro Moran play a game of chance with themselves and the audience. The masks often prevent the mimes from seeing each other, and they therefore rely on the reactions of the audience to determine their timing. The audience is always guessing and wondering what is being expressed on stage.

The underlying theme of the program is the evolution of the world. The show begins with a large brown blob that struggles to pull itself onto a platform and progresses to more complex relationships between people. The people are unlike any humans. Some have heads composed of wooden blocks, others of clay and toilet paper. However, their language is universal.

Mummenschanz has delighted audiences in the United States, Europe, Israel and the Far East. Their 8:00 p. m. performance is sold out.

by Vernon Squires

In the dark, remote basement of Thompson Chapel, "God is dead" and Friedrich Nietzsche, the 19th century German philosopher, is coming to life. Tim Hinkle '84, Stuart Weinstein '84, and professor Robert Stiglicz are working on a movie about Nietzsche and his philosophies, which examines the man as well as his controversial ideas.

"We're trying to get across a conception of Nietzsche," says Weinstein, co-director, co-producer, and co-writer of the film. "Even for us, the project is a journey into the understanding of Nietzsche."

Weinstein and Hinkle, who is co-director, co-producer, and set designer, conceived of the project last fall. Both are History of Ideas majors with strong interest in Nietzsche. In addition, Hinkle hopes to work in cinematography after graduation. Professor Stiglicz, too, joined the project as a student of Nietzsche. Stiglicz, who will be teaching a course in film and politics next January, plays Nietzsche in the movie.

"It's a great learning experience for me," Stiglicz notes. "The philosophy is so different from an everyday intellectual viewpoint; Nietzsche gives us another way to look at the world."

According to Stiglicz, Nietzschean philosophy essentially calls for a turning away from traditional religious thought to a humanistic, personally oriented outlook. Stiglicz finds fault with the common linking of Nietzsche to Nazism.

"Nietzsche was not a proto-Nazi, or an anti-semitic; his ideas were adopted rather simplistically by the Nazis for their own use. What Nietzsche did was call for suffering as a means to growth and knowledge. He looked at the overabundance of life and suffered because he knew it was too much for one man."

Stiglicz also objects to a grouping of Nietzsche and Marx, explaining that while Marx advocated class and social revolution, Nietzsche espoused "personal revolution."

"He represents the extreme element in the enlightenment tradition," Stiglicz says. "He is probably the greatest moral philosopher since Plato."

The three movie entrepreneurs agree that capturing Nietzsche on film is the most difficult and intriguing part of the project, which has dominated Hinkle's and Weinstein's Winter Study Period.

"We're trying to portray philosophy and personality in a palatable way," Hinkle explains. Adds Weinstein, "It's a question of style versus substance—the challenge is trying to get both."

The final version, which will run from 30 to 45 minutes, will be shown in March if all goes according to schedule. The film is in three acts, with the first and last portraying Nietzsche the man, and the middle one describing his philosophy.

"It will probably be incomplete as far as capturing Nietzsche," conceded Weinstein. "But it will be true to him, and will add to the knowledge of him."

Clip Shops earn local certification

On Dec. 1 the Clip Shops, located in Bennington, Vt., Pittsfield and Williamstown, were certified as the first Sebastian Artistic Centers in the area.

Sebastian International is a leader in the field of educating hairstylists and is an innovator in all aspects of that industry. They were the first to introduce a video education program for changing fashions in hair, of which the Clip Shop has been associated for the past six years.

Sebastian shows in New York, Paris, Tokyo have been attended by capacity crowds. Their products and styles have been on the pages of the world's fashion magazines.

Bell ringers' traditional craft thrives in Thompson chapel

by Monica Fennell

They aggravate everyone in Sawyer Library during reading period, but they do add to a snowy evening in January. They are the bells of Thompson Chapel, ringing across campus three times a day.

Students bell ringers David Desmond '86 and Jordan Hampton '87 climb the same steep, creaky steps that ringers have climbed for three quarters of a century to reach the console room one third of the way up the tower. Inside the console room, the chapel's bells are rung by depressing wooden "pump handle" levers connected to the clappers of the belfry's bells.

This paid job is no longer given to the winners of a selective competition; however, bell ringing requires more than music-reading ability. The whole campus is privy to the bell ringers' mistakes, but students seem to prefer our old system to a modern, mechanized carillon. It is physically tiring to push down levers in time to a quick beat, especially when the bells range in weight from 275 and 3000 pounds.

The bellman's job hasn't always been this easy. Turn of the century bellmen could scarcely leave their room in the belfry of West College for fear that mischievous students would kidnap them, meaning that the college bells would not ring on time. Today, Hampton finds that her job keeps her in touch with the college. "I'm doing something that adds to college life," she says.

The duties and skills of bell ringing are passed on from "generation" to "generation" as graduating ringers teach newcomers. Desmond and Hampton use much of the traditional music that has been handed down to them, like Christmas carols, Easter hymns, and of course "The Mountains." Ann Jochnick '84 has also transposed many popular pieces, including "The Sounds of Silence" by Simon and Garfunkel.

This set of handles is the "keyboard" for the carillon's bells. (Scheibel)

Arts in View

The Clark Art Museum will show a collection of German Impressionist Prints until February 26. The collection includes pieces from Liebermann, Corinth, and Sievogt. Many of the prints date from the early twentieth century. . . . Songwriters Mason Darling and Jeanie Stahl will perform at the Williams Coffeehouse tomorrow at 8 p. m. In Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, Darling and Stahl wrote the soundtrack for the movie "Lianna." Admission is $3.00 at the door or $1.00 with a Williams ID. . . . The first exhibition of African Art to hit the Museum of Art, "Vigango," opened last Saturday. Vigango sculpture, native to Kenya, is a centuries-old tradition of creating life-sized abstract figures representing the leaders of the Mijikenda tribe. The exhibit contains 42 figures collected by Ernie Wolf III. . . . The Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield has been awarded a $100,000 Challenge Grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities. In order to receive the money, the museum must raise at least $300,000 from the community. . . . "Rats," an off-Broadway musical opened in Boston December 27. Billed as "a revue not based on the book by T. S. Elliot," the show parodies its somewhat more successful counterpart. The plot centers around a group of rats who live in a Boston theater. A show has just recently closed there, and the rats decide to put on a show of their own. Songs such as "Like Liza Does" and "The Night I Bit Joan Rivers" keep the action lively. The show runs for most of January at Nick's Cabaret.

The African art of the Mijikenda is on display at the College Museum of Art. (Ruderman) that is consistent with Martin Luther King," he said. "This has revolutionary potential." "The view of black politics has matured. The concern is not just with black people in a racial sense, but in an ontological sense—as the poor and oppressed people of the world." "Jackson is a black political candidate organizing people across racial lines with an eye toward redistribution of wealth and power, nationally and internationally."

Dodson said that Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young, who called Jackson's campaign a "mistake" after his Chapin Hall lecture January 11, was simply avoiding the risk of being associated with a losing candidate.

Dodson cited the return of Lt. Robert Goodman from Syria and Jackson's performance in the Dartmouth College debate as evidence of the candidate's strength.

"Undercover" takes off; New Stones

by Brett McDonnell

As soon as I saw the cover of the new Rolling Stones album, Undercover, I knew they were in form this time around. The front depicts a nude woman with stickers covering the strategic areas. The back pictures a bent-over rear end, similarly nude and similarly protected. How could one resist getting this album?

So I got it. Imagine my surprise when the two best songs turned out to be political, and what's more, responsible and even moving.

Everybody must have heard the single Undercover of the Night by now. It is a great song and has been made into one of the best videos currently showing on M-TV. The band is in high style: solid drumming, inventive guitar and that wonde's got itchy fingers/ All the way from New York to Africa."

Even better, though, is the closing song, "It Must Be Hell." It opens with an instantly classic and familiar-sounding guitar riff. Soon the rest of the band kicks in with an anthemic mid-tempo rocker. Jagger breaks in with lyrics that would be passionate and compassionate from anyone, and are downright amazing for the Stones: "We got trouble that's for sure/ We got millions unemployed/ Some kids can't write, some kids can't read/ Some kids are hungry, some overeat." And how about this from the people who gave us "Sympathy for the Devil": "We need more power to hold the line/ The strength of darkness still abides." On both songs Jagger comprehensively articulates most of the words, a rare occurrence. Perhaps he wanted people to hear what he was saying in these songs.

This theory is borne out by the rest of the album, which is less political and where the more normal slurring and incoherence are the order of the day. Plenty of songs here live up to the cover. The titles say it all: "She Was Hot," "Feel on Baby" and my personal favorite, "Tie You Up (The Pain of Love)."

Only on "Too Much Blood" do they really again depart from their normal turf. The song alternates between choruses in which Jagger expresses his normal rambunctiousness ("Wannadance wanna sing/ Wanna bust open everything/ And have some fun") and spoken parts in which he ironically decries the excessive bloodiness of modern culture — "When I go to the movies, you know, I like to see something more romantic, you know, like Officer and a Gentleman or something, something you can take your wife to, you know what I mean?" I like the loose disco feel of the song, but I could do without the horns.

Overall this album is not as good as Beggar's Banquet or Sticky Fingers, or even Some Girls, but it is good rock, and certainly better than the current work of some of their old contemporaries. Have you heard the recent stuff by the Who and the former Beatles? The Stones may not be the best anymore, but they still are awfully good.

captain Brian Rutledge '85 broke the ice at the 5:21 mark when he tucked home a pass into the left corner of the Salem net from sophomores David Fritz and Joe Sciacca.

The Ephs struck again against the team that has not been beaten by Williams in eleven years when junior defenseman Mark Winters fired a slap-shot into the upper corner of the net past goalie Tom Luce, who was screened on the play.

Williams battled through ten minutes of short-handed hockey in the second frame, and Finn controlled 12 of 13 Salem shots in the second period, in which play was concentrated in the Williams defensive zone. The visitors tallied their first goal with 7:35 gone in the period on an unassisted power-play by left-wing Steve McCadams, who controlled the puck along the left boards and moved unmo-ested on Finn, who he beat to the lower right corner.

Salem ties game

The third period featured seesaw action in which the Ephs out-shot Salem by a 12-8 margin although Salem controlled the flow of the game. Salem earned a momentary tie at 2-2 with 5:32 elapsed in the period, when Mike Storer took a rebound off line-mate Paul Vertullo's shot and squeezed it between Finn and the right post.

Williams regained the lead for the final time at the 6:02 mark, just 31 seconds later. Salem was attempting to clear the puck when freshman center Denny Wright intercepted a pass in the slot, ten feet from the goal, and fired a quick wrist shot.

Dan Finn fended off 30 shots to preserve the ECAC Eastern Division win.

The Ephs next game is at Army tonight.

Men's basketball falls to 3-6 after four straight defeats

by Dave Paulsen

It was not a good week for the men's basketball team. Falling to put together a full forty minutes of inspired basketball in any of their games, the Ephs were defeated by Trinity College, Dartmouth College, and Connecticut College.

Although all three opposing teams were favored to beat the Ephs, the losses were especially galling to coach Harry Sheehy. "On paper," Sheehy said, "all those teams were better than us. But the losses were unfortunate because we had our chances."

Fall to Camels

Poor shooting and many turnovers proved to be the downfall for the Ephs in their 82-75 loss to Connecticut College. Connecticut came into the game sporting a 8-2 record, and ranked among the top five teams in New England Division III polls.

An uncharacteristic off shooting night for guard Art Pidori-ano '84 and the team's 21 turnovers proved frustrating to Sheehy. "Artie's poor shooting and the turnovers really hurt us," Sheehy said. Pidori-ano shot 4-17 from the floor, while backcourt mate Tim Walsh '86 had eight of the team's 21 turnovers.

Walsh, however, poured in 23 points to pace the Ephs in scoring, while Pidori-ano added 12 and Dave Krupski '84 added 11 points.

Dartmouth overpowers

Thursday, the team was simply outmanned by the Division I Dartmouth squad in their 81-65 loss.

Although fighting valiantly throughout the game, the Ephs could not offset the high-powered Dartmouth frontline, which measured 6-5, 6-5, 6-4 as opposed to Williams' 6-2, 6-4, 6-2. Defensively, Williams was not able to stop the Dartmouth forwards and centers (who combined for 54 points), while offensively, the Ephs could not muster any type of inside attack.

Walsh led the team in scoring with 24 points in what perhaps was his finest outing of the season. Pidori-ano chipped in 19 points, while co-captain John McNicholas '84 netted 11 points.

Center Brian Burke led the Green with 23 points and 12 rebounds, while holding Eph center Dave Krupski '84 to only two points and six rebounds.

Fall to Trinity

Against Trinity Tuesday at home, the squad led through the entire first half and much of the second before coming unglued and losing 77-68.

Again, the Ephs were victimized by poor shooting. Sheehy said, "We didn't shoot well. We didn't shoot free throws well. We just didn't execute. That's unfortunate because Trinity was a good team that was ready to be beaten." Trinity was ranked nationally in Division III going into the game.

Pidori-ano turned in a stellar performance, slithering his way through the Bantam defense for 27 points. Center Brandt Johnson '87 earned the praise of Sheehy with a fine performance off the bench, contributing 10 points for the Eph cause. Walsh was also in double figures with 11 points.

The hoopsters, now 3-6, travel to Middlebury for a game tonight.

Jeff May '85 clamps down on his Norwich opponent whom he beat 11-1. (Plonsker)

Wrestlers take fourth in tourney

by Mike Gillis

The wrestling team came in fourth in a four-way meet Saturday at Lasell Gym. Brown University defeated all comers to win the meet, while M.I.T. beat Norwich to capture second place, and Norwich defeated the hosts to gain the third spot.

Williams was plagued by injuries and a lack of light wrestlers. Against Norwich, for example, they had to forfeit two matches because they had voids in those weight classes.

The Ephmen fell to Brown 21-13, to M.I.T. 31-14, and to Norwich 28-16.

Junior Jeff May gave an outstanding performance for the Ephmen. May defeated his Norwich opponent 11-1, tied All-American candidate Ken Shull of M.I.T., and lost by one point to Kent Rollins of Division I Brown.

Dave Bicknell '84 also shined for Williams, as he won all three of his matches (9-3, 9-3, and 10-6) to remain undefeated on the year.

Williams falls to 2-5. They travel to Boston next Saturday to take on UMass-Boston in a four-way meet including grudge matches against Norwich and M.I.T.

Hoopsters split for the week

by Mike Best

In an uninspired performance Saturday night, the women's basketball team lost at Union, 52-44. The Eph offense never really got on track, and Union was able to maintain a lead throughout the entire game.

The first half was marked by Williams' inability to take many shots, a problem that continued into the second half. The Dutchwomen jumped out to an early lead which they never relinquished, and the Ephs were forced to play catch-up. That task was made even more difficult by Williams' lackluster offensive showing against the frequently changing Union defense.

Still, the Ephs managed to close the first half down by the smallest margin of the game, 29-25. In the second half, though, Williams' scoring problems persisted, and the Dutchwomen widened their lead. Williams simply could not close the gap.

High scorer for the Ephs was Liz Kellison '87, who scored 12 points on 57 percent shooting but only took seven shots. Jean Hakmiller '86 also had a good game, shooting 66 percent, but she scored only 10 points because she had so few shots.

52-49 over Hamilton

Last Wednesday's game at home against Hamilton was a different story, however. The Ephwomen, playing what coach Julie McHugh called their "best defensive performance of the season," won their rematch with the Continentals, 52-49. Just four days earlier the Ephs had lost to Hamilton.

The game was close the entire way. The Continentals, playing a strong zone defense, took the lead at the beginning of the game. They were up 12-6 with 9:24 remaining in the first half.

Williams quickly mounted a comeback, though, and tied it up with seven minutes remaining. The lead went back and forth for the rest of the half, and a last-second shot gave Hamilton a 23-20 halftime lead.

The Ephwomen dominated the boards during the second half, and the Continentals did not get a single offensive rebound after halftime. Leading the way were Kay Lackey '85 with seven rebounds and Sandy Wanstall '87 with five.

Rebounding and defense

The combination of strong rebounding and fine defense proved too much for Hamilton, and the Ephs turned their three-point halftime deficit into a three-point win.

Offensively, the Ephwomen, who shot 42 percent for the game, were led by Kellison and Tracy Burrows '84, with 16 points apiece. Kellison shot eight for twelve from the floor.

The team, now 4-3, visits North Adams on Thursday and Westfield on Saturday.

Yale shuts out Ephs but Continentals fall

by John Schafer

The women's squash team took their 2-0 record to New Haven Friday but ran into a clearly superior squad in the Yale Bulldogs. Earlier in the week, however, the Ephs destroyed the Hamilton Continentals 7-0.

The Bulldogs simply overwhelmed Williams. Only one player, junior Hillary Thomas, the second on the Eph's ladder, even managed to win a single game as everyone else fell 3-0.

Coach Renzle Lamb summed up Yale's strength, "They are very experienced in that all their players have played squash before coming to Yale."

Shutout Hamilton

On Wednesday, the Ephs shut out visiting Hamilton 7-0. In this match, there was only Continental who managed to win a game off one of the Ephs.

Senior Cassie Fisher, ranked 14th nationally at the end of last year, dropped one game but still beat Kate Wallace 3-1. None of the other matches was even this close. The scores within the games were also lopsided. For example, Thomas won 15-3, 15-4, and 15-6 and number three Amina Mahmood '84, coasted 15-6, 15-4, and 15-3.

Lisa Scott '84, the hero of the victory at Middlebury, recorded the most impressive win as she outpointed her opponent 45-11 (15-3, 15-4, and 15-4). Sophomore Amanda Griggs also won by the same huge margin 15-3, 15-6, and 15-2.

The Ephs, now 2-1, next travel to Dartmouth, with the men's team, for a match on Wednesday the 25th.

Men's squash, 15-0, gets three more wins

by John Schafer

The men's squash team won three times this weekend beating their opponents by the collective score of 26-1. The victories, over Rochester, Yale, and MIT, make the Ephs 15-0 on the year with a winning streak of 18 games.

Saturday, Williams simply overpowered MIT 9-0. All but two of the Ephs won their matches in straight games. On Friday night Williams downed visiting Rochester also by the score of 9-0.

Yale came to Williamstown Friday afternoon for what was supposed to be the Eph's toughest challenge to date. However, in an unusually one-sided match, the Ephs destroyed a team that was third best in the nation last year, 8-1.

Though the wins over Rochester and MIT were more or less expected, many had anticipated a tough battle with the Bulldogs. "Yale had a new coach and some injuries," explained coach Sean Sloane, "but we really played a great match to beat them."

Next week features two away matches with Dartmouth and then Tufts, which Sloane does not see as problems for his team. On February 2nd, however, top-ranked Harvard comes to town for what should prove to be the Ephs hardest and most challenging match of the year.

All-American Greg Zaff '84 reaches for the ball in his 3-0 victory over Yale's top players. (Ruderman)

Ephs out skate Salem but fall to Union 6-2

by Chris Harned

The Union College hockey team surged past the Ephs with four unanswered mid-game goals to top the hosts by a 6-2 tally Saturday. On Wednesday, the Ephs topped visiting Salem State 3-2.

Union, which was paced by Gavin Marton's two goals and left-winger John MacKenzie's goal and two assists, advanced to 6-5-1 while the Ephs fell to 6-4-1 despite senior goalie Dan Finn's 36 saves.

Union went ahead 1-0 in the tenth minute of the game, when MacKenzie poked the puck between Finn's skate and the post for an unassisted goal.

Ephs fight back

The Ephs fought back to tie the contest with 12:15 gone when Rich Jackson took a break-out pass from defensemen John Booth and Erik Knutzen and flashed a slap-shot past Union netminder Paul Brooks from thirty feet out in the right side of the Williams offensive zone.

Finn picked up 16 of his 36 saves in the fast-paced period but found himself watching helplessly as Mike Pozzi flipped a rebound into the open net to end a Union power-play.

Captain Gill Egan put Union ahead 3-1 in the first minute of the second period and assisted Marton two minutes later to make the score 4-1. The Dutchmen broke the contest open at the 10:37 mark when Bill Kirby found Duane Joyce in the clear on the far side of the Williams net.

Goalie provides edge

Although neither team dominated puck control in the first two periods, Union goalie Paul Brooks provided a significant edge, stopping several point-blank Williams shots.

The Ephs forced the action in the third, taking advantage of four power-play opportunities, and got off 12 shots on Brooks while Union tested Finn just seven times.

Freshman Chris Traggio pulled the Ephs within three, at 5-2, with a power-play score in the seventh minute. Junior Mike Uretsky's slap-shot from the point was controlled behind the net by Jeff Potter, who found Traggio under heavy pressure in the slot. The wrist shot found the upper corner of Union's mesh.

Union put the icing on the cake at 14:32, when Marton scored off a pass from David Appleby and MacKenzie to close the scoring at 6-2.

Women pucksters shut out RPI

The women's hockey team raised its record to 3-2 with a suspense-filled 1-0 victory over R.P.I. last Tuesday night. The victory gave Williams its highest victory total in seven years.

Coach Dave Scheibe '86 said, "The difference between this year and past years is the play of Debbie Bernheimer '86." The first-year goalie has been the catalyst that has the other players playing well.

Williams jumped out to an early 1-0 lead, then applied pressure the whole game. The Ephs outshot R.P.I. 30-9 although the Engineer shots were all dangerous. Bernheimer stopped three breakaways to keep R.P.I. off the scoreboard.

Game's only goal

With less than two minutes gone in the first period, Laura Ryan '85 scored her first goal of the year, assisted by Beth Ebel '86. Ebel drew the R.P.I. goalie out of the crease then passed over to Ryan, who rapped the puck into the vacated net to get the game's only goal.

In the final minutes of the period, R.P.I. appeared to be gaining momentum. Bernheimer stopped a breakaway just before the buzzer to sent the opponents to the locker room empty-handed.

Williams came out gunning in the second period, peppering the R.P.I. goal with shots, but the only shots getting by the goalie hit the posts.

The line of Sally Hart '86, Sarah Montgomery '86, and Kirsten Rooks '87 repeatedly threatened to score only to be stopped by the post and the sprawling netminder.

The third period saw no change in the pattern of play. Williams controlled the puck nearly the whole time, and R.P.I. struggled to keep the Ephwomen at bay. Midway through the period came one of the most important exchanges of the game. Williams had Meredith Bibber '85, Lisa Marr '86, and Pam Briggs '84 attacking in the R.P.I. zone. Just after Marr had hit the post, R.P.I. cleared the puck to mid-ice.

There, a waiting Engineer took the puck in alone on Bernheimer. Bernheimer rejected the bid and R.P.I. never threatened again.

Defense clamps down

The Ephs' defense relieved coaches' praise for holding R.P.I. to three shots per period. Senior tri-captain Alice Coniskey and freshman Haley Clifford played well, continually denying R.P.I. any offense. The coaches also lauded the play of the other captains—Briggs and Jeanette Hazelton '85.

Tracksters outrun Springfield, Albany St. for comeback victory

by Chris Stearns

Friday witnessed the humbling of highly touted Springfield and Albany State by the mens' indoor track team in Towne Fieldhouse as the Ephs compiled 67 points to Springfield's 57 and State's 45. The Ephs' depth proved to be the crucial factor in Friday's victories.

Once again the tracksters struggled early on against formidable competition. Highlights of the field performances included a 3-4 showing in the long jump by Will Love '86 and Kendall James '85 as well as Bernie Krause's toss of the 35 lb. weight good for third, and his subsequent heave of the shot 44'9 1/4" to grab fourth.

A big surprise in the triple jump was the emergence of freshman Andre Lopez, recruited the day before, and Marc Hummon '84, stolen from volleyball. They bounded for big points as they took 2-3. The Ephs exploded in the high jump as they swept the event. Paul Toland '85 soared 6'4" eclipsing Tom Dougherty '84 for second and Cam Burns '85 for third.

Ephs take lead

The Ephs mounted their attack in the 1500, led by senior co-captain Bo Parker who won in 4:05, and followed by Tom Gudas '86, who hit the after-burners in the final lap to take second. This catapulted the Ephs into the lead for the first time.

James then snagged second in the 55 meter highs and co-captain Ted Leon '84 bolted for second in the 400 in 51.6.

Springfield once again challenged and after a taking the top two spots in the 500 regained the lead. Sophomore Tom Pingree and Mark Rice '84 were third and fourth in that race.

But Clark Otley '86 burned down the lane in the 55 meter dash to hit second at the wire. And Williams made up more ground in the grueling 800 as junior Kevin Jenkins polished off a 2:02.4 for first and Jon Fisher '87 scampered for fourth.

The Ephs climbed back behind senior Bennett Yort's victory in the 1000 in 2:40.8, with Mike Coyne '87 unleashing a fearsome kick en route to second. John Ellison '86 cruised to second in the 3000 and freshman Dave Grossman came alive in the final lap to nail down fourth. Springfield won the mile relay, although Williams held on for second. The Ephs struck again in the two mile relay, holding the crowd in awe as they squeaked by Albany State at the tape.

"Depth wins the meet"

Kevin Jenkins said after the meet, "I just wanted to run a good time and win. The track is real nice but sort of slow. It still needs to be broken in."

Coach Dick Farley provided more insight: "It was the kids that backed us up that made the difference. Not to take away from the top guys, but performance is what is expected of them. Our depth won the meet." On the afternoon the Ephs took an impressive nine seconds and five thirds in the meet.

The team will be treated to a two week repose and face their next opponents, Fitchburg, Worcester State, and Westfield, on Saturday February 4 at 1:00 pm.

Coakely named coach

by John Clayton

Robert M. Coakley of Lenox has been named the new head baseball coach, succeeding James R. Briggs, who resigned recently in favor of a position on the College's administrative staff.

Coakley is widely known in the region for his 21-year career as a basketball and baseball coach. His position at Williams will be a part-time one, and he will continue as Head of Guidance at Taconic High School in Pittsfield.

Coakley has been coaching basketball and baseball, mostly on the high school level, since his graduation from Springfield College in 1960. At Springfield, he played shortstop on the 1958 NCAA Championship team.

Since then, Coakley has coached freshmen teams at Springfield (1960-2), varsity teams at Lee High School (1961-66) and assisted at UWYoming, where he earned his doctorate in education in 1969. He has also helped coach varsity basketball at Pittsfield and Taconic High schools (1968-81).

Briggs moves to alumni office

Briggs resigned his baseball and football coaching duties this winter to become the College's Executive Director of Alumni Relations. He had also previously worked in the alumni office.

Briggs said of his successor, "He will make a fine addition to the staff of the Williams Athletic Department. I have known him for a number of years now, and he is an outstanding human being, and of course, his coaching record speaks for itself."

Coakley takes over a hard-hitting young team that finished with an 8-9 record last year. Seth C. Johnson will continue as assistant coach.

Coakley has a strong background in public service in the Lenox area, and owns The Coakley Farm which raises, shows, and trains Morgan horses.

Coakley's two sons—Mike, a junior catcher, and Rob, a sophomore infielder, both started for the baseball team last year.

Dennis Butler '86 left paralyzed by Brodie Mtn. skiing accident

Moved to Washington, still "very positive"

by Christian Howlett

Sophomore Dennis Butler is in critical but stable condition in the intensive care unit of George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C., following a skiing accident at Brodie Mountain ski area Jan. 25.

According to newspaper reports, Butler was working as a ski patrol at Brodie when he went off the trail and struck a tree or light pole at about 5:30 p.m. He received serious injuries to his spinal cord and fifth vertebrae which have left him paralyzed below the neck.

According to Charles Butler, Dennis' father, doctors believe the condition may be permanent. However, his spinal cord does not appear to be severed.

Butler spent the first 11 days after his accident at the Berkshire Medical Center in Pittsfield. He was transferred by air to George Washington University Hospital Sunday morning for a bone fusion operation to repair his broken vertebrae.

Deluge of visitors

While Butler was at the Berkshire Medical Center, he was visited daily by students and members of the faculty and administration, his parents said. Visitors described him as alert and generally in good spirits. Although he had difficulty speaking because of a tracheotomy performed Friday, he communicated with students via signs and eye movements.

"His morale, due to the Williams students, due to the staff here (at BMC) and due to some of the faculty and staff (at Williams), has been kept high, and that's good," said his mother, Anita Butler. "It's been very obvious that there's a lot of caring from the Williams people."

On Friday the Dean's Office and College Council informed students of a newly-formed "Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund," and elicited contributions to help Butler's family with their huge medical expenses.

"We sure appreciate them initiating that," said Charles Butler. "We're talking about the minimum of a year in rehabilitation. We don't have any definite plans yet, we're just taking it day by day."

"A long, hard road"

"There's the possibility of maybe coming back to Williams someday, but that's a long way down the road. The main concern now is getting him off the ventilator to where he can breathe normally," he said.

"The young man has a long, hard road ahead of him," agreed his mother.

Butler, a native of Washington, D.C., lived on the third floor of Currier Hall. He was an avid skier and rock climber and a member of the Williams Outing Club.

He also has a strong interest in languages and has studied Latin and Norwegian as well as German, his intended major. He worked in Driscoll Dining Hall and volunteered with the Williams unit of the National Ski Patrol.

Covered with posters

While Butler was at the Berkshire Medical Center, his room was covered with posters of skiers and rock climbers and messages in German brought by visiting friends. His guest book of greetings and good-luck messages filled an entire spiral notebook.

Tom Addison '85, a friend and suite-mate of Butler who has been in almost daily contact with him, said the accident's effects have been mainly just physical.

"He's very much still Dennis Butler, and all the fun that implies," he said.

"The same old Dennis"

Another friend who saw Butler Saturday agreed. "I expected all the machinery, I expected him to be all strapped in, (but) he's still the same old Dennis, it's amazing."

"It was very encouraging to see him, he seems to be very positive."

Butler's parents wished to thank all the students and faculty members who visited Dennis and urge them to keep in touch by writing him care of the Intensive Care Unit, George Washington University Hospital, 901 23rd Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20037.

Colby to abolish frats, Amherst still debating

by Vernon Squires

After twenty years, the rest of New England is beginning to catch up to Williams. At least on the issue of fraternities. During the past several months, debate over the future of frats has rocked Colby, Amherst, and Trinity Colleges. Only the latter school remains secure in its support of frats; at Colby the Greek Houses were abolished, and at Amherst their future looks bleak.

The current charges against frats echo by-and-large the protests that marked Williams in 1963. Hazing procedures, vandalism, exclusivity, elitism, divisiveness and promotion of "drunk and disorderly" conduct are the standard complaints. A criticism that never surfaced at Williams but is raging now is the sexist nature of frats. When combined with the older charges, the sexist issue gives new impetus to the abolition movement.

tion movement.

At Colby College fraternities will be formally abolished on May 20. The decision to eliminate frats was reached after extensive study by a commission created to assess their viability. Essentially, the commission concluded frats needed substantial reform, but the houses were unwilling to make accommodations. According to Colby senior Doug Terp, who is a frat president and commission member, the proposals for reform were met coolly by frat members.

"We offered co-ed frats, and the frat presidents replied 'unacceptable.' We asked for non-exclusive means of acceptance into frats, and the presidents replied 'unacceptable.' We suggested frats relinquish some control, and the presidents replied 'unacceptable.' No one wanted to say what the

Young Democrats plan voter drive to register students for primaries

The College Young Democrats, a group formed last month, will hold a non-partisan voter registration session Monday in Baxter Lounge from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.

According to Young Democrats president Daniel Peris '86, Monday's session will be part of an overall non-partisan registration drive put on by the club, in cooperation with the College Council, Dean's Office and Political Science Department.

This upcoming session in Baxter will have three distinct purposes, Peris explained. It will allow Massachusetts residents to register, some out-of-state residents to obtain mail-in registration forms and out-of-state residents who wish it to register in Massachusetts by declaring Williamstown their permanent residence.

Students who register now will be eligible to vote in the upcoming presidential primaries as well as in the general election in November, Peris said. In Massachusetts the deadline for registering for primaries is next Tuesday. The Massachusetts primary will be held during the second week in March.

In addition, "(out-of-state) people who are interested in registering in their own state can come here for information," Peris said. Depending on their state, they may be able to register by mail, he noted. Twenty-nine states currently accept mail-in registration, "including most of the major states from which Williams draws students," he added.

The Williamstown Registrar

will staff the booth along with at least one Young Democrats member.

Peris said he was unsure how many Williams students need to be registered, but the Young Democrats plan to conduct a telephone survey next week to determine the number.

After Monday's session, the group plans to set up tables in Baxter and other dining halls to hand out information on the various Democratic presidential candidates. Next fall it will hold another session to register more voters for the November elections.

Peris said he and other students formed the College Young Democrats in January. "The main purpose of the group is to be a main-stream liberal activist group, of which there are none on campus," he explained.

Voiceless

Student opinion has had little effect on Colby's decision to ban fraternities, and on the probably similar upcoming decision at Amherst. At both schools, polls showed a substantial majority of students favoring frats, yet their administrators went against these student wishes.

It appears to be a trend. Williams students complain that our administration goes against student wishes on the issues of rock concerts at Chapin, the house transfer system, dogs, and Row House dining. Yet we are not alone. The student voice on other campuses is also ineffectual.

Thus, Williams students cannot place all the blame for taking away student rights on any one Dean or on our particular administration. The problem is endemic to colleges nationwide.

Compared to fifteen years ago, student input has declined. Back in the 1960s and '70s, young people were fighting in Vietnam, and so demanded a stronger voice not only in the war but in the college's decisions, as well. Administrations were willing (or forced) to listen. But with the more competitive job market of the '80s, students are (somewhat justifiably) more interested in succeeding within the system than in trying to change it. Possibly sensing this change in priorities, administrations have filled the vacuum by re-assuming many of the privileges they gave students earlier. Since students in general do not want to make decisions, administrations make them instead.

However, this leaves students conditioned to apathy. Since the decisions are being made for us, we don't bother to try to make them, instead concentrating on studies, recreation, or vocation. But in a vicious cycle, students thus have less and less input while administrators realize this and do more and more. Furthermore, if and when students attempt to take part in the decision-making process they don't know how to. Can we really say that College Council resolutions or Record editorials or even hunger strikes have fully realized their goals?

Apathy in many cases means satisfaction with what's happening. But the polls at Colby and Amherst, and similar opinions on other issues here, seem to indicate that students are not satisfied. If so, this is disconcerting, for there is no clear road to change.

Sixth Man

Did Williams College spirit leave with Steve Epstein? We think it did. Articles certainly will be written about how our men's basketball team has not played up to its potential or even how they have played poorly. Players will be criticized, the coach may be criticized but unfortunately the sixth man may not be. Lasell Gymnasium always has been the unsung hero; until now. The most recent display of enthusiasm at the game against Brandeis brought new meaning to the word apathy. It is our duty to show support for a hard-working team; a team that has beaten Middlebury and will defeat Amherst and Wesleyan. But by support we do not mean merely one's presence at the game; we must commit ourselves to making noise. Memories of a thunderous Lasell haunt those of us who have seen victories over Dartmouth, Clark and numerous other talented clubs. If people want to attend sporting events in silence, let them travel with the golf team (no offense linksters). The sixth man must rise. Do we really want Epstein back?

Open-mindedness

To the editor:

In defense of Mr. Franklin Miller as well as myself, I am writing in response to Phillip W. Holmes' article of January 24th.

In the first place, nowhere in my article did I say that I support Reagan's policy on deterrence, yet Mr. Holmes claimed that I do. The fact is that I am highly skeptical of Reagan's extremely hard-line policy. However, as I have already said, my main motivation to compliment Mr. Miller (with whom I also disagree with regarding his extremely hard line) was that he showed that an alternative to the widely publicized freeze movement does exist.

Secondly, Mr. Holmes' accusation that we "are preparing for a war our leaders insist we cannot fight" fails to take heed of the argument I made. We do not know whether or not a limited nuclear war is possible or not. Thus, it only makes sense that we prepare for it. Yes, we do not think a limited nuclear war is possible, but we do not know.

Finally, and most importantly, I would like to say emphatically that I by no means am calling the freeze movement "melodramatic stuff". Like the supporters of the freeze, I consider nuclear disarmament the most important and real issue facing the present generation. However, there is a tendency to support the freeze without considering its implications. In saying this I am in no way accusing the entire movement (particularly not the members of the Williams Disarmament Forum) of being guilty of emotionalism. I believe that the freeze movement is, in general, based on an intelligent approach to solving the greatest crisis of our day. Also, I believe that the movement is moving towards an even more solid base, as evidenced by the forum organized here by the WDF.

I also want to state categorically that I do not oppose the freeze. However, I do not support it. The headline that appeared over my article was written by the Record staff and does not represent my final decision. I am skeptical of the freeze; I am skeptical because of the reasons that Mr. Miller pointed out in the debate. Although I do not agree with him entirely, I think he deserved praise for coming to Williams and presenting sound arguments that must be confronted by all concerned. The defense of the United States is an issue that must be carefully analyzed; we cannot afford to reject the words of an experienced military just because we hate bombs and poverty and violence. Again, let me reiterate that my praise of Mr. Miller comes from my respect for some of the points he made, not because I support everything the Defense Department does. In the same way, I think many of the speakers who favored the freeze deserve praise; during the conference I agreed with much of what they said as well. It is a complex issue and all that I request is that the issue be addressed from all points of view, for only then will we be able to develop a policy that will ensure the security of our nation and avoid the devastation of a nuclear conflict.

Soda/Pop Wars

Mountain Dew

by Dave Paulsen

They took away my Mountain Dew! That's right, they took away my Mountain Dew.

I discovered this the other day at lunch when I stuck my glass under the third dispenser and an ugly white liquid came out. To my great surprise and indignation, the Mountain Dew had been replaced by, of all things, Seven-Up.

As far as I'm concerned, this is the last straw. I've tolerated and suffered through some of the cultural absurdities of the East Coast, but I will not be converted. Yes, I'm now willing to refer to basketball as "hoop" instead of as "buckets", and I sometimes catch myself using the terms "psyched", "wicked", and "harsh". But give up my Mountain Dew for Seven-Up? It's a fate worse than death.

First of all, I have no respect for anyone who refers to either of the drinks as "soda". Such an immature, quick-eater's phrase for pop brings nausea to any self-respecting Midwesterner.

But the problem goes deeper than that. First, there is the difference in taste. Mountain Dew tastes good. Seven-Up does not. Mountain Dew has that distinctive sparkle of quality. Seven-Up never had it, and never will.

Look at the commercials. Seven-Up has some guy sitting around in a chair watching life go by. Mountain Dew features voluptuous women actively engaging in sports and other leisure activities. If caffeine can get me into that crowd, more power to it!

Seven-Up

by Rob Park

It seems that the Williams College Food Service is turning over a new leaf. Previously, all we could do was beat our breasts and bemoan such things as the installation of the mewing and drooling flume.

But signs of internal reform have already become apparent; the first step in the right direction was the replacement of the fluorescent battery acid known as Mountain Dew with that champagne of sodas (not "pop" as the Midwestern corrupters of the language would have it), Seven-Up. Hallelujahs and hosannas.

And why should Seven-Up be given the nod as the drink of choice among discriminating Williams soda sippers? The reasons should be obvious for all but the most obtuse (or those from the Midwest):

—Seven-Up has a better logo. Like the drink itself, it's crisp, clean, sharp, touched by the spritely muse of originality; truly the pride of Madison Avenue (where, by the way, many Williams grads will be working, including those from the Midwest). The Mountain Dew can look like it's been designed by the Berkshire Fingerpainting Club.

—The faintly urtic tinge to Mountain Dew is pretty disgusting. —Unless you're a congenial narcoleptic or a senior with a thesis, scarfing caffeine-loaded Dew may not be wise.

—Finally, the continued consumption of Mountain Dew has been shown to cause severe retardation, particularly affecting the taste-centers of the brain. Harsh.

ACSR forum draws only 3

by John McDermott

An all-campus forum held by the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility to discuss social issues and college proxy votes, drew only three students, including this reporter, to Griffin Hall Jan. 25.

The six ACSR members present discussed proxies, the spring-time shareholder resolutions which the committee votes on. In recent years proxies before the ACSR have addressed corporations' roles in oppressive South American countries, in nuclear weapons building and in discriminatory hiring practices.

Last year the ACSR was the target of much the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition's calls for divestment from South Africa.

College treasurer Will Reed, a member of the ACSR, said student interest is currently at a low ebb. He added that he thought the turnout would have been no larger had the meeting focused on one issue, such as South Africa.

"Last year, the room would have been filled," Reed said after the meeting. "The history of campus interest is that it rises and falls dramatically."

"Campus interest in the problem has waned because of more confidence that the ACSR is doing the job," he added.

Reed said he was surprised, however, that the January 13th and 14th conference on nuclear arms, sponsored by the Williams Disarmament Forum, did not spark more interest in the ACSR meeting. David Yaskuika '84 and Jackie Lanzarone '86, two organizers of the nuclear conference, were the other two students present at the proxy meeting.

At the Jan. 25 meeting, the committee reviewed last year's proxies on Williams investments such as Rockwell International, General Electric and AT&T. All of these proxies involved nuclear weapons.

In the General Electric case, a stockholder resolution asked the company to "support an immediate U.S./U.S.S.R. freeze on nuclear weapons, testing, production and deployment by adopting as policy that our company shall neither accept nor renew contracts involved with development or production of nuclear weapons."

One committee member voted for the resolution, five voted against it, and two abstained. Most of the other voting stockholders voted no at the suggestion of management. Several ACSR members said that their no-votes were cast not because of the intent of the resolution, but because of its wording or its impracticality.

Committee member Neil Grabols, College Provost, said that asking General Electric to give up its defense contracts was "asking it to go out of business."

"Individuals should take positions. The college should not," said ACSR chairman Stephen Lewis.

College Council rewrites rules for Election Com., Treasurer

by R. DeMott

On Thursday the College Council began reviewing a revised constitution, approved by a sub-committee headed by Council President Tom Paper '84 and Vice President Jan Van Eck '85. The new constitution included only a few proposed changes, all of which were accepted by the Council.

Although the revised general College Council by-laws passed without objection, the Election Committee by-laws caused some discussion, before being passed unanimously with one abstention.

"Election Committee by-laws haven't existed (in the past), so we created them to make it easier to change things," explained Van Eck. Paper added, "It's much more flexible to have rules in the by-laws," (as opposed to including them in the constitution).

The constitution provides that amendments may only be passed by a majority vote of the student body and a 2/3 vote of the Council. The by-laws, on the other hand, may be changed by a simple majority of the Council.

CC will choose

A major change in policy included in the Election Committee by-laws is that the Committee on Undergraduate Life and the Committee on Educational Policy will be chosen by CC's Election Committee from now on. In the past these committees were the only two to be elected by the student body. A College Council liaison was added to the membership of each of these committees as well.

Explaining these changes, Van Eck said, "The ballot is long and most people vote on name recognition. College Council wants a little more say in who's on these committees."

The first four articles of the Constitution, dealing respectively with the government, function, members and officers of the Council were all passed as the sub-committee had proposed them.

Off-campus rep. can vote
The first challenge to the sub-committee's proposal came in Article III, section B, dealing with non-voting members. The revised constitution made the off-campus housing representative a voting member and left the minority and exchange student representatives non-voting members.

Van Eck explained that since student representation is by house, the off-campus students had not had a voice in the Council when their representative had not had a vote.

After proposals that the minority and exchange representatives either be made voting members or released from the Council (thus relieving them of Council attendance requirements), Paper called for a vote on them. Neither proposal could carry the necessary 2/3 majority of the Council, so the section stood as presented.

Treasurer changes

The only other challenge to the proposed Constitution involved Article IV, section A-3, on the election of the Treasurer. The Treasurer has always been elected from a candidate pool of people who have served on the Finance Committee.

The new Constitution added a clause stating that when only one Finance Committee member wishes to run for the office, the Council may make other candidates eligible.

Proposals were made that the Council should always have the ability to make other candidates eligible and that the wording of the clause be changed. Here again, neither proposal could pass by the 2/3 margin.

The council will continue to review the new Constitution at its next meeting on Thursday.

Development head departs

John Pritchard, Director of Development at Williams, will leave the college in mid-February to join the New York City insurance firm of Johnson & Higgins as Vice-President.

Pritchard, a 1957 graduate of Williams, joined the college as Associate Director of Development in 1977 and was named Director of Development in 1978. He had previously worked at Fred S. James and Co. Inc., and before that, for 16 years, at Johnson & Higgins.

William S. Reed, Vice President for Administration at Williams, noted that total giving to the college during the time Pritchard headed the Development Office had reached new heights. Last year the total giving to Williams was over $15 million.

"John has been instrumental in the development of the regional development representative network," said Reed, "and in improving communication between the college and the alumni. He will be sorely missed."

Pitchers gone from the Log

Due to a large number of pitchers being stolen, Log manager Dave Heinlein '83 has decided to stop serving beer in pitchers until the lost containers are recovered. In addition, servers at the college pub have become more stringent in checking hand stamps to ensure that they do not serve beer to minors, Heinlein said.

"I've lost two-thirds of the pitchers," he said, adding that they were probably stolen. Originally, there were approximately 60 pitchers, and now less than 20 remain. "If they come back, I'll start serving in pitchers again," he stated.

The stricter hand stamp checks were a management decision, independent of college security, Heinlein said. "We're just upholding the law," he explained, adding that there had been no specific incidents which influenced his decision.

Outside of the pitcher problem, Heinlein has been very pleased with operations at the Log. "It's been nothing like last year, thank God," he said, referring to two incidents of vandalism on Spring Street by drunk freshmen which nearly caused the closing of the Log during Winter Study last year.

"There were no slow nights in January, and there haven't been any so far in second semester. As a businessman, I'm happy, but in terms of sleep I'm anxious," he said.

Raab garners $12,500 grant

Associate Professor of English Lawrence Raab was recently awarded a $12,500 National Endowment for the Arts poetry fellowship for creative writers. He won a similar award in 1972.

This year's fellowship was one of only 113 awarded in the fiction category among 1,150 applicants. They are awarded to published writers of exceptional talent as judged by the Literature Advisory Panel, a group of scholars which advises the National Council on Arts on policy and grants in the field of contemporary literature.

Raab said he will use the fellowship money to "take time off from teaching to write." He is currently on sabbatical leave from Williams.

Raab is the author of two collections of poems, "Mysteries of the Horizon" and "The Collector of Cold Weather." His most recently published poetry includes "Listening to a Certain Song" which appeared in the Fall issue of the Paris Review, and "The Witch's Story," published in the October 31, 1983 issue of The New Yorker.

In addition, Raab's work appears in a number of anthologies, including the most recent edition of the Norton Anthology of Poetry.

Help Line calls for volunteers

Help Line, a volunteer telephone counseling service in North Adams, is looking for students interested in learning to become counselors. Applications will be accepted through February 10.

Although no prior experience is needed, there is a training program run by Help Line for all counselors. Beginning Feb. 18 and continuing every Tuesday and Thursday through March 13, the program teaches listening skills, and helps operators learn to deal with calls concerning drug, alcohol and suicide problems.

Students counselors are expected to contribute at least three hours a week to Help Line. The service, begun in the early '70s, also provides daily calls to elderly persons and shut-ins, and has an adjunct program called Phone Friend for children at home alone.

Counseling volunteers range in age from 18 on up, and have a wide variety of backgrounds. Several Williams students are already working for Help Line.

Interested students should contact Susanne Green at 664-6391 by Feb. 10.

Frats in trouble despite student protest reforms would be," said Terp. Fraternities are still popular with students, according to a recent poll. The Boston Globe reports that 80 percent of those asked supported the fraternity system.

The reforms needed at Colby are large, especially in the context of fraternal life. Not only do Colby males enjoy reserved, single-sex housing, but they also have the nicest rooms at the college. Frat row is the site of wild parties and verbal assaults on pedestrians. Even campus tours tend to avoid the frats, according to the Globe.

The frat houses also require substantial maintenance and upkeep, to the point that frat members alone cannot pay the bills. Frats owe the college almost $500,000 in loans.

When the frats go in May, a new residential house system, partially modeled on Williams', will replace them. According to Terp, Colby students are responding enthusiastically to the new plans.

"We accept the fact that frats are abolished," conceded Terp. "Now we are asking what we can do for the future to make the system work out. The college should be better."

Not all Colby students agree, however, protesting that the frats were picked on because they are so prominent. Some campus leaders are pondering court action to reverse the trustees' decision.

At Trinity College the frats were put on the line last spring. A faculty committee recommended abolishing the houses, with their proposal supported by a majority of the faculty. The students protested this recommendation with an equal majority, and they won. The trustees voted to keep frats with some strengthened regulations.

Amherst

At Amherst the situation is heated, with a decision on the still operating, their members expect trouble ahead. A trustee committee issued a report on student life in January, with the findings quite critical of the current situation.

"Although we do not believe the fraternities have created the problems in Amherst's social life, we do believe they have exacerbated them by their future of fraternities scheduled for late February. Preliminary announcements and statements by faculty indicate dissatisfaction with frats. On the other side of the coin, students and alumni are rallying to save the frats, which dominate Amherst social life.

"In some fraternities you'll see several hundred people standing wall to wall drinking beer and inhaling God knows what chemicals."

Prior to his death one year ago, Amherst President Julian Gibbs issued a "white paper" entitled "The Place of Fraternities at Amherst College." Gibbs concluded frats were dead, writing it is not "whether we maintain fraternities forever but, rather, for how much longer."

Now, with a permanent president taking over next year, students fear the administration is trying "to rush things through, to get them cleaned up for the new president," in the words of one frat leader.

Although frats at Amherst are lack of social discipline, by tolerating gross social activity in the name of all-college service, and by accentuating the formation of cliques and fostering anti-social behavior," the report states.

Frat members are unimpressed by the report's findings, believing the administration is looking for a scapegoat for the undistinguished social life at the college.

"It's a socially strained college, because the frats are the only place to party," admitted frat member Steve Harris '85. "Guys get a little wild once in a while, but that would happen whether the frats existed or not."

Acting College President Armour Craig thinks the frats are to blame, however, saying in the Globe: "In some fraternities you'll see several hundred people standing wall to wall drinking beer and inhaling God knows what chemicals."

Beyond the issue of whether or not to dismiss frats is the problem of an alternative. No other viable social centers exist right now, and the proposed "cluster" system for housing is met coolly by students.

On their own initiative, several students conducted a poll designed to show statistically the support for frats. Approximately 65 percent of the student body voted to keep frats in some form, with most students desiring an alternative as well.

"There is a strong feeling that frats are a desirable part of the college," said pollster Russ Weaver. "What we need is a complement." Added Kate Silbaugh, a resident counselor, "It's hard to say if we're equipped for a social life without frats. If you want to be in the mainstream social life, there's really no choice."

The frats promise not to go down without a fight, and they are trying to meet administration guidelines as best as possible. According to Hal Ball, president of the inter-fraternity council, the frats have shaped up remarkably.

"We're about as utopic as you can get right now for a fraternity. They blame us for being the wild element on campus, but that's because we're the only element."

At the end of February the trustees will decide whether or not to follow Williams' lead. Things look bad, however, for the frats. As Ball admits, "Our lives are in danger."

Two plays in DownStage open eyes

by Monica Fennell

Everyone in DownStage last weekend went to a party. The performance of Wolfgang Bauer's Party for Six presented a tantalizing glimpse of a gathering of young people. The short play was followed by Eugene Ionesco's The Lesson.

Most of the action in Party took place in a room backstage. At times the door to the room was left open offering the audience a peek at the action inside. Unable to clearly view the scene, the audience had to listen and imagine. Too often, however, the door was closed, making it difficult to hear the conversations and leaving the audience staring uncomfortably at an empty stage.

Just as the discomfort became unbearable, a brief scene on stage provided relief. Freshman Averil Clarke's appearance as an annoyed but understanding landlady wearing fuzzy slippers was a particularly amusing interlude.

The success of The Lesson was due to the superb acting of Gordon Compton '85 who played a frenzied professor and Ana Deboo '85 as his initially enthusiastic and later deflated pupil. The actors' mastery of body language and mannerisms created exaggerated characters that were still believable.

Don't miss the Williams theatre production of Don Juan in Hell. The play, directed by former English professor Fred Stocking who retired last spring, is really one section of a longer Shaw play, Man and Superman. Performances are Friday and Saturday nights at 8 p.m. in DownStage. Tickets are $1.50, 50¢ with a Williams ID. Famed violinist Pina Carmirelli will perform with Music from Marlboro at the Clark Art Institute Friday, Feb. 10. The eight member string group will play works by Beethoven, Boccherini, and Mendelssohn in their 8 p.m. performance. . . . The new program at the Millam Planetarium takes star gazers back in time to Egyptian pyramids and Stonehenge. The piece "Dawn of Astronomy" will be shown on Friday night at 7:30 p.m. Watch out for The Attack of the Killer Tomatoes. The movie, billed as one of the ten worst ever made, is scheduled for Tuesday night at 7 and 9 in Bronfman. World renowned folk-blues musician Josh White Jr. will perform on Wednesday at North Adams State College. White has recorded on Mercury and United Artists labels and has produced such hits as the theme song from Peace Corps and VISTA. The 8 p.m. concert will be in the Venable Hall Theatre.

Ephwom fall to Cards

by Mike Best

In their fourth loss in a row, the women's basketball team lost to Wesleyan Saturday night, 64-49.

"We had a bad day offensively," said Coach Julie McHugh, "and they had a great one. They were really fired up, really wanted to beat us."

Wesleyan took an early lead and the Ephwom simply could not catch up. In the first half, only Liz Kellison '87 provided much offense, scoring half her game-high 20 points in the first period.

The Cardinals were helped by numerous Williams turnovers, especially in the first half, and by the Ephwom's 32 percent shooting for the game.

Down 29-18 at halftime, Williams tried a second half charge led by Kellison and junior Kay Lackey (twelve second-half points). The Ephs managed to narrow the gap, but Wesleyan pulled away again, finishing the game up by fifteen.

On January 28, the team lost a physical game to Westfield, 57-42. Two days earlier North Adams edged the Ephwom, 58-55, despite Kellison's 20 points.

The losses dropped the team's record to 4-6.

Men and women swimmers romp on Springfield

by Chris Clarey

The men's swimming team improved their record to 6-0 with a 75-38 trouncing of Springfield College at Springfield Saturday. The highlights of the meet were the national qualifying first-place performances of the Williams 400 medley and freestyle relay teams.

The medley team, composed of John Peloso '85, Bill Couch '86, Peter Orphanos '85, and Will Andrew '86, sped through the Springfield pool in 3:38.22. The freestyle team of co-captains Jeff Mills '84 and Rob Sommer '84, Scott Robinson '87, and Andrew finished in 3:12.56.

All-American Bill Couch, who qualified in both the 200 IM and backstroke last week against Bowdoin, improved on his 200 IM time, winning in 1:57.00, and also won the 200 breaststroke (2:16.06). Sommer looked strong in winning the 200 backstroke (2:01.01) and is apparently recovered from his early-season ailments.

Freshman Robinson had an outstanding meet as well, taking second and qualifying for the nationals in the 200 free (1:45.32) and winning the 500 free in 4:52.04 (his best time of the season). Steve Delano '85 had an outstanding swim in the 1000 free, breaking the 10 minute barrier with a 9:52.82.

Women trounce Springfield

The two-time defending Division III national champion women's team raised their record to 6-0 with a 100-40 defeat of Springfield. The team qualified nine swimmers for the nationals (to be held at Emory University March 15-17) during the course of the meet.

Freshman Joan Horgan was one of the standouts for the Ephs, winning and qualifying in the 100 (1:01.86) and 200 (2:16.02) yard backstrokes and in the 200 medley relay (1:55.96) with teammates Katie Anthony '87, Kim Eckrich '85, and Rachel Stauffer '85. Horgan also qualified in the 400 free relay (3:45.00) along with Kathy Kirmayer '86, Sue Knapp '85, and Stauffer.

Eckrich, an All-American in six events at last year's nationals, took first and qualified in the 100 (1:10.01) and 200 (2:32.05) breaststrokes and the 200 individual medley (2:17.51). Kirmayer, coming off an outstanding performance against Bowdoin last Saturday, where she qualified for three events in the nationals, once again surpassed the qualifying standard in both the 50 and 100 freestyles, winning them both.

Other Ephs who qualifying in individual events included co-captain Celia Ciepleja '84 in the 200 butterfly, Anthony in the 100 back, Lani Searfoss '87 in the 200 breaststroke, and diver Emily Parker '86.

Both teams will return to Muir Pool this Saturday as the men host Colgate and the women host Mt. Holyoke.

Icewomen glide, 8-1

by Tom Dumphy

The women's hockey team skated to its third straight victory on Saturday, demolishing Wesleyan 8-1. The eight goals in one game is a season high.

Williams scored seven goals in the first two periods. Coach Dave O'Keefe '86 credited the strong showing to a good week of practice and the growing experience of both players and the staff.

The Williams attack was led by Beth Ebel '86, Sally Hart '86, and tri-captain Jeanette Hazelton '85, each of whom scored two goals. The defense once again shut down the opposition, allowing only 22 shots all game. Sue Klein '86 and Suzy Schulze '85 repeatedly turned back the Cardinal attack at the blue line.

Open the scoring

Hazelton opened the scoring five minutes into the game after a steal behind the net. Andrea Raphael '86 scored the game-winner by stealing at mid-ice, skating between two Cardinal defenders, and rifling the puck past the goalie from thirty feet out. Ebel scored with leaping five minutes into the game after a steal behind the net. Andrea Raphael '86 scored the game-winner by stealing at mid-ice, skating between two Cardinal defenders, and rifling the puck past the goalie from thirty feet out. Ebel scored with leaping two defenders and then flipped a backhander in the net past the hapless Wesleyan goaltender.

Williams hopes to avenge an early-season loss to Middlebury Friday night at home.

Skiers compete in UVM carnival

by Greg Leeds

The men's alpine ski team posted a third-place Giant Slalom finish in last weekend's University of Vermont Carnival at Stowe, Vermont. John Pier '85 led the Ephmen, finishing fifth, while teammates Chris Eagon '84, Crawford Lyons '84, and Heige Weiner '87 came in tenth, eleventh, and 16th respectively.

In the Slalom competition, the team was spectacular in the first run but failed to sustain their performance in the second. After the first run Lyons was fourth, Pier was seventh, and Weiner was tenth. Tim Hill '86 followed with 12th, and Eagon was 25th. On the second run, Hill moved up to 8th and Eagon to 17th, but the remainder of the team failed to finish.

As of Sunday night, Williams coaches did not have most of the results, including the final Slalom, overall results, and women's results. The men's cross country team, however, did finish sixth in the relay.

A week earlier, Williams finished third in the Slalom and fifth in the GS at the University of New Hampshire Carnival. Lyons had a strong performance with a first in the Slalom and eighth in the GS. Weiner and Eagon took 11th and 19th in the Slalom.

Women's squash get 4th in Can-Am

by John Schafer

In the second phase of the Canadian-American tournament, the women's squash team finished third out of six teams this weekend at Dartmouth. Overall, the squad received fourth place because they ended up fifth on the Canadian side of the match which took place earlier this year.

The first phase of the tournament took place in Canada using a softer ball than that of the players were not familiar with. In this match the Ephs fell to three strong Canadian schools—University of Toronto, Queens, and York—and Dartmouth. However, Cassie Fisher '84, the Ephs top-player, went undefeated and was voted the MVP.

This weekend at Hanover, where the players used the livelier, harder ball, Williams beat Vassar, Queens, and York but fell to Toronto and Dartmouth. Toronto, which mounted an insurmountable lead after the first part of the tournament, won the whole match.

Again Fisher, who was ranked 14th nationally at the end of last year, swept by all her opponents and was chosen MVP. "It is a tremendous accomplishment for Cassie," said Coach Renzie Lamb, "to be undefeated at number one playing the best of these teams from both Canada and America. The team played well, but Cassie was really the star."

Tracksters fall to Fitchburg

by Chris Stearns

The men's track team upped its record to 5-2 by defeating Westfield State and Worcester State but failing to Fitchburg State Saturday. The meet turned out to be a two way match between Williams and Fitchburg with the Ephs losing 67 to 63 while Westfield racked up 27 and Worcester a meager 9 points.

Bernie Krause '84 led off by tossing the 35 lb. weight 46'2 1/4", good for third. In the shot put, Williams got a second with Krause's 46'4", a third by Maurice Blanks '87, and a fourth by Stephen Theodore '87. Junior Paul Toland skied for second in the high jump with Tom Dougherty '84 and Cam Burns '85 in third and fourth.

Ephs make up ground

The Ephs began to make up some ground in the track events. Junior Kevin Jenkins and sophomore Tom Gudas combined for second and third in the grueling 1500. Kendall James '84 streaked over the 55 highs in 8.2 to take third, and Mark Rice '84 added a 53.4 to snag third in the 400.

Senior co-captain Ted Leon garnered the Eph's first victory in the 500, turning in a 1:08.5, and freshman Andrew Arnold followed him with 1:10.3 for second. In the 55 meter dash, freshman Andre Lopez took third down the straightaway.

Jenkins, in his second race of the day, seized the lead late to capture a victory from Dave Ellis of Fitchburg. Mike Coyne '86 and Darryl Shaper '86 finished third and fourth. Senior Brian Angle ran tremendously in the final lap of the 1000 meter to clock a 2:35.6 and gain the third win for the Ephs on the day. Jon Fisher '87 and Tom Pingree '86 cruised for third and fourth in the same race.

Coach Dick Farley said, "It was not a bad day. We ended up losing to a better team. We were missing a few people today, but you can't use that as an excuse. The kids who competed today did admirably."

Women win own meet

After the conclusion of winter study, the women's track team held the first Williams Winter Invitational Track Meet. Williams won in the final lap of the final race to hand arch-rival Amherst a 53-51 loss. Brandeis mustered 17 points and Rhode Island College hit double digits with 11.

Lindsay Rockwood '85 led the way for the Ephs. She won the long jump in 15'8", took second in the triple jump, took another second in the hurdles, and jumped for third in the high jump.

Sprinter Gail Henderson '87 tore down the straightaway in 7.4 over the 55 meter distance and exploded for a win in the 200. Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 won the hurdles in 9.6 as well as snaring thirds in the long and triple jumps.

The meet came down to the two mile relay. Anchoring the final leg, senior Amy Dougherty pulled away to win the relay and the meet.

The men's and women's teams both face Amherst, Wesleyan, and Trinity in Little Three competition Saturday at 1:00.

Hoop tops Cardinals for first Little 3 win

by Dave Paulsen

Clutch free throw shooting by Dave Krupski '84 and Tim Walsh '86 helped the men's hoopsters hang on to a narrow lead and defeat Wesleyan 77-73 in Saturday's contest at the Wesleyan Fieldhouse. The win evens the Ephs record at 7-7 and leaves them with a 1-0 record in Little Three competition. For Wesleyan, the defeat followed on the heels of an earlier overtime loss to Amherst dropping their Little Three record to 0-2.

The game plan for the Ephs was to push the ball up the floor offensively, looking for the fast break. Taking advantage of the somewhat slower Cardinal defenders, the Ephs raced to a 43-38 halftime advantage.

Instrumental in the halftime lead was the play of guards Walsh and Art Pidlorlano '84. Also aiding the Eph cause were reserves Russ Howard '84, and John McCarthy '84. Howard hit two long range jumpers to loosen up the Wesleyan defense, while McCarthy contributed two inside moves off of fine passes from Brandt Johnson.

Cardinals clamp down

The high-powered Williams offensive attack was obviously a source of concern for Wesleyan coach Herb Kenny, and his team came out for the second half playing intense defense. The suddenly hard-nosed Cardinal defense held the Ephs scoreless for the first four minutes of the second half and edged to a 44-43 lead.

It was then that the Ephs, despite playing in a decidedly hostile gym, righted themselves and displayed the pulse which had been lacking in some of their previous games.

Executing a more disciplined offense, the Ephs regained their advantage and held a 67-59 lead with four minutes remaining in the game. At that point, Williams coach Harry Sheehy put his team into a 4 corners delay game.

Wesleyan narrows margin

Wesleyan, though, was not yet dead. Behind the long-range gunnery of Mike Arcieri, the Cardinals fought back. When senior co-captain John McNicholas and Pidlorlano both missed front ends of bonus free throws, Wesleyan narrowed the margin to four points.

With just 17 seconds remaining, the Ephs held a 73-71 lead when Krupski stepped to the line for a bonus situation. Displaying icewater in his veins, he calmly sank both free throws to make the score 75-71.

Desperation shot falls short

Chris Brown then hit for the Cardinals to cut the lead to two points once again. With four seconds remaining, Walsh was fouled and canned both free throws. A desperation heave by a Wesleyan player fell short, and the Ephs had their victory.

Pidlorlano turned in a stellar performance for Sheehy's squad. In addition to a steady floor game, Pidlorlano poured in 22 points.

Walsh also played extremely well, converting on six field goals and all six of his free throw attempts for 18 points.

83-71 over Brandeis

The performance was a marked contrast to Tuesday's sloppy game against Brandeis. In that contest, Williams was lucky to prevail 83-71. Defensively, the Ephs were unable to stop Brandeis guard Paul Celucci. The 5-11, 180 pound bowling ball rolled through the Eph defense en route to a 32 point performance.

Offensively, the Ephs were inconsistent, despite the 24 points of Pidlorlano, 22 from Walsh, and 15 points from Johnson. Sheehy made it a point to single out Johnson, who is seeing increased playing time, and Peter Griffith '85, who sparked the team in an otherwise lackluster first half.

In other action over the Winter Break, the Ephs defeated Middlebury and Bates, but lost to Colby. Their next home action will be this Saturday night against Amherst in a crucial Little Three contest.

Amherst downs pucksters 7-2; Eph winless streak at six games

by Chris Harned

The men's hockey team extended its midseason tailspin to six games with losses to Little Three rival Amherst, Ivy League power-house Princeton, and Division II rivals Colby and Bowdoin over the past ten days to fail to 6-9-1 on the season.

The Ephmen fell to Amherst, whose 7-3 record established the Lord Jeffs as the top team in Division III hockey, by a 7-2 score at Lansing-Chapman Rink this Saturday. The visitors jumped to a 2-0 lead in the first eighteen minutes of the game on the strength of two unassisted goals by Amherst sophomore Rick Hartflel, who burned Williams back-up goalies Rick Dietz '87 and Marty Collins '86 for four goals on the night.

Assistant Captain Greg Pachus pulled Williams within one just thirteen seconds after Hartflel's second goal when he took a crossing pass from linemate Jeff Potter and slapped the puck past Amherst goaltender Mike Keroack.

The Ephs were handicapped by the continued absence of Captain Dan Finn, who has been out of the Williams net with a pulled muscle for the past four games. Freshman Chris Traggio, the team's second leading scorer, is also out with a shoulder injury.

Dietz starts in goal

With Finn out of the net, Dietz got the starting call against the Jeffs. Despite an impressive debut which featured 28 saves in two periods, he fell victim to four more second period goals which put Amherst up by an insurmountable 6-1 lead after two periods.

Although Williams tested Keroack, the top goaltender in Division III, 34 times, only Pachus and Freshman Dave Caswell managed to slip the puck by him. Caswell pulled the frustrated Ephs within four with an open net score after linemate Guy Kurtz '87 had pulled Keroack out of the net.

Williams, however, could pull no closer, and the Jeffs closed the scoring at 7-2 in the 14th minute of the final period when Hartflel picked up his fourth goal of the lopsided contest, slapping the puck past Collins, who fended off 12 Amherst shots in the final period.

Loss to Princeton

Earlier in the week, the Ephs appeared to emerge from a scoring slump (in which they had not scored over three goals in a game since 1983) as they fell to Division I Princeton 11-6. Williams went ahead of the Tigers by a 3-2 margin midway through the second period on goals by junior Jeff Potter, Traggio, and assistant captain Brian Rutledge '85, before the Tigers reeled off seven unanswered goals. Three Williams penalties led to Princeton goals.

Co-captains unbeaten

Forfeits cost grapplers match

by Lee Hatcher

The wrestling team won nine out of fourteen individual matches at a tri-meet against Trinity and Plymouth State Saturday, but on paper the performance resulted in a 26-24 loss to Trinity and a 21-20 loss to Plymouth State.

In the mind of Williams Coach Hal Zendie and the members of the team, it was a win. Zendie said, "The match went well. I was pleased to see us win more individual matches than we lost. We were unable to fill the lower two weight classes, which meant we forfeited away a great deal of team points."

May and Leahy star

Against the Bantams co-captains Jeffrey May '85 (158 lbs.) and John Leahy '84 (167 lbs.) put on an awesome display of wrestling prowess, pinning their respective opponents.

The lower weights were not as fortunate. Freshmen Andrew

Williams pulled within four with seven minutes remaining in the game on Traggio's second goal and on junior Rich Jackson's slap-shot from the slot. Princeton tallied once again on Collins, who had 29 saves in the game, before senior Dan Finneran picked up Williams' final goal to close the gap to 10-6. Princeton added a meaningless break-away goal with two minutes remaining.

Downed by Colby and Bowdoin

During Winter Break, the Ephs journeyed to Maine to battle with Colby and Bowdoin. In both contests, the Ephs fell behind quickly due to numerous penalties, Dan Finn's immobile right arm, and talented competition. Junior center Rich Gallun prevented the two teams from holding Williams scoreless on the weekend when he scored a first period goal in the 7-1 loss to Colby.

After Colby, the Ephs lost a flat, embarrassing game 9-0 to Bowdoin, the second-ranked team in ECAC Division II East.

Tonight, the Ephs travel to Union to take on the team that started the Ephs' current losing streak with a 6-2 victory in the Purple Valley.

The squad currently holds down the seventh spot in the ECAC Division II East standings with a 5-6-1 Division record. Playoff berths await the top eight teams.

Anselmi and Drew Steckler lost at 134 lbs. and 142 lbs., respectively. Dan MacDonell '87 came up short in the waning moments of the bout in a 3-2 loss.

In the last match of the day Peter Dawson '86 landed an impressive 11-4 victory, but the result was counted as a minor win rather than a major. Had Dawson won by eight points, the Ephmen would have gained an extra team point, resulting in a tie with Plymouth State.

There were some other notable victories against the Plymouth State contingent. Anselmi and Steckler blazed their way to 8-3 and 7-4 victories. In the middle weight classes, captains May and Leahy also won, as May beefed up his undefeated record. MacDonell rallied from his earlier loss to garner a major 11-0 win.

The next match, the Little Three championship, is Saturday at Wesleyan.

Crimson hands squash first loss of year

by John Schafer

Unbeaten defending champion Harvard overwhelmed the men's squash team Thursday in a match that may have decided this year's national title. The loss broke Williams' 20-match winning streak and dropped their record to 17-1.

Harvard, undefeated over the past two seasons, was clearly boosted by the return of their top player, Kenton Jernigan, who had taken the first semester off and only just came back to Cambridge Monday. Jernigan, who is the top-ranked player in the country, handed All-American Greg Zaff '84 his first loss of the year, 3-0. Playing number four, senior co-captain Jamie King also suffered his first defeat of the season. Like Zaff and like the team, King is now 17-1 on the year.

Thompson still unbeaten

Only Ben Thompson '85 remains unbeaten for the Ephs as he outlasted Harvard's sixth man 3-2. Co-captain Tom Harnity '84 recorded Williams' only other win by downing the Crimson's second-best player, Jim Lubowitz, 3-1.

The loss to Harvard followed impressive road wins at Dartmouth (9-0) on January 25th and at Tufts (8-1) two days later. Now the Ephs must regroup, as they travel to rival Trinity tomorrow. The Bantams were ranked fourth in the polls last year, one spot in front of Williams.

Four frosh arrested, caught stealing keg

by Christian Howlett

Four freshmen were arrested and charged with larceny and transporting alcohol as a minor by Williamstown police early Sunday morning.

The arrests occurred after the four allegedly stole a keg of beer from a party in Dennett House and were attempting to transport it back to the freshman quad. They were stopped by police next to Chapin Hall at approximately 12:15 a.m., according to Officer Vincent Zolto.

Charged were 18-year-olds Gregory Keller and Ajata Mediratta, both Williams B residents; 18-year-old William Graham and 19-year-old Barrett Brown, both of Williams A.

According to Brown, the four saw a beer keg sitting next to the door of the Hot Dust Room, located below Mills House, Saturday night. He said one of them asked "how could we get that back to the Quad?" and he then volunteered to get his car.

The four loaded the keg in back of the car and pulled on to Park Street. After turning onto Route 2 they were spotted by Zolto, who was off-duty on his way home.

According to Zolto, he saw Brown's car driving down Route 2 "at a high rate of speed" with a keg in the back and the hatch flapping open and closed. He happened to pass two police cruisers at that point and motioned to them. They followed Brown's car up to Chapin Hall.

Brown said the officers stopped him and asked "have you guys got I.D.'s and registrations, and where'd you get that keg?" He explained that "we told them what we were up to. At that point it wasn't worth lying about."

The four were arrested, taken to the police station and released that night. They will be arraigned in Northern Berkshire District Court Wednesday.

The charge of transporting alcohol as a minor carries with it a $300 fine; larceny is punishable by a maximum jail sentence of two and a half years.

Keller said he had heard from Security that the larceny charge might be dropped in court, although Zolto said he had no knowledge of that happening.

Following the theft incident, Security, on the recommendation of town police, closed parties in Dennett, Armstrong, Mills and Perry Houses since state law prohibits large parties after 1 a.m.

For reasons which are not readily apparent many courses, such as this Environmental Geology class which has more than 50 people, are seriously overcrowded this semester. (Ruderman)

Students and faculty troubled by overcrowded course crush

by John Irwin

Students seem to be having more difficulty than usual getting into courses this semester and many courses are unusually large, although figures indicate that more courses are actually being offered than in the fall.

Most of the incidents of overcrowding appear to be attributable to the volume of student course changes and specific problems in several departments.

In the History department, for example, many students were turned away from courses such as History 202 (Modern China) and History 214 (Modern America). Department chairman John Hyde said that professors had to turn people away from the freshman seminar History 106 for the first time in several years.

100 for Art 110

The Economics department also had several overenrolled courses, and courses in several other departments were unusually full as well. For example in Art 110 (Drawing I), a studio art course intended for 20 students, more than a hundred sought places. Even English 216 (Introduction to the Novel), a lecture course intended for over 150 students, had to be closed when 200 people appeared at the first class meeting.

The extent and seriousness of the problem are hard to determine, since final course registration counts are not yet in to the Registrar's office. In addition, these counts only show how many people are in a course, not how many were turned away.

More courses this spring

Registrar George Howard cited figures, however, which suggest that the problem of crowded courses ought not to be any different this semester than in the past. More courses are being offered this spring than last fall, and there are only 18 more students on campus now than there were last semester.

Two hundred and thirty-six courses with 333 sections were offered in the fall, while 286 courses with 323 sections are being offered this spring. The fall in the number of sections is mostly attributable to English 101, which had 19 sections in the

Housing Com.: Groups of 7 to Mission Park

by R. DeMott

Meeting Wednesday, the Housing Committee unanimously passed a proposal to allow freshmen to apply to Mission Park in groups of seven instead of four during freshman inclusion this year. The proposal will take the form of an official recommendation to the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

The Housing Committee's action reopens a controversy which ended last fall when the CUL decided to lower the size of freshman inclusion groups to four, the size of most suites on campus.

In the past those groups with more than four students had automatically been relegated to Mission Park, which has larger suites.

"[CUL] changed it (last year) so it would be consistent across the board," said Dean Mary Kenyatta, a member of both the Housing Committee and CUL.

Only 3 to Mission

However, explained Bill Foraker '85, Housing Committee co-chairman and author of the proposal, "we changed it back because last year three people applied to Mission Park (first choice, 22 second choice). That was in a large part due to the restriction (on group size)." The previous year 71 freshmen put Mission Park first choice and 192 second choice.

"Most freshmen seem to want to have the option," Foraker added. Freshman representative James Goodwin '87 agreed. "Every single freshman wants the option of applying as a group of seven," he said. Dean Kenyatta said that she would like to see a poll taken on the subject.

Co-chairman Phil Walsh '85 said the question of inclusion group size got reopened this year because "it's a different Housing Committee." He said he was confident that CUL would also pass the proposal. "We'll put the screws in. You can get anything passed if you're persistent."

Several Housing Committee members pointed out that the larger application groups were a drawing card for Mission alone. Pratt House President Allison Martin '85 retorted, "We need something! Let's face it, it's ugly, there's no parking, it's a hole down there." Later she added that she loved the people there.

In other business, the committee also examined a proposal concerning the Center for Developmental Economics, whereby each CDE member would be matched with a volunteer from one of the residential houses. The volunteer would be responsible for keeping the CDE member aware of social activities on campus.

"It's ridiculous, this should have been done years ago," said Walsh '85. The house presidents agreed to bring a list of interested volunteers to the next meeting.

The committee scheduled its annual Freshmen Inclusion Program for Sunday, Feb. 26, at 7:00 in Brooks-Rogers. Walsh explained that during the program, "the house presidents get out and give the freshmen the dope on [their] houses."

The following week was set for open houses, during which freshmen are invited to visit the housing groups before actually applying to them.

The Berkshire Quad and Dodd-Tyler will hold their open house on Monday, Feb. 27. The row houses will hold theirs on Tuesday, Greylock on Wednesday, and Mission Park on Thursday. All of the open houses will be from 7-10 p.m.

Security Supervisor Jean Thorndike asked Mission Park house presidents to go to their houses and find out

Butler improving in Washington hospital

by Christian Howlett

The condition of Dennis Butler '86, who was left paralyzed by a Jan. 25 skiing accident, has now officially been upgraded from critical to stable, according to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. Butler remains in the intensive care unit of George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C.

O'Connor said that according to hospital personnel, "[Butler] is resting more comfortably in traction." An operation to rebuild his crushed fifth vertebra has been postponed in the hopes of natural healing occurring, O'Connor said.

However, he added, Butler's spinal cord appears to be transected and he has "no hope of regaining any function."

O'Connor said Butler is still on a respirator but has begun to do a little breathing on his own. Doctors say he will remain on artificial breathing for several more weeks, O'Connor added.

In addition, Butler is now able to talk a little bit. According to O'Connor, Butler's parents say Dennis is in reasonably good spirits and is beginning to think about his future and how he will deal with his disability.

The "Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund," begun Feb. 3 by the Dean's Office, has already netted $3,000, O'Connor said. Notable contributions have come from the swim team, various residential houses and a benefit party by the Black Student Union, as well as individual students, staff and faculty members.

"I think it would be wonderful if we could get it up to $10,000," O'Connor said. "That is the price of a really first class wheelchair, and I think that would make a good gift."

He noted that contributions, made out to the fund, can be turned into the Dean's Office or S.U. Box 3291.

On Wednesday the Housing Committee, led by chairman Phil Walsh '85, left, voted unanimously to raise the size of freshman inclusion groups from four to seven to encourage freshmen to apply to Mission Park. Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta, right, did not approve the move. (Ruderman)

The Williams Record Seven-Up

Seven freshmen could again be included as a group to Mission Park if the Committee on Undergraduate Life approves a recent Housing Committee resolution.

Last year, for the first time, the number of people allowed to apply to Mission was lowered from seven to four, and only two freshmen applied to Mission as their first choice.

An attractive feature of Mission—being able to live with a large group of friends—has been turned on its end to become a drawback. If four people apply to a Mission house, they are almost guaranteed to have to share a six- or seven-room suite with strangers. The seven-room suites, which were designed to a unique feature of the Park, are now unpopular because of the mix of roommates.

Dean Mary Kenyatta favors the four-person limit for reasons of consistency with other houses. But a consistency in all houses of happy suite members is more important than a consistency of numbers. While suites in Greylock are designed for four people, those in Mission are designed for more, so it is logical to adapt the system to fit Mission Park.

The Mission Park limit was originally lowered during the move to cut the number of transfers. However, the lowered popularity of Mission among freshmen can actually increase the number of transfers because those who are there are not there by choice. A group of six or seven, however, would be more pleased with Mission and less likely or even able to transfer out.

Physical plant is not the main problem at Mission Park. Mission was once a highly sought-after place to live; and it can be again if inclusion rules are tailored to Mission's special advantages.

Crudities

To the editor:

Last Saturday night the Williams hockey team lost decisively to Amherst for two reasons, one obvious and deplorable. First, the Amherst team was clearly the stronger that evening. Second, the Williams undergraduate "fans" were unsportsmanlike, painfully juvenile and worse than embarrassing.

We would guess that tennis balls, bottles, unimaginative cheers and tasteless jeering did little, if anything, to encourage the Williams players, bench penalties notwithstanding.

This behavior defiled the image of student sportsmanship in the worst possible way, at least in the eyes of visitors, faculty, alumni and townspeople. Hockey games are public events and not simply private preserves where uninhibited poor taste can all hang out and one can wallow in his own crudities.

Unfortunately all Williams undergraduates now bear the stigma of some of their number who behaved so poorly. Your friends are irritated, perplexed and ashamed.

Spectator Sports

Fan participation in athletic events returned to the school in recent basketball and hockey games. Last Saturday's hockey game was an example of how not to participate; this week's basketball game was an example of constructive rowdiness.

There is a fine line between helping and hurting the team you are cheering for, and the obnoxious, thoughtless, drunken activity at the hockey game went over that line. On the other hand, coaches, players and fans welcomed the return of the Sixth Man to Saturday's hoop game. Cheers were fun and clean; stunts were original and amusing.

Active fan participation is an enjoyable part of athletics, and one that can help the team greatly. Saturday's crowd from Lasell would be welcome at all College sporting events year round.

profanity and worse. It is too bad that a few individuals can do so much harm to a college as fine as this one.

Little Boys

To the editor:

Along with many other spectators, I am distressed and offended over the behavior of some of the Williams hockey team cheering section at the recent Amherst hockey game. They cheapened themselves and the College. More importantly, they injured and insulted the Williams team which they had supposedly come to support.

I urge the student body, faculty, and administration to take some action to help these little boys to grow up. Such shenanigans would get them tossed out of Madison Square Garden and arrested. Perhaps a dose of real world medicine would be helpful.

There were 205 of us in Brooks-Rogers Friday before last. One out of every ten Williams students. Amazing. When cards asking whether or not we were pre-registered were passed around, thirty-two people began to sweat. You could say that I was glad to be pre-registered. I had my place on the life-boat, but I knew how those thirty-two felt. The day before, I had been sweating, in hopes of getting into Econ 101S, for which twenty-six had been pre-registered. There were exactly forty people in the room. I had counted them to see just how bad my chances of getting in were.

Freshmen and sophomores, who have yet to decide on a major or concentration, experience a great deal of indecision, which is certainly a valid feeling. It's easy to hate a subject when you're cramming for the final. Later on—maybe a month later—you may decide that you actually did enjoy it.

Our system is better than many other schools'. We don't have the dreaded arena in which students clobber each other in order to get a seat in Micro 307 or Mondo 101. But there is room for

by Jan van Eck

This year, the College Council is doing its spring cleaning early by revising its Constitution. We think it makes sense to rewrite passages which have caused problems in the past and to delete references to obsolete committees. The proposed changes have already been passed by a two-thirds vote of the College Council and will be on the ballot at the end of the month. At least 1000 students must vote for the changes on February 27th, 28th and 29th for the proposed changes to take effect. Brief descriptions and explanations of the proposed changes are presented below:

•Like candidates for the White House, the Council President and Vice-President will be elected as a ticket. Dif-

Assembly will be 250 students, not the present number of 100. We felt that a substantial number of students should attend such an Assembly before it can claim to speak for the whole student body.

•The student member of any college committee chosen by the Council may be removed by a three-fourths vote of the council. In the past, the Council could do nothing even if a person never attended any meetings. Under the proposed changes, if a person fails to attend meetings or severely misrepresents what a large majority of Council members feel to be student opinion, then the College Council will have the power to remove that person.

... presidents and vice-presidents who were elected separately have sometimes caused the Council to be ineffective even if both were creative and energetic—sometimes especially so.

ferences between Council presidents and vice-presidents who were elected separately have sometimes caused the Council to be ineffective and disorganized, even when both persons were creative and energetic—sometimes especially so. The benefits of this change, proposed by a past vice-president, seem to override any side-effects of increased pre-election politicking.

•The Council will be able to, by a two-thirds vote, make students eligible to run for Treasurer even if they have not previously served on the Finance Committee. In the past, it seemed unfair to let former Finance Committee members run unopposed when other qualified candidates wanted to run.

•The following committees will be deleted from the Constitution because they have not met for several years and, as far as we could tell, never served any useful purpose in the first place. They are: the Information Committee, the Faculty Meeting Committee, the Council's Housing Committee (the other one will continue to exist), the Student Life Committee, and the Student Education Committee. Now, the president forms ad-hoc committees, like the Newsletter Committee, which disband after their jobs are done. In addition, the position of alternate House Representative will be abolished in the proposed Constitution.

Pursuit Of Excellence

by Seth Johnson

Athletics play a very important role in today's educational systems. Competitive athletics and intellectual pursuits can complement and enhance each other, benefiting both the individual and the institution.

We can trace the roots of this athletic and academic motif to Greek philosophy, in which the guiding principle behind education was that an individual must strive to achieve a sense of harmony and proportion between the exertions of the intellect and the body: "The mere athlete becomes too much a savage and the musician (intellectual) is melted beyond what is good for him." In saying this, Plato is not talking about a casual jog or stroll in the park, but rather an activity that requires considerable effort, a striving and pursuit of excellence and attainable goals.

In the 19th century the English added the concept of character building to the sound-mind-and-body principle of the Greeks. According to this view, sports, and especially team games, instilled the qualities of discipline, loyalty, leadership, and perseverance, all of which contribute to one's ability to make a contribution to society beyond the athletic field.

Competitive athletics are very much a reflection of the world in which we live. Besides teaching specific physical skills and techniques that an individual can apply to a particular sport, athletics teaches that one's talents and abilities can be worked on, developed, put into practice, and perhaps even mastered. It teaches the value of being able to relate to people and to be able to work as part of a group under sometimes difficult situations. It teaches one a great deal about how to respond to the pressure of a particular situation and about loyalty and commitment to others.

These are truly the reasons why participation in sports is of value within an educational program. Whether one is an All-American or a substitute, a Division I or Division III competitor, the opportunity to reap the benefits of the experience is readily available. Everyone eventually ends up on some kind of team, whether it be as a part of a family, business, church, or social group.

Colleges and universities are continuing today to better define the proper role of extracurricular activities in education improvement:

•First, print up add/drop cards with two add spaces and two drop spaces. This will cut down on the volume of paper flying back and forth.

•Second, give the people over in Hopkins a break and send the cards out with the registration packet.

•Third, require every student to pre-register for a minimum of four courses. People who pre-register for three or fewer courses—usually because they are uncertain about what course to take—create a false impression.

•In courses with limited enrollments, send out a notice of acceptance or rejection early; give them a chance to pre-register for a fourth course.

•Finally, put a question on the pre-registration form asking for possible alternative choices. Top priority in switching would, of course, be given to those who had indicated a possible switch.

All of these should make life easier for student, instructor, administrator, and Joe Dewey. After all, he's the one who gets blamed for understocking books and takes the loss for overstocking.

and in particular, the role of athletics. At one extreme athletics have been diverted from its original purpose because of media pressure, business and money concerns, leading to abuses of the role of athletics and athletes. At the other end of the spectrum however, some institutions put too tight a lid on athletics and stymie its potential. Neither allows the athletic program to meet its educational purpose.

Williams can be an ideal setting for the student-athlete (we produce Rhodes Scholars in numbers far out of proportion to our size). Unlike the vast Division I training grounds for pre-professional athletes, Williams athletes will more likely become lawyers, physicians, educators and scholars, or executives rather than NBA centers or NFL quarterbacks. As a small liberal arts institution of exacting standards and a policy of awarding scholarships and aid purely on the basis of financial need, it is very unlikely that Williams will ever lose its perspective of the proper academics/athletics balance. Recruiting abuses and indirect player bonuses are not problems which we are likely to face.

But although the vast majority of Williams athletes will not become professional players, this does not mean that athletics should or does play a less important role within the educational system. Does Williams face the opposite problem, that athletics is not supported enough? This is not necessarily true either. In terms of providing facilities and financial support, Williams matches the other institutions of its size.

But even at Williams there is a tendency for academicians and physical educators to view the academic/athletics balance as a "them vs. us" relationship. This is counterproductive to say the least, for the qualities of energy, discipline and maturity are best developed when these two facets of education work in tandem.

Any community needs balance, vitality and diversity. Athletics plays a vital role in providing these qualities to a college, and one would hope that it is not merely viewed as amusement or recreation, but as a legitimate educational tool.

This is the first part in a two part series on athletics. The second will appear next week.

Art Museum still growing, flourishing

by Jeffrey H. Bralnard

Although everything seems quiet outside, work is still continuing on the Williams College Museum of Art.

According to co-director Charles Parkhurst, the museum plans to install the College's permanent art collection this summer. In addition, the College is currently raising money to complete the modernization of the original octagonal part of Lawrence. Both the upstairs and downstairs of Lawrence will house the collection.

The only part of the old building which has already been fully restored is the upstairs Bloedel Gallery, which currently houses the Edward Munch exhibition. However, after this summer the gallery will house only works from the permanent collection instead of changing exhibits.

Louvers delayed

Several other renovations have been delayed because the College did not have the money to fund them when the Lawrence addition was being built last year. These include louvers in the ceiling of the Class of 1954 Gallery to control the amount of light coming through its skylight.

The skylight has been covered by a temporary cloth shade, but Parkhurst said it does not screen out enough light to allow certain kinds of art to be safely shown in the gallery. "Watercolors or works on paper could fade or be damaged" in the existing lighting conditions, he explained. The louver system will allow museum staff to precisely control lighting levels.

Driveway in front

The College will also build a circular driveway in front of Lawrence that will have parking spaces for 40 to 50 cars, Parkhurst said. Current parking around the museum is limited to the driveway by East College, which only has space for about ten cars, making parking congested.

The College hopes to build a loading dock and door at the building's northwest corner. Currently artwork has to be brought in through the museum's main entrance.

There will be a courtyard in the present Fayerweather parking lot, Parkhurst said. An archway will also be built over the walkway leading to the steps south of Lawrence.

According to William Reed, College Vice-President and Treasurer, the College must still raise $1 million to complete all the renovations. The National Endowment for the Arts will provide money to pay for the installation of the permanent collection, in the form of a $25,000 matching grant.

Parkhurst said. Reed said it may take one to two years to complete everything.

Even in its unfinished form, the museum has generated considerable attention since its opening in September. "Attendance has been first-rate so far, considering our low profile," said Parkhurst, adding that the number of visitors should gradually increase as the College completes its renovation.

He said attendance averaged about 138 per day during the first two months, but dropped in January to about 84 per day, which he attributed to winter doldrums and the holiday season.

"Steady increase"

"We've had a steady increase [in attendance], it's like a snowball effect," he said. "There have been more school tours and bus groups through each month...we've had a lot of repeat visitors."

"I don't know if we'll ever reach the level of the Clark [Art Institute in Williamstown]—it has a bigger and more attractive collection—but we should get a little bounce-off from it," he said.

There has been no promotion of the museum other than through press releases to regional media, Parkhurst said. Any additional advertising is dependent on funding in next year's budget, he said.

Although this part of the College Museum of Art has been completed, much of the building still awaits renovation and repair before the College's permanent art collection can be moved in this summer.

If the museum is to build its reputation further, it will "require some permanence in the collection," Parkhurst said, "and that requires that we finish the building."

Behavior modification peels of pounds again

by Becky Conklin

The notorious "Freshman Ten" strikes on college campuses all over the country, and victims spend much of their four-year college careers trying to lose the weight they gained initially. Fad diets are not the answer, however, according to Mimi Welch, a registered dietitian at North Adams Regional Hospital.

Welch directs a program on the Williams College campus to teach students to eat properly so that they can take off weight permanently. The program, based on behavior modification methods, encourages participants to change their eating habits whether they are overweight or not.

"Overweight people tend to react to external stimuli...whereas a thin person eats from internal stimuli, telling them whether they are hungry or not," Welch said. "We want to teach people to become more in tune with their inner feelings."

No calorie counting

With that goal in mind, participants monitor their eating habits by filling in charts that show what, where and how they eat. After the first weekly meeting, the students begin to alter their bad eating habits without necessarily counting calories.

"Weight loss is secondary, something that comes along with it," explained Welch. "It's not a diet. You can eat anything you want...in moderation." The program does not use calorie-counting, and since there are no forbidden foods, no guilt feelings or cravings accompany the process, she added.

Success stories

The program began at Williams last year, although it originated at North Adams Regional Hospital several years ago. Last year's Williams fall and only four this semester. Howard said he does not yet know whether the number of student course changes is much greater this semester than normally, but the flow of add/drop cards that has come in is not noticeably different from past experience. Typically, Howard said, about two-thirds of all students make some sort of change.

Better preregistration

However, Graver attributed the crowding problem to lack of careful preregistration. Student course changes, he said, "put a stress on the system." When planning course offerings, the faculty try to gauge student interest, but they often find out too late, he explained.

"The shop around system is a difficult one. If students preregister, and then later change, it is very difficult to accommodate them because of advance planning. The preregistration system is designed to save students places in the courses they want."

Professor Hyde agreed, saying that the College "is incapable of handling this number of drop/adds," because of advance arrangements for books, staffing, and classroom size.

Contributing to the problem this particular semester are some unusual arrangements in the popular History and Economics departments. In History, five professors are on leave this spring compared to two last fall, and three visiting professors who were here last semester have left. Thus history courses are more crowded this semester, especially Gail Her-shatter's courses on China, since she is the only non-Western history professor not on leave.

Econ errors

Similarly, in the Economics department, upper level electives have been overcrowded because of a miscalculation and a surprise. Department Chairman Gordon Winston reported that the department offered a new course in mathematical economics this spring. It expected, correctly, that the course would not draw many students, but it forgot that students who wanted or needed upper level electives, having one less that appealed to them, would crowd the remaining ones.

The other cause of overcrowding in these courses was a sudden jump in the number of junior majors, from about 60 to nearly 80, which caught the department by surprise. Winston noted, however, that despite the problems, "overall, we still have some room in these courses."

Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley reported that there have been no striking shifts in popularity from some departments to others, but he suggested that there are often "short-term fluctuations that are hard to predict and irritating" to faculty, who cannot plan for them. "We all pay a price for the fluidity of the system," he said.

Don Juan in Hell lacks drive, luster

by J.B. Bird

For an hour and a half Friday night, Professor Fred Stocking's production of Don Juan in Hell effectively focused a DownStage audience's attention on the esoteric interlude from George Bernard Shaw's hefty play, Man and Superman. Unfortunately, the interlude should have run closer to an hour.

The pace became at times laborious; the actors did not always cue in quickly; and a general absence of character conflict often settled over the stage.

Fortunately, Shaw's speech clearly delivered by some more than competent actors, justified themselves; and comic touches, many successful, buoyed up the innately fascinating text.

The play is a dream sequence—from Shaw's larger play—which finds Don Juan (Tom Loizeaux '85), bored stiff with hell, breaking down misconceptions about the fiery vacationland for a woman he unsuccessfully pursued on earth. The woman, Ana (Victoria Price '84), would like to go to heaven. Her father (David Altschuler '84) and the Devil (Alfred Haft '85) take it upon themselves to dissuade her.

Shaw turns heaven and hell inside out. His hell worships love, beauty, and eternal happiness; his heaven only offers eternal solitude and contemplation.

Loizeaux carved out an admirably clear character. His Don Juan smirked arrogantly, waved refined and delicate hands, and trilled a wonderfully affected falsetto.

But that well-carved character did little for Shaw's dramatics. Don Juan's arrogance annoyed before it charmed. As a result, his revolutionary and slightly immoral proclamations—"virtue is the trade unionism of the married," or "the sex relation is not a personal or friendly relation at all"—lost some allure.

Alfred Haft's devil, with his realistic acceptance of spiritual boredom, death, and the pursuit of personal happiness, walked off with the show.

Haft played his devil like a game show host, hair slicked back over a gaudy red blazer. He promised in hell the life Ana had expected in heaven. Heaven, on the other hand, was like a classical concert: "A number of people sit there in glory, not because they think they are happy, but because they think they owe it to their position to be in heaven."

Stocking staged the show in a suped-up reader's theater, each actor performing from his own black lectern which held a script. The black set was a perfect touch for the presentation of Shaw's intellectual text. Haft most effectively and naturally leaned on, slumped in and spoke from his lectern.

Price, also unselfconscious about the lectern, captured her character as clearly as Haft. Her voice above all was excellent. Clear, in character, and broad-ranging, when she spoke she gave the entire performance the much-needed pace and clarity of a radio show.

Winter Carnival brings Wild Things to purple valley

Mission Park residents went all-out in the snow sculpture competition last year. This rendition of the Nautilus, well over 50 feet long, won the competition. (Scheibe)

by Martin Hildebrand

The Wild Things are here and with them they've brought the 1984 Winter Carnival. This year's carnival will feature skiers from about a dozen schools, as well as parties and other sporting events.

However, Carnival hasn't always been this big. The first Winter Carnival had only 10 participants. They ran 100 and 440 yard dashes for skiers and snowshoers on Weston Field, held a one-mile cross-country race, and constructed a ski jump that rose one and a half feet. The following year, a similar Winter Carnival was held, but the ski jump was so much larger, rising 8 feet, that only one person tried it.

Throughout its history, Carnival has created and broken some traditions. In 1934, the Thunderbolt Trail on Mt. Greylock was first used for the Alpine events; it remained in use for the Carnival until the 1961 opening of the ski trails on Berlin Mountain. In 1941, the first Carnival Queen was crowned, and the crowning of a Carnival Queen was popular until the start of co-education.

In the period following World War II, Carnival became similar to present-day Carnivals. Programs from around 1950 list House Dances as major events for the Saturday evening of Carnival. Jim Briggs '60, the former Director of the Outing Club, recalled, "The weekend was a time for parties as well as races and games. Everyone had dates up for the weekend." Like now, everyone had a day off, and many people were gatekeepers.

Technology has brought some changes since the late '50's. Briggs recalled that there were no Sno-Cats to pack the snow, and students packed the snow themselves. One year, following a snowstorm of 2 to 3 feet, students rose at 4 or 5 in the morning to pack the snow. Starting in 1980, the Alpine races were held at Brodie Mountain, where snow-making equipment reduces the threat of lack of snow. This year, a computer will be used to speed the scoring process.

An event that is no longer held but had attracted many spectators was the ski jumping. In fact, Jeff Hastings '81 is the top U.S. ski jumper in the Olympics. The N.C.A.A., however, starting a few years ago, no longer sanctions ski jumping.

Snow sculpture contests have become more popular in recent years. This year's Winter Carnival theme is "Where the Wild Things Are." Snow sculptures, however, need not be based on the monsters in the book of that name.

Thursday afternoon's opening ceremonies will feature a citizens' cross-country race around Poker Flats and Cole Field. This race is open to all members of the college community and will be a low-key affair. Friday afternoon there

NOW-WE'LL PAY YOU TO ATTEND MEDICAL SCHOOL

In fact, we'll even pay you more than $575 a month while you attend. That's in addition to paying for your full tuition and required books and fees.

It's all part of the Armed Forces Health Professions Scholarship Program.

How does it work?

If you're selected for a Physician Scholarship—from the Army, Navy, or Air Force—you're commissioned as an officer in the Reserve.

While you're in school, you'll serve 45 days a year on active duty, gaining valuable medical experience. After graduation, you will serve three or more years, the length depending on the requirements of the Service selected and years of scholarship assistance received.

As an Armed Forces physician you'll receive officer's pay and benefits, and enjoy the advantages of working regular hours. You'll also see a diversity of patients and have opportunities to use sophisticated medical technology.

But most important, while you're in medical school we'll help pay the bills. For more information, send in the coupon. There's no obligation whatsoever.

Yes, I am interested in receiving more information about an Armed Forces Health Professions Scholarship. I understand there is no obligation. 9004

Ephs bleed for Red Cross; donate record 325 units

by Karen Phillips

More than 300 Williams students lost 40 gallons of blood last week, but all they felt was good. The Red Cross Bloodmobile milked the campus for a record 325 units in Tuesday's and Wednesday's blood drive.

The motivations to give blood varied. Most students were concerned with the recent increased demand for blood. Steve Zlotowski '84 was especially aware of this need.

said. A senior, who wishes to remain anonymous, enjoyed giving blood, saying, "It's the most fun you can have lying down with your clothes on." Paul Rardin '87 appreciates the rewards of giving blood. "The cookies are great," he said.

Homemade cookies were not only served to the donors but will be given to the winners of the Vampire Sweepstakes (the Williams students donated 325 units of the 386 units of blood collected in Williamstown. This is the largest amount of blood ever collected in Williamstown at once. Diane Rowe, Field Representative for Northeast Blood Services was thrilled with these figures and complemented the students on their enthusiasm.

The next Red Cross Bloodmobile will be at the First Congregational Church from April 10-11.

"It's the most fun you can have lying down with your clothes on."

"Someone in my family needed it once," he said. John Ahn '87 decided to give because "it doesn't take anything away from me." Kenard Gibbs '86 came to the bloodmobile because he considers it "the American thing to do."

The returning donors (all but 72 first-timers) have unique reasons for coming back. Lou Altman '87 likes the nurses. "They give good back massages after they take your blood," he house with the greatest percentage of participation in the Bloodmobile. Carolyn Behr of the American Red Cross said that the cookies will be "baked by several of the best cooks in Williamstown."

The cooks are going to be busy because Armstrong, Fayerweather, and Lehman all had 42% participation. The Vampire Sweepstakes therefore resulted in a three-way tie.

class brought several success stories.

Because the program changes well-established habits, weight loss was slow, but two students lost as much as twenty pounds by this fall. Many participants lost five to fifteen pounds during the class. With new eating habits, those who lost weight can keep off the extra pounds, according to Welch.

At Williams this spring the twelve-week program coincides with the semester. The class begins Feb. 21 and meets weekly until spring break, resuming again after students return to campus.

The directors hope that participants will have learned enough in the first five weeks of class to maintain their good eating habits over spring break.

"It's a learning experience," said Welch. "It's simple, but it's not easy, and it's more work than a diet." However, the rewards of the work appear in the participant's permanent weight removal," she said.

Pooh Perplex quietly serves students

by Joe Ehlers

Despite a new location and competition from outside book firms, Pooh Perplex's second semester operations have been smooth, according to co-owner Chris Harned '85.

Lines at the Pooh during the first week of each semester have traditionally caused problems. However, this semester "people flowed through smoothly," he said. "We haven't expanded hours very much, but we did open earlier for the big sale."

The Pooh Perplex buys used books from students and sells them again at two-thirds their current new price. The previous owners of the books are then paid three-fourths of the selling price.

The Pooh was started in the 1960's by a group of Williams students. Harned says that the business was originally a shaky operation. "It was not until the previous owners took over five years ago that it began rising to legitimacy," he added.

Currently Harned runs the business with two other juniors, Julie Meer and Rich Gallun. The three will operate the Pooh through the first semester of next year, when the new owners will take over.

Hundreds of students He noted that the Pooh has a "tremendous" involvement with the campus. "We probably affect one-third of the college community," he said, estimating that the business sold books to about 500 students this semester and sent out 700 checks last semester to students who had sold their books to the Pooh.

However, he added that he wished more students would sell their books to Pooh so it would have more stock available the following semester.

The Pooh does not have a monopoly on the used book market at Williams. Last spring an independent business bought up books from students for publishers. Harned said he believes the permit to operate the business was issued through the Dean's Office. He went before the College Council to discuss the pros and cons of the issue, and the firm was allowed to come on campus on a trial basis.

"It hurt our business to an extent," said Harned, "but it also improved the community awareness of the Pooh. People know that that type of business doesn't do a heck of a lot of good for the school."

He added that the firm paid students very low amounts for textbooks, about seven to 12 percent in cash.

"A lot of time"

Financially, the students involved with the Pooh earn approximately the same hourly wage that a student dining hall worker on campus does, according to Harned.

"We put in a lot of time at several times throughout the year, for example at book collection and book sale times around the beginning and end of each semester. Last summer, we spent a lot of time moving the Pooh from Jesup to Weston (basement)."

Harned said he believes the Pooh will continue to be student run. "As it grows in scale and effect, the college may become more interested in it. As things are now, I don't think it would be in anyone's interest to alter the status quo."

Name's origin

As for Pooh's unusual name, Harned said "Pooh Perplex" is a catchy name which has been passed on through time from workers at the Pooh. It originated, as far as we can tell, from a book, "The Pooh Perplex", written by a former Williams instructor, which analyzes deep inner meaning in Winnie the Pooh stories."

Volleyball

The men's volleyball team took their record to 6-0 this weekend with big victories against Wesleyan and Dartmouth and continue to roll on unbeaten.

The Ephs travelled to Dartmouth on Sunday to take on the Big Green; last year, Dartmouth finished high in the Ivy League and even upset eventual Ivy champs Harvard in the New England Open. On Sunday, however, the Ephs turned the tables, continuing their winning ways in taking it in three straight 15-5, 15-4, and 15-7. The team followed their proven formula of strong middle hitting and blocking, with consistent outside hitting, and tough defense.

Second win over Wesleyan

Williams hosted the Cardinals on Friday in a rematch of an earlier Eph win. After dropping the first game 15-5 to an aggressive and scrappy Cardinal team, the Ephs rallied to take the next three and win the match, 15-4, 15-4, and 15-14.

Though lacking some of the precision that has characterized their previous wins, the Ephs triumphed behind the hitting and blocking of senior co-captains Vicente Hill and Steve Brewster. With Brewster setting, Hill peppered the Wesleyan squad with thunderous middle hits. Chris Clarey '85 and Marc Hummon '84 provided strength on the outside too, enabling the Ephs to roll to their fifth straight win.

Earlier in the season, the squad defeated Little Three rival Wesleyan (15-13, 15-10, 15-9) a week ago Saturday and Brown University (15-2, 15-9) and Northeastern (16-14, 3-15, 15-12) that Sunday. Earlier in the week, the team had defeated Division I Springfield (15-4, 10-15, 15-5, 15-12).

Hill and Brewster lead way

Middle hitter Hill has been the key figure in the squad's early-season success, leading Williams in both kills and blocks, as well as setting on three of the six rotations.

In defeating Springfield and Northeastern, the Ephs, ranked sixth in New England Division I last season, defeated two of the teams ranked ahead of them last year.

The squad will next see action in Laseil Gym on Friday as the Lord Jeffs of Amherst come to Williamstown.

Swimming

by Chris Clarey

The men's swimming team improved their record to 7-0 and qualified for the nationals in four events as they defeated Colgate for the first time ever, 82-51 Saturday. The women kept their winning streak running by defeating Mount Holyoke 97-58.

For the men, Bill Couch '86 was a double winner, matching his national qualifying time of a week ago in the 200 Individual Medley (1:57.00) and qualifying in the 100 butterfly with a 52:35.9 mark. Freshman Scott Robinson continued his season-long success, winning and improving on his season-best times in both the 500 (4:49.012) and 200 (1:44.803) freestyles. Other double-winners for the Ephs included Rob Kirkpatrick '85 who took the 100 and 200 breaststrokes, and sprint freestyler Will Andrew '86, who won the 50 (21.853) and 100 (48.274) freestyles.

Senior co-captain Rob Sommer finished second to Colgate's Kevin Rusch in the 100 and 200 backstrokes, qualified for the nationals in both events.

Ephwomen drown Holyoke

The two-time defending national champion women's team finished the regular season 8-0 as they downed Mount Holyoke 97-58 on Saturday.

Kim Eckrich '85 led the way winning the 100 breaststroke (1:09.53), the 100 butterfly (1:03.50), and the 100 Individual Medley (1:03.65). Kathy Kirmayer '86 qualified for the nationals in the 200 freestyle (1:59.153), having already qualified in the 50 and 100 free events. Katie Anthony '87 (2:19.12 in the 200 back) and Myla Jordan '85 (4:56.93 in the 400 IM) also passed the national qualifying standard.

Diver Jennifer Campbell '87 qualified in the one meter optional event with 229.70 points as she finished second to her teammate Emily Parker '86 (238.35).

The Ephwomen have not lost a regular-season dual-meet since February 7, 1981 and have now won 25 in a row. They defend their New England title on February 24, 25, and 26. The men host Wesleyan in their final regular-season meet before the New England and the national championships.

Wrestling

by Lee Hatcher

In the Little Three meet this weekend, the Williams wrestlers fell to Amherst 31-13, and Wesleyan 40-0 at the Cardinal gym in Middletown.

However, the meet was not without some noteworthy performances for the Ephmen. In what Coach Hal Zende called a "most impressive" match, freshman Dan MacDonnell at 177 lbs. whipped his Amherst opponent 12-1. MacDonnell racked up a 8-5 record this season and should be a formidable opponent in the upcoming New England tournament. At 158 lbs., co-captain Jeff May '85 decisively outpointed his Amherst foe.

The upper weights also had some good showings against Amherst. Sophomore Peter Dawson, always a force to be reckoned with, scored a 6-3 victory in the heavyweight division. David Bicknell '84 at 190 lbs. landed another win, which should provide him with some momentum in preparing for the New England tournament.

crowd, pulled away with just over 100 meters to go as Williams turned back Amherst to take the victory.

Coach Dick Farley commented after the meet, "This was a good day for the team. We were strong today in the field events and that gave us something to work on." The Ephs will next travel to Bates where they will compete in New England Division III's this weekend.

Ephwomen outrun all rivals to capture Little Three crown

by Chris Stearns

In a big showdown between Little Three rivals and Trinity this Saturday, Williams carried the day as they compiled 54 points to Amherst's 46, Wesleyan's 35, and Trinity's 21. Pacing the Lady Ephs were Lindsay Rockwood '85, Mary Ellen Mahoney '86, and Gail Henderson '87, who combined to account for 31 of those 54 points.

Leading off was Rockwood, who cleared 5'½" for first in the high jump. In the long jump, freshman Pam Merritt flew 15'4¼" for second while Rockwood captured third and Mahoney grabbed fourth. In the shot Henderson placed second with a throw of 31'1½" trailed by Martha Nikitas '86 in fourth. In the triple jump Rockwood and Mahoney teamed up to snare second and third. In the shorter distances, Williams increased their lead after a Mahoney first in the 55 meter high hurdles with Rockwood second. The Ephs captured a pair of seconds as Merritt cruised to second in the 400 and Lizzie Maris '87 just missed winning the 600 meter.

Henderson claimed yet another second for Williams with a 7.8 in the 55 meter dash. In the 800 freshman Caroline Teer ran to a fourth while Lee Gwatkin claimed third in the 1000.

Although losing momentum, the Ephs regained composure as Henderson won the 200 and put the meet safely out of reach. In the most exciting race of the day, mile relay anchor Henderson took the race at the finish line beating out her Amherst opponent by inches. The wins raised the Ephs record to 6-5.

Women skiers set for Carnival

by Mary Keller

The women's ski team showed tremendous improvement in their performance last weekend at the Dartmouth Winter Carnival. They have built up momentum all season and hope to be at their best for this weekend's Carnival at Brodie.

The cross country individual race, held on the thin snow cover at Hanover, required intense concentration to negotiate the twisting hills and varied terrain. Sarah Bates '85 secured the first spot for Williams in 13th place, followed by Karla Miller '85 in 25th, and freshman Thayer Tolles in 28th. On Saturday, coach Robert Fisher sent Beth Schmidt '85 to tackle the "scramble" or first leg of the relay, followed by Bates and anchored by Miller. The team skied to a 7th place under dreary and threatening skies.

The Alpine women, supporting their Nordic teammates all the way from Pico, Vermont where the Alpine events were held, skied to a 6th place in the Giant Slalom on Friday. Despite a rough course Donna MacDonald '87 finished 11th, followed by Kate Knopp '85 in 16th, and Marcy Rubinger '85 was the third scorer for the team.

The Slalom, although hampered by timing difficulties, soft snow, and rain, pulled the team's standings up. MacDonald skied to a solid sixth place, again followed by Knopp in 11th and Rubinger in 19th.

The women's team is getting ready to peak for their home Carnival which will feature some of the finest skiers on the East Coast as the Outing Club hosts the Williams College Division I Carnival at Brodie Mountain this Friday and Saturday.

Icewomen fall to Panthers, 5-0

by Tom Dumphy

The women's hockey team's winning streak was halted by Middlebury Saturday afternoon at the Chapman Rink. The Panthers wore down the Ephs for a 5-0 victory. Coach Dave O'Keefe '86 said Middlebury's experience was the key as they converted on plays that Williams could not.

The first period was played evenly, but Middlebury got the only goal with 6:35 left to go. The puck came out of a jam in the slot to Middlebury's center who fired it by the screened goaltender. Williams had its share of chances but could not even the score. Laura Ryan '85 made several nice plays that were unfinished by her mates.

Panthers Put It Away
Early in the second period, the Panthers scored their second goal on a rebound of a shot from the left face-off circle. Williams then controlled play but failed to tally on the key opportunities. Captains Pam Briggs '84 and Jeanette Hazelton '85 were both denied on breakaways mid-way through the period.

Middlebury then took the play to Williams for the remainder of the game. The Panthers caught the Ephs changing lines, giving them a momentary five on two advantage. This edge resulted in Middlebury's third goal before the end of the period.

The Panthers were in total command throughout the third period, but the Eph defense played well to keep the game in hand. Bobby Klein '86 and senior tri-captain Alice Comiskey kept the puck away from the net admirably and Goalie Debbie Bernhelmer '86 turned in another fine performance, stopping twenty-one shots on net.

The Ephs next home game is Saturday afternoon at 2:00 against Little Three rival Wesleyan.

Potter was nailed with a ten minute misconduct penalty while defending Finn against a Union attacker. The penalty immediately turned the flow to Union as they scored twice within thirty seconds to pull away. Williams never regained momentum, and Union added another goal in the waning moments to make the final 5-2.

Williams travels to Hamilton today in an ECAC Division II clash in hopes of duplicating an early season win over the Continentals. The Ephs are still in the fight for post-season competition with four games remaining and are optimistically remembering last year's five-game season-ending winning streak.

Hoopsters drop sixth falling to Holyoke

by Mike Best

In a low scoring game Saturday night, the women's basketball team fell to Amherst, 49-43. The loss was the sixth in a row for the Ephwomen.

The first half was even as the Ephs played well against the taller Lady Jeffs. Williams was getting the ball inside and even outrebounding Amherst 24-19, despite the height disadvantage.

The Ephwomen were led by Kay Lackey '85, who ended up with 21 points and seven rebounds. Also helping out on the boards was Jean Hakmiller '86, who had 13 rebounds to go with her six points.

However, the Ephs were plagued by turnovers in the second half. Their offense stopped producing and, to make matters worse, point guard Lynne Jaycocks '85 fouled out.

Amherst, boosted by forward Hali Hammer's 20 points, was able to pull away from the Ephwomen and establish the six-point winning margin. In so doing, the Lord Jeffs improved their record to 9-6 and moved one step closer to the Little Three title.

Loss to Holyoke

On Wednesday, the Ephs again played well but lost to a strong Mount Holyoke team, 64-56. The game was characterized by quick Mount Holyoke scoring bursts followed by slow Will-ams comebacks. Holyoke, playing a tough full court press, came up with a few steals and convert them into easy baskets. When the Ephs could penetrate the trap they used their good outside shooting to pull close. They ended up shooting 50 percent for the game.

With three and a half minutes remaining in the first half, Mount Holyoke, led by forward Valita Fredland, who scored 20 points, had built up an eleven-point lead. But the Ephwomen began a rally with two minutes left. Playing good defense, they managed to close the half down by only 31-26.

Ephs tie game

The Williams surge continued into the second half. With fifteen minutes left in the game, the Ephs tied it up at 34. The teams traded baskets until there were five and a half minutes left.

At that point, Holyoke began to build up its final advantage. Good shooting negated fine Eph defense, and a final effort by Williams was too late to bridge the gap.

High scorer for the Ephs was Liz Kellison '87 with 16 points. Hakmiller contributed 13, all in the second half, and pulled down 13 rebounds.

The Ephs' record is now 4-8. They play Trinity on Wednesday and Wesleyan on Saturday, both at home.

also qualified in both alpine events; and Hill has effectively made the Nationals in slalom.

Weiner may also qualify for the Nationals in both events, depending on his performance in the remaining two carnivals. Martin Magoun '86 needs one strong finish for slalom qualification, while Eagon needs approximately a top-ten GS finish.

In a Tri-State GS race at Jimmy Peak Sunday, Pier won, Lyons was second, and Eagon was third.

The team is optimistic going into the Williams carnival this Friday and Saturday to be held at Brodie Mountain.

Men skiers take fourth in carnival

by Greg Leeds

The men's ski team finished fourth overall in last weekend's Dartmouth Carnival, combining places of second in slalom, third in giant slalom, and fifth in the relay and 15-kilometer races. Dartmouth was the victor with 302 points, followed by University of Vermont with 289 and Middlebury with 266. Williams had 231 points.

In the alpine events, Dartmouth captured firsts in both slalom and GS. In the slalom, Dartmouth had 84 points and Williams had 75, followed by Middlebury, University of New Hampshire, and UVM. Co-captain Crawford Lyons '84 placed second, while John Pier

'85 was seventh, and Tim Hill '86 was tenth.

Williams finished behind Dartmouth and UVM in the GS with Lyons' 12th-place finish. Heide Welner '87 was at 14th, and Chris Eagon '84 was 19th.

O'Connor races to third
In the cross-country events, Coiman O'Connor '85 had an outstanding third place finish in the 15-km race. The top finisher was a former Norwegian National Team member, while the second-place finisher was formerly on the Canadian National Team. O'Connor displayed additional effort in the final ten seconds, when he passed Middlebury's Mike Graham to capture third.

Anticipating the Nationals

Williams now has four spots virtually secured for the Nationals competition. O'Connor has qualified in the 15-km; Lyons has qualified in both slalom and GS (with an almost-definite first-seed in slalom); Pier has

Lord Jeffs look to drive against Williams' defense in Saturday's 74-72 win over Amherst. (Khakee)

Hoopsters win thriller over Jeffs

by Dave Paulsen

It was something that they had never done before. The seniors on Coach Harry Sheehy's basketball team had never before beaten Amherst at home. Never, that is, until Saturday night, when the Ephs, cheered on by the "sixth man", defeated the Lord Jeffs 74-72 in a thriller at Lasell.

The gym was packed before the start of the game, which promised to be an even match. Amherst (9-8) boasted the nation's leading field goal percentage shooter in 6-7 center Jim Cook who had converted on 71% of his shots in tallying his 13.4 points per game average.

Sheehy's strategy was to attempt to front Cook in an attempt to keep him away from the ball. In so doing, though, the Ephs also had to be aware of Amherst's Jack Kiley, whose deadly outside shot was as potent a weapon as Cook's inside moves.

Walsh and Pidoriano lead way

Fired up by the crowd, the Ephs raced to a 40-31 halftime lead behind the dynamic duo of back-court mates Tim Walsh '86 and All-American candidate Art Pidoriano '84. Pidoriano pumped in 12 points in the first half, while Walsh, hitting from all spots on the court, poured in 16.

Defensively, centers Dave Krupski '84 and John McCarthy '84 did a fine job on Cook, muscling him away from the ball and making him work for every basket.

Amherst bounced back in the second half, led by the play of Kiley, Cook, and jet-quick guard Bob Weston. With 2:53 remaining in the game, the Lord Jeffs led 72-69. From that point on, however, the Eph defense tightened, and Amherst did not score another point in the game.

Forward Mike Meadows '86 converted a layup on a fine feed pass from Krupski to make the score 72-71 with 2:12 remaining. Amherst then missed a shot, and Cook crawled over Pidoriano's back going for the rebound. The foul was Cook's fifth personal, and sent Pidoriano to the line for a bonus. He calmly sank both free throws to give the Ephs a 73-72 lead with 1:39 left.

Then, Pidoriano and Krupski combined for the defensive play of the game, coming up with a steal from a Lord Jeff. Sheehy quickly called time to set up his delay offense. After the timeout, however, Russ Howard '84 could not inbound the pass from the sideline, and Amherst regained possession.

Jeff's last shot

Amherst quickly took a shot, but it went awry, and Howard claimed the rebound. With 15 seconds left, he was fouled, and he sank one free throw to give the Ephs a 74-72 lead. The Lord Jeffs brought the ball down the court for one final shot. An Amherst guard momentarily fumbled the ball wasting precious seconds, and the Lord Jeffs were forced to hurry their shot. The attempt missed, and Meadows swatted the ball to half-court as time expired.

A key to the Amherst scoring drought in the final minutes was the absence of Cook and Weston, who fouled out. Weston, the team's playmaker, had scored 12 points, but after his departure, the Jeffs lacked direction.

The Ephmen are now in the driver's seat of the Little Three with a 2-0 record. Amherst fell to 1-1, while Wesleyan is 0-2. Sheehy said, "I'm just so pleased for our seniors, they really deserved this one." He noted, though, "If we had made our free throws, it would have been a 10 point win...but I'll take this one any way I can. We just needed a win."

Sheehy praised the play of Walsh, who for various stretches in the game, carried the team. Meadows also received Sheehy's complements for his excellent rebounding.

Fall to WPI

In other action over the week, the Ephs were defeated 95-86 at WPI. Leading scorers in that game were Pidoriano with 26 points, and Walsh with 24.

The Ephs play at home tonight against RPI, and then again on Saturday against Wesleyan. Sheehy said about the crowd, "The sixth man has been welcomed back, and we hope to see [him] on Saturday when we play Wesleyan for the Little Three Championship."

Hockey beats Wesleyan after losing to Union

by Chris Harned

The hockey team snapped a three-week long, seven-game losing streak this Saturday with a 5-3 win over the Wesleyan Cardinals, a Division III Little Three rival. Earlier in the week, the squad traveled to Union to face the team that started Williams' mid-season slump, and fell once again, 5-2.

Williams upped their season record to 7-10-1 with the home-ice victory over the Cardinals and clinched the second spot in Little Three standings behind Amherst.

Center Rich Jackson '85 paced the Eph scoring effort with two unassisted goals and an assist, but Wesleyan goalie Dave Blaner emerged as the standout in the contest, racking up 45 saves in a losing effort. The 50 shot output by the Ephmen ranks as top offensive effort of the season, and the 5-3 final score was in no measure an accurate indication of Williams' virtually total domination of the Cardinals.

Sophomore David Fritz gave Williams a lead they would never relinquish just 42 seconds into the contest when he picked up freshman Chris Tragglo's rebounded shot and flipped the puck into the Wesleyan net from point-blank range for his third goal of the season.

Pounding at net

Williams continued to pound away at the Wesleyan net, as they got off 20 shots in the first twenty minutes of the game, while Wesleyan could manage just five on Dan Finn '84. The second of those twenty shots entered the Wesleyan net in the twelfth minute of the contest, as Jackson picked up his first goal when he intercepted an errant pass in the Wesleyan zone and beat the Wesleyan netminder one-on-one to the upper left corner.

Williams set the tone for the second period when they took advantage of an early Wesleyan penalty to mount a seven-minute-long barrage on the Wesleyan goalie, and, although the team failed to capitalize on the series, the offensive display was a welcome sight to the team that averages just three goals a game.

The Cardinals narrowed the margin to 2-1 eight minutes into the second stanza after they finally cleared the puck from their zone and took the offensively minded Williams defense by surprise. Wesleyan's A.J. Salerno got his first of two goals in the game when he beat Finn from just outside the crease in a scramble around the goal.

Jackson upped the Williams lead to 3-1 with his eighth goal of the season when he banked a centering pass from behind the Wesleyan net off a Cardinal defender and into the net.

Constant Williams pressure

The Cardinals refused to buckle under persistent Williams pressure and Salerno took advantage of a Williams penalty to close the gap to 3-2 when he put the puck into the top of the net from five feet out.

The Ephs regained a two goal advantage in the final minute of the period when defenseman Scot Karmozyn '86 passed to assistant captain Greg Pachus '84, who eluded two Wesleyan defenders and slipped the puck under Blaner's pads.

Wesleyan closed the gap to 4-3 with a third period fluke deflection that entered the goal in the midst of a mass of sprawling Williams and Wesleyan players in front of the net.

The Ephs, who fired at Blaner 20 times in the final period, were successful just once, when junior Rich Gallun fed sophomore Chris Pappas at the point, and the defenseman scored his first Williams goal with a slap-shot into the upper right of the Cardinal net to close the scoring at 5-3.

Loss to Union 5-2

Last Tuesday, Williams fell behind 2-0 at Union in first period action, but rallied to knot the contest at 2-2 as the second period ended. The game marked the return of goalie Dan Finn, who was used lightly over the past six games due to a severe muscle pull in his right arm. His 30 saves, however, were five too few.

Williams mounted an impressive second period offensive surge, outshooting the Dutchmen 15-8, and juniors Jeff Potter and Brian Rutledge each found the net once to tie the score at 2-2.

Williams continued to control the action in the third period, until the seventh minute, when

Squash stands at 18-2

by John Schafer

Suffering their second straight defeat, the men's squash team fell to Trinity Wednesday but rebounded to beat Army Saturday 8-1. The Ephs are fighting with Trinity and Navy to finish in the top three of the national rankings (behind Harvard and Princeton) which are not posted until the end of the year.

After losing what coach Sean Sloane called a barnburner to the Bantams 5-4 and trouncing the Cadets at West Point, the Ephs stand at 18-2. They are still very much in the running for that third position in collegiate squash. Both Trinity and Navy have lost three times, once each to Princeton, whom the Ephs do not play. Navy has already beaten Trinity and lost to Williams, and all three teams vying for the third spot have fallen to Harvard.

Because all three squads are obviously so close, the decision may come down to a tie-breaker of scores against common opponents. Army was one such opponent as the Bantams and Midshipmen will play the Cadets later in the month. The 8-1 trouncing of Army was, therefore, very helpful to the Eph cause.

Throughout this week of play, seniors Greg Zaff and Tom Harrity won twice to make them each 19-1 on the year and strong candidates to receive All-American honors again. Playing number five, Ben Thompson '85 kept his undefeated streak rolling at 18-0 by winning twice.

The four seniors will play their last home match next Saturday against Amherst.

Tracksters run over Lord Jeffs to capture Little Three crown

by Chris Stearns

This past Saturday the men's track team sent rivals Amherst, Wesleyan, and Trinity away in bitter defeat as they racked up 75½ points to the Lord Jeffs' 41, the Bantams' 35½, and the Cardinals' 23. Senior Bernie Krause and sophomores Will Love and Clark Otley led the way for the Ephs.

Williams pounced on the lead in the opening event with Krause's 48'2¼" toss of the 35 lb. weight which earned him a first. In the pole vault, senior John Campbell sprang 13 feet to take second followed by newcomer Otley who took third. Love then bounded for a jump of 20'6¾" to capture first with Kendall James '84 in third and Andre Lopez '87 in fourth. By this time the Ephs were up 21 to Amherst's 7, Trinity's 5 and the Cards' nothing.

Williams continued to dominate the field events behind junior Paul Toland's jump of 6'6" for second and senior Tom Dougherty's tie for third which netted him 1½ points. Krause and Blanks came back in the shot to take second and third while in the triple jump, Lopez and Love were third and fourth respectively.

Add to lead

The scene then shifted to the track where the Ephs continued to add to their lead. In the 1500 senior Brian Angle ran a 4:08.2 to garner third, and in the high hurdles, James and Bernie Lau '85 netted second and third. In a close finish senior co-captain Ted Leon was second at the wire in 51.1 in the 400 trailed by senior Mark Rice. Running the 500 meters, junior Kevin Jenkins left in his wake a field of runners as he clocked a 1:07.7.

Sophomore Clark Otley then returned to nail down his first win of the season in the 55 meter dash in a furious 6.5 seconds. In the 800 no one could catch senior co-captain Bo Parker as he won

SAB works to bring The Clash to campus

by Becky Conklin
and Martita Weil

The rock group "The Clash" may perform at Williams College this spring if final arrangements can be settled in the next few days. The College Council on Thursday night overwhelmingly agreed to provide the Student Activities Board with the $2000 it needs to bid competitively for the group.

Ed Mitchell '84, head of the SAB's Concert Committee, appeared before the Council and explained the financial and logistical details of bringing The Clash to Williamstown. The concert would be held April 19 or 20 in the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink.

Tentatively, tickets for the concert would cost $8 for Williams students and $10 for outsiders. However, the SAB has had to raise its bid for The Clash, which may raise ticket prices significantly, according to SAB chairman Arunas Gudaitis '84.

Competing with RPI

"We're competing against RPI," Gudaitis said, noting that RPI sold out its 18,000 seat hall when The Clash played there last year. He explained that since the group got a flat price and a percentage of the sales, it made more money there than it could at Williams.

"We're bidding as high as we can, chances are 50-50," he said. "We've put in a substantial bid, that's basically all it is."

Gudaitis noted that the SAB was also looking at the British dance band Madness, whose most recent hit is "Our House," for the spring concert.

"We have to have big acts to fill the hockey rink," he said, noting that one big concert made more sense than several small ones throughout the year.

Dancing on the floor

Gudaitis explained that for this concert, which would be the first ever to be held in Chapman rink, the current stands and bleachers would be left up but no seats would be placed on the floor. "The floor will be filled with people who want to dance," he said, something which was not allowed at Chapin concerts.

He also noted that the SAB has gotten a very positive response from the administration about the concert. "We were worried about crowd control, but [the administration] said it wouldn't be much of a problem," he said.

In addition, Gudaitis said the SAB may allow Williams students to reserve tickets for the concert, before they are sold off-campus. Concert Committee chairman Mitchell said he hopes half of a 2000 person sell-out crowd will come from on-campus ticket sales. The Concert Committee also plans to publicize the concert in the five-college area, he said.

The SAB wants to start a trend of success with the Clash concert, Mitchell said. "Hopefully more people will become involved in the SAB," he added. After losing money on the Marshall Crenshaw concert in the fall, the Concert Committee has decided to promote one big name concert each year instead of numerous small concerts, he said.

Bacchus will appear

In other College Council business, members discussed the crowd behavior at the Amherst-Williams hockey game last week, during which students threw tennis balls and beer cans on the ice. The Council decided to print an admonitory letter in the Record and in the Daily Advisor and will invite members of Club Bacchus to the next meeting to discuss their possible contribution to the crowd disturbances.

Council president Tom Paper '84 said that although he was unsure of the extent of Club Bacchus participation, he thought "the people who are responsible should confront the community about what they have done."

Survey says Class of '87 richer, more conservative

Registration poll shows freshmen want business careers, bigger families and dope left illegal

by Benjamin Duke

Significantly fewer Williams freshmen are likely to discourage large families, support the legalization of marijuana or think the wealthy should pay higher income taxes than were the freshmen entering five years ago, according to recently released results of the Cooperative Institutional Research Program questionnaire.

In addition, more than half of this year's freshman parents earn over $50,000 a year and more than half of the freshmen feel no concern about financing college.

These were just some of the results of the survey which has been administered to the freshman class every September during Registration since 1966.

The questionnaire asks students to respond to a variety of questions, ranging from family income to personal ambitions. More than 90 percent of the freshman class must complete the polls for the results to be tabulated.

Among members of the Class of 1987 responding, 41.1 percent said they would discourage large families, compared with 65.1 percent in the Class of 1982. Only 23.6 percent of this year's freshmen agreed that marijuana should be legalized, a dip of nearly 40 percent since 1978.

In addition, nearly six percent fewer freshmen than five years ago agreed that the wealthy should pay more taxes, although there was little evidence of a change in self-reported political orientation in the same period.

More grad degrees

Some marked changes have occurred over the last five years in reported incomes and in dramatically higher levels of education among freshmen parents of both sexes. Nearly 12 percent more freshman parents hold graduate degrees of some kind, including 61.5 percent of fathers and 30 percent of freshman mothers.

More than 55 percent of this year's freshman class reported family incomes of over $50,000, up from 34.4 percent in 1978, at least in part due to high inflation until last year. But despite soaring tuition costs, the number of Williams freshmen expressing concern about financing college rose by less than two percent over the same period.

Mirroring such changes is a corresponding drop in the number of freshman parents with incomes of less than $15,000, declining by seven percent in five years.

"Squeezed out"

That change, Director of Admissions Smith said, has caused a natural reduction in the size of financial aid packages, with fewer students needing complete aid.

"I think we're getting squeezed out of that market," Smith said, citing the decline in federal opportunity programs and in the quality of urban schools as reasons for the change. He said that colleges of all sizes were suffering similar problems.

This year's freshman class also showed a stronger inclination toward business careers than in the past, exceeding the figures for both the Class of '82 and for other "very highly selective" colleges participating in the survey.

More execs

More than 14 percent of freshman listed "business" as their career goal.

10-1 confronts a spectrum of problems in an attempt to counsel and inform

by Martita Weil
and Margaret Schumann

Ten to One, the new student-originated, student-run counseling service, is now a month old. Since it began serving the Williams community, it has handled both informational calls and problem calls, dealing with topics ranging from local phone numbers and movie schedules to the more serious concerns of Williams students.

Located in (though not officially associated with) the Chaplain's Office in Baxter Hall, the peer to peer listening, information and referral service was conceived last year by five members of the class of '84: Jim Foley, Doris Beyer, Jamie King, Heidi Peterson and Emily Young.

The five founders felt students needed an organization to provide information about both Williams and non-Williams activities and to provide sympathetic listeners for students who wanted to discuss their problems or just chat.

The result, Ten to One, is now open seven days a week from 10 p.m. to midnight for walk-ins, and from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m. for phone calls. All calls and visits are strictly confidential.

Listening skills

Training of the approximately twenty-five counselors began early this fall. Discussions between Ten to One counselors and speakers from Help Line and comparable organizations at schools such as Wesleyan and Princeton placed emphasis not on psychological counseling but on empathetic listening skills.

The service receives up to five calls and walk-in visitors a night, and a few more on weekends, according to its counselors. "We're just there to listen—just getting it (the problem) out is what's important," says Jan Pyncheon '85.

Hill Snellings '84, another Ten to One counselor, said there was a real mix between walk-ins and calls, and between academic and extra-curricular concerns. At the beginning, there were more walk-in visitors, he said, but increased publicity has encouraged phone calls. However, David Santis '86 noted that "people walk through Baxter and poke their head in" and then stay to talk.

The Williams Record

Endorsements

Because of their experience and impressive proposals, the Record endorses Andrew Cypiot '85 and Anza Mammen '86 for College Council President and Vice-President.

In the past two years, Cypiot has served on three standing committees of the Council and three important ad hoc committees. Mammen has served on the Election Committee and as Freshman Council President.

The pair have many innovative and well-researched proposals on issues ranging from finals schedules to student input in administrative decisions. Cypiot and Mammen not only have the creativeness to come up with new ideas, but also the determination to think them through.

Cypiot also has experience with other college committees, such as the Committee on Undergraduate Life, which will be important for coordinating campus government activities if the new Council Constitution is in effect.

Although three presidential candidates are running on tickets (indeed, all the vice-presidential candidates are paired up), there is no requirement for a ticket. The existence or quality of a running-mate should not influence voters from choosing candidates they feel are most qualified.

The Constitution revisions also merit a Record endorsement. The ad hoc Constitutional Review Committee has done a lot of work and their effort deserves a vote—pro or con. At least 1000 people must vote for the changes, and it would be a shame to let these revisions die because of a lack of voters.

The changes will strengthen the Council leadership by streamlining the power of the officers. Many standing committees—apparently

Billsville

by L. Rockwood

useless—will be eliminated, replaced by temporary ad hoc committees elected by the President. The President and Vice-President will be elected on a ticket to insure cohesiveness. The Council will be able to remove Council-appointed members of other committees with a three-fourths vote.

The effect of these changes will be to centralize student power in the College Council. The "voice of the students" will reside largely in the college officers.

With good officers, the effect will be a stronger, more effective, better student voice. With bad officers, there will be the danger of poorly used or unused power. But the alternative to consolidated power is none at all—a fragmented student voice that is much less effective.

LETTERS

Social Rejects

To the editor:

The following resolution was unanimously passed by the Council at Thursday night's meeting:

"As spokesman for the Student Body, the College Council would like to express its strong disapproval of the actions taken by some Williams students at the recent Williams-Amherst hockey game. Although we strongly support school spirit, their behavior showed not only a lack of self-respect, but also a lack of sensitivity and respect for others which we feel is not indicative of the general Student Body."

Tom Paper '84
College Council President

Hockey

To the editor:

We were appalled by the faculty and alumni letters deploring the school spirit the Williams fans showed during the Williams-Amherst hockey game. We were proud to call ourselves Williams College students as our fans demonstrated time and time again just how funny and full of school spirit they could be.

We think that the people who wrote those letters were stuffy intellectuals who have absolutely no concept of team spirit and real humor. The Amherst fools were absolutely no match for us. For every pitiful cheer they had, we had one infinitely better and funnier. They had "scoreboard" and we had "Amherst sucks". They had "U.S. News" and we had "Amherst sucks". They had "52-26,14-13" and we had "Amherst sucks".

But as if our brilliant cheers weren't enough (we were determined to pull out all the stops for this game) we had what was probably the most diabolically hilarious trick ever to find its way into a hockey rink, ready to spring at just the right moment: TENNIS BALLS!

We really just couldn't stop laughing when first we saw the tennis balls on the ice, but in retrospect, as we think of the majestic arcs they took and the significance of it all, we are filled with a deep sense of pride in our school as witnesses to such an event.

What really added to our already heightened sense of pride was when, after being warned, we had the guts and determination to do it again, even though the resulting penalty left us two men short and we let up a goal.

And we still can't forget the outrageous display of "wimpishness" the Amherst fans showed as they clapped for our injured player when he got up. We of the Williams crowd showed them what team and school spirit really are as we jeered their apparently badly injured player off the ice.

We are sure there are many other examples of the Williams crowd's vast superiority to Amherst's degenerate pack of dull-witted moral lepers. The bottle thrown out on to the ice by our crowd is just one shining example, but a list of the Williams fans' triumphs and the Amherst fans' atrocities we are sure would be too long for this simple letter.

We just wanted Williams' over-intellectual band of humorless faculty and alumni to know that the student here have school spirit in spite of them. We think we represent the majority of student opinion in applauding the actions of the fans at the Williams-Amherst hockey game.

Opinions

To the editor:

I wonder if I might use my own experience for a minute to explain why I disagree with your editorial suggesting that the fraternity disputes of our sister colleges are another example of apathetic students becoming "voiceless".

In 1954 I arrived as a Williams freshman, partly because my best friend was coming here and partly because, in those golden days, our admissions officer had ended our joint interview by announcing that we both were admitted. Being what you would now call a "Geek", I was startled to see a fraternity pledge required to wear a toilet seat around his neck the first week of classes. As I investigated further, I discovered that of the fifteen or so fraternities (I'd have to look up the exact number), about five were "top of the line", maybe seven were solid second choice, and the remaining few were lucky enough to get enough pledges to meet their financial needs. In those days the round dining hall at Baxter had just been opened as the "Garfield Club", a place where the motley crew of non-fraternity idealists and social rejects could get something to eat. There were of course no women, but also few Jews or racial minorities, for who would want to come to a social system where you ran the risk of being blackballed? I left, never dreaming that I would be back later to serve as a faculty member and a "baby Dean"—best defined as a "mouse learning to be a rat"—while President Sawyer was in the process of banning fraternities at Williams.

Now the purpose of this tale is NOT to suggest that Williams almost lost a great guy, or even to remind you that, even with better rules of inclusion and hazing, a fraternity system has just as many defects (more?) as our present mix of choice and random draw. Rather my point is that when the President and Trustees of Williams College choose to end the fraternity system, the opinions of the majority of students currently in residence were well known. So were the opinions of a highly intelligent, sensitive and alienated minority, the overwhelming majority of the faculty, and many concerned alumni. For better or worse, the sense of college community also included thoughts on how the college could attract better students, how it could nourish diversity, and how it could live up to standards of what might best be called a sense of fair play.

If lots of changes came in the 1960's, it was because powerful forces within all these elements agreed that improvements could be made. You need only read what past issues of the Record used to say about me—in Gothic script no less—to see that students, then as now, often felt that their opinions were not being fully considered. If you feel frustrated on issues such as dogs, rock concerts and row house dining, then, it is not

WAAC and student activism: dormant or dead?

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

Student activism, especially support for divestment, may have died a quiet death this Winter Study, and that colorful, dramatic and uncommon spectacle, a Cause of the Year, may not be seen at Williams again. Have the activists renounced their causes, and if so, what does this entail for similar efforts in the future?

I think the tactics, rhetoric and structure of past student movements make it unlikely that future activism, if any, will be successful.

This Winter Study was the most uneventful of the past two years. In previous Januarys, we saw the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition attempt unsuccessfully to force the College to divest from its interests in companies that do business in South Africa, and we saw the Williams Alliance against Sexual Harassment inspire much soul-searching and a clarification of the College's guidelines against such harassment.

This January the College's Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility held an open forum to discuss its voting policies on shareholder proxy votes.

The issue of divestment from South Africa still remains, and the position that the ACSR has settled on concerning the College's responsibility as an investor has little in it to satisfy WAAC's stated goals.

Case by case approach

The ACSR's policy is to review companies in the College portfolio on a case-by-case basis to see if they are complying with the Sullivan Principles, a group of guidelines that stipulate fair employment practices for U.S. businesses operating in South Africa.

The ACSR also reviews companies to make sure that they are not selling weaponry to the South African government. Although none of the companies in the portfolio sells weaponry, they sell a variety of non-military products to the government.

Compare this to some of WAAC's rhetoric last spring. Although the hunger strikers specifically demanded divestment only from 15 companies which were not then complying with the Sullivan Principles, WAAC sought eventually to achieve divestment from all companies operating in South Africa, even Sullivan compliers.

Are students here only willing to express themselves if they can have the thrill of doing so in a confrontational and hostile atmosphere?

Three students attended and the issue of South Africa was not even brought up. Instead, the upcoming proxies dealt solely with nuclear weapons manufacturers.

One of the three students there was the Record reporter covering the meeting, and the other two were principal organizers of the disarmament conference sponsored at Williams in January.

Class conflict

In defense of all the students who did not attend, the forum was held the night before Winter Study classes ended and papers were due. However, it seems unlikely that the College was aware of this and chose the date accordingly. The ACSR had no reason to call the forum in the first place if it did not genuinely want to garner student opinion.

Said College Vice-President and ACSR Secretary William Reed last week, "we weren't aware of the conflict. Students are so busy all the time that it's hard to find an open night."

The student body has been represented at both the ACSR's January forum and its meetings during the past year by its two elected representatives, Navjeet Bal '84 and Susan Reilly '85. Bal is spokesperson for WAAC and Reilly is a member.

But where was the rest of WAAC? The forum was held in Griffin Room 3; one will recall that last Winter Study over 100 people jammed into the Hopkins Hall conference room—a room one-tenth the size of Griffin 3—for a showdown with the Trustee Finance Committee.

It is amazing, at least to me, that WAAC's interest has faded so quickly.

WAAC spokespersons said that the College's Investments promoted a "race war," "killed South Africans" and were inconsistent with the goals and values of a liberal arts institution. Others said that "the issue will not die until apartheid does" and that "we will use tactics to pressure the Trustees in the future."

Since the beginning of the year, and culminating in the unattended ACSR forum, those tactics have been nonexistent. The divestment banner has been carried exclusively by ACSR representatives Bal and Reilly. Both favor full divestment. Both have said the existing review process goes too slowly and sidesteps the basic political question of whether U.S. corporations should do business in South Africa at all.

On the other hand, both have seemingly retreated from this position and accepted the ACSR's review process, if not its underlying political orientation. Both have said that their opinions on how much a company should deal with the South African government were different from the amount that the ACSR found acceptable.

"Nothing radical WAAC can do"

"WAAC—and I—still agree with everything we said last year," said Reilly. "There's no way the Sullivan Principles are enough. But the six other people on the committee would never seriously consider divestment as an option...so it's useless for me to keep bringing it up in our meetings. We have to kind of play their game, and push it as far as we can. There's nothing radical WAAC can do."

this year," Reilly said. "It doesn't seem that being vocal again is going to get anywhere." She said she thinks the most effective thing students could do now would be to write letters directly to the Trustees to express their views.

Reilly said she thinks WAAC will lie low for another two or three years, following the ACSR's present review format, and then actively lobby for divestment once again. "WAAC is somewhat defunct right now," she said. "Things go in cycles—we got a lot further last year than seven or eight years ago," she said, referring to WAAC's first efforts in 1977.

It seems there's something wrong when only two students are left to lobby for a change that, only last year, scores of students vigorously supported. It raises a question as to whether WAAC or any other political group will be successfully active and vocal in the future at Williams, and more importantly, whether they will succeed in accomplishing anything.

Students for the most part here seem reluctant to openly support political causes without extensive justification. And the College also usually demands good justification before allowing student opinion to influence or change its policies or procedures.

Ongoing activism needed

Thus for activism to be successful at Williams it must be responsible, consistent and ongoing. For obvious reasons, the administration has an interest in delaying a response when students rally for changes which the administration disagrees with. Students did force the administration to make some kind of response during the 1977 and 1983 divestment movements and the 1982 sexual harassment issue, but the administration's responses stopped short of what the students wanted.

Specifically, the Williams Alliance against Sexual Harassment got the College to publish guidelines against sexual harassment in the Student Handbook, but then WASH quickly dissolved during the following spring term. No doubt people continued to be upset and/or uninformed about the issue, and sexual harassment still exists at Williams today, but somehow the issue is now considered irrelevant by the former members of WASH.

WAAC succeeded in getting the student representatives to the ACSR elected by the student body as a whole, in speeding up the review process, which Reilly said has been useful, and in educating students about divestment and conditions in South Africa.

But knowledge is not the same thing as action, and there is danger in settling for small concessions and forsaking the larger goal. If student activism continues to be temporary conflagrations instead of sustained, and widespread, student expression, the administration will grow ever more confident that such demonstrations are just flashes in the pan that will fade away, and will ignore the few vocal students, like Bal and Reilly, that remain.

Reilly says that WAAC, or what is left of it, is doing all it can right now. Maybe so, but the January forum was a chance for other students to help her.

Students would not have to have been widely active but could have taken a few hours out that night to take an opportunity, which the College willingly offered them, to express their continued support of divestment, or other opinions, concerning College Investment. Are students here only willing to express themselves if they can have the thrill of doing so in a confrontational and hostile atmosphere?

Press may ignore us

Students also have to be cautious about using the press to publicize their causes. WAAC and WASH mailed press releases to regional media to put outside pressure on the College in the form of publicity. But a number of the organizations, particularly television crews, felt that both WAAC and WASH misrepresented the situation at Williams (in terms of numbers of students involved and, in WASH's case, whether a rape had actually occurred on campus) in order to get them to come.

Thus in the future those news organizations will probably be more hesitant about covering student activism here. Perhaps this will force students desirous of such coverage into staging publicity stunts so outrageous that the camera crews will not be able to resist coming. But this will be even more counterproductive to reasoned debate and actual change here.

Student groups also need organization from year to year in order to ensure continuity. Otherwise, the groups lose momentum as the active students graduate. This seems to be what happened in WAAC's case. Instead, they need to have regular meetings, officers with specific duties (such as organizing letter-writing campaigns) and a group effort from year to year.

While I do not necessarily agree with WAAC's positions, I think activism on nation and world issues is worthy. However, I'm more concerned with the future of all political activism here at Williams. To that end, I think future activists will be more successful if they have less ambitious goals. They will be most successful in gaining wide student and faculty support if they focus on issues on which the College community as a whole can form a broad consensus.

For example, students grumble about not having input into administration decisions like banning rock concerts at Chapin Hall, banning dogs, limiting transfers, etc., etc., but students as a whole should be able to work diligently to combat changes they generally disagree with. Former College Council President Freddie Nathan '83 did this in rallying students to save Winter Study. It can be done. And it may give students more leverage in more politically-substantive College decisions in the future. Concentrating on community rather than global concerns may be isolationistic, but at least it's realistic.

NEWSBRIEFS

Frosh fined $50 for theft

The four freshmen arrested last Saturday for stealing a keg from a college party appeared in Northern Berkshire District Court Wednesday and were assessed $50 apiece for court costs, according to Williamstown Police.

The four "submitted to the facts" of the case for the charge of minors transporting alcohol, police said, meaning they agreed to let the judge decide simply on the basis of police evidence in hopes of obtaining a lighter punishment. The other original charge, larceny, was dropped.

In addition to the $50 fines, the four were placed on informal probation for three months, police said. If the students get into any more trouble, their cases may be reopened, otherwise the court will dismiss them in three months and the four will not have a police record.

The freshmen involved were Gregory Keller, Barrett Brown, William Graham and Ajata Mediratta.

Butler fund hits $5,000

The Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund, begun three weeks ago to help pay the medical bills of Dennis Butler '86 who was paralyzed by a skiing accident, has garnered more than $5,000 so far, according to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

More than 250 people have contributed, he said, and upcoming fund raising events are being planned by the National Ski Patrol and the Faculty Club. In addition, part of the money raised during the annual 24-hour relay race will go to the Butler Fund.

O'Connor noted that the fund had now reached more than half of its $10,000 goal. Over $2,000 was received in the last week alone. O'Connor said he would like to see the College use $10,000 to purchase for Butler a new ultra-modern wheelchair capable of being operated by a parapalegic.

Butler remains in the intensive care unit of the Georgetown University Hospital in Washington, D.C. He is still on a respirator but his breathing is improving, O'Connor said.

In addition, he is able to eat some solid food and to talk with the aid of a mechanical device. He spends a good deal of time watching television, O'Connor said, and listening to tapes which have been sent to him by friends at Williams.

O'Connor added that contributions to the Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund are being accepted in the Dean's Office or S.U. Box 3291.

Alumni gifts best in nation

Williams College's record-setting 1983 Alumni Fund total of $2,688,751 has maintained the College's position as a leader in annual giving among colleges and universities, the Alumni Office reported. The four-month campaign ended Jan 31.

The nearly $340,000, or 14 percent, increase over last year's totals is largely attributed to a competition between the reunion classes of 1944 and 1954. The class of '54 contributed $183,833 to top the class of '44's $176,614.

Both gifts broke the record for single class giving in the Alumni Fund campaign which was set last year at $120,000 by the class of '53, according to Director of Alumni Giving Robert Behr '55.

The class of '44 set a new standard of participation with 97.5 percent, and the class of '41 finished second with 95.6 percent. The total 1983 participation of 65.6 percent kept Williams in the lead in alumni participation among colleges and universities which solicit all alumni.

"Once again the Alumni Fund has met at least ten percent of the College's operating expenses," said Behr. "When almost two-thirds of those who earned even one credit at Williams will respond to its annual appeal, you know that we have a very special institution."

Classes that have been out more than 50 years, the "Old Guard," also collected a record total of $258,695, and three classes, 1918, 1919 and 1924, had 100 percent participation.

Survey: 58% of students cannot vote

As part of its overall voter registration drive, the Williams College Young Democrats recently conducted a poll to discover how many students are registered to vote. Out of more than 150 students surveyed, only 58 percent were registered.

Of eligible voters, 60 percent of seniors were registered, 61 percent of juniors and sophomores and 53 percent of the freshmen. Of those, 42 percent were registered Democrats, 22 percent Republican and 35 percent Independent.

Young Democrats president Daniel Peris '86 said the poll showed the need to continue the group's recently-started registration drive. At a Baxter Hall registration session Feb. 13, more than 170 people either registered or sent postcards to state officials requesting registration materials.

Peris said the voter drive would now focus on getting students absentee ballots and on continuing to register students by mail.

Peris added that the reason that nearly half of the eligible students are unregistered is a combination of student apathy and the difficulty involved in registering by mail in a different state.

The College Young Democrats hope to heighten political awareness by registering students and informing them about the presidential candidates through information tables and a forum of candidates' official representatives later this spring.

Two profs get NEH dollars

Associate Professors Richard Krouse and James Wood have received fellowships for the 1984-85 academic year from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Both Krouse, of the Political Science department, and Wood, of the History department, have previously been awarded NEH grants.

Krouse will use his grant to compare and contrast selected topics in the economic and political theories of Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill in an attempt to show that the two theories are not as philosophically divergent as commonly supposed. Krouse has been teaching at Williams since 1975. In 1980 he received a summer research grant from the NEH to explore the concepts of marriage, divorce, and family in the social and political ideas of Marx and Mill.

History Associate Professor James B. Wood

Wood will use his grant to examine the impact of the Wars of Religion on French Society during the second half of the 16th century. The research will contribute not only to the social history of 16th century France, but also to a new field, the socio-economic history of war and collective violence.

Wood came to Williams in 1973. He is the author of "The Nobility of the Election of Bayeux, 1463-1666, Social Continuity and Change," as well as tutors are double majors in Math and some other subject, Durfee added. "Because of the variety of subject matter they have to cover I think they have to be a little more versatile than other tutors," she noted.

"No response so far"

Response during the first week of the Workshop's operation has not been good, Durfee said. "There's really been no response so far. People don't know much about it, and as it's early in the term its unlikely people have run into much difficulty yet."

Still, Durfee thinks the workshop offers an important service. "Many times I see students who need some mathematical background because they have forgotten concepts or have had poor preparation," she noted. "There's a lot more that could be done, but this is a beginning."

Review sessions possible
Students can come to the Workshop with mathematical problems they have encountered in any course, Durfee emphasized. "If there is a concept which they don't understand, we'll try to figure out their difficulty and clear it up," she said. Durfee added that she hopes teachers will inform the Workshop in advance of topics they will be covering, so that review sessions can be scheduled.

"The Workshop is in the experimental stage right now," she said, "and we may staff differently later on depending on the type of response we get." Most of the current student

A new mathematics workshop, modeled on the popular Writing Workshop, opened on campus last Sunday in Room 107 of Brontman. Staffed by experienced student tutors, and administered by Visiting Lecturer Jean Durfee of the Math Department, the workshop is intended to "help students who are having difficulty understanding basic mathematical ideas as they are applied in the various disciplines," Durfee said.

The workshop will be open Sunday afternoons from 2-5 p.m. and Sunday-Thursday evenings from 7-10 p.m. Durfee will also be available from 2-5 p.m. Tuesday afternoon in her office.

The initiative for the Math Workshop came from the Dean's Office, according to Durfee. "The Writing Workshop was such a success," she said,

WINTER CARNIVAL

The Frolic in Review

Snow or no snow, Winter Carnival '84 was a huge, muddy success. From the opening throw of the first ski by Professor Bill Moormaw to the house parties, everyone had a balmy blast. The Trike race started out Day Two (below). The guys who entered this trike said it had three wheels. Uh huh. What we want to know is how one guy talked the other six into letting him ride. At right, the ever-popular banana-eating contest. Rob Coakley '86 had the right idea, but hey, Skavs, that's a microphone, not a banana! We did have another picture of the bananas but, uh, we decided to hold off on that one. (Shame on you, Ted.)

Instead of a cross-country ski race, we had an obstacle course this time. Nice snow. Anyway, the obstacles involved twirling around baseball bats (above), a couple of Tonka Trucks, and some eggs that didn't make out so well. Oh yeah, hurdles—more people ran through them than over, anyway. There was enough snow left for Morgan to make a sculpture, but few others tried. The melted snow, however, turned the tug-of-war into the Mud Bowl. These guys (below left) gave it their all, but had to wash it out with Tide (ouch). All things considered, though, events went well and the '84 (End of) Winter Carnival will be totally (if barely) remembered. After all, the object is to have a good time. Right, guys? Right.

COLLEGE

Shannon
McKeen

I think College Council is an important part of any College Community. Our College Council may at times seem unproductive or inactive, but actually the Council has many responsibilities. Besides handling the budget and appointing members to the various committees on campus, the council serves as a governing or overseeing body on campus. I think this is an important responsibility and I'd like to see the council become more visible on campus and to approach the overseeing responsibility more diligently. I don't mean for council to butt in or try for more power, but to open communications so all organizations on campus can be "in touch" with each other and the student body. That's College Council's purpose, to serve as a liaison between the students and the rest of the campus. If elected President, this, the above, is the philosophy I'd bring with me.

The council has done a good job this year. I have no reservations about its decisions or actions but only want to add to them. The proposed changes to the constitution are a good indication of how this year's council has tried to make College Council more active or even more useful to the college. I want to continue that philosophy so that more of the student body will know who's on the council, what it does, and how it works. I would like to see more student interest and input in the council. This has to begin by rather than an "unused" one, and in fact will be presented for student ratification during the upcoming elections.

Sridhar

Were I to be elected, my goals for next year would be simple and straightforward. First, I am anxious to continue the policy of the present administration, which is trying to make the College Council the "hub" of college government. Also, since next year will be a test for the improved constitution, it is important that it not be allowed to fall into disuse like the previous one. Finally, since the College Council is a popularly elected body, there is no reason that students shouldn't know what it does. Therefore, making it a more visible and accessible organization would be a major goal.

Lastly, if elected, I would do my best to fulfill my duties with any one of the presidential candidates, all of whom I'm sure are competent and interested. But due to similar ideas and goals, I feel that I would be most effective at the job if I held office with Shannon McKeen, '85, and Wendy Webster, '85, who are running for president and secretary respectively.

College Council elections will be held next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday in all dining halls. These candidates for President and Vice-President will participate in a forum at 7:00 p.m. Friday in Brooks-Rogers. The Record received no statements from potential candidates for Treasurer.

The major purpose of the College Council is to consolidate student opinion and to bring about change on behalf of the student body. Effective action requires a president with three essential qualities, and they are the qualities which the president must have, and they are the qualities which distinguish me from the other candidates.

On the College Council, I am the only student to serve on the three standing committees; these cover each area of the Council's explicit functions:

Finance Committee—Allocates Student Activities Tax

Elections Committee—Oversees the election and appointment of students to student/faculty committees

Campus Review Committee—Works to keep the Council informed of the developments on S/F committees and the college as a whole.

In addition, I have served on all the major ad hoc committees during the past year: Constitutional Review, Newsletter, and Gargoyle.

In order to implement College Council policies, the president must be familiar with other colleges' committees, such as CUL and CEP, as well as with college administrators. The president must know which campus committees determine which policies as requested by the student body. On this issue, there is no substitute for the two years I've served on College Council and my present term on the CUL, the single most influential student/faculty committee.

continue to compile and distribute tenure information, making clear possible channels of student action.

continue to support Tuesday coffees, pizza dinners and other non-academic activities with emphasis on students inviting faculty.

4) the president and vice-president devise a system and encourage faculty to consider providing students with two or three exam sessions, on different days, to ease academic pressures.

I see the role of vice-president to be one of chairing the Elections Committee (of which I am now a member); supporting the president during meetings and providing guidance behind the scenes; ensuring that proposals passed by Council are pursued and instituted; meeting with faculty, administration and trustees with a clear resolution of student opinion; and gauging the views of Council members.

I have served as an at-large member to College Council, a member of the Elections Committee and as chairman of a College Council sub-committee. I have gained leadership experience as President of the Freshman Council.

Hamilton
Humes

THE COLLEGE COUNCIL was designed to act as the voice of the student body of Williams. Its function is to help make Williams a more effective college. To perform this role the Council, working with the administration and faculty, must be a body committed to making Williams a stronger institution. Equally, in the tradition of American checks and balances, the Council must be the voice of the students when the actions of the administration or faculty are in opposition to the wishes of the students.

To fulfill this role, the Council does not have much real power. Equally the presidency does not possess many specific powers; the President and the Council are only as effective as the President and the other officers make it.

This year, the Council's ability to act has been strengthened by the creation of a system of liaisons between the Council and the student-faculty committees. This allows the Council, and thus the students, to be informed of these committees' deliberations. Coupled with the Constitutional changes, giving the Council control over the students in these committees, the Council has leverage when actions are being taken which run counter to the students' interest. This ability, if used aggressively, should stop summershocks, such as the closing of the Van Alstyne lounge. Just as important is the ability this gives the Council to aid the committees, to help them better coordinate and act.

Using this system, the Council will work to reform registration, the of information, and the exchange of ideas.

Students voiceless at Williams? They don't have to be; the Council gives a voice to each student and with it the power to affect College policy. But before students can effectively participate in the decision-making process, they need to know the issues and where to go. As Vice President, I will work to make students on all committees, including the Committee for Undergraduate Life and the Committee for Educational Policy, responsive to the student body.

For me, the goal of effective information flow should include student-faculty relations. The purpose of the informal pizza dinners and Tuesday coffees, organized in conjunction with the administration, are for facilitating a relaxed interaction between students and faculty, which is essential to a small college like Williams.

I have experienced both the accomplishments and frustrations of dealing with the bureaucracy. I also initiated and organized the student-faculty pizza dinners and was closely involved with the effort in 1981-82 that saved Winter Study. My experience as a member of the Council as a housing representative and various student-faculty committees, including CUL and Faculty committees, can be used to run the Elections Committee, which selects students for student-faculty committees, which I would chair as Vice President.

calendar and exam scheduling, and deal with the problems of freshmen-upperclass interaction and the interaction of the Center for Developmental Economics with the rest of the campus.

The present Council has taken many initiatives, including the tenure list, student-faculty events, constitution reform, the Campus Review Committee, and the acceleration of the budget process—important steps to increasing the effectiveness of the Council. We plan to further these initiatives by putting out a tenure list in the spring to encourage student input before decisions are made, continuing student-faculty events, modifying the Campus Review Committee to make it more effective, and establishing the new budget process of a preliminary spring budget and a final budget in the first weeks of the fall.

I believe my experience on the Freshmen Council, Finance Committee, as Treasurer, and as House officer enable me to work with all sections of the Williams community. We believe that the Council should act as an independent, innovative group for formulating and implementing policies—not simply responding to the initiatives of others. We want to lead a council of action.

Tom Paper has made a good start. Most notably he has revived the Daily Advisor, worked hard to create an atmosphere in which student-faculty relations can flourish, and he has been responsive to student voices. But Tom has just made a start, the next president will need to be just as enthusiastic. I am prepared to make this kind of commitment, bringing with me an energy and persistence that the Council will need to continue evolving into a more effective organization.

The College Council cannot fall back into its old pattern of being simply "the forum of student opinions." It must not wait for issues to arise, it must continually seek new ways of improving the quality of all of our lives, students, faculty, and administration as well as deepen our understanding of each other's opinions and needs.

If elected president of the College Council I will search for a more reasonable registration process; the current one expects you to choose your future courses while you still have not decided whether or not you enjoy your present choices. I will fight for an exam schedule that does not force students to gamble their final grades on a final exam that they have not had a proper amount of time to prepare for.

If elected president I will see to it that minority organizations like the Black Student Union, the Gay-Lesbian Union, and the Feminist Alliance are better represented both on the Council and in the Council's decision-making. For too long many of these groups have remained on the fringe of campus life. If we are to truly come closer to achieving our shared ideal of a diverse community these groups and others who do not conform to majority opinions must be heard.

Additionally as president I would try to rebuild the student activities board into a financially stable, well publicized group that can provide entertainment for us all. I would like to re-evaluate the Finance Committee's guidelines, particularly those pertaining to food purchases. I would like to give freshmen a chance to play a bigger role in upper class life. Most of all I would like to get more people than ever before involved in the Council and its decisions.

Many of you know me as the president of Dodd House, others know me as one of the co-chairmen of the Housing Committee. So as you are reading this Bill Foraker-the other co-chairman-and I are at the CUL meeting with two proposals: One, to include the members of the Center for Developmental Economics as social members of all of the Houses on campus; the other to allow freshmen to apply in groups of six or seven to Mission Park. If you have any questions about any of the issues please ask me

Carnival fun despite weather; students do it in mud and slush

by Vernon Squires

Mount Brooks was the first clue. A week earlier it had been a formidable mound; now it was a pile of slush. A similar fate befell Mount Perry and the rest of the campus snow piles. Once again, Winter Carnival promised to be a bit different.

Thursday. The opening ceremonies and the annual Citizen's Cross Country Race were on schedule. However, Mother Nature had different ideas. Not to be defeated, the SAB organizers turned to improvisation. Enter the obstacle course.

After Professor Moomaw tossed out the obligatory "first ski," thirteen teams lined up for an unusual relay. The race went in the order of spin, drag, hop, run backwards, spin, run again, leap, dive, stumble, fall and watch your teammate do it all over again. It wasn't skiing, but the shenanigans were entertaining. Thursday night. Brodie Mountain and a dance contest. Bill Tinsman '86 and Betsy MacIver '86 wowed the judges for first place in the event. A large crowd promised a memorable Winter Carnival, despite the persistent drizzle outside.

Friday. This was the first big day, with ski races, hockey, the trike race, a Jamboree and even a banana eating contest. A few hardy innovators actually gave it a go at snow sculpture. The Daily Advisor suggested creativity (use chairs?), but the sculptors stuck to the rules and made the best of the meager snow.

The trike race was a festive competition, complete with wacky costumes, wackier vehicles, a golden retriever and a keg. The team of "One and one-and-a-half" emerged victorious in the two lap course around the Freshman Quad. In the midst of the race a contingent of freshmen stood over a toppled snow sculpture, lamenting their ruined work.

"The girls didn't really go for it," explained one worker. He described the idea behind the icy mess; the girls were not to be blamed for their nonparticipation.

The race went in the order of spin, drag, hop, run backwards, spin, run again, leap, dive, stumble, fall and watch your teammate do it all over again.

At the race's conclusion, the leader of the "Trike Patrol" herded the crowd down to Cole Field, where the games took place. The sleigh ride and traying events were victims of fickle Mother Nature, but the games went off no less.

The highlights at Cole Field included the tug-of-war and a three legged race up the muddy hill behind the fieldhouse. Tunes blared over the sound system and kegs quenched the thirsty athletes, foiling Mother Nature's sabotage attempt.

"We had to improvise with the weather being what it was," said SAB member John Skavlem '84. But it went off well; people had a good time."

Other events included a football toss for six-packs and a perennial banana eating contest. Brad Ball '86 chowed down a banana in record time to win the event.

The broomball tournament also crowned a champion on Friday. After a week of elimination matches, the finals pitted a student dynasty headed by Andy Cypriot '85 against a faculty team. In a tribute to youth over wisdom, the students swept the faculty aside 11-1. At least one event had taken place on ice.

Friday night. The hockey game, parties and the Jamboree at Chapin. This singing extravaganza drew a large crowd which was not disappointed. Sadly the rain came down harder than ever.

Saturday. A bonanza of sports activities and of course, the snow sculpture judging dominated the activities on this final day. A creature in front of Morgan looked intriguing, especially the way its eyes followed you down Spring Street.

The champion came from elsewhere, however. In a stunning Act II to last year's Captain Nemo, Armstrong House created a marvel. Standing proudly in front of Mission was a dragon, ferociously guarding its treasure. It wasn't just impressive; it was alive. This dragon breathed fire. The miracle of liquid nitrogen gave this creature the smoke to pass the

The Trike Race. Snow or no snow, this one would not let me down. Unexpectedly, I came upon an overflow crowd at the freshmen quad, upsetting my plans for a single command post where all the action could be taken in. No matter, I'd park myself beside the keg in the center ring.

Peering toward the starting line, I tried to find a favorite. One team quickly captured my attention, however, because it was undeniably head and shoulders above the others. An Orwellian Ben-Hur perched upon a rickety ladder, supported by a contingent of ram-bunctious Ephs. The leader sported a tacky cape, and a daz-zling sword and shield. This team had potential, I mused, but the intricacy of its locomotion sent me away.

Next emerged a caricature of the Blues Brothers. They looked positively elegant in their black and white garb, topped off with hats and sunglasses. A woman in a flaming red dress stood in their midst; undoubtedly she was a key part of the show. These were my newly established favorites.

Singing extravaganza Jamboree dazzles Chapin crowd

by Karen Philipps

Although the Springstreeters informed the audience at the Jamboree last Friday night that escape from Chapin Hall before the show was over would be impossible because armed security guards were stationed at the doors, nobody wanted to leave. Each singing group brought its own sparkle and personality to the stage, and the audience clung to their seats with pleasure.

The Springstreeters brought humor to the stage. Dressed in outfits ranging from a pseudo-mohawk to a bathrobe, they sang about getting a record contract and Man's tendency to scratch his name on walls. In a more serious tone, they hushed the audience for several minutes with their beautiful rendition of "Send in the Clowns." They ended their performance on a funny note, however, by putting on party hats.

Ephoria, an all women's group, claimed they were not funny, but they could sing. And sing they did in sweet, strong, and controlled voices. Their song directed to the rich daddy was particularly amusing.

Quad Olympics prove talent isn't everything

by Martin Hildebrand

If you were to mention the Olympics while eating recently in Driscoll Hall, you had to be careful to distinguish the games in Sarajevo from those in the Berkshire Quad.

Fitch-Currier, Prospect, East, and Fayerweather held these Olympics during Winter Carnival. Like their somewhat more famous counterpart, these games began with an opening ceremony complete with fanfares, toga-wearing runners carrying flashlights and flags and banners hung from the buildings.

The games were hardly what one would expect from Olympic athletes, but exactly what one would expect from the Berkshire Quad. There was a relay race through Prospect House, in which each participant not only ran up and down stairs but also drank at prescribed intervals. Although football is not normally an Olympic sport, it was one in the Berkshire Quad version.

The Berkshire Quad Olympics also featured some activities typical of Winter Carnival. Despite the damp weather, snow sculptures, which consisted of one large sculpture surrounded by some smaller ones, were built. Friday evening there was a party to finish this version of the Olympics with a celebration.

Basketball star Art Pidioriano will probably break the school career scoring record this week. Pidioriano, a 6-2 senior guard, is within exactly 20 points of the record.

The school record, held by Coach Harry Sheehy, is 1391 points. Sheehy set the record in 1975.

Williams plays two home games this week: tonight against Clark and Saturday against Tufts. Both games begin at 8:00 in Lasell Gym.

Pidioriano has averaged over 20 points a game for most of the season, and broke the 1000-point barrier against Hamilton in December.

"The remarkable thing about Artie's play," said Sheehy, "is that he can get into position for his shot. He's done all this scoring without having magnificent

MIDDLEBURY

A Middlebury student was recently charged with careless and negligent driving after being arrested while driving around with another student perched on his auto's roof, according to the Middlebury Campus. The arresting officer reported the student disclaimed knowledge of the human cargo, who clung to the luggage rack "sliding around and beating on the roof." This student was later identified as the driver's roommate. The officer also stated that the driver "became very arrogant, said the officer was being ridiculous issuing him a citation and that his father was a judge in Mass. and would fix it for him."

SWARTHMORE

The Swarthmore Phoenix reports two Princeton students recently conducted a "cheating experiment" to test the school's honor code. During a freshman chemistry exam, the two experimenters used notes and a text, copied others' tests, and whispered to each other. As the students expected, their treachery went unreported, in direct defiance of the Honor Code. After the exam, the students notified their professor. The professor acknowledged the need for revision of the Code in order to get students to report one another's transgressions.

RPI

According to the RPI Polytechnic, RPI students may soon be responsible for more and better writing skills. RPI's School of Humanities and Social Sciences issued a report which proposes a writing requirement for all undergraduates. This requirement calls for the completion of three "writing intensive" courses, one in a student's major, as a prerequisite for graduation. Such a course would probably entail "a total of twenty pages of writing in three or more assignments." The proposal is designed to counter the problem of "freshman whose writing is below the acceptable college level, and the apparently negligible improvement in writing between freshman and senior years."

AMHERST

A snowball wielding mob of UMass students attacked several Amherst College dorms in December, shattering dorm windows and prompting a deluge of irate phone calls to Amherst Security. According to The Amherst Student, some 150 warriors from UMass showed up on the Sunday night of the first snowfall to engage in the annual assault. A preliminary bout occurred earlier in the day, but the fiercer attack took place under the cover of darkness. The fighting is a traditional gesture from UMass students to their Amherst peers, celebrating the arrival of snow. Despite the intensity of this year's bombardment, no serious injuries were reported.

Jamboree sings out

The Skidmore Sonateers, a visiting woman's group, used a more direct humor than Ephoria did. Telling jokes and funny first-date stories between numbers, they tried to establish rapport with the crowd. They invited audience participation (perhaps forced is a better word) from Josh Lebowitz '87, whom they coaxed onto stage as the man of their dreams. The Ephlats also included a member of the audience, asking her if "that's the way you look."

The Yale S.O.B.'s, another visiting group, thrilled the crowd with their rich, powerful voices. The S.O.B.'s found their place in the hearts of Williams students by commiserating about the dinner selection.

The performance by Essence was well received by the audience. Casually but handsomely dressed in their purple and yellow sweatshirts with the message "We are Essence" printed on them, their renditions of "Boy from New York City" and "My Girl" were especially well done, evoking sustained and enthusiastic applause.

The evening ended with the appearance of Octet. This eagerly awaited group was introduced as "Greg Walker, a god and his cherubs." Closing out the Jamboree, Octet sang traditional capella pieces, which the audience listened to, laughed at, and loved.

not always easy to tell where the root of the caller's concern really lies. "Sometimes informational calls turn into problem calls," such as when a caller asks about a bus schedule, only to divulge that his desire to go home is motivated by problems at school.

Some serious calls

But Ten to One counselors handle far more than bus schedules. "We have had some serious calls, and we just let people talk out their problems," Santis said. "We're not experts on anything," added Pynchon. "The most important function is being there when people need somebody to chat with," said Gatzkiewicz. "We let people talk, and help them see alternatives" by talking out their problems, added Santis.

The strength of the service, according to many counselors, is its anonymity. "It's very objective—you approach the problem as a problem, not as 'somebody's,'" Gatzkiewicz said.

Informality is also a key element, Snellings added. "It's not necessarily anything important. Your roommate's busy or you don't want to bother him, but you can call Ten to One."

Georgetown denies gays funding; Deans veto student government

by Monica Fennell

Georgetown University's Dean of Student Affairs, William Schuerman, vetoed the Student Activities Commission's decision to give official recognition to the Gay People of Georgetown University (GPGU) and to the Gay Rights Coalition of the Georgetown University Law Center. The two student gay groups took the university to court, and last October Judge Sylvia Bacon ruled in favor of the university.

The University defends its decision not to charter the organizations on the grounds that the gay groups' philosophy, activities, and goals are contrary to Georgetown's Catholic charter. Without university recognition Beth Wilson '84, co-chair of the GPGU, says "We don't get any money. As a chartered organization we might be able to get $200-300. Official recognition of the group means we can have an office, a telephone, the right to apply for funding, and use of xerox facilities."

GPGU claims that the university has discriminated on the basis of sexual preference. Yet, according to the Chronicle of Higher Education, Bacon ruled that it is legal because "the First Amendment's guarantee of religious freedom outweighs a District of Columbia law protecting homosexuals from discrimination." Thus a private institution can maintain the policies of its charter even if these policies are discriminatory.

Ted Bird, editor-in-chief of The Georgetown Voice, predicts that this case will be appealed all the way to the United States Supreme Court. GPGU's attorney Ronald Bogard told the Voice that if state human rights laws, like a ban on discrimination on the basis of sexual preference, can be overridden, then the Constitutional grant of state powers is useless.

Veto power

President John Chandler and Treasurer William Reed believe that they, like the Georgetown University administration, hold veto power over decisions on the allocation of student activities tax money.

College Council President Tom Paper '84 acknowledges that the administration can exercise this power.

Williams differs from Georgetown University in that it is not a religious institution and that it has developed a system for allocating the $70-per-student activities money that the College Council collects. The College Council hears arguments from the campus groups, and then votes on how to parcel out the money. Organizations do not need to go through an official recognition process.

Chandler is not surprised by the decision in the Georgetown court case, because he asserts that courts do respect colleges' charters and that the rules set down in an ancient document like our charter, which dates from 1793, should win out over other laws. Yet Bacon's decision disturbs many students. For, as Paper queried, "What are your fundamental rights when you enroll in a private school?"

Said calls for Arab freedom

The Palestinian problem can not begin to be solved until it is totally recognized, according to Edward Said, professor of English and Comparative Literature at Columbia University.

"When (Secretary of State George) Schultz says 'We plan to resolve the Palestinian problem in all its aspects,' he does not even recognize that there is a Palestinian people, that there is exile and that they are entitled to self-determination," remarked Said, a member of the Palestinian National Council, in his lecture last Tuesday.

Recognition and action on the Palestinian problem has not yet come from the United States or Israel, countries which Said feels would give such actions the authority they need. "The United States and Israel have restricted themselves to non-narrative and vague pronouncements," he said.

However, the Palestinians have not completely failed in the Middle East, Said stated.

"If you're a Palestinian, it is never too late. The struggle between Zionism and the Palestinians is very far from over.

Palestinian nationalism has had, and will continue to have, a reality of its own. Injustice isn't justice," he concluded, "and no one, Palestinians included, will bow to it."

Nature raped by religion Moomaw says

The Judeo-Christian doctrine, an exploitative view of nature which held back the progress of environmentalism for thousands of years, lives on in the former Secretary of the Interior, according to chemistry professor William Moomaw.

"James Watt is really defending the traditional Judeo-Christian view of nature," said Moomaw, the director of the Center for Environmental Studies, in a lecture Wednesday.

Moomaw said that while environmentalists consider the destruction of nature as morally wrong, Watt and traditional Jews and Christians see "no value in the wilderness."

"Environmentalists view the destruction of nature as a sin, and [think] that we'll pay for our sins," he said. "Modern environmentalism may well be the modern extension of the Judeo-Christian heresy."

Environmental Studies director William Moomaw explained how the Judeo-Christian religion discouraged environmentalism, in a lecture Wednesday.

Moomaw cited passages from the Bible which he said encouraged followers to utilize, rather than coexist with, the environment. An example is the Genesis sentence in which God tells the first humans to "have dominion over the earth."

"Exploitative view" Moomaw said that despite environmentalist Christians like St. Francis of Assisi, this exploitative view of the environment remained prevalent in the West through the nineteenth century. In the 1830's, he said, an American senator was quoted as saying, "the land must be reclaimed from nature."

Progress in environmentalism occurred in this century, beginning with naturalist John Muir, who is known for his praise of the holiness and harmony of the environment, said Moomaw.

"If it's a heresy, it's one that's wending its way into established religion," Moomaw said. He noted that the Protestant Book of Common Prayer now incorporates prayers on nature. "We could not deal with the environment until we had changed our basic philosophic underpinnings," he said, adding that followers of religion and environmentalism are both "concerned with something bigger than themselves."

Dylan/Allen show Jews' development

The Jewish people's search after the Holocaust for a personal God can be seen through the creative work of writer/actor Woody Allen and popular singer Bob Dylan, Rabbi Alan Berg said last Tuesday.

Berg traced changes in the religious attitudes conveyed by the works of the two popular Jewish figures, both of whom have maintained a large audience in the arts for more than twenty years, concentrating specifically on Dylan's latest album, "Infidels," and Allen's Oscar-winning film, "Annie Hall."

After the first quarter of this century, "the Jewish people began to be faced with a theological crisis," Berg said. This crisis of faith stemmed from an imbalance among the four common concerns of religion: the relationship of life to death, issues of family, the question "does God have a plan for my life?" and the question "why is there evil and suffering in the world?" he said.

An imbalance caused by an increased emphasis on the last question, as a result of the Holocaust, has "caused the Jewish people to doubt one of the root principles of talmudic philosophy—that God is involved in our lives in a personal way," Berg explained.

"Yearning for grace"

He described Dylan's "Infidels" as a "consciously theological album effused with a sense of yearning for grace," meaning in this case "how it feels to be redeemed or to turn into something else." In other words, to achieve grace is to establish a relationship with God which involves personal involvement, he said.

Berg said Dylan demonstrated a certain "crisis of faith" both through his music and through his temporary involvement with fundamental Christianity. "The wonderful thing about 'Infidels' is that it is clear from the will of his voice that he has regrounded himself spiritually. He sings with the kind of will that makes you believe in God," he said.

In addition, Dylan uses traditional Judaic imagery in several of his songs to emphasize the ambivalence of the Jewish God, noted Berg. In one song, "Joker Man," "one set of images, such as the casting out of bread onto the water, focuses on redemption and atonement, while another presents a God with a powerful hunger to consume existence," he said.

Berg said a similar crisis of faith was evident in the early films of Woody Allen, where jokes about the fear of anti-Semitism and about preoccupation with death were prevalent.

However, he pointed out that in "Annie Hall," Allen "looks at his own insecurities as a Jew. He is still afraid of anti-Semitism, but he is no longer afraid of Judaism."

Both Allen and Dylan, throughout their creative work, were attempting to establish the personal involvement with God which is essential to Judaism, Berg concluded.

ness executive" as their probable career, nearly four percent more than at comparable colleges and 6.2 percent more than the earlier Williams class.

Moreover, 9.3 percent of the Class of '87 said they planned to major in economics, nearly double the number five years ago. The increase at least partially reflects the rising prestige of that department in the eyes of applicants to Williams, according to Director of Admissions Philip Smith. Last year, 12.9 percent of the graduating class were economics majors.

However, Director of Career Counseling Fatma Kassamali said she doubted that such freshman career figures were borne out when students began their job searches as seniors. She said the consistent number of students who expect their major fields or career plans to change while at Williams more aptly showed the continued flexibility of students' ambitions.

"Corporate types"

As freshmen, "that's all they know: law, pre-med, and business," observed Kassamali, adding that businesses interviewing here often shy away from overzealous "corporate types."

The number of freshmen foreseeing careers as lawyers and doctors has varied little over a five-year period, according to the questionnaire results. This year they were 17.3 and 16.2 percent respectively.

Selected results from the Cooperative Institutional Research Program's survey of the Class of 1987 at Williams.

Williams Olympians: the tradition continues

by Christian Howlett

On February 12 in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, Jeff Hastings '81 sailed 107 meters through the air to take fourth place in the 90 meter ski jump at the XIV Olympic Winter Games. He also finished ninth in the 70 meter jump, the best American finish since the event was added to the Olympics in 1964.

Although his particular feats were new, Hastings was by no means the first Williams alumnus to participate in the Games. The Williams-Olympic link began with the II Games in Paris in 1900. The Games were still fledgling then, and instead of sending a national team, America let its colleges and sport clubs send promising athletes. Most of the prominent U.S. competitors came with teams from Princeton, University of Pennsylvania and University of Chicago. However, John Bray '00, a four-year member and two-year captain of the Williams track team, went to Paris on his own to represent his alma mater.

With 35 competing track and field athletes, the United States won all but six of the 24 events. In the 1,500m run Bray slipped past fellow American David Hall to take the bronze medal and the top American finish in the event. He later donated his medal to the College.

Williams next appears in Athens at the 1996 games in the person of Robert Grandison Leavitt '07. The 1906 Olympics represented an early attempt to hold the games in Greece in off years. Although the idea was soon given up, and the 1906 Games are now considered "unofficial," Leavitt's gold medal is very real. He attended Williams only during his sophomore and junior years, but during that time won the 120 and 220 meter hurdle events in almost every track meet, including the Eastern college championships. Hew also competed in the standing broad jump at Williams.

In 1906 America decided to send a national team to the games. Tryouts were not held, instead competitors were chosen by the Olympic committee on the strength of their records. In Athens, Leavitt's victory in the 110 meter hurdles was a surprise. In The Olympic Pageant, Alexander Weyand described the race this way:

"This was one of the most thrilling contests of the games. Robert Leavitt and H. Healy raced neck and neck over the last jump; some say the Australian was a shade ahead. In the sprint to the finish, the Williams man won by an inch or two."

Williams' last early Olympic victory came in Antwerp in 1920 at the VII Games. There H. Hallock Brown '20, the national two-mile champion, won two gold medals for the 3000 meter team race. Brown finished first overall in the event, thus earning a gold medal, and received another for being a member of

by Christian Howlett

On Saturday Jeff Hastings '81, America's number one ski jumper, with a spectacular 107 meter jump, finished fourth in the 90 meter jump at the Winter Olympics in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia. In the 70 meter jump he finished ninth, the best American finish ever in the event.

Williams got a bit of recognition, too, from Hastings' feat. Several times during the 70m event the ABC cameras panned to show his parents waving a Williams College banner.

This season has been Hastings' best. On December 18 he put together jumps of 114.5 and 108.5 meters to win the 90m World Cup jumping competition at Lake Placid, N.Y. That made him only the second American to have ever won a World Cup ski jumping event and the first ever to win one on American soil.

Going into the Olympics, the former Williams ski captain was ranked sixth in the world. He just missed a berth on the 1980 Olympic team.

Competing since age 9 Hastings, 24, is a native of Norwich, Vt., who began competing at age nine. He said at 15 he decided to give up cross-country and downhill skiing in favor of jumping. "Once cross-country got over two kilometers, I got out," he said. "I'm not into physical abuse. Jumping is a one-time thing where you do everything in a short clip of time."

Now, he added, he's beginning to think about retirement. "Ski jumping is a young man's sport. I'm 24, and I'm called the grandfather of the team. You get cautious. You stand at the top in the wind, and you start to think. And that's the time to quit."

Hastings, who was an honors graduate in economics, worked full-time for the Sheraton Hotel chain during training. In the off-season he enjoys lacrosse and fly-fishing.

the winning American team. Since he had gotten his start in running at Williams (after being told freshman year by the football coach that he was too small to play), he donated one of his medals to the college in gratitude.

The two gold and one bronze medals won by Brown, Leavitt, and Bray are now on display in the Williamsiana collection in Chapin Hall.

To the best of our knowledge, no Williams person has won an Olympic medal since 1920. However, the college has been represented at almost every Olympics.

In 1948, Ralph Townsend, later Williams ski coach and Outing Club director, competed with the U.S. Nordic Ski Team at the Winter Games in St. Moritz, Switzerland. He finished 74th (the third place American) in the 18 kilometer cross country event and 33rd (the fourth place American) in the Nordic combination.

Robert B. Muir, Williams swimming coach, was an associate coach of the men's team at the XIV Summer Games in London. The Americans swept the pool, taking first place in every single event. Heinie Greer '22 and Lanphaer Buck '24 worked together coaching the men's field hockey team and heading the field hockey committee.

In 1952 Muir was again on the coaching staff of the men's swim team at the XV Games in Helsinki, and in 1956 he was named head coach of the men's swim team at the XVI Games in Melbourne.

Angus G. Morrison '75, competed in the 1972 Summer Games in Munich on the men's canoeing team. He finished tenth in whitewater canoeing competition. In 1976, Nancy Storrs '73 was a member of the first women's crew team in Olympic history at the XXI Summer Games in Montreal. She rowed number two in the U.S. women's four boat. Angus Morrison '75 competed as the lone American entry in the canoe singles competition.

The day began well as senior Bernie Krause led off the day with one of his best performances ever in the shot put. He placed fifth in the field with a toss of 46' 1/2". In the relays the Ephs enjoyed outstanding performances. The distance medley team of Mike Coyne '87, Ted Leon '84, and John Ellison '86 unleashed a 10:37 to take fourth. Their feat was duplicated by the two-mile relay team of Bennett Yort '84, Tom Pingree '86, Kevin Jenkins '85, and Brian Angle '84 which ran a blazing 7:53 just missing the school record while taking fourth.

In other individual performances, Jenkins and Pingree came in second and fifth respectively in the 800. Senior co-captain Ted Leon also took a second as he clocked a 50.1 in the 400 meter run.

Putting things in perspective, Coach Farley said, "We were not really concerned with points going in since we took only a limited number of competitors. Overall I was pleasantly surprised

Hoopsters go to 3-0 in Little Three after beating the Cardinals 69-66

by Dave Paulsen

The men's basketball team clinched at least a tie for the Little Three Championship with a 69-66 victory over Wesleyan Saturday night at Lasell. The win upped the Ephs record to 3-0 in the Little Three, while Wesleyan fell to 0-3. Amherst stands at 1-1.

The Ephs raced to an 11-4 lead in the first half, behind the shooting of Tim Walsh '86. Williams cooled down after that, however, and Wesleyan spurred to a 32-31 halftime advantage.

Head coach Harry Sheehy felt that his team failed to play with intensity in the first half and committed some "dumb mistakes." Sheehy said, "We told our guys at halftime that we had to play smarter basketball—we had to execute on offense."

Second half turnaround

The Ephs set about to follow Sheehy's instructions and gradually edged ahead of Wesleyan in the second half. Co-captain Art Pidoriano '84 came alive for the Ephs in the second half, and the team as a whole shot better from the floor.

Peter Griffith '85 drives for a layup against Wesleyan in the Ephs' 69-66 victory Saturday. (Ruderman)

With 7:02 left in the game, the Ephs held a 56-48 advantage. The Cardinals narrowed the lead, but with 5 minutes remaining, senior co-captain John McNicholas hit John McCarthy '84 with a fine pass out of the four corners offense. McCarthy converted the basket, was fouled on the play, and made the free throw for a big three point play.

Crowd senses Little 3 title

Down the stretch, the Cardinals kept inching back into the game, but could not get any closer than four points, as the Ephs repeatedly hit their foul shots. As time expired, the sixth man was chanting "Little Three", and a jubilant Sheehy exchanged congratulations with his squad.

Sheehy pointed to several factors in his team's second half turnaround. "In the second half, we executed better offensively, we hit our free throws, and shot well," he said. He also praised Dave Krupski '84, and McCarthy, for their work inside. "I thought Krup (Krupski) did a good job keeping Gallivan (6-7 Wesleyan center Paul Gallivan) off the boards in the second half. And Johnny McCarthy came off the bench and really gave us a lift on the boards. He does some of the things that don't show up in the box score but help us win."

Pidoriano poured in 22 points to lead the Ephs. With the effort, he drew within 20 points of breaking Sheehy's all-time Williams career scoring of 1391 points.

Walsh turned in another stellar performance, especially in the first half when he scored 13 of his 19 points.

76-67 loss to RPI

In other action over the week, the Ephs suffered an emotional letdown against RPI and were defeated 76-67. Sheehy said, "Only two people came to play: Peter (guard Griffith '85) and Timmy (Walsh)." Griffith scored a season high 12 points, while Walsh sank 28.

The Ephs fell behind early in that contest, and despite the efforts of Griffith and Walsh, could never get over the hump to victory.

The Ephs, now return to action tonight, hosting Clark at 8 p.m.

Tracksters run in regional meets and post-season competitions

by Chris Stearns

This past weekend nine members of the men's indoor track team travelled to Bates College where they finished ninth in the New England Division III championship.

The day began well as senior Bernie Krause led off the day with one of his best performances ever in the shot put. He placed fifth in the field with a toss of 46' 1/2". In the relays the Ephs enjoyed outstanding performances. The distance medley team of Mike Coyne '87, Ted Leon '84, and John Ellison '86 unleashed a 10:37 to take fourth. Their feat was duplicated by the two-mile relay team of Bennett Yort '84, Tom Pingree '86, Kevin Jenkins '85, and Brian Angle '84 which ran a blazing 7:53 just missing the school record while taking fourth.

In other individual performances, Jenkins and Pingree came in second and fifth respectively in the 800. Senior co-captain Ted Leon also took a second as he clocked a 50.1 in the 400 meter run.

Putting things in perspective, Coach Farley said, "We were not really concerned with points going in since we took only a limited number of competitors. Overall I was pleasantly surprised with the effort because they all ran about their best times this season and that is what you really want."

Women tracksters take second

Though they only took five runners, the women's team fared much better as they placed second overall in an invitational meet held at Union College. All five had outstanding days.

Gail Henderson '87 took two firsts in both the 300 and the 55 meter dash. Lindsay Rockwood '85 continued a fine season winning the triple jump and taking second in the high jump.

Mary Ellen Mahoney '86 added another first in the 55 meter hurdles and a third in the triple jump. Pam Merritt '87 grabbed seconds in the triple jump and the long jump. Capping the day, Amy Doherty '84 took a second in the half mile with a 2:28.

Next weekend the women's New England are being held at B.U., but the Ephs have their sights set on the Division III Eastern Championships being held at Bates in two weeks. Coach Farley said, "To have all these women qualify for the Easterns from what is a non-varsity sport here is exceptional. Everyone is very enthused and pumped up for it."

Grapplers end season at tourney

by Lee Hatcher

In the prestigious New England Tournament, the Williams wrestling team capped off their season with an eleventh place finish out of eighteen of the most competitive wrestling teams in the Northeast. The Ephmen were led by Co-Captains Jeff May '85 and John Leahy '84, who romped to 4th and 6th place finishes respectively.

Competing at 158 lbs. May put in his finest performance of the season. In his three victories of the tournament, he racked up 27 points to his opponents 4. But the highlight of the meet had to be his match against a Wesleyan foe. In the semifinal round Jeff drew Skalla, a junior Cardinal with two New England titles and

All-American status to his credit. May led most of the match, and eventually lost, but his 6-4 score was the closest of the tournament for this formidable foe.

Leahy concluded a spectacular season with a fine showing. Wrestling in the tough 167 lbs. weight category, he faced the top seed in the second round. In an impressive showing Leahy fell 7-5. He rallied in the wrestle backs, in whipping two opponents by a combined score of 19-8. But in his final bout for fifth place, he lost to one of the Skalla brothers of Wesleyan by a 7-0 margin.

Other Eph performances There were some noteworthy efforts by other Ephmen in the upper weights. Freshman Dan MacDonnell landed a victory in the 180 lbs. division. Dave Bicknell '84 wrapped up the season with a win in the 190 lbs. weight class. Sophomore Heavyweight Peter Dawson also captured a bout in this post-season tournament.

First year coach Hal Zendle praised his team's performance this year and remarked the outlook for the future is bright. "I was most pleased by this team. There was tremendous progress on the part of each and every wrestler. The team pulled together, and really jelled in the season finale. I enjoyed working with these young men."

Pucksters stay alive with 2 overtime wins

by Paul Meeks and Chris Harned

The Williams hockey team kept their Division II Eastern College Athletic Conference play-off hopes alive by extending their winning streak to three games last week with crucial overtime wins over Middlebury, 3-2 on Friday, and Hamilton, 1-0 Tuesday. With a record of 9-10-1, the Ephmen may secure a postseason bid at the verge of elimination.

The squad gave the the Winter Carnival fans an early gift Friday night with an impressive come-from-behind victory over Middlebury in overtime. Earlier this season the Panthers dealt the Ephmen an embarrassing 3-2 loss.

Center Rich Jackson '85 and defenseman Paul Coleman '85 supplied the scoring firepower. Jackson scored twice, at 11:27 in the first period and again at 17:58 in the second and assisted on Coleman's game-winning blast from the point four minutes into the overtime. Forward Dave Fritz '86 chipped in two assists.

In the third period, Williams killed three Middlebury powerplays, and goalie Dan Finn '84 stopped a break-away attempt off the stick of the Panthers' high scorer Chip Kenyon with two minutes remaining. Finn, only recently returning from an injury, was superb with 42 saves. Such poise and confidence has been absent from the Ephmen in their roller-coaster season thus far.

Paced by Liz Kellison's 29 points, women hoopsters snap losing streak

Home win over Cards

by Mike Best

Led by freshman Liz Kellison's 29 points, the women's basketball team broke an eight-game losing streak by defeating the Wesleyan Cardinals Saturday, 57-44.

As in many of the Ephwomen's recent games, the first half of Saturday's contest was close. Neither side was able to establish a sizeable lead before the other team caught up. Twice in the last four minutes, the Ephs built up four-point leads only to see Wesleyan come right back. Kellison, who had sixteen points in the half, sank the last shot before halftime to put Williams up 31-29.

The second half was quite a change from recent Eph play. Lately, the Ephs have stayed close in the first half only to be blown out in the second. Exactly the reverse happened in the second half Saturday.

Eph's 14 straight points

Nevertheless, the Cardinals stayed close for the first ten minutes. In fact, at the 10:00 mark Wesleyan held a 42-39 lead. However, they would not score another point until there was less than a minute left. The Ephwomen then reeled off 14 straight points and outscored the Cardinals 18-2 in those last ten minutes.

The Ephwomen took control with nine minutes left as Sandy Wanstall '87 began the Eph streak with two foul shots. It was Liz Kellison, though, who led the charge. She scored eight straight points, breaking through the Wesleyan zone. Kay Lackey, who ended up with fifteen points, then scored seven of the Eph's last eight points, while the Cardinals could only manage one more basket.

The Eph drive was the product of what coach Tom Cruthers called "real good basketball." The Ephs played patient offense, trying to find Kellison, and strong defense, shutting Wesleyan off the boards. Led by Jean Hakmiller '86 with 15 rebounds and Kay Lackey '85 with 13, Williams outrebounded the Cardinals 44-24 for the game.

Cruthers summed up his team's fine performance, "We kept our composure a lot better. Defensively we played really well." He added that the Ephwomen "know they're getting a lot better, and I know they're getting a lot better."

Loss to Trinity

On Wednesday, the Ephs lost to Trinity, 67-52. The game was close throughout during the first half, and Trinity held just a 28-27 lead at halftime. In the second half, the Bantams kept increasing their lead until it became a blowout. Jean Hakmiller led the way for the Ephs with fourteen points and eight rebounds and Liz Kellison added twelve points.

The Ephs are now 5-9. They play at Smith Wednesday and at home against Tufts Saturday.

Lyons and Pier lead skiers to third in Winter Carnival

by Greg Leeds

As Americans Phil and Steve Mahre were winning the gold and silver medals in the Olympic slalom, Williams' Crawford Lyons '84 and John Pier '85 placed first and second respectively in the slalom at Williams' carnival. Their finishes led the men's alpine team to a first place in that event, as Williams ousted perennial winner University of Vermont for the top spot. The Ephmen had 82 points to UVM's 79.

The race was strikingly similar to the '83 carnival slalom, where Pier was first and Lyons was second. Helping Williams substantially was Chris Eagon '84, who broke away from a 16th first run placing to finish 8th. Helge Weiner '87 was second after the first run but ended up at 24th. Martin Magoun '86 also had a spectacular first run, placing 8th from the last start position, but fell in the second run.

In the giant slalom, Lyons had his best finish of the year at fourth. Eagon was 9th, followed by Weiner at 13th and Tim Hill '86 at 19th. Pier was 7th after the first run but did not finish the second. Dartmouth won the GS, followed by UVM, Williams, and Middlebury.

Johansen leads cross-country squad

In the cross country events, Steve Johansen '84 had his best races ever, placing 15th in the 14-kilometer and holding third on his leg of the relay.

Colman O'Connor '85 also skied well, finishing 6th in the 14-km. Ole Halvorsen '87 was 24th and Tim Goss '85 was 31st. The relay team of O'Connor, Johansen, and Halvorsen finished fifth.

In the overall standings, UVM was first with 317 points, followed by Dartmouth with 260. Williams was third with 253 points.

Women take fourth

Third-place finishes in the giant slalom and cross country relay events brought the women's ski team to 4th place overall in the Williams carnival last weekend. University of Vermont won the four-event competition, followed by University of New Hampshire and Middlebury.

In the GS, Kate Knopp '85 and Donna MacDonald '87 led Williams with third and fourth places respectively. Betsy Paine '85 was 21st, followed closely by Marcy Rubinger '85 at 25th.

In the slalom, Knopp was 14th, while Paine was 21st and Rubinger was 25th. Gwen Garcelon '87 was 29th.

Sarah Bates '85 was an outstanding performer for the cross country team, finishing 7th in the 7 kilometer and pulling the relay team from sixth to third in the final leg. Karia Miller '85 was 22nd in the 7 kilometer, while Beth Schmidt '86 was 24th.

The final Carnival for both men and women is next weekend at Middlebury.

Women pucksters win 3-1 to claim "Little Two" title

by Tom Dumphy

The women's hockey team defeated rival Wesleyan Saturday 3-1 before a vocal Winter Carnival crowd. Williams' victory clinched this year's "Little Two" crown (Amherst has no team). After falling behind 1-0 in the second period, the Ephs netted three quick goals. Goaltender Steph Jacon '87 shut out the Cardinals the rest of the way to seal the victory.

Williams applied pressure throughout the first period but the fine passing of Peggy Cardle '86 and Andrea Raphael '86 was to no avail. Williams took twice as many shots as Wesleyan but the Cardinals constantly thwarted the Ephwomen by bunching up in front of the net and blocking shots. At the other end, Jacon's sprawling style of play kept the opponents off the scoreboard.

The second period was played much as the first until tri-captain Alice Comiskey '84 was called for tripping at 6:04. Wesleyan converted on the power-play to go up 1-0. Williams responded with a three goal flurry in the next ten minutes.

Williams strikes back

Beth Ebel '86 tied the game 1-1 on a goal that got a long argument from the Wesleyan coach. Tri-captain Jeanette Hazelton '85 passed to Ebel outside the blue line from where she skated the puck in and shot as she was being tripped by a Wesleyan defender. The momentum carried Ebel, defender, goalie, and puck all into the net. The Ephs then went ahead on a goal by freshman winger Leslie Fernandes.

Tri-captain Pam Briggs '84 carried the puck along the right boards into the Wesleyan zone. Briggs passed into the middle to Raphael who put a half-shot half-pass to the crease. Fernandes knocked it in for the game winning goal.

Wesleyan tried to rally, but Jacon stopped a breakaway to ruin the Cardinals' hopes. Haley Clifford '87 then got the insurance goal to close out the scoring. With Comiskey in the penalty box, Clifford

Candidates coming to campus McGovern, Jackson and Hart

by Martita Weil
and Melissa Matthes

The Williams campus will become a center for presidential political discussion in the next two weeks. Plans are now being made by various campus Democratic organizations for Jesse Jackson, Gary Hart, George McGovern and Ernest Hollings, four of the eight Democratic presidential candidates, to speak here.

This Thursday, March 1, George McGovern will begin campaigning in Massachusetts by speaking at Williams. According to McGovern delegate David Wagner '86, the topic of his speech at about lunchtime in Thompson Chapel will be "Educating America and Other Issues."

McGovern's visit, for which he is not taking a fee, is organized by the Williams Lecture Committee and Students for McGovern. Of all the candidate's visits, McGovern's is the only one confirmed so far.

On Sunday, March 4 in Chapin Hall, Jesse Jackson will present his views and answer audience questions. The speech will be broadcast over WCFM, which will also be interviewing the candidate earlier that afternoon. According to Nzingha Clarke '86, the Black Student Union will be paying for Jackson's transportation to Williams, while the Students' Committee for Jackson has been arranging the visit.

The following afternoon, Gary Hart is tentatively scheduled to speak in Chapin Hall. Like Jackson, Hart will give a general campaign speech and entertain questions from the audience. He will be introduced by Joe McGuinness, author of the recent book "The Selling of the Presidency."

Although "the details are not firm," according to Jeff Trout '80, a spokesman for Williams Students With Hart, "it would be his only campaign appearance in this part of the state." The student group is sponsoring Hart's visit.

At some as yet undetermined date next week, Ernest Hollings will also speak on campus. Currently, according to Eric Glatstein '87, the speech may be held on either the 7th or the 10th.

Officers of the Williams College Young Democrats club noted that their organization is not involved in the visits. Each particular advocacy group planned, raised money and arranged the details for the visits of their respective candidates. There has been primarily student input into the events, although all of the spokesmen hope to involve others.

"It's not going to be just the Williams community," said Clarke, adding that the Student Committee for Jackson has been working with students from North Adams State College, and hopes to get many NASC students and faculty to attend.

Similarly, Trout said that the audience will include "Adams, North Adams, and Williamstown residents," and that local media coverage should be heavy.

Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta and other members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life officially approved the Housing Committee's proposal to allow groups of seven freshmen to apply together for housing at Tuesday's meeting. (Khakee)

Reverses own decision

CUL approves frosh groups of 7

by R. DeMott

The Committee on Undergraduate Life unanimously passed a motion to increase the maximum size of freshmen groups applying together for housing back to seven at its meeting Tuesday. The decision reverses one passed last year by the CUL which limited the size of such groups to four.

The proposal, initiated by the Housing Committee several weeks ago, is an attempt to encourage freshmen to affiliate with Mission Park.

"Evidently there were very, very few people who applied to Mission first choice last year as a result of the smaller groups," said CUL member and biology professor Henry Art.

"Dumb in the first place"

"It's a pretty self-evident point, it was dumb to take it (the seven person option) out in the first place," said student representative Phil Walsh '85. Representative Bill Foraker '85 added that, "freshmen feel that Mission is an undesirable

Amherst disbands fraternities after week of student protest

by Ned Ladd

Amherst Trustees, meeting in New York City, officially announced this weekend that the school will permanently disband all fraternities in June. Students were informed Saturday of the decision which came after a week of student protest and 160 years of the institution at Amherst.

Trustee committee Chairman George Beltzel stated in the Boston Globe, "this is the time and opportunity to make the quality of campus life as exemplary outside as it is inside the classroom."

The abolition of fraternities is only one part of the Trustees' plan to upgrade social life at the college. According to Ann-Marie McGowan, editor of the Amherst Student, the package includes a new campus center, a residential house system like Williams' and a so-called social behavior code.

No student input?

Recent student protest has centered around the fact that student input has been largely ignored in the Trustees' decision. A poll taken last December showed that at least two-thirds of the students supported fraternities.

Last Monday nearly 300 students occupied the office of acting president G. Armour Craig in a day-long peaceful sit-in, taking time out only to go to classes. In addition, almost 200 letters of protest were sent to the Trustees.

Hunger strike

Last Tuesday ten frat members began a five-day hunger strike to show their concern. They made no direct demands, but expressed hope that the Trustees would meet with members of the Inter-Fraternity Council. "This is simply a way for us to show our concern for fraternities," said striker Robert Hecht '86. "Hopefully it will make a difference."

The IFC met with the Trustees in New York Friday for 15 minutes, but could not change their minds. IFC Vice-President Daniel Franzese '84 said of the meeting, "the campus sentiment is that we were brought down there as a formality so we can't say now there was no student input."

All ten of the striking students ended their hunger strike Friday when the IFC met with Trustees.

Beginning Wednesday, student Security monitors will patrol Mission Park in the evenings in an attempt to cut down on vandalism to the dormitory complex. (Buckner)

Starting Wednesday

Security students to patrol Mission Park

by Sarah Abernathy

A new student security patrol will go into effect Wednesday night in Mission Park in an effort to prevent further vandalism to the dormitory complex, according to Security Supervisor Jean Thorndike.

The halls will be monitored from 10 p.m. till 2 a.m. on Wednesday and Thursday nights and from 10 p.m. till 3 a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays.

"What we're hoping to do is set up students with radios in communication with security officers, and if they observe any problems they'll call them in," said Thorndike.

"We're not expecting them to get involved in any serious incidents; they will be an extension of the security department, an extra pair of eyes and ears," she added.

Shifts of at least three or four will patrol the lobby area, the cafeteria and the hot dust and rec rooms, Thorndike said.

"We'd originally hoped members of each (Mission) house would be willing to monitor, but we don't have a pool of students for assignments now," said Thorndike.

Students will be paid through the security student monitor program and must be certified financial aid students, Thorndike said. Only about five of the desired 16 students have volunteered so far, she added.

A similar dorm patrol for the different quads was used and then discontinued several years ago, she said. It was unsuccessful.

physical plant and when we reduced the size to four, it took away a lot more of the desirability."

The smaller group size also made it harder to arrange for people to stay together in suites, according to Foraker. "Because of the size of the suites, the house presidents had problems meshing various groups together. Since this is communal living, that can really create tension," he said.

According to the proposal, groups larger than four must list Mission Park as their first choice. With this year's institution of the so-called Pomilla Proposal, a prioritized lottery system for housing transfers, freshmen who live in their first choice next year will have little transfer priority the following year.

"Stabilize the transfer process"

The Committee made no special provision for members of large groups who later wish to transfer their affiliation. "That's the cost of app-

Self-Control

Having student security monitors patrol the halls is an excellent step towards solving the vandalism problems in Mission Park.

Mission is an active party center—a place where many partygoers end their evenings. It is also a large complex where outsiders can go unnoticed. Thus it is especially vulnerable to vandalism and other anti-social acts.

The mere presence of students in yellow jackets should discourage many of these acts. The change may not be a noticeable one—the student monitors may find themselves with little to do on a typical evening, and little effectiveness if problems do arise. However, their existence should calm the occasionally rambunctious folks who can do so much damage.

The move is a good indicator that the administration trusts students to monitor themselves. By reporting vandalous acts, students can keep that trust. In addition, regular security guards would not blend in as well as students with the daily life in Mission Park, and might arouse the resentment of some, feeling that Security has intruded.

Student labor, relatively cheap for the College and also valued by the workers, could also be used in other places to make life at Williams better. Extended gym hours, extended library hours, and the new small-party regulations that the Housing Committee is now working on can all be facilitated with the use of student labor.

Cruel Threat

To the editor:

Many thanks for the mention in the February 7th issue of the Record. I'd very much like to thank the authors of the letter for identifying me with school spirit at Williams. While here at NYU Law School I miss the sports scene at Williams a great deal. I'm just sorry that spirit may have dwindled this year. If true (and Drew Klein has never lied to me before), this cannot be permitted to continue.

I watched the Olympics last night and got a rush of Williams pride when I saw Jeff Hastings competing in the 70 meter ski jump. I was even more proud when I saw the alumni contingents there with the purple banner prominently displayed. Williams' athletes and sports fans have a proud tradition to follow. We played in the first college baseball game, we have had national swimming champions, we have coaches such as Bob Odell, Carl Samuelson, Sue Hudson-Hamblin and Bill McCormick who personify the quest for athletic excellence in an academic environment.

I only wish I could be there watching Art Pidoriano and Lynne Jaycocks ballhandle through enemy hoopsters and cheering Danny Finn and the hockey squad through their mid-season troubles. These athletes perform not for the lure of professional contracts, but for the sheer enjoyment of sport.

I part with a hearty W-I-L-L-I-A-M-S and the reassurance after first term grades that you don't have to worry about getting me back. That gentlemen, was a cruel threat to Billsville.

Inhuman

To the editor:

We were most disappointed with your haphazard coverage of the Trike Race. We are distressed to be referred to as the Big Wheelers, especially since it is a registered trademark of Mattel, and your neglect to correctly transcribe our name has involved us in a serious copyright dispute with Mattel. Our real name is, of course, Nanook and the Huskies. In addition, your inability to distinguish between a Big Wheel and a dogsled defies imagination and while we must admit that our Eskimo was made in New York, he was authentic enough to warrant at least some attention.

We also missed your incredible photo of the most exciting part of the race, when we accidentally ran over one of our huskies, and he had to be taken to the Infirmary. We attribute this oversight to your inhuman, cruel and utterly uncalled for hatred for huskies. We are not amused.

For the Record

"For the Record" is a new part of the editorial section in which we commend or comment upon subjects that are noteworthy, but would not fit into a full editorial.

•Amherst lost its frats last weekend. With them went the ubiquitous Friday and Saturday parties. No longer will there be institutions directly responsible for campus nightlife. Clearly, there will be a vacuum. The next year will be a test of Amherst students' ability to organize an exciting and vibrant social life. Let's hope they can draw on our twenty years of experience.

•His win in the giant slalom on Friday draws attention to the fact that Crawford Lyons '84 is an awesomeskier. Through the year, Lyons has acquired two wins, a second and a third in the slalom, establishing his pre-eminence in that event, and a first seed in the Nationals. This weekend, while posting the fastest time in the second run of the slalom (a fall in the first run dropped him to 17th overall), Lyons took a victory in his off event.

•For the next two weeks, newsmakers will be on the Williams campus. Several Democratic candidates will speak on the issues defining their campaigns. This is one time in which we can get a jump on the New York Times. Our information will be first hand, coming from a direct dialogue with the newsmakers themselves. Don't see it on the evening news.

Infuriating

To the editor:

I was dismayed and disgusted by last week's article by Jeffrey Brainard on WAAC and student activism. Once again, the Record succeeded in printing misrepresentation of the grossest kind, emanating out of a lack of understanding of the nature of student activism on this campus in general, and of WAAC in particular. To begin with, allow me to clear up a few points. First, WAAC has never and does not claim that Williams College is responsible for promoting a "race war" or is "killing South Africans". To make such a simplistic claim would be absurd, and outrage even the least informed. The relation of the College's Investments to the Apartheid regime in South Africa is somewhat more complex than Brainard seems to think.

WAAC argues that divestment is a means of making an institutional statement that refuses to participate in American companies and banks that support South Africa. It seems quite obvious that it is the white minority in South Africa which is creating a "race war", and the College's Investments constitute a tacit acceptance of that racist regime. The strength of WAAC's argument lies in asking that the College no longer continue to make this tacit acceptance, but, rather, take an active stance against it by joining the divestment movement. For Brainard to reduce the divestment argument to the simple-minded assertion that the College is "killing Black people" is a dangerous and misleading misrepresentation.

Brainard also seems to suffer from a profound lack of knowledge and understanding of the nature of WAAC. His only "evidence" for their assertion that students have "lost interest" in the issue of divestment is the lack of students at the open forum held by the ACSR last January. It is far more plausible that students and WAAC members have long ago recognized the futility of placing their arguments before the ACSR, since the Committee has absolutely no power in making decisions. The locus of power of this College is with the Trustees, and it is simply a waste of energy (a precious resource here in the Purple Valley) to spend an evening with the ACSR.

Brainard fails to make the distinction between an apparent lack of interest, and the difficulty in sustaining the level of energy required to deal with the Trus-

Jackson and the media: a double barreled attack

by Muhammad Kenyatta

Jesse Jackson is coming on strong. His rainbow coalition candidacy has almost doubled its percentage of popular Democratic support since his formal announcement. Within months, Jackson's candidacy has become the second most favored candidacy among all Democrats, tied with that of John Glenn.

The Democratic race is now between Mondale, Jackson and Glenn. Good moves and good luck could catapult the upbeat rainbow campaign past Ohio Senator John Glenn's fading star. Jackson's general strategy and his political intuitions are coming through more and more clearly.

First, build the Black candidate movement. Then, when no one else has the guts to run, cultivate the "Run, Jesse, Run" draft movement. Declare the candidacy and his legitimacy escalates. A stroke of genius: the bold diplomatic rescue of U.S. pilot Goodman from Syria. Look, number three in the polls. Next the Dartmouth debates goes as smooth as silk. Now he is tied for number two. It's time to take the high road. Exude confidence. Project competence. Convey momentum. And let John Glenn eat Jackson's dust. It is a smart and effective strategy.

You've got to take your hat off to the man. He is winning white support at an accelerating rate. He's showing his grasp of the full range of social welfare, economic, military and foreign policy issues. He is as genuine a contender as any other presidential aspirant. And he has, in fact, left Hollings, Cranston, Askew, McGovern, and Hart too far behind for any of them to touch him.

But, there is a glitch in the plan. As Jackson gets bigger, his opposition takes him more seriously. Like Malcolm X after his conversion to multi-racial humanism and like Martin Luther King gathering together his Poor People's Campaign, the brash Rev. Jackson is emerging as a black leader of a rainbow coalition, potentially embracing a multi-racial national constituency. Malcolm and Martin were literally gunned down. But Jackson's opposition is gunning for him with propaganda bullets.

It is a double-barreled attack. But it can be overcome if individual Jackson supporters will take the time to promote their candidate by the simple expedient of letter-writing campaigns. Let me explain.

A carefully orchestrated smear campaign, from the Jewish Defense League to the New York Times, has tried to paint Jesse Jackson as an anti-Semitic tool of Arab money. One should simply understand that the pro-Israel lobby feels a vested interest in discrediting any black leader who dissents from that lobby's dictates. A few years ago, it was the forced resignation of then U.S. Ambassador Andrew Young. Now the pro-Israel lobby is after Jesse Jackson. From the sleek innuendoes of the New York Times to the vulgar racism of the Jews against Jackson, it is hard-ball interest group politics that Jackson has resisted as a matter of principle. His Mentor M. L. King Jr. would be proud of Jackson's principled support of Palestinian rights.

The other barrel of the attack comes from a more unconscious bias of the White media generally. This bias causes the major media to continue to think of the Democratic campaign as a race between two white male millionaires, Fritz Mondale and John Glenn. But every indication from the trends of opinion polls to the candidates' performance in the several televised debates shows that the two most viable Democrats are Mondale and Jackson, not Mondale and Glenn.

And here's where the letter-writing comes in. Imagine thousands of Jackson supporters sending letters to the editors of local papers asking why reports do not recognize Jackson's poll position as the second-ranking Democrat. Imagine letters to CBS and the Washington Post and the New York Times, demanding that those media representatives conduct opinion polls matching Jackson against Mondale, among Democratic voters. Imagine letters calling for pollsters to sample opinions about a November contest between Reagan and Jackson. The results may be surprising.

My educated hunch is that such polls would render two results. One result would be to narrow the field of viable Democrats to Jackson and Mondale. The other result would be to reveal that Jackson would be a formidable opponent to Ronald Reagan in the November general election. And such results would likely lead to a quantum increase in Jackson's ability to raise funds and to woo liberal supporters from the lost causes of Hart, Cranston and McGovern.

Developments like these could place the sky-rocketing Jackson within striking distance of a place on the Democratic presidential ticket. In a popular sixties song Bob Dylan admonished, "Don't look too soon because the wheel's still in spin and the times they are a-changing." Jesse Jackson's wheel is spinning fast.

A public push by his supporters in the form of a grass-roots letter-writing campaign could help keep it spinning. American politics is, after all, largely a matter of public perceptions of media presentations. Jackson's constituency, via letters, could have a direct impact on media presentation, thus effecting public perception (it is a simple enough technique that the black middle class does not use often enough).

Jesse Jackson is coming on strong. But right now he needs a little help from his friends. With that help, Jackson could decisively eclipse Glenn in terms of the intangible viability quotient. And then, maybe Mondale is not so invincible after all.

tees and administrators of this campus on the issue of divestment. Students are still concerned about College investments in companies and banks involved in South Africa. Divestment is not a dead issue. The struggle does continue.

Which brings me to my next points. It must be stated, most emphatically, that it is wrong to place the burden of carrying the "divestment banner...exclusively" on the shoulders of two people. The whole concept of reducing political activism to the individuals concerned is indicative of a pervasive misunderstanding of WAAC as a group, and as a movement, not simply an aggregate of individuals.

Let me add that the two student members of the ACSR, Bal and Reilly, have not retreated from their position of calling for full divestment. They are carrying on the struggle in a different form by exploring what they can do to expand the parameters of the ACSR. This is part of the process of a sustained effort to maintain a dialogue between the students and the Trustees.

I wish to conclude by challenging Brainard to rise out of his deplorable parochialism. To suggest that future activists should spend their time and energy on fighting to keep dogs on campus is truly infuriating. The College Council exists as a means of representing student concerns regarding the quality student life. Political activists on this campus are concerned, by definition, with issues that are, at one and the same time, a part of this institution and greater than it, since this College is a product of, and in some ways, a reflection of the society which creates it.

Two Hands

To the editor:

In a sense, after reading Jeffrey Brainard's article on student activism, I felt very much the way a nine year old must feel upon accidentally stumbling into a department store full of free toys: There is so much in the store to pick and choose from, but it is frustrating deciding where to begin.

So that this letter doesn't take up the entire "Letters" section, though, I will only pick and choose from the first paragraph in the hopes that others will write about the remaining thirty-one.

"Student activism," writes Brainard, "...may have died a quiet death this Winter Study, and the colorful, dramatic and uncommon spectacle, a Cause of the Year, may not be seen at Williams again."

Although Williams is certainly not a school for revolutionary cadres, Brainard has ignored a good number of students who have, since September, been quietly and vocally mobilizing support around various worldly and campus issues.

The following, just to refresh some memories, is an incomplete list of student-initiated political and social events that have succeeded in addressing some relevant issues over the past seven months: Women's Week, Panel on "Women of Color," a GLU Panel on "Homosexuality at Williams," a Central America Teach-In, a rally protesting, and a Town Meeting on, the invasion of Grenada, a rally protesting the Marines' presence on campus, a petition drive demanding Reagan's resignation, a panel on "Racism at Williams," student-organized car pools to anti-nuclear rallies in Groton, Conn. and Boston, student representatives at the Women's Peace Encampment in Seneca Falls, NY, a voter registration drive on campus, the formation of a number of Presidential campus campaigns, the Edward Said lecture, Germinal, and a weekend conference on Disarmament.

As can be clearly seen, student activism is still very much alive at Williams, and contrary to Brainard's assertion, activism here tends to be more "educational" rather than "confrontational" although there are times when "confrontation" is necessary.

Furthermore, Brainard harbors the fallacious notion that the so-called "Cause of the Year" no longer exists. Such a misreading of social reality is both ignorant and, ultimately, harmful. Every "cause," to certain people, is a "Cause of the Year," especially to those directly affected.

Clash bow out try Madness?

The rock group "The Clash" will not perform at Williams this spring, but will play at RPI instead, where they appeared last year and earned $44,000.

The Student Activities Board is now trying to get the group "Madness," and perhaps a reggae band to open with them, for an April concert in the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink.

"We thought [The Clash] could play both Williams and RPI, but they were looking at it as an either/or situation," said SAB chairman Arunas Gudaitis '84.

Both colleges bid $25,000 for The Clash, but at RPI the band will also receive a percentage of the ticket sales for the 8000-seat hall, which sold out last year.

The SAB might have had sufficient funds for a big-name group such as The Clash if it had known last fall that the concert would not be in Chapin, he said. "We didn't expect to have to do a show in the hockey rink, so we didn't have enough money," explained Gudaitis.

The SAB is 80 percent sure it can get the English group "Madness," according to Gudaitis. It is bidding $10,000, and tickets will probably cost six or seven dollars, he added. Gudaitis characterized the band as "a British ska group, which has a mixture of influence from normal pop, rock and roll and reggae music."

He also said that the group is popular in England, and had the American hit "Our House" last year.

Channel 40
films campus

Camera crews from Channel 40 in Springfield were on campus for a good part of the day Monday talking to students, faculty and administration members and filming the campus.

Their efforts were intended as an examination of the residential house system at Williams and of how the campus operates without fraternities, in light of Amherst Trustees' decision Saturday to abolish them at that school.

Spokesmen in the Williams News Office said they were unsure whether or not Channel 40 planned to air the segment as a single story on the evening news or as part of a several-night series.

Camera crews interviewed College President John Chandler, Dean Nancy McIntyre, chemistry professor William Moomaw '59 and town resident Bruce Grinnell '61 who was a head of the student committee which first called for the abolition of fraternities twenty years ago. They also talked to students and shot pictures of rooms in several houses.

Grees to head
Outing Club

Edward Grees, assistant coach of men's skiing and tennis at Williams, has been named Director of the Outing Club, effective July 1.

He will begin directing the Outing Club on a part-time basis beginning March 1.

Grees' new full-time responsibilities will include teaching physical education classes and managing the activities of the Outing Club in conjunction with the student board. He will also continue as assistant coach of the men's ski team.

Grees is a graduate of Windham College where he was most valuable player and captain of both the ski and lacrosse teams in his senior year. He received his master's degree in Sport Management from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst after skiing professionally for five years.

He is replacing former director James Briggs who left the Outing Club in January to become Executive Director of Alumni Relations for Williams.

His wife, Mary Lou Briggs, directed the Outing Club through Winter Carnival.

Frat pledge at
AIC found dead

A freshman at American International College in Springfield was found dead at a fraternity house shortly after a dinner held as part of pledging "rituals" early Thursday, according to the Springfield Morning Union.

Police said James F. Lenaghan, 19, of Watertown (Ma.) died at the Zeta Chi fraternity house after eating a "spaghetti dinner and wine chasers."

Lenaghan was found unconscious by fraternity members sometime between midnight and 12:30 a.m., college officials said.

Police said Lenaghan appeared to have choked on his own vomit, but the department was awaiting an official ruling on the cause of death.

The Hampden County Medical Examiner performed an autopsy at Mercy Hospital Thursday afternoon but postponed ruling on the cause of death pending toxicology reports from the Massachusetts State Police laboratories in Boston.

"It's a ritual. They do it once a year. It's part of the pledge, this dinner," said a police detective, who added that Lenaghan was one of six freshman pledges who attended the dinner at the fraternity house.

Blaine Stevens, AIC dean of students, denied that pledging led to the death or that anything "less than kosher" took place.

"The death had nothing to do with the pledging process," Stevens said, although he said the process "might have been mitigating."

Stevens said Lenaghan, who was assigned to a room at Broadhurst dormitory on campus, apparently went to sleep at the fraternity house and was then found by fraternity members "in some distress."

The death came in the third week of a five-week pledging process. Zeta Chi has been ordered to stop pledging until the matter is investigated, Stevens said.

Perry Jano, 18, an AIC freshman and close friend of Lenaghan, said he was also pledging Zeta Chi until a week ago when he quit.

"It's a lot of harassment. You can't study, you can't do anything. Hey, I don't need that kind of abuse," he said.

Role of security guards at small parties examined

by Joe Ehlers

Williams College is reviewing the function of Security officers at house parties, according to Dean Daniel O'Connor, in part because of problems at several house parties earlier this year.

A committee of Housing Committee members and Security personnel is trying to assess the value of security at house parties. "The committee is looking at all aspects of security, including the problems of expense," said O'Connor.

"If there are over 50 people and alcoholic beverages (at a party), we are determined to shut them down unless they have Security," said Supervisor Jean Thorndike.

Fine raised

Houses will now pay a $100 fine, instead of the old $50 one, if they are caught having such a party, Thorndike said. Before the fine increase, it was more expensive for houses to get Security than to pay the fine, so many parties did not hire Security.

No proposals have been finalized by the committee as of yet. Bill Foraker '85 is working with Thorndike on the problem. "Right now, we are studying some proposals and the issues," said Thorndike, including the idea of having student Security monitors at some parties instead of Security officers.

"Whether or not a party requires student monitors or Security officers depends on the location of the party, its nature, and the party's sponsors," she explained. Dodd House president Phil Walsh '85, a member of the reviewing committee, stressed the importance of security at house parties. "People complain when [Security officers] are at parties, but they do a heck of a job," he said. "Now with the fine increased, you will see them more often."

Keep fire code limits

There are major reasons for security at house parties, according to O'Connor, the most important being to keep the crowd within fire code limits.

"We are quite worried about Dodd," O'Connor stated. Two weeks ago a Club Bacchus party was shut down because too many people arrived after the building's occupancy limit was reached.

"There was so much vibration from the dancing that the alarms went off. It sounds like fun and games, but it can be dangerous, especially in that building," said O'Connor.

Help with accidents

Security also helps in case of accidents, injuries or violence. Two years ago two students suffered from alcohol overdoses and "one of the students had stopped breathing but Security was able to handle the situation," according to O'Connor.

Security serves as a buffer zone between the town police and the College and also deals with any noise complaints from students or town residents.

"The police might be forced to act if we didn't," states O'Connor.

The committee meets this Wednesday to act on proposals on the house parties and to re-evaluate the importance of security at these parties.

Applications surge by 10 percent

by John Irwin

After a sharp drop last year, applications for admissions to Williams are up strongly for the class of 1988, despite the fact that there are fewer high school seniors nationwide. Final applications will probably top off at about 4375 this year, compared with last year's 3962, according to Admissions Office staff.

The bulk of the increase came in regular applications; Early Decision applications were up by only 10, to 331 from 321.

Associate Director of Admissions Tom Parker said he was uncertain of the causes of the increase, which most other top Eastern colleges are experiencing as well, but he suspected it was attributable to an improved economy, better information about financial aid and increased recruiting efforts by the admissions staff.

Parents more confident

Parker suggested that parents are more confident now than they were a year ago that they will be able to pay for four years of an expensive college education. "They have more faith in the economy—that they'll still be holding their jobs."

Moreover, Parker felt that thanks to the efforts of Williams' and other colleges' admissions departments, parents and students are realizing that they will be able to get financial aid if they need it.

"I think we collectively have managed to get the message across that you're going to get aid if you can get in," he said. "We hit that really hard."

Last year, Admissions Director Phil Smith, along with admissions directors from the Little Three, the Ivy League, and other competitive Eastern colleges, sent a joint letter to high school guidance counselors stressing the availability of aid for those who need it. Williams remains committed to an aid-blind admissions policy, he noted.

Bigger staff

In addition, the admissions staff has increased its recruiting efforts this year. It added one member, increasing the staff from six to seven, and travelled to more areas and more high schools than in the past.

As Parker explained, "we're

Ephlats host Swarthmore, Dartmouth; sing with enthusiasm and style

by Martita Well

Singing, acting and clowning to a standing room only Brooks-Rogers auditorium, Williams' Ephlats, Dartmouth's Woods-wind, and Swarthmore's Sixteen Feet a capella groups provided a wonderful Saturday night show.

The year-old Ephlats began with "Happy Together," including a short but beautiful solo by Libby Miles '86. Then, with Blake Martin and Brook Larmer's imitation of the Smothers Brothers, the Ephlats turned the stage over to Sixteen Feet.

The men's octet exuded warmth and humor. They joked with the audience, especially about the number-two ranking that Swarthmore and Williams shared recently, and about the obscure location of Williams.

After proving themselves as stage personalities, Sixteen Feet showed their musical prowess. With "Runaround Sue," "Stormy Weather," and "My Girl," the group wowed the audience. Yet despite great performances on all of their numbers, the most memorable was undoubtedly an amazingly authentic a capella version of the B-52's "Private Idaho."

Then the Ephlats appeared for their first set, which included a soft, spiritual "Little Lamb." Demonstrating their versatility, the group did a song not often heard on this campus—"Georgy Girl." Continuing the mood established by Sixteen Feet, they performed all their songs with humor and exuberance.

After a short intermission, the Ephlats returned to introduce the Woods-wind. Using a routine centering on frogs, and on the jumping ability of Kendall James '84, Williams presented

Vibrant forces mold Tarantella into exhilarating performance

by Vernon Squires

Last Saturday night's final performance of "Tarantella" was a vibrant celebration of human movement. The seven piece concert in dance theater built from a dramatic opening to a stunning and energetic climax in which the potential for physical expression shone brightly through. Under the direction of Will McClaren '84, the seven performers captured their own sense of human vitality.

The concert began with the lonely presence of McClaren, moving erratically to the sound of his own voice. He promised the capacity crowd at Downstage Theater to "become myself, and let you become yourselves and love me."

With these words echoing silently throughout the theater, the company crept onstage under the cover of darkness. When the lights went up, six dancers spun a web of movement around a solitary masked figure. This muse seemed alternately curious and pensive as she watched the gesticulations around her.

From the haunting tension of the second number, "Tarantella" slipped into a slow piece by Sara Griffiths '84. Griffiths seemed to stumble a bit through her routine, although the problem lay more with the struggle between the methodical music and inconsistent choreography than with the dancer. At times her steps seemed forced, and unable to flow with the accompaniment.

Any relaxing of the audience was reversed in the fourth number, which closed out the first act. This piece was frightening, depicting a battle between old and new dance. Judy Lewis '84 occupied center stage, delicately performing a series of ballet steps, which she identified by their French names. Her movements and lessons were interrupted, however, by the presentation of a short film in the background. The film depicted the dancers in moments of quiet preparation. As Lewis continued her refined movements, and the film rolled on, McClaren began to rock to his own beat, provided by a headset. The resulting tension between ballet and contemporary dance was very effective. McClaren's wild rocking captured today's common dance, while Lewis' grace and delicacy bespoke of tradition. A resurgent blend of music added to both dancers' efforts, producing a palpable tension.

After an appropriate five minute break, Julie Hey '84, Lewis, and Griffiths moved onstage to begin the second act. Wearing beautiful dresses in varying shades of blue, the three dancers wove a piece suggesting harmony and self-transcendence. There were some problems with synchronization, however, preventing the full emotion of the dance from coming through.

A brief solo by Valerie Anastasio '86 was a charming interlude. She truly seemed to enjoy herself as she discovered the magnificence of movement. Tracing and wondering at her own body, Anastasio smiled with innocent delight at the beauty of motion.

The final number was brilliant. McClaren found at last his notion of dance as "ephemeral and transitory beauty." The entire company moved with ease and joy, expressing marvel and reverence at their own capabilities. The dance was intricate, beginning with frenetic dashing and frog-like hopping. Griffiths and Lewis performed traditional dance, with McClaren imitating their movements in a comic and extraordinary effort. The dancers found their potential, capturing humor, grace, originality, and freedom. Anastasio and Maureen McDonnell '86 engaged in a delightful rhythmic interlude, and Rumi Kurosaki '86 added an amusing solo. Griffiths, too, sparkled when she donned a pair of white slippers and prouetted gracefully to a receptive audience. McClaren was the star of this number, though, fulfilling his opening promise. A surprise was McDonnell's asking the crowd if they had "experienced their catharsis yet," but this irregularity did not diminish the quality of the piece.

The concert ended with the entire company waving colored streamers to appreciative viewers, who could not help but wonder at the marvel of human movement.

Man on the Quad

"What do you think of fraternities and social clubs?"

Leigh Repko '84 "Fraternities don't belong at Williams because the residential house system works very well. Social clubs are different because they don't have rules, and the organization brings together a group who otherwise wouldn't be together. It's a service for the campus."

Mike Duncan '86 "I think they're a good idea if taken on a very esoteric plane to enhance the social life, or lack thereof, at this school."

John Conyers '84 "Fraternities are big fun. The social clubs here are trying. It's a start at livening this place up."

Peter Minnum '85 "At times when it's boring on campus I decide that it would be good to have fraternities. But when I hear about the ridiculous things that go on at fraternities, then I'm glad our system is based on houses."

Sara Gross '85 "I think social clubs are great as long as they pull the social life together, they're a legitimate group, and they reach out to the campus to get people involved."

Dominic Kulik '86 "I don't miss fraternities. I'm a swimmer and so I'm part of the best social club on campus."

Julie Welborn '87 "I'm not really for the Bacchus Club because I heard they only invite you if you're pretty. I think social clubs should have parties if they don't have strict criteria."

Trio performance sparks new album

The Musical Heritage Society recently released a new recording from the Williams Trio, three Williams professors who double as musicians and conductors. Founded in 1970, the Trio includes Julius Hegyl playing violin, Douglas Moore playing cello, and Paula Ennis-Dwyer playing piano.

The new recording, called "An American Treasure," features the piano trios of Arthur Foote, who composed in the late nineteenth century. The two trios, which were published 25 years apart, are described by Moore as "very romantic."

"The flavor is rich and lush," explained Moore. "It's quite beautiful and audience oriented."

The Trio recorded the album in November of 1982, following a summer performance of Foote's Second Trio at the American Music Festival of the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. This performance drew strong reviews, praising the originality of the sound. According to Moore, the novelty of Foote's Trios helped inspire the recording session.

"We wanted to do it for a very simple reason: it hadn't been done before," Moore related.

Each member of the Trio, which will perform at Williams on March 9, also enjoys acclaimed individual success. Hegyl is conductor of the Berkshire Symphony and the Albany Symphony Orchestra, and a frequent guest conductor. Moore, who has played with the Berkshire and Albany Symphonies, and at several music festivals, gave the first modern performance of Foote's "Cello Concerto" last fall. Ennis-Dwyer has played in Carnegie Hall, and has traveled as a soloist and recitalist in America and Europe. With Moore, Ennis-Dwyer has already had published two recordings.

The Musical Heritage Society publishes selected works of nationally and internationally known artists. The Trio's new recording, which is directed toward "a select audience including researchers and music libraries," will sell for $7.75. Last Saturday, the Trio prepared an encore recording, featuring music of Rachmaninoff and Arensky, which will be released next fall.

Fraternities

ing that they have been ignored. Mary Dagostino '83 said, "we haven't been listened to and dealt with as responsible adults."

"The way they handled it was wrong," said Ellen Manger '86. "The majority of the students didn't want this decision."

Fraternities have been a part of the Amherst scene for 160 years. This year membership includes 42% of the student body, both male and female.

"Sheer gross behavior"

Last fall the faculty voted 90-29 to urge the trustees to abolish frats because they had not improved since 1978, when a regional college accreditation committee found "sheer gross behavior" at several frats, according to the Globe.

The eight fraternities, which actually house 18% of the student body, have been held responsible for several pranks during the year. In one incident, former President Julian Gibbs disbanded Delta Upsilon Delta after finding a six foot phallic snow sculpture on the house's front lawn.

Gibbs disciplined several other fraternities for infractions such as leaving a naked pledge on his doorstep and ringing the doorbell. Mrs. Gibbs answered the door.

Saturday night students responded to the fraternity decision by burning effigies of the Dean of Students and Beltzel at Chi Psi House, according to McGowan. Reports of damage this weekend at several frat houses have not been confirmed.

Student Security

ful because monitors did not necessarily live in the dorms they patrolled and so did not have sufficient interest in their duties, she said.

"Attica State prison"

Recent damage to Mission Park prompted house presidents and Security to raise the issue of a patrol at a recent Housing Committee meeting.

"Two weeks ago after the rec room party it looked like Attica State prison after a riot," said Armstrong House president Dave Wehner '85.

Someone put his head through a window which Armstrong House will have to pay almost $600 to replace, Wehner noted.

"If we can pay a student $12 a night to stop that, it is definitely worth it," he added.

"It's a party center; everyone seems to end up here, and it seems like someone else's place so people don't take care of it," said Dennett House president Phil Lusardi '85.

"Nobody's property"

"They think it's nobody's property so it won't matter if they smash a $300 window, or a coke machine or a bicycle. Almost every week the telephone gets ripped off. It's a shame that you can't leave your bike down here," he said.

"Unfortunately, it appears at this time that it is (Williams students doing the damage)," Thorndike commented.

"People in my house felt they went to Ohio University instead of Williams," said Pratt House President Allison Martin '85. "It's disappointing that the vandalism has become so bad they had to resort to security," she added.

"I think someone in a security jacket walking up and down will be enough of a deterrent (to stop the vandalism)," Wehner said.

Arts in View

The Berkshire Symphony, conducted by Julius Hegyl, will play its third concert of the season on Friday, March 2, at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Harpist Ellen Rubin O'Hearn will give solos in J.C. Bach's Concerto for Harp and Orchestra and in Debussy's Two Dances for Harp and Orchestra. This piece will be played a second time as well, conducted by Douglas Moore and featuring the Williams English Handbell Choir as soloists. Other works on the program include pieces by Mendelssohn, Ernst Schelling, and Rimsky-Korsakov. Tickets for the performance are $3.50 for general admission, $1.75 for students, and free to Williams I.D. holders and children under twelve. Joseph Ceo, viola d'amore, and George Kent, harpsichord, will present an Evening of Baroque Music tonight at 8:00 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Ceo is a professor of music at the University of Rhode Island, as well as conductor of the URI Chamber and Symphony Orchestras. Kent is also a professor of music at URI, and conducts the University Chorus and Concert Choir. This evening's performance, entitled "The Six Lessons of Attilio Ariosti," is sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music. Admission is free. The Psalter, the folk duo of Lillanne Labbe and Don Hinkley, will perform Thursday, March 1, at 8:00 p.m. at the Clark Art Institute. Their repertoire consists of traditional French-Canadian songs, classical and jazz material, and original songs. Tickets are $3.00, $2.50 for members, and $1.00 for students. On Friday, March 2, at The Clark, there will be a reception for the opening of Alexander Gabriel Decamps' exhibition of paintings, drawings, and prints. The reception begins at 5:00 p.m. The Colorado College New Music Ensemble will present a concert of music for bowed piano and other works by Stephen Scott on Sunday, March 4, at 3:00 p.m. in Brooks Rogers. The program will feature ten musicians performing at a single grand piano. The concert is free and open to all. The Williams College Museum of Art will exhibit recent monochrome paintings by 11 European and American artists from March 4 to April 22. The exhibition is called "Radical Painting," and illustrates the artists' attempts to reduce painting to its most fundamental elements of color and shape.

Applications

using terms that used to seem dirty to us, like marketing and recruiting. Most of our energy had been going into selection. What's fascinating to me is how we (competitive colleges) have all responded in precisely the same way. Williams added a person, but so did Amherst and Wesleyan. We've done an excellent job in this respect, but so has everyone else."

Parker said that although the increase in applications was large, the quality of the applicant pool was not diluted. "Despite (last year's) drop in applications, averages of most standardized test scores actually went up last year, and this year the trend seems the same."

Stronger black pool

Although applications as a whole are up about ten percent, minority applications have increased only slightly from last year. Parker expects about 115 final applications from black students for the Class of '88, compared to 112 for the Class of '87. Both Parker and Assistant Director of Admissions Mike Reed '75 pointed out, however, that Williams will probably accept more black candidates this year than last.

"Academically, it's a much stronger group," said Reed. "I don't know what to attribute that to; marginal students seem to have eliminated themselves." Reed added that there were an unusual number of "academic superstars" in this year's group.

One minority group from whom the number of applications did rise strongly was Asian-Americans. Parker said that 179 applied this year compared with 120 last year, and added, "This is a very powerful academic group in a broad range of disciplines."

The increase in applications this year has been shared by most other competitive colleges, and has been the subject of articles in the New York Times, the Boston Globe, and the Berkshire Eagle.

Clouds fly smoothly on jazz/rock beat

by Gary I. Selinger

Clyde Criner and his band, Clouds '84, played nearly two hours of rock-tinged jazz to a crowd of 800 in Chapin Hall on Sunday night.

Criner, a 1975 Williams graduate, has returned to the school to teach courses on jazz history and improvisation during spring 1983 and January 1984. He moved back and forth between a myriad of keyboards, including electric and acoustic piano, ARP Omni and MiniMoog synthesizers, and his newest instrument, the Fairlight CMI digital synthesizer. The Fairlight is programmed much like a personal computer; Criner acknowledged the assistance of Clive Smith of Fairlight Instruments, who sat out of view, plunking away "on a mean typewriter."

Accompanying Criner were three musicians, young but already accomplished in the jazz world. Drummer Omar Hakim is currently with noted jazz-rock group Weather Report; rock aficionados may recognize him as one of the drummers on David Bowie's Let's Dance. Guitarist Kevin Eubanks has gained critical acclaim for his fluid playing, displaying technical mastery in both jazz and rock styles. Bassist Rael Wesley Grant has played with such established jazz trendsetters as Lenny White and Pharoah Sanders.

The most satisfying moments in the show came with a Criner composition, "Pelican," in which the band moved gracefully through complex tempo and time signature changes; drummer Hakim's "Good Question," which allowed both Hakim and Criner to flex their solo muscles; and a Wesley-Eubanks duet, "Sundance," in which Wesley's thumb-plucking bass brought the crowd to its feet.

After finishing the set, Criner returned to the stage to play solo piano. Almost out of nowhere, the Fairlight joined in. After Criner finished, the synthesizer played on, even after its programmer also left the stage. It was an impressive advertisement for the $27,000 keyboard, but an even more impressive display of contemporary jazz-rock.

Takacs

International quartet delights crowd

by Karen Philipps

Rumor must have gotten around last Thursday that the Takacs Quartet was worth hearing because at 8:00 all the seats were filled in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. The quartet's perfect performance proved that rumors can be true.

The program began with the Haydn Quartet in F Major, Opus 77, No. 2. The quartet enhanced the sweetness and cheerfulness of the piece with its delicate technique. The soothing, lullaby-like second movement, Menuet: Presto, was performed with a tender touch.

The second piece was the Quartet No. 2 by Bartok. The undulations in sound from heavy and oppressive to light and peaceful evoked corresponding changes in the listeners' emotions; Bartok's music inspired the audience to look inward.

The quartet's precise playing effectively delineated the mood distinctions which otherwise could have been lost in Bartok's unpredictable flow of music. In constant contact with each other, the members of the quartet even swayed their bodies in unison as they played.

Following the intermission the concert resumed with Webern's Six Bagatelles, Opus 9. Typical of Webern's miniature works, this piece lasted no more than a minute. The introspective mood of the piece was similar to that of the Bartok Quartet, and in a sense both summed up and reinstated the pre-intermission feelings of the audience.

The quartet's next piece, Beethoven's Quartet in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2 combined the beautiful melodies of the Haydn piece and the emotions of the works by Bartok and Webern. The group played this rich, powerful music with entrancing expression.

The quartet finished with an encore, Schubert's D minor Minuet, a charming piece which was a delightful end to an enjoyable evening.

the Dartmouth women's group. Dressed in black and white, the women looked very elegant but unfortunately, lacked the spirit of others. Though technically they were on key and excellent, as stage personalities they seemed somewhat flat.

After the Woodwind, the Ephlats reappeared. Opening with Billy Joel's "The Longest Time," they thrilled the enthusiastic audience. Kendall James long solos, sung in his richly expressive voice, showed off both the singer and the song.

The Ephlats continued to shine with charming stageplay and acting. Quickly changing their costumes to reappear dressed as members of the infamous Williams band, they played "The Mountains" on and slide trombones. Only their encore, however, an exciting rendition of "Ease on Down the Road" from The Wiz had real spirit and vitality.

exuberant kazoo. Encouraging the audience to sing along, the singers then moved into a stirring patriotic vocal rendition.

Charmingly staged versions of "Love Potion Number Nine," an old Williams favorite given new moves, and "They Can't Take That Away from Me" showed the Ephlats to be comfortable using their bodies as well as their voices to express the music. The finale, "Is That the Way You Look?" used yet another original device, with lead singer Brook Larmer '84 having his phone number, description, and availability advertised on large placards by other members of the group.

Jeffs saw in different light their 74-72 defeat in hoop

by John Clayton

As the basketball team travels to Amherst Saturday to conclude its season, it is evident that the Lord Jeffs deserve to take another beating. The Amherst Student printed in their February 13 edition this account of the Ephmen's 74-72 win two weeks ago:

"If a tie is like kissing your sister, then losing by two points to Williams is like kissing a cow....It's nasty. After a seemingly endless barrage of psychological torment, and catcalling morons in a hot foreign gym, the A-team faced a 'do-or-die' situation in the final twenty seconds, and literally came within inches of 'doing'."

"The 74-72 loss was the biggest upset of the year for the Jeffs. Trailing by nine at the half, the Jeffs operated like a team possessed for the remainder of the game. As the unruly crowd chanted 'Bobby', 'Fat Bill' (and other unprintables not included in the Amherst lexicon) Bob Weston and Billy O'Malley provided sparks for the Amherst offense with sweet passes inside to Jim Cook and Harlan Coben. Cook had his best free-throwing game of the year, quieting the belligerent masses on several key occasions."

The article, entitled "Ephs squeak over Jeffs" and squeezed in next to a large "Women Hoopsters Down Williams", concluded:

"The last second jumper by Flaherty that went astray will remain in Amherst fan memory for years, but more importantly, for three weeks, until the cows bring their motley crew of hoopsters up to the fairest college where the gentlemen jocks will prove once and for all that U.S. News wasn't just speaking of academics."

The body of the article insinuated that Amherst won the game, belittling Williams' nine-point halftime lead and ignoring the fact that the Jeffs failed to score a point in the last 2:53 of the game.

Zaff, 21-1 this year, has played number one all four of his year's at Williams and amassed a record of 61-16 against the top players of other schools. Discounting his freshman year when he struggled somewhat, Zaff has paced the squad with a combined record of 51-7. He will go to the national championship tournament next as the second seed behind Harvard's Kenton Jernigan. The two have played often, and Zaff won earlier in the year in the finals of the Exeter Open. However, Jernigan won most recently as he was responsible for Zaff's sole loss this year.

Co-captain Tom Harrity has played number two for the last three years and chalked up a 62-15 career record. His 21-1 performance this year assures him All-American status for the second year in a row. Sloane anticipates a strong performance next week by Harrity in the tournament that will determine the national champion.

Though Bill Nau did not play on the varsity in his freshman year, his career winning percentage of 85% is the highest of all the seniors. His 18-3 showing this season boosted his record of three seasons to 52-9. Co-captain Jamie King won eighteen of twenty matches in 1983-84 playing number four and graduates 60-16 for his four years.

Joggers get set for 24-hour run hope to raise money for charity

by Peter Farwell and Chris Stearns

For the 13th consecutive year the Williams College community will put its best foot forward with its collective effort to run miles and raise contributions for the College Chest Fund.

Faculty and staff, family members, and students band together to sweat out the miles in Towne Field House, and dig deep to pledge to support local charities in an effort to aid the community.

The benefited organizations include the Mt. Greylock A.B.C. (A Better Chance), Help Line, Hospice of Northern Berkshire, Williamstown Youth Center, Recording for the Blind, Williamstown Day Care Center, and this year a special push will be made to afford a substantial contribution to the Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund.

Butler '86 is paralyzed as the result of a skiing accident in January, and the College hopes to raise enough to purchase Butler a first-class wheelchair.

Seeking universal participation

This year campus dorm solicitation will be done by the Williams track team, with the goal of attaining universal participation for this cause. Anyone who is not offered the chance to contribute can do so by calling the Athletic Office to pledge, or by sending a check made out to the Williams College Chest Fund to 24-Hour Relay at Lasell Gym.

The running itself will be done by 100 or so regular "all-nighters" along with some 200 friends who "guest-mile" by showing up to run one to three (or more) miles for teams in need. A few official teams will run with only 10 runners all 24 hours, while other campus teams are allowed an unlimited number.

250 miles per team

Most teams will register 200 to 250 miles on the nine-laps-per-mile Rekortan track. All in all, the 12 to 15 teams combined would cross the United States in 24 hours.

Teams are being formed and getting in shape now-check your dorm or club and join in. Traditional teams entered include the Williams Roadrunners (who founded the relay in 1972 and sponsor the event along with the Athletic Department); the faculty Striders of the Purple Valley; biology department Retreads; dorm teams of Dodd, Mission, Greylock, and row-houses among others; as well as the Black Student Union; Williams Christian Fellowship; Rugby Club; and The Back of the Pack.

Outside club teams will come from Quincy, Worcester, Adams (Western Mass. Track Club), Pittsfield (New England Pioneers), and Weymouth, home of the two-time defending champion South Shore Striders.

The relay begins at 10:00 a.m. on Saturday, March 10 in Towne Fieldhouse.

Housing

lying with a group; it's more risky to transfer," said Art. "We hope that this will stabilize the transfer process somewhat."

Suzanne Biemiller '87, freshman representative to the CUL, said that she is in favor of the proposal and is going to be part of a large group applying to Mission. "There are at least five groups which I know of that are definite and many others which will probably go down there."

"Mission needs something to draw people down there," Biemiller added. "It's not very nice to look at, but if you are with people who you want to be with, it's very attractive."

CDE to be included

The establishment of student liaisons to keep Center for Development Economics students informed of social happenings on campus was also discussed at Tuesday's meeting. A proposal for closer relations with CDE, submitted by Phil Walsh '85 and Jon Tigar '84, was passed unanimously by the Housing Committee several weeks ago and was praised by CUL members.

The Committee will vote on the proposal at its next meeting. "The general sense is that it is a great idea and overdue," Art said.

Walsh said that because the CUL allowed the proposal to pass without a vote, it has already begun to be implemented. He said he feels that the CUL vote is a formality, and that the proposal will pass readily at the next meeting.

CUL member and economics professor Kathleen McNally praised the proposal and its designers. "Last year, some of the (CDE) students said that they wished they had more contact with the college community," she said.

Women hoopsters fall to 6-11

by Mike Best

In a lackluster performance Saturday, the women's basketball team lost to a superior Tufts squad, 70-51.

In the first half, the Ephwomen played uninspired basketball, and were unable to generate much offense. There was not much scoring early, as both teams started slowly, but with 12:20 left in the first half the Jumbos had opened up a three-point lead.

From that point on, Tufts took control of the game. With 8:15 left their lead was up to nine, and with a minute left, it was eleven.

Tufts up 12

While the Jumbo offense was in high gear, the Ephs could muster very little on scoring. Williams was plagued by turnovers and missed shots. The Jumbos closed the half up 33-21.

The second half was the same story as Tufts ran away from the Ephwomen. Williams could do little right on offense despite fine efforts from Liz Kellison '87, who ended up with 19 points and Jean Hakmiller '86 who had 13.

Tufts, meanwhile, was playing well on both ends of the court. The Jumbos played stifling defense and used the resulting steals to spearhead their running game. While overall rebounding was about even, Tufts came up with many key boards. Taking advantage of their numerous opportunities to score, the Jumbos kept increasing their lead until they had built up their final, 19-point margin.

56-30 over Panthers

Thursday, the Ephs destroyed Middlebury, 56-30 by playing a good all-around game, shooting 41 percent from the field and 66 percent from the foul line.

Balanced scoring was the key as the Ephwomen ran away from the Panthers. Kay Lackey '85 and Liz Kellison both contributed 10 points. Denise Saunders '87 added nine, and Jean Hakmiller put in eight. The rebounding was equally balanced with Hakmiller and Tracy Burrows '84 each grabbing eight.

Smith handed the Ephs a loss Tuesday 58-42. Williams shot 40 percent from the floor but just 33 percent from the line. The Ephs were led by Kellison with 12 points and Lynne Jaycocks '85 with eight.

The team, now 6-11, will finish its season Saturday, at home against Amherst.

High-scorer Liz Kellison '87 banks in two of her 19 points against Tufts. (Finnermore)

Lyons wins giant slalom as skiers take fifth at Pico

by Greg Leeds

The men's ski team finished the Winter Carnival season with a fifth-place overall finish at Middlebury's carnival held at Pico, Vermont. University of Vermont claimed its usual first place status with 383 points. Second was Dartmouth with 377, while Middlebury was helped to third with a strong cross country performance. Williams had 315 points, just 8 short of fourth-place University of New Hampshire.

The weekend started out strong with a second-place in the giant slalom. Co-captain Crawford Lyons '84 won his last carnival GS race, with only .01 seconds separating each of the top three finishers. John Pler '85 was sixth, and Tim Hill '86 placed 22nd. Dartmouth won the GS, while Middlebury was third and UVM was fourth.

The Ephmen did not fare as well in the slalom the next day. Hill was the top Williams finisher at 12th, followed by Helge Weiner '87 at 14th and Chris Eagon '84 at 15th. Lyons had the fastest second run but fell in his first run giving him 17th combined. Williams ended up fourth in the slalom. Dartmouth was first, UVM second, and St. Lawrence third.

Sixth in cross-country

In the cross country events, the team was very consistent. Colman O'Connor '85 placed sixth in the 15-km, while Tim Goss '85 had his best race of the season placing 17th. Steve Johansen '84 was 24th. UNH won the race, followed by Middlebury, UVM, Dartmouth, St. Lawrence, and Williams.

Goss, Johansen, and O'Connor brought the relay team to sixth place, another event UVM won.

In the alpine awards, Lyons was named to the EISA All-East first team, and Pler was named to the second team. O'Connor made the first team for nordic.

Several skiers have qualified for the Nationals this year. Lyons is tied for first as the first seed in the slalom, while Pler made the second seed and Hill made the third. Eagon and Weiner each qualified for the fourth seed, but only one will attend the Nationals at Attitash in two weeks. In GS, Lyons, Pler, Eagon, and Weiner were first, second, third, and fourth seeds respectively. O'Connor made the nordic first seed.

Women place sixth

The women's team placed sixth overall, combining finishes of 5th in both alpine events and seventh in both nordic events. Dartmouth won the four-event combination; on its heels were UVM, Middlebury, UNH, St. Lawrence, then Williams.

In the GS, Donna MacDonald '87 placed eighth, while teammates Kate Knopp '85 and Betsy Paine '85 were 14th and 24th respectively.

MacDonald was fourth in the slalom, and Knopp was 13th. Marcy Rubinger '85 finished 19th. The slalom competition was very close, with only three points difference among the top four teams.

Sarah Bates '85 was eighth in the nordic race, while the relay team of Bates, Karia Miller '85, and Beth Schmidt '86 finished seventh.

points, and Meadows added 18 in a strong performance that included a thundering slam-dunk which brought the crowd to its feet and ignited an Eph first-half surge.

Five point play

A crucial point in the game was with 11:35 left in the game, and the Ephs trailing 54-53. Meadows was fouled, and a Clark player was called for a technical foul. Meadows hit his free throws, Walsh swished the technical, and on the ensuing inbound pass was fouled again. Walsh then converted two more free throws to conclude a five point play, and give the Ephs a 58-54 lead, a lead that they were never to relinquish.

Down the stretch, the Ephs converted on their free throws when Clark was forced to foul. Meadows, Walsh, and Howard were the mainstays from the charity stripe for the Ephs.

The three victories left Sheehy extremely pleased. "We've really improved as a team; the team has really jelled lately. We've become comfortable with the roles we have to play to win," Sheehy said.

Little Three Champs

Wesleyan beat Amherst Saturday night to give Williams sole possession of the Little Three crown. Both Amherst and Wesleyan now have two losses, while Williams is 3-0 going into Saturday's game with Amherst.

Sheehy also noted that his team had an outside shot at a berth in the ECAC playoffs. "There are four to six teams which are clearly ahead of us, and then a whole clump of teams fighting for the seventh and eighth seeds. We've beaten some good teams, so we have a good shot at it. We should find out early this week."

The Ephs, now 12-9, conclude their season on the road, traveling to New England College tonight, and to Amherst on Saturday.

Hoop wins three more keeps playoff hope alive

The men's basketball team furthered their hopes of an ECAC playoff berth with impressive victories over Tufts, Clark, and Skidmore this week to raise their record to 12-9. The two games were the final appearances for seven of the members of Coach Harry Sheehy's squad.

Playing some of its finest basketball of the year, the team trounced Tufts 78-64 on Saturday. The Ephs jumped to a 42-32 halftime lead behind the strength of what Sheehy termed "great team offense." Leading the first half attack were guards Art Pidorlano '84 and Tim Walsh '86 and forward Brandt Johnson '87.

In the second half, the Ephs extended their lead by continually breaking the Tufts pressure defense for easy shots. Walsh was especially adept at either scoring, or dishing off to his teammates under the basket.

Sheehy commended the play of senior reserves John McCarthy, Russ Howard, and Jeff Goodell for their efforts in the first half. "When our bench was in there in the first half," he said, "we extended our lead."

Pidorlano led the Eph attack with 22 points, while Walsh added 20. Johnson joined the high scoring duo in double figures with 10 points.

Smash Skidmore

On Wednesday, Williams beat Skidmore 68-59 in a make-up game of the January 10 snow out.

Five players—Pidorlano, Walsh, Howard, center Dave Krupski '84, and forward Mike Meadows '86—scored 12 points apiece to lead Williams, as most Ephs saw playing time.

Sheehy had special praise for Krupski, who scored all 12 of his points in the first half.

Skidmore, however, was not an opponent of the quality of others this week, as just two years ago they failed to beat the Williams JV.

Crush Clark

On Tuesday, the Ephs defeated Clark University 87-81. Clark came into the game with a 16-5 record and ranked third in New England Division III polls.

But they could not stop Pidorlano, who tallied 28 points and broke Sheehy's all-time Williams scoring record. Pidorlano needed 21 points to break the record of 1391 points, and after scoring 18 in the first half, he broke the record with a free throw with 15:06 left in the game.

Pidorlano led the way with his 28 points, and the team's cause was aided by brilliant play from Walsh and Meadows. Walsh netted 21

Pidorlano breaks old scoring standard

by John Clayton

Senior guard Art Pidorlano broke the all-time Williams basketball career scoring record Tuesday night, surpassing the mark of his coach, Harry Sheehy '75.

Going into Tuesday's home game against Clark, Pidorlano needed 20 points to tie Sheehy's record of 1,391. He came through with 28 in an impressive effort, and the team beat highly-rated Clark 87-81.

After scoring 18 points in the first half, Pidorlano tied the record with 19:10 left in the second half when he hit a top-of-the-key jumper. With 15:06 left, he hit a free throw to break the mark.

Chandler awards game ball

The game was stopped briefly while President John W. Chandler presented Pidorlano with the game ball. After the game, Chandler said, "I was delighted with Artie's play. I was impressed with his selfishness, the way he passed up opportunities to score to pass to his teammates."

Sheehy said, "I'm very excited for Artie. The recognition is something he deserved more here"

Felt little pressure pressure on him to break the record during the season. "I knew that if I didn't get hurt, I could do it," he said. "I only had to average 17 or 18 points per game. I didn't even think about it much until last week." Last week's thoughts, he said, were simply how far away it was and in which game he would break it.

Pidorlano agreed with Sheehy that he doesn't have magnificent range. "I'm not a great outside shooter," he said. "My strengths are more in driving to the basket, and shooting off the dribble."

Curt Tong, who coached Pidorlano in his freshman and junior years, said, "I'm extremely pleased for Artie, and also for Harry—because the record's going to be broken some time, and it's great to have your own player do it."

The scoring record will stand with an asterisk, as Sheehy compiled his record in only three years. Freshmen were not eligible for varsity until 1976.

Pidorlano, from Staten Island, is applying to medical schools, but said, "I hope to defer for a year to play somewhere in Europe."

Icewomen win 6-4 but lose to UConn

by Tom Dumphy

The women's hockey club split a pair of games this past week, beating Skidmore 6-4 and dropping a thriller to UConn 3-2. The club's record now stands at seven wins and four losses with one game remaining in the season.

Beth Ebel '86 and Pam Briggs '84 led Williams past Skidmore by scoring the team's final five goals, after Tedie Jones '86 opened the scoring. Jones put Williams ahead 1-0 by putting in a shot from ten feet out. She was set up by Briggs and Leslie Fernandes '87. Skidmore scored twice in the final four minutes to take a 2-1 lead into the locker room.

Ebel gets hat trick

Ebel tied the game up 2-2 by jamming in a pass from Laura Ryan '85. Jeanette Hazelton '85 also assisted. The Ephs then scored twice within 35 seconds, taking a 4-2 advantage. Briggs scored her first goal on a break away set up by Fernandes at 13:30. Then, at 12:55 Ebel scored her second goal of the period. She followed Ryan breaking into the Skidmore zone. Ryan's shot was stopped, but Ebel flipped in the rebound.

Skidmore scored twice to tie the game 4-4 due to Williams' sloppy play. The first goal was while Skidmore was short-handed and the second on a break away. The Ephs took back the momentum by scoring with one second left in the second period. Ebel got the hat trick by sliding the puck past the goalie after taking a centering pass from left winger Ryan.

Briggs netted the only goal of the final period. She scored from the left side of the crease by knocking in a crossing pass from Fernandes who got the puck from Jones.

Huskies sneak past Ephs

The Ephs did not fare as well against the UConn Huskies despite playing their best game of the year. UConn won the 3-2 matchup on a goal with only 19 seconds remaining in the game. Ebel played another fine game, scoring both goals to add to her team leading total.

Ebel scored in the first period on a break-away to put the Ephs up early. After two Husky goals in

Despite season-ending streak, hockey falls short of playoffs

by Chris Harned and Paul Meeks

The men's hockey team fell to Babson, 6-3 in Wellesley Tuesday night but rallied for a 7-6 victory to close their season at Westfield State on Saturday. Despite winning four of the last five games and ending the season with a 8-8-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Division II record, the Ephs were overlooked for post-season competition for the second consecutive year.

Against Westfield, Williams rallied with four unanswered third period goals to erase a 5-3 Westfield lead in a win for pride, not prize. The team had already mysteriously been eliminated from the play-offs on Wednesday. Athletic Director Robert Peck was notified that day by phone that Williams had been rejected by the selection committee. The decision, however, should have been made Sunday after all the teams in consideration had closed their seasons. Colby, UMass-Boston, and Merrimack qualified for the play-offs with worse records than Williams.

Freshmen lead way

Against Westfield, the freshman connection of forwards Denny Wright, Chris Traggio, and Mike O'Connell paced the Ephs with four goals combined. Wright scored twice unassisted, at 1:55 in the first period to give Williams a 1-0 lead and at 2:02 in the third period. Traggio and O'Connell tallied their scores mid-way through the third period. With juniors Rich Jackson and Brian Rutledge, the Ephs top two scorers, out with injuries, the Williams youth filled the vacuum.

David Fritz '86 continued his scoring streak with assists on the Traggio and O'Connell goals and scored himself at 12:57 in the second. Fritz played both forward and defense in this game due to a decimated Williams defensive unit.

Hard-working Dan Finneran '84 ended his college hockey career with the game-winner with 2:10 remaining. Wright carried the puck into the Westfield defensive zone along the left boards, drawing the defense toward him, and passed cross-ice to Finneran, who had just come onto the ice on a line change. Finneran unleashed a blazing wrist-shot from inside the right face-off circle that crashed into the left post and rebounded into the Westfield goal to give the Ephs a 7-5 lead. A Westfield power-play goal with six seconds remaining closed the scoring at 7-6.

Fall to Babson

On Tuesday, The Ephs saw their three-game win streak fall at the hands of Babson, the top-ranked team in ECAC Division II East (17-3-1). The Beavers jumped to a 4-0 lead after two periods before Wright slapped home his own rebound after taking a pass from Dan Finneran.

The Ephs controlled the flow in the third period, but Babson

Squash, 20-2, takes Little 3

by John Schafer

By routing the Wesleyan Cardinals 9-0 Saturday, the men's squash team captured its tenth straight Little Three title and ended its regular season 20-2.

The win over Wesleyan, coupled with Tuesday's 9-0 thrashing of Amherst, makes the Ephs the Little Three champions, a position they have held since 1975.

Shutting out the Cardinals, the Ephs ended one of their most successful seasons in the College's history. Their record of 20-2 makes them strong contenders for third in the country when the national rankings come out next week.

"There's no way we'll be lower than third," said Coach Sean Sloane, indicating that Trinity could possibly tie the Ephs in the year-end polls. The Bantams have accounted for one of Williams' losses, but in scores against common opponents, the Ephs have outpointed Trinity and also have one less loss.

Record number wins

The twenty wins on the year is a school record, and the finish in the top three will be highest ranking since the teams of the late 1950's. For more than half the season, the Ephs were holding collegiate squash's longest winning streak which started with the last three matches of the 1982-83 campaign and totaled to twenty games before the 7-2 loss to top-ranked Harvard earlier this month.

This season was not without individual accomplishments either. Junior Ben Thompson became only the second player in Williams history to go undefeated throughout a full year. He went 20-0 playing number five and sometimes six on the ladder.

The Wesleyan match was the last regular-season contest for the four seniors who were the backbone of the team as they occupied the top four spots on the ladder. Two-time All-American Greg Zaff, All-American Thomas Harlity, number three Billy Nau, and co-captain Jamie King have led this squad for four years and graduated with a amazing 235-56 combined record.

McGovern betting all on March 13 primary

by Sarah Abernathy

Former South Dakota Senator George McGovern, one of the five democratic presidential candidates, opened his Massachusetts campaign before a capacity crowd in Chapin Hall last Thursday by outlining his political platform and goals for the future.

He also said that he will withdraw from the race unless he comes in first or second in the Massachusetts primary on March 13.

"I know deep in my soul that if I can't carry Massachusetts there's no point in going on," he said. "This is the make-or-break state for George McGovern." When McGovern ran unsuccessfully for President in 1972 against Richard Nixon, Massachusetts was the only state he carried.

"I came into the race (this year) because there were issues not being discussed that I thought were important to the nation's future, and I wanted to raise those issues, and I have," he said.

In his speech "Educating America," McGovern outlined five of the ten major points of his platform, all of which he pledged to carry out if elected.

Pull out of C. A.

On Central America, McGovern stated "I would terminate, right now, all U.S. military operations in Central America."

"We ought to use what influence we have through diplomacy, through trade, through carefully selected economic and medical assistance to try to pull these revolutionary groups (in Central America) in as moderate a direction as possible," he said, adding that we should not control the people's lives.

McGovern also noted that he had recommended the pullout of U.S. Marines from Lebanon before anyone was killed there.

The U.S. should have recognized that it was a mistake to put forces from a superpower into the Middle East, he said in response to a question from the audience. Once the U.S. troops are withdrawn, he would recommend a continuation of the United Nations peacekeeping idea, but with forces from more neutral countries, such as Sweden or Italy.

McGovern added that U.S. shelling of Muslim and Druse positions in Beirut serves no American interest, and should be stopped.

"Nuclear freeze right now" "The third step is a nuclear freeze right now," McGovern stated.

"No matter what the Russians do in the next two to four years, we have enough nuclear power in the arsenal right now...to kill every living thing in the Soviet Union with ten percent of our present force, and they can do the same thing with us," he said. "What possible security gain does either side get in piling up another thousand of these weapons?"

McGovern, the only candidate proposing a cut in military spending, said $60-75 billion could be cut from the military budget by enacting a weapons production freeze and eliminating the waste in the present budget.

"Call up Lee Iacocca"

"If I were president of the United States, the first thing I would do is call up Lee Iacocca, and I would name him Secretary of Defense, and I would ask him to go to the Pentagon and do for them what he's done for Chrysler Motors," he said.

"I think we ought to relieve the poor people at the Pentagon of the burden of having to spend $1 billion a day," he quipped. "Nobody should have to work

Cypriot, McKeen and Humes pegged in CC run-off elections, Walsh, Rothstein out

by Joe Ehlers

As a result of last week's elections, juniors Andrew Cypriot, Shannon McKeen, and Hamilton Humes will face each other this week in a run-off election for the College Council Presidency. More than 1100 students voted in the elections, the largest turnout in two years.

The constitutional changes proposed by the present College Council passed with 984 votes. "It's great!" commented current President Tom Paper '84. "All the reactions are positive. Everybody's happy!" In order for the changes to be ratified, at least 1000 votes were necessary, with a simple majority in favor of ratification.

Some of the most notable changes included in the new Constitution will be having future presidents and vice presidents elected on single tickets, removing most of the Council's non-voting members and abolishing many of its standing committees, including the Student Life Committee, the Faculty Meeting Committee and the Information Committee.

Frosh VP candidate was ineligible for CC

Recent College Council vice-presidential candidate Sridhar Ramaswamy '87 was ineligible for election according to the Council Constitution, which states that "the President and Vice-President shall be directly elected...from a field of the entire Junior and Sophomore Classes at the time of the election," the Record learned recently.

Nevertheless, Ramaswamy received 166, or 15 percent, the 1,080 votes cast in last week's election. His two opponents, Sara Gross '85 and Anza Mammen '86, who received 445 and 469 votes respectively, are now engaged in a run-off election.

Current Council president Tom Paper '84 and vice president Jan Van Eck '85 admitted that they were responsible for the oversight which allowed Ramaswamy to run. The two said that they were reminded of the constitutional provision last Sunday evening, after the ballots had already been printed with Ramaswamy's name.

Paper explained that at that point he and Van Eck did not want to delay the elections by a week in order to have the ballots reprinted. They also felt that it was unfair to disqualify Ramaswamy on such late notice after he had done so much campaign work, simply because of a mistake of their own, the two stated.

Paper also admitted that if Ramaswamy had won the vice-presidential election, he would have been allowed to hold office in violation of the Council Constitution. This kind of mistake is not unusual, he added, since in recent years several College Council treasurers have been elected who were not members of the Financial Committee, as the Constitution stipulates.

If Ramaswamy had not been allowed to run, either Mammen or Gross probably would have won the election outright, and the present run-off would not have been necessary, Paper said.

Ramaswamy said he had not discovered his ineligibility until after the elections had been held, when he was reading through a copy of the Council Constitution. Presidential candidate Shannon McKeen '85, his unofficial running mate, said he found out about the problem last weekend before the elections, but did not inform Ramaswamy.

"I didn't want to put him through the hassle. I felt it wasn't my place to say anything. I made the assumption that the people in charge knew about it," he said.

"They were the ones that planned the elections and made the decision and I figured if they let it ride, I'd let it ride," he added.

More than 1100 students voted in last week's College Council elections, the largest turnout in several years. Although the new constitutional changes were passed, run-off elections will be necessary to decisively elect a president and vice president. (Walker)

Cypriot, McKeen, and Humes received 325, 229, and 221 votes, respectively, defeating candidates Philip Walsh '85, with 165 votes, and Lance Rothstein '85, with 131 votes. Write-in candidate Ben Olshin '85 got 44 votes.

In addition, Anza Mammen '86 and Sara Gross '85 will contend for the post of Vice-President in this week's run-off elections. Mammen received 469 votes and Gross received 445, while Sridhar Ramaswamy '87 garnered 166 votes.

Wendy Webster '85 was elected secretary outright, defeating Amy Jeffress '87 by a vote of 528 to 397. Sam Broeksmit '85 was elected treasurer with 775 votes. He ran unopposed for the position.

All six at-large positions were decided last week, with Bill Leininger '86, Kelly Havig '85, Libby Hoffman '86, Dave O'Keefe '86, Lisa Payne '87 and Michael Stoddard '86 all elected to the Council.

Honor and Discipline

Two representatives from each class were elected to the Honor and Discipline Committee. Laura Volpe of the Class of '85 won outright, and a run-off between James Browner, Bill Foraker, and Mary Schwarzer will decide the other representative.

Richard Miller and Sara Suchman will represent the Class of '86, and Jim Reicheld and Chris Strear will represent the freshmen.

Winning positions on the Honorary Degree Committee were Mark Evans '85, Jan Pynchon '85 and Dave Shedd '85. Chris Strear '87 was elected to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility.

Housing Reps

Housing Representatives had greater opposition this year than last. David Applebaum '86 and Rich Miller '86 will face each other in a run-off election this week to determine who will represent the Row Houses.

Sam Fortenbaugh '86 will represent Greylock, with Jon Carpenter '85 representing Mission. Both ran unopposed.

Write-ins Christian Howlett '85 and Sam Chapman '86 won their races and will represent the Berkshire Quad and Dodd-Tyler, respectively.

The Williams Record Screw-up

In not realizing that Sridhar Ramaswamy, as a freshman, was ineligible for Vice-President under the current Constitution, the College Council Elections Committee made a large mistake. It is ironic that this oversight of the rules occurred in a year when a Council subcommittee focussed specifically on the Constitution in its revision efforts.

In speculating about the outcome of the Vice-Presidential race, and its implications on other races, the validity of the elections becomes questionable. However, the obvious solution—eliminating Ramaswamy from the Vice-Presidential race—would have yielded the current situation: a runoff between Anza Mammen '86 and Sara Gross '85.

Another bothersome aspect of the recent elections was the all-or-nothing fashion of voting for the constitutional changes. Although voters could write in their choices if they disagreed with particular amendments, this action required much extra time and research. Granted, there were many changes, but an itemization on the ballot of at least the major changes would have been a fairer representation of them.

Reaffirmation

To the editor:

The recent Supreme Court decision (Grove City College vs. Bell) has focused attention on Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, and by implication, on Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The ruling that the non-discrimination requirement of Title IX extends no further than the particular program or activity receiving Federal aid will be the subject of close reading, interpretation, and speculation.

Regardless of how the various Federal enforcement agencies eventually interpret the Supreme Court's decision, I would like to take this opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to equal opportunity of education and employment for women and minorities. Williams College will continue to provide equal opportunity and equal access to its programs and activities, and it regards its affirmative action program as a continuing commitment.

Scalped

To the editor:

Concerning Muhammad Kenyatta's press release of last week, a few comments:

1) No "carefully orchestrated smear campaign" to discredit Reverend Jackson exists—unless the reporting of Jackson's habitual rant against Jews and Jewish money counts as a smear. Jackson is perfectly capable of voicing his anti-Semitism with no prompting from the "pro-Israeli" lobby. Great minds think alike, Reverend Kenyatta?

2) Were another presidential candidate to make similar comments about blacks, he would be immediately enveloped by howls of execration, with Reverend Jackson and his epigone Reverend Kenyatta leading the wholly-justified call for the candidate's scalp. Would Jackson excuse such remarks if the candidate claimed that he failed to realize that blacks might take offense at his words? The propriety of racial slurs cannot depend on whose ox is being gored.

Awareness

To the editor:

I would like to thank the entire Williams community for its enthusiastic response to George McGovern's visit. As a graduate of Trinity College I realize how busy one's schedule can be during the day. All morning I was handing out copies of Senator McGovern's message. It didn't feel so cold outside because almost all were receptive to reading the message, even if they could not attend the speech.

Williams College can be proud of its tradition of political awareness and open debate of important issues. The questions that students asked after the speech were challenging—just as challenging as Senator McGovern's ten-point platform.

I know I speak for all the campaign's volunteers; thank you once again.

Hypocritical

To the editor:

Your paper should not openly decry the apparent favoritism and biases in Amherst's account of the recent Eph-Lord Jeff basketball game. The Record has been guilty of the same practices, although perhaps in a more subtle manner; many times we read of Williams being "topped 52-20", when if the scores were reversed you would have written "Williams annihilates Amherst, 52-20". You also often relegate accounts Williams defeats, however important the match, to inappropriately small spaces on the sports page.

Granted, Amherst's article was pretty amateurish, but your need to righteously cite such amateurism is unprofessional, if not hypocritical.

Cycles

To the editor:

In his article, "WAAC and Student Activism: Dormant or Dead?", Jeffrey Bralnard advises activists that "they will be most successful in gaining wide student faculty support if they focus on issues on which the College community as a whole can form a broad consensus."

Well, prior to the hunger strike, around 1250 signatures were collected on a petition calling for Williams to fully divest from corporations doing business South Africa. During the January action, over 500 names filled petitions supporting the hunger strike and WAAC's three demands. In the semester following the strike, nearly 1300 students and 130 members of the faculty expressed support for Williams providing "some sort of aid" to male students who have not registered for the draft and so would be denied federal funds due to the Solomon Amendment.

Such large proportions of the Williams community certainly qualify as a "broad consensus." Jeffrey Bralnard, rather than deriding such showings of unity, perhaps should focus his attention on those people in the Administration who tend to ignore such widely held opinions.

Further, when broad-based support exists for a particular issue, activism certainly is more easily pursued. But it is precisely those times when an issue is unknown, unpopular, or ignored that activism is most needed. Most, if not all, social change movements have started small, and then grew. If Jeffrey Bralnard's criteria were followed, for example, we might still be fighting in Vietnam. Student interest in political issues seems to go through cycles. As

My Generation Hart's appeal to young voter

by Victor Mather

The startling events in New Hampshire last week have finally defined the course of the 1984 Democratic primaries. There will not be a rapid coronation of Walter Mondale that nearly everyone expected. Instead this spring looks to bring a prolonged fight between two wings of the party. But unlike a traditional liberal/conservative or North/South political rivalry, 1984 has brought the advent of generational politics.

On one side is Mondale. In the general election, like Jimmy Carter in 1980, Mondale plans to once more revive the fading Democratic coalition of women, minorities, union members, Jews, suburban liberals, and the South. But the prospects seem dim, since except for minorities, every one of these groups abandoned Carter and gave a majority of its votes to Ronald Reagan. Despite the odds against Mondale, virtually every big name Senator, Governor and political group has endorsed him, many claiming that to beat Reagan the party must unite upon a candidate now.

It is Gary Hart who leads the other wing. He has few endorsements and almost no money, but he makes up for it with a dedicated core of volunteers. The big difference in the two factions constituency is simple: Mondale's is made up of established political regulars and older people, while Hart's supporters are largely under 40 years old.

Even before the New Hampshire upset, polls were registering this startling gap in Mondale's support. Among senior citizens Mondale held a big lead. But support and (more importantly) enthusiasm dropped sharply as one surveyed the opinions of voters further down the age column. Among the youngest group of voters, those between 18 and 24, his support was only one-third that of Hart. A generational gap as wide as this has never before been seen in Presidential politics. It is in fact substantially wider, in terms of percentage, than the much ballyhooed Democratic/Republican "gender gap".

The young see in Hart a man who doesn't fit into traditional political stereotypes. Reagan has stated a traditionally conservative opinion on the issue of defense spending: Increase funds. George McGovern responds in the time-honored manner of the far left by calling for a drastic cut. More "mainstream" democrats like Mondale and John Glenn stake compromise ground, cautiously advocating a defense spending policy not so cornucopian as Reagan's and yet not so drastically reductionary as McGovern's. But the differences are merely ones of degree and not kind. Only Hart calls for a complete rethinking of the issue.

Instead of making cuts merely for the sake of making cuts (which may perhaps benefit the economy but which could also needlessly jeopardize American security), Hart's plan would be to cut wasteful big-budget items such as the MX missile and the B-1 bomber, while emphasizing effectiveness and maneuverability in big-budget items such as the MX missile and the B-1 bomber, while emphasizing effectiveness and maneuverability in conventional weapons: smaller carriers and submarines and faster tanks. The net result would be a fighting force billions cheaper, yet more effective in actual combat. The war Reagan is preparing to fight is the last war. Hart knows that it is insane to continue to build up nuclear weaponry.

If the Democrats want to unite behind a candidate who can beat Reagan, it will have to be Hart.

Hart's economic ideas are equally appealing to younger voters. In his book, A New Democracy, Hart outlines tax reform plans eliminating many of the wasteful and unfair tax loopholes corporations use, thus increasing revenue without creating a harsher burden for most individual taxpayers.

Op-Ed

Are these folks dead or alive?

by John Clayton

Listening to John Lennon's new song the other day, I realized that the record publicists probably don't even know he's dead.

"Boy, that Yoko sure is a domineering wife," one publicist remarked. "You never see John around here any more—why, she even brought in the material for his latest album."

"I know what you mean," said his friend. "A couple of years ago it wasn't so bad, but now he never gets out of the house. His songs are getting wimpy, talking about Yoko and sitting around doing nothing, watching the world go by. He's so mellow, he might as well be dead."

"Wait a minute," interrupted a visitor to the office. "He's dead. He was assassinated over three years ago."

"Don't be silly," the P.R. men hooted. "Did you get fooled by one of those publicity gags?"

But then, entertainment by dead people seems to be a popular fad these days. The last "Pink Panther" movie was made after its stars—Peter Sellers and David Niven—were both dead. Michael Jackson's "Thriller" stars dancing corpses. Mr. Spock will star in "Star Trek III" even though we all saw him kick off in the last one.

The trend is interesting because it indicates that they could be pulling the wool over our eyes now. It doesn't take much. Look at Yuri Andropov. All that time when we thought he was bundled up somewhere within the bowels of the Kremlin trying to figure out how to make Chernenko's pants fall off in public, he was probably already being worked over by morticians. A dab of rouge here, some preserving fluid there. It just goes to show you (though I'm not sure exactly what).

Could the entertainment industry have taken a leaf from the KGB's book? For instance, I suspect Burt Reynolds has been dead for several years now. In his last few films we see a suspiciously pale and shadowy reflection of the macho Burt we cheered for in Smokey and the Bandit. I ask you, would the real Burt Reynolds wear what looks like a skinned muskrat on his head to hide his baldness? Would the real Burt Reynolds have gone bald? It stretches the bounds of reasonable belief.

Now that Hollywood has been taken over by these celebrity zombies, my dream is to make a new movie sequel to "Night of the Living Dead"—if only I can figure out who to star in it.

To the editor:

I must say that I was appalled to hear Mr. Moomaw's opinion that the Judeo-Christian tradition is responsible for slowing the progress of environmentalism. I feel that his opinion, as stated in the February 12 publication of the Record, could not have been well thought out—especially his view that "traditional Jews and Christians see no value

In the wilderness".

To prove my point, I shan't even have to consult a Bible to cite examples. Rather, I shall use oft-repeated and sermonized-on references from memory, to show Mr. Moomaw's misconception.

First, on many biblical occasions, religious historical figures such as Moses, John the Baptist, and many of the Monastics of the Middle Ages, retreated to the deserts and hills in prayer. Christ made many references to the beauty of nature, saying once that not even Solomon, in all his riches and splendour, was as well clothed as the grass and flowers of the field. Christ also said that the Father feeds and clothes the animals, and that not a single bird falls out of the sky without the Lord's consent.

Second, if Mr. Moomaw were to look at a song or two out of any traditional hymnal, he would come across titles such as "I to the Hills Lift Up Mine Eyes," and

Madness coming, CC affirms, SAB to gain more autonomy

by Becky Conklin

College Council and the Student Activities Board officially announced a confirmation date for the Madness concert at the College Council meeting on Friday. The Council also reconstructed SAB's basic structure and reviewed the JA Selection Committee, which will announce its decisions in the near future.

Madness will perform at Williams on April 19 in the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink. Their new album and new keyboard player-vocalist Paul Carrack, formerly of Squeeze, have been successful in recent weeks, so the Concert Committee hopes to see a big turn-out for the concert, according to SAB president Arunas Gudaitis '84.

The socio-cultural board of the SAB has been eliminated, and future requests for funds for all-campus activities will go through College Council. "In terms of all-college parties, I don't think there's a place for them anymore. There are more house parties now," said Gudaitis.

In addition, College Council decided to let the SAB elect its own officers, instead of relying on the appointments of the College Council elections committee.

•In other Council business, representatives approved a computer system to handle all future co-op housing decisions. Because of complaints about the political nature of the present system, next year's co-op decisions will be handled in the same manner as freshman inclusion.

•College Council president Tom Paper '84 initiated a discussion of the present Junior Advisor Selection Committee. Although the discussion did not lead to any reforms, representatives reviewed the successfulness of the Selection Committee in choosing effective JAs'.

•Council is gearing up for Eph's birthday on March 7. Celebrations will include a Birthday Dessert in Chapman Rink on Wednesday night and a Birthday Ball in Baxter Hall on Friday. Both activities will be free of charge to Williams students.

Comic books derived from old Italian art, Edgerton says

by Christian Howlett

The illustrations of modern adventure comic books are really a rediscovery of the perceptual techniques and pictorial conventions of Italian Renaissance art, professor Samuel Edgerton explained last Thursday as part of the faculty lecture series.

"I want to make an art historical case for super-hero comics," he explained. "The artistic style of these books, even when reduced to bad taste, follows nonetheless the great innovations of Italian Renaissance painting."

Showing side-by-side slides of comic books and Italian paintings, Edgerton explained that the three-dimensional perspective techniques which began during the Renaissance, such as birds-eye view and the "picture-as-window" concept, are being incorporated today into comic books for much the same effect as when they were used to depict the lives of saints.

"The psychological perception of young comics readers can be related to the similar visual experience of our adult medieval ancestors...when they first laid eyes on the new paintings of the Life of St. Francis in his pilgrimage church at Assisi," he said.

St. Francis as Superman

"Medieval people were here seeing 'realistic' pictures for the first time since classical antiquity, in contrast to the traditionally abstract style of Gothic painting."

"In fact, if I now compare those revolutionary frescoes...to our present subject, I am tempted to claim that Assisi represents the world's first adventure comic, and St. Francis the original Superman!" he added.

Another Renaissance perspective technique, "foreshortening," was invented by Florentine artist Giotto when he depicted angels as though seen from head-on flying out of the picture, Edgerton said.

Angels and Thor

"Such foreshortening was truly an astonishing achievement in the early fourteenth century," he noted. "Traditional art of the time always showed figures moving or flying only parallel with the background."

"Needless to repeat, neo-Renaissance comic book illustrators have rediscovered this same idea," he added. "Whenever Jack Kirby represents super-hero Thor driving his sledgehammer into the face of the reader/viewer, he pays homage to Giotto!"

that hard. McGovern added that his proposed 25 percent reduction in the military budget and a $75-80 billion increase in tax collection would be necessary to help solve the federal budget deficit.

"I would do it primarily by closing off a lot of the tax shelters and tax write offs at the top," he said.

Against Solomon Amendment
McGovern also said that he is opposed to the Solomon Amendment, which denies financial aid to students who have not registered for the draft.

"I am opposed to draft registration, I am opposed to the draft. I think that we can supply all of the military personnel we need under a voluntary system," he stated. "If we go to war, obviously that's different. We'd have to go to the draft, but even under those circumstances, I would not favor the Solomon Amendment," he added.

Upgrade education
To improve public education McGovern proposed federalizing welfare. This, he argued, would relieve the burden on the states, and enable them to spend their $19-20 billion savings on upgrading the quality of elementary and secondary education.

He also promised to have "a long-term, low-interest, government-backed student loan for any qualified student who wants to go on to higher education." He added that he would cure the student loan

Berkshire Symphony accompanies well

by Christian Howlett

Strange and beautiful sounds floated through Chapin Hall Friday night as harpist Ellen Rubin O'Hearn and the Williams Handbell Choir helped the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra present its third concert of the year. On the whole, it was a truly memorable performance.

The concert opened with an ambiguous performance of Mendelssohn's Fourth "Italian" Symphony, salvaged only by the orchestra's fine treatment of the second movement with its rich, haunting theme. Indeed there, their tonal quality reminded one of larger, more prestigious orchestras.

As usual, however, the faster movements presented much more trouble for Berkshire, which several times seemed about to lose control of the allegro vivace first movement, and was also unsuccessful in building tension in the final saltarello movement.

Flawless harp

The flute section performed

surprisingly well despite the absence of usually principal Tracey Tenser '85, led this time by the shining, crystal clear tone of Audrey Albem '84.

The gems of the evening were undoubtedly the performances of Ellen Rubin O'Hearn in J.C. Bach's Concerto for harp and orchestra and of O'Hearn and the Handbell Choir in Debussy's Danse Sacree—Danse Profane.

With a simple accompaniment from the strings, O'Hearn's gentle, dripping notes enthralled the audience, particularly in the andante movement where she smoothly plucked out trills with only an understated string pizzicato for background. With all the smooth sharpness of a harpsichord, her performance was simple and gentle in its virtuosity.

In the Debussy, O'Hearn's harp was nothing short of mesmerizing. Again she was accompanied only by the strings, who gracefully managed their lyrically haunting and atmospheric part for a truly ineffable effect.

Handbells smooth contrast

A delightful contrast to the smooth, rippling water sounds of O'Hearn's harp were the raindrop-notes of the Handbell Choir, which followed O'Hearn by playing her part in the exact same Debussy piece. Their unusual performance was bright and serenely beautiful.

A completely different experience was the 1923 piece by former New York Philharmonic conductor Ernest Schelling, entitled "A Victory Ball." A showpiece for the orchestra's fine percussion section, the piece alternately interposed slightly out-of-joint waltz passages with tense military crescendos.

The constant contrasts, from slow and sing-songy to brilliant and climactic, frustrated all expectations, while the skillfully handled cymbals and snare drum provided subtle transitions. The piece ended dramatically with a snare drum roll as a single muted trumpet played "Taps."

Good modern pieces

Conductor Hegyi is to be congratulated for his continuing selection of interesting and unusual twentieth-century pieces, such as "A Victory Ball" and last concert's "Flügelhorn-Millionen," which manage to widen musical horizons while still being thoroughly enjoyable.

The concert concluded after two and a half hours with Rimsky-Korsakov's popular Capriccio Espagnol. The lively, jubilant piece was played with authority, and show-cased a number of fine individual performers in cadenza passages. Particularly good showing were made by concertmaster Janet Rowe, clarinetist Susan Hohenburg, oboist Carl Jenkins and horn-player Linda Pushee.

Once again with this concert, the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, which sometimes struggles on its own, proved itself a first-rate accompanist to outstanding solo performers.

BSO backstage: Hegyi sharp in rehearsals

by Kathi Rosenbaum

"When the composer wrote the music down on paper he wanted it to be as perfect as possible. It's up to us to try to match that perfection."

This is the goal of Julius Hegyi, conductor of the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra; his drive towards perfection results in not only fine performances, but also highly demanding rehearsals.

"The music in general is extremely difficult and Hegyi asks a lot," says Laura Cook '87, a violinist. "He's really strict and gets annoyed very easily."

Hegyi will single out a member who has made a mistake, stopping the entire orchestra as he does so. According to senior Marc Mazzone, however, "His comments are never devastating—they're more directed toward getting people to produce."

Hegyi stresses that a criticism of an instrumentalist is not a personal attack; "the person doesn't even have a name in a sense," he explains.

Since there are only five 2-1/2 hour rehearsals for each concert the BSO performs, their pace is necessarily fast. The number of rehearsals is so limited, Hegyi notes, because of "economics." Although Williams students make up forty percent of the orchestra, many paid professionals hired from the Albany Symphony are also members.

"The professionals are very willing to help the students and are good teachers," says Suenn Ho '85, stage manager of the BSO and a violinist. "It's not a very competitive situation; for example, seating is arbitrary and better players don't necessarily sit at the front."

Hegyi sees to it, however, that a lack of competitiveness does not mean a lack of seriousness during rehearsals. "He knows what he wants," states Mazzone. "I really respect that kind of professionalism in a conductor."

Before he lifts his baton Hegyi must know in his mind how the piece should sound; nevertheless, "we can't always do justice to the way he wants the music to be played," says Carl Leafstedt '85, who plays the viola.

Hegyi appreciates, though, the members' effort to do their best. "I find it a great joy and pleasure to work with this orchestra; their spirit is so fine and they have a great willingness," he comments.

"When you talk with Hegyi one-to-one he's very charming and humorous," Ho notes, although as a conductor Hegyi can be difficult to deal with according to several members.

His temperament often sets the tone of rehearsals. "When he's in a bad mood rehearsals are frustrating," acknowledges Cook.

Many members agree that any conductor of a professional orchestra must be demanding, and Hegyi is no exception. As Mazzone points out, "Whatever Hegyi does, no matter what people may think of him, it works—he gets results."

College papers view Williams

by Martin Hildebrand

Williams has received a considerable amount of press since the days of "maid service" and the bulldozing of the Aycock sculpture. Newspapers at other colleges have recently given Williams some bizarre attention.

The problems with our phone system merited mention. The November 10, 1983, issue of the Sophian of Smith College reported that "Williams College students will receive touch-tone phones by January, according to the Williams Record." These expectations, however, did not become reality. The January 27, 1984, issue of the Swarthmore Phoenix reported that the new phone system at Williams had many problems and claimed, "Since the students will not be able to get touch-tone phones as originally anticipated, the main benefit seems to be to the Williams administration which receives with this new system a mechanism that allows it to restrict the use of phones by students who have not paid their bills."

Political activities here have drawn indirect and direct attention.

Our second place finish in the U.S. News and World Report survey on the top colleges in the U.S. received considerable attention in college newspapers. The January 27, 1984, issue of the Phoenix reports, "It might also be noted that in its article on the U.S. News and World Report survey, the Record lists itself as placing second to Amherst, not 'co-second' not 'tied for second' just 'second'. This little piece of artistic editing merely points up the quality of the competition in that never ending chase for the elusive number one."

The accidental bulldozing of a sculpture built by Alice Aycock prompted a remark in the January 27, 1984, issue of the Midbury Campus. Having looked at a January 10, 1984, Record

"God's Holy Mountain We Ascend", "Let all Things Now Living", etc. In the song "Joyful, Joyful, We Adore Thee", the second verse states that "All thy works of Joy surround Thee; Earth and Heaven reflect thy rays; Stars and Angels sing around Thee; Center of Unbroken Praise; Field and forest, vail and mountain; Blooming meadow, flashing sea; Chanting bird and flowing fountain; Call us to Rejoice in Thee!"

Songs such as these, and passages such as those stated in the above paragraph are a major part of the tradition, believe it or not.

To say that James Watt is "defending the traditional Judeo-Christian view of nature" is a very cutting remark to our faith. Speaking for myself, I'd have to say that "Them's fightin' words!" James Watt is an industrialist—a big-businessman. He'd blacktop the United States if he had a bulldozer big enough. But that's an industrialist view. Religion and state began to separate with the Reformation. Industry and state are, to this day, quite a unity.

In a lot of years' membership in the Roman Catholic Church, I have heard even the eighty year-old, and conservative-as-the-dickens priests preach to us the importance of going out into the woods, because "that," they say, "is God's land", and "that is where you will find Him."

Traditionally that is where Jews and Christians, such as Mme. Julie Billart, Christ, Joseph of the Twelve, Moses, Noah, John the Baptist, just to name a few off the top of my head, have gone—and a lot of us still find our Lord there. The idea that "traditional Jews and Christians see no value in the wilderness" is very distressing. It is just plain not true.

A day at the races

by Ned Ladd

"And here's Frosty!" Or is it Roxy? No one can really understand the announcer, but officials at Green Mountain Greyhound Racing are quick to point out that she (whoever she is) is the only female track announcer in the country. Either way, she's not Frosty or Roxy because she's sitting in a warm booth somewhere speaking gibberish into a microphone while Roxy gets frosty in the 20 degree weather outside on the track.

If this makes little sense to you, it's only because you haven't experienced pari-mutuel gambling Vermont style. Back home in Connecticut, I'm used to Jai-Alai where you sit in a warm auditorium watching people behind a wire screen throw small hard balls at each other using something that looks like a cross between Captain Hook's hook and a fruit basket. You get to bet on who you think can throw the little balls hard enough to scare the other seven men off the court.

In Vermont, they don't have enough people (there are more cows than people in the state), so they use dogs instead. (Cow races are pretty boring.) Since the dogs can't use the fruit basket very well, they just run around a track.

This is where Frosty or Roxy comes in. She's a piece of rug, tied to a metal pole, that's supposed to look like a rabbit. The rug is driven around the track and all the dogs run after it. You get to bet on who you think will make it around the track first.

This is actually easier than it seems, because in every race I saw, Frosty came in first. Unfortunately they don't let you bet on Frosty, so you really have to guess who's going to come in second. This is much harder than it seems.

No matter what kind of "system" you have, there is one essential ingredient to successful (or unsuccessful) betting—money. There are several ways to acquire this commodity. This reporter tried to get access to the Record's expense account. ("But John, I got a system—it can't lose.") The Record chose not to invest. I then tried friends. I then lost friends. Finally I had to resort to (horrors!) my own bank account.

If there are many ways to acquire money, there must be a million ways to lose it—win, place, show, quinela, trifecta... A particularly effective way I discovered is the trifecta box. It allows you to lose three times the money in half the time.

Most of your time at the track is spent studying a small pamphlet called a program. This program tells you which dogs are racing, their weights, and millions of other ridiculous things that are supposed to make it easier for you to bet. Your job is to pretend to pore over these charts while you're really looking around to see

Eph's birthday to feature eating, singing, dancing

by Carl Leafstedt

This week, the Williams community will be part of an all-out celebration of the birth of our founder, Ephraim Williams. Formerly feted only by a special Food Service dinner, this year Eph's birthday celebration has been expanded to include a panel discussion, a birthday party, and a birthday ball.

Ephraim Williams was born in Newton, Massachusetts, on March 7, 1714. His mother died when he was four; as a result, he and his younger brother, Thomas, were raised and educated by their grandfather. As a young man, Ephraim was a sailor, making several voyages to Europe, where he acquired a considerable stock of knowledge.

A contemporary described him as "...large and fleshy. He had a taste for books; and often lamented his want of a liberal education. His address was easy, and his manner pleasing and conciliating...was very generally esteemed, respected, and beloved..." Ephraim served in the military from 1740 to his death in 1755 in a battle of the French and Indian war near Crown Point, New York, eighty miles north of here.

To celebrate Eph's 269th birthday, the College Council has lined up a series of events from Monday through Friday. On Monday, there will be a panel discussion in Brooks-Rogers on: "Williams College: Is it better now than it was then?" featuring Williams grads from '35 to '80. On Wednesday, there will be a special dinner from Food Service and a big birthday bash down at the hockey rink featuring cake, Dean O'Connor, Sean Crotty '84, and other singing groups. The festivities will culminate with a student/faculty ball with the Jazz Ensemble on Friday night in Baxter.

AMHERST

About 70 students at Amherst participated in a food fight to protest the college's decision to ban fraternities. The foodfight was obviously planned; according to the USA Today, it began on cue with the playing of the Beatles' Revolution. Earlier last week, students hung effigies of administrators and trustees.

HARVARD

The Boston Globe reported that the co-editor of the Harvard International Review was recently ordered off campus after a session with Dean of Students Archie C. Epps 3rd. According to Epps, editor Joel Goodfader "committed a grievous act against the integrity of the university." Goodfader joined the magazine in 1982, and was elected co-editor last fall. The basis for the dismissal is that the deans recently discovered that he is not, as they had assumed, a Harvard student.

In other news, Harvard announced that King Juan Carlos I of Spain will speak at their 333rd commencement. In the Boston Globe, executive director of the Harvard Alumni Association David Aiolan said, "We are delighted to have a major European leader address us."

UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND

University President Philip Phibbs has challenged the freshman class at the University of Puget Sound to achieve a lower average weight than the faculty, according to the USA Today. Both sides have accepted and the weigh-off will occur in May at the end of the regular semester.

SMITH

The Smith Sophian published in February a list of "ins" and "outs" for Smithies in 1984. Topics that are "in" include Calvin Klein underwear, tan lines, William Hurt, and cottage cheese. Things considered "out" include Amherst Frat Parties, Dartmouth (in toto), Woody Allen, and yogurt. Although Williams was overlooked, Princeton, Yale, and the North Star are "in."

Arts in View

The Williams Trio will perform this Friday night in Brooks-Rogers at 8:00 p.m. Featuring Julius Hegyi on Violin, Douglas Moore on cello, and Paula Ennis-Dwyer on piano, the Trio will play Haydn's Trio in G Major, Ives' Trio, and Dvorak's Trio in F Minor. Folksinging groups Spatz Family and Taylor Pie will perform at a Coffee-house sponsored by A Better Chance next Sunday at the Log. A donation of $1.00 is requested and refreshments will be available. Williams-theater will present Aleksander Sukhovo-Kobylin's "The Death of Tarekin" March 8-10 at 8:00 p.m. in DownStage Theater. Tickets are $1.50, or 50¢ with a Williams ID, and are available at the box office one hour before each performance. "The Telephone," an opera by Gian-Carlo Menotti, will be performed by Williams students in Brooks Rogers on Thursday, March 8, at 8:00 p.m. Admission is free and open to all. The Graduate Program in Art History is sponsoring a talk by James F. Gorman tonight at 8:00 p.m. at the Clark Art Institute. This Saturday, March 10, Alfred Gallman, artistic director of the Newark Dance Theater and member of the national touring company of "The Wiz," will give a master class in jazz dance technique. The class begins at 10 a.m. in the wrestling room of Lasell gym. There will be a dance concert by the Newark Dance Theater on Saturday, March 10, at 8:00 p.m. in Lasell. Admission is 50¢. Ephoria and the Juggler's Vein will make special appearances at the fifteenth annual Children's Fair, held at the First Congregational Church this Saturday, March 10. The fair's theme is "Noah's Ark," with games, a visit from "Noah," and Disney movies highlighting the celebration, which runs from 10:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. For those not so interested in the games, there will be a boutique featuring guest artists' works.

what other people have decided.

The tricky part is to decide which people know what they're doing and which people are looking over shoulders just like you.

Once you've placed your bet, you get to go to the rail and watch the race. Just before the race, trainers wearing silly green hats bring the dogs from the kennel to the starting gate. Once the dogs are in the gate, the trainers race back to the kennel. I don't really see why they need the dogs; we could just bet on the trainers. Their race is really more amusing than the real one.

Then Frosty comes by, the dogs run after it, and you lose your money. After doing this about seven times, you run out of money and have to go home. This might not sound like fun to some people, but to those of us who care about how we lose our money, the dog track is a great place to drop all that extra cash.

Perspectives on Williams

article on Vito Acconci's sculpture "Body Walls," someone at Middlebury wrote, "Let's hope that the sculpture will survive longer than an expensive outdoor sculpture which was accidentally bulldozed in the fall by buildings and ground workers." Some bad incidents that have been reported in the Record have been echoed in other newspapers. The December 2, 1983, issue of the Phoenix reported on the incident where a Williamstown teen-ager accosted with a gun a couple of Williams students. The Phoenix entitled its report "Are You Psyched?" The February 3, 1984, issue of the Campus reported on the problems we were having with fire alarms in the Freshman Quad.

Political activities here have drawn indirect and direct attention. Criticizing recent protests against plans to dismantle fraternities, an editorial in the Amherst Student indirectly referred to the hunger strike for divestment here last January by saying, "The use of sit-ins and hunger strikes implies that these sheltered students consider the righteousness of their cause equal to other provocations for civil disobedience such as apartheid, the violation of civil rights and the acceleration of the nuclear arms race."

A Phoenix editorial referring to the effects of the Solomon Amendment said, "That number can be expected to climb higher in coming years since some colleges with which Swarthmore compete directly for students, like Williams, have denied replacement aid to non-registrants." An article in the same issue of the Phoenix also mentioned briefly Andrew Young's speech here and "his opposition to the candidacy of Jesse Jackson."

Renaissance instrument revived in concert duet

by Carl Leafstedt

Eighteenth century sonatas filled Brooks-Rogers last Tuesday night as Joseph Ceo, viola d'amore, and George Kent, harpsichord, presented "An Evening of Baroque Music." The duo played the "Six Lessons for Viola d'amore and Harpsichord" by Italian composer Attilio Ariosti.

The viola d'amore, an instrument slightly larger than the modern viola, has seven strings instead of the viola's four. Seven additional strings located underneath the bowed strings resonate to produce its characteristically sweet tone. Used almost exclusively in the Baroque period, it is rarely heard today.

Ceo had three instruments on stage, each tuned to a different key, for the purpose of efficiency—changing 14 strings from A major to E-flat major, the range of the Lessons, would take considerable time. As it was, Ceo spent enough time tuning.

Ariosti, composer of "Six Lessons," is known primarily as a composer of Italian opera. However his interests occasionally swayed in the direction of the violin and the viola d'amore, for which "Six Lessons" were published in London in 1728.

Ceo and Kent split the lessons evenly over the two halves of the program and succeeded in performing them with the correct touch—not too heavy, and with sufficient ornamentation. After all, these two are old hats at this music, having recorded it for the Titanic record label.

The only problem with this concert was its lack of variety. Each Lesson, really a sonata in the manner of Handel, sounded interesting by itself but after about the fourth one the music started to wear. Not even the bravest concert artist would consider giving a concert of sonatas by Handel (much less Ariosti) without a change of pace every so often. This is what this concert sorely needed—a little Vivaldi, maybe even a little Handel; just something different. But, all we were promised was an evening of Baroque music. That is what we got.

Squashers end season competing in Nationals

by John Schafer

The men's squash team closed out one of the most successful seasons in Williams history this weekend at the Nationals held at Annapolis. The squad ended third in the country behind only Harvard, whom they lost to, and Princeton, whom they did not play.

By finishing 20-2 and winning the Little Three title, the Ephs set a school record for wins and captured their tenth straight Little Three crown. The third place rating is the best for Williams in over 25 years. At the Nationals, though primarily an individual tournament, the team was awarded another honor.

For the second time in four years, the Ephs won the coaches' award for sportsmanship. The National Inter-Collegiate Squash and Racquets Association coaches gave this prestigious honor, which the Ephs last won three years ago, for team sportsmanship during the regular season.

Three All-Americans

Three seniors made All-American—Greg Zaff (for his third time), Tom Harrity (for his second time), and Billy Nau. Zaff was named to the first team by virtue of his 21-1 performance at number one. Playing second, Harrity, also 21-1, and Billy Nau, 18-3 at number three, both made the second team. In addition, Zaff and Nau were honored for their play this weekend by being included on the ten-man All-Tournament team.

In the "A" tournament, which decides the national champion, Zaff was seeded second behind Harvard's Kenton Jernigan, the defending champion. The two had played earlier in the season when the Crimson came to Williamstown, and Jernigan won handily in three games. Both cruised into the finals Sunday and played what Coach Sean Sloane called a "spectacular match." Jernigan retained his title by outlasting Zaff in a grueling five-game match.

Billy Nau went to the finals in the "B" bracket, a tournament for players third and fourth on their team's ladder. Nau, who played unexpectedly well according to Sloane, lost in the finals to Harvard's Rich Jackson.

"We played really well and had a great time," said Sloane, "this was a nice way to end the year."

Women 8th in country

The women's squad ended 7-3, ranked 8th in the nation, and Little Three Champions for the year. At the Nationals, held at Wesleyan this weekend, Coach Renzie Lamb travelled to Middletown with the top four players—Cassie Fisher '84, Hilary Thomas '85, Amina Mahmood '84, and Lisa Scott '85.

In the draw of 64, Fisher won the consolation finals, placing sixth in the tournament. She won the consolation last year too and was ranked 14th nationally. This season, her 22-4 performance at number one should guarantee her an even better finish. "She should be ranked in the top ten," said Lamb.

Women's hoop falls to Jeffs 48-41

by Mike Best

The women's basketball team lost its last game of the season on Wednesday, 48-41 to Amherst. This game was the last in the college careers of seniors Peggy Southard and tri-captain Tracy Burrows.

The game was close for most of the first half, with the score tied at 13 with 8:05 left. It was at that point that the Lady Jeffs took control, reeling off ten straight points in six and a half minutes.

The Ephwomen were having great difficulty with the Amherst fullcourt press. When they were able to get the ball upcourt, the tough Jeff defense kept the Ephs from getting inside, and the Ephs shot only 33 percent for the game. To make matters worse for the Ephs, Amherst controlled its defensive boards, allowing Williams only seven offensive rebounds in the contest.

At the same time, the Lady Jeff offense was running well, led by freshman point guard Amy Stamm, who finished the game with 10 assists. Stamm repeatedly made long passes upcourt for layups or brought the ball up and worked it inside. Amherst ended the half with a 25-16 lead.

Jeffs add to lead

The same trends continued in the second half. The teams started out pretty much trading baskets, but Amherst slowly increased its lead. With 11:15 left in the game the Jeff advantage was up to thirteen; with 6:35 left it was fifteen.

The Ephs, though, staged a mini-comeback. With 4:05 to go, Liz Keilison '87, who led Williams with 16 points, hit a layup to start an eight point spurt. Burrows then hit her last basket as an Eph. Two baskets by Anne Schmutz '87 sandwiched between a foul shot apiece by Denise Saunders '87 and Judy Crown '87 pulled the Ephwomen within six. Time, however, was on Amherst's side as they ran a stall that the Ephs were unable to overcome.

Eph weaknesses

The game pointed out most of the Ephwomen's problems this season: inability to break a fullcourt press and impatience on offense, in particular. Those problems and a tendency to fold in the second half of close games are caused mainly by the fact that the Ephs are such a young team. Experience should take care of these difficulties.

On the more positive side, the Ephs lose only two seniors to graduation this year. Four of the five starters will return, including two of the tri-captains, Kay Lackey '85 and Lynne Jaycobs '85. In leading scorer Liz Keilison the Ephs have an outside scoring threat, and the play of center Jean Hakmiller '86 improved steadily over the course of the year. Next year's record should be better than this year's 6-12.

Volleyball tops field of fifteen teams, claim tourney

The men's volleyball team defeated host Springfield College (13-15, 15-5, 15-9) in the finals of the New England Open Sunday night. Eph co-captain Vincente Hill '84 was named MVP of the fifteen team tournament, thoroughly dominating play in the early rounds and leading all teams in blocks and kills in the playoffs. The victory gives Williams the number two New England Division I ranking behind Harvard and sets the stage for a showdown between the top two teams at the Division I Championships in April.

Hill was named to the All-Tournament first team, along with Chris Clarey, '86. Co-captain Steve Brewster '84 earned second-team status.

15-10, 15-11 win over Northeastern, split with Dartmouth (13-15, 15-10), downed Amherst (15-10, 15-9) and then secured a spot in the semifinals with a 15-10, 15-8 victory over Boston College.

In the semis the Ephs faced Wesleyan, a team they have already defeated twice this season, and destroyed them in two straight games (15-12, 15-5) to set up the showdown with Springfield.

Seeded first in its bracket of five, Williams opened with a

Hockey ends short of playoffs due to seven-game tailspin

by Chris Harned and Paul Meeks

The men's hockey team finished an up and down season with a 10-11-1 overall record and a respectable 8-8-1 in ECAC Division II. That .500 mark was good enough for a tie for fifth place in Division II East. The Ephs, however, were not awarded one of the play-off berths usually reserved for the top eight teams in the Division.

Reasons for the ECAC Selection Committee's decision to overlook the Ephs in favor of four teams with worse or equal ECAC Division II records are slightly suspect. Only weeks before play-off selections were made, the traditional policy of automatically taking teams with a .500 record was abandoned. Had that criterion remained in effect, Williams would have entered post-season competition as the sixth seeded team and would have traveled to challenge New England College, a team that the Ephs beat in Lansing-Chapman Arena 2-1.

The surprising exclusion from the play-offs was somewhat typical of the Williams season. Back in December, the Ephs were touted as one of the top teams in the division after drubbing a powerful North Adams squad by a convincing 4-0 tally. Williams continued to fly high in the New Year. Relying on timely scoring and tenacious defence, they beat Salem State 3-2 and New England 2-1 while upping the season record to 6-3.

Seven game skid Events turned sour after fighting Holy Cross to a tie, and the Ephs fell into a slump with a seven game tailspin which started and ended with losses to Union. The losing streak was exacerbated by the loss of senior captain Dan Finn, the number one goalie, to an arm injury. The Ephs were outscored 51-15 during the seven game horror show that dropped the squad from third to eleventh in the league. Williams outscored rivals 51-44 while carving out a 10-4-1 record exclusive of the mid-season turmoil.

The Ephs reemerged from the depths with five games remaining in the season to trounce Wesleyan and squeeze past Division II foes Hamilton and Middlebury, both in overtime. The 3-2 victory over the Panthers was the first in which Williams came from behind. They saw the three game winning streak come to an end against Babson. Though learning of their exclusion from the play-offs the next day, the Ephs rallied from a 5-3 deficit with four third period goals to topple Westfield State 7-6 to end the season.

The team will return next year with its entire defensive unit intact except for Finn. This will provide a solid combination with the offense that returns individuals responsible for 146 of the Ephs total 160 points.

Losing three seniors

The squad loses three seniors to graduation, and though this is not large quantitatively, it is a loss of quality. Assistant captain Grag Pachus, one of the quickest attackmen, used his superior speed and stickhandling ability to kill crucial penalties as well as furnish tremendous offensive talent as most recently seen in his spectacular goal late in the game against Wesleyan.

Senior wing Dan Finnegan, in scoring the winning goal in his final game against Westfield, could not have closed his career with on a more appropriate note. The senior, playing against doctor's orders for two seasons with a knee injury, had an uncanny knack for putting the puck into the net.

Captain Dan Finn, an All-American candidate in goal, was one of the top goaltenders in collegiate hockey for his entire career at Williams. As a freshman, he led the team to the play-offs with a 10-1-2 personal record, and fashioned a four-year mark of 37-29-4. His .914 save percentage distinguishes him as a national leader and a pro prospect.

on. WILLIAMSBURG: "Hey look—that street sign says Williams St. Let's get it!" John Belushi/ "Animal House" stealth. The lady in the house smiles and waves, until we grab the sign and twist. Then she calls the sheriff. We didn't get the sign, but Sheriff Buford T. Justice got the van.

I'm plodding along with the ball, running against traffic, expecting to see the van any moment, ending this particular ordeal. It's got to be around the next corner. Then I see it...driving TOWARD me at 45 mph. I kept going figuring they went back to retrieve a hat that someone had dropped. Nope. They were being escorted back to the scene of the crime, where the legal difficulties were straightened out, as was the sign.

Meanwhile the Sheriff stopped a woman for littering. She had thrown an ice cube out the window, which he promptly stepped on. No joke.

I'm still puffing along. Somebody coming out of a tavern I ran by told me: "You're crazy." Thanks pal, that's just what I need. At that point, I was considering selling the ball and taking the bus the rest of the way.

NORTHAMPTON: Bob is dodging pedestrians downtown. We're on a side street, cheering him on. I found out his last name. I can't understand why we got so many dirty looks for yelling "Let's go Hussey", "C'mon Hussey", and "Keep running Hussey!" Luckily I had managed to park on a patch of ice, so the other six had to get out and push while the townspeople laughed at us.

There was some serious heroism happening in this stretch. Everybody was doing two or three mile pieces. Marty came off three miles and climbed in the van, and he wasn't even breathing hard. Everybody ran together what we thought was the last mile. It was really a mile and a half, with a hill. We jogged into the gym with the ball, looking bedraggled, and received a standing ovation from the Williams JV and Varsity teams. Wow! While the JV game started, we borrowed the locker room to shower. There was no shampoo, soap, or towels (or frats) within a five mile radius. Oh well, there was plenty of hot water. We scrounged one comb. We were psyched.

And then, the highlight of the day—the Varsity game. Our crowd out-yelled their crowd at Amherst. The sixth man had returned, hopefully to stay.

Hoopsters go 4-0 in Little Three by blowing out Amherst 87-70

by Dave Paulsen

If a tie is like kissing your sister, then defeating Amherst by 17 points is...well, such a decisive victory speaks for itself.

Or does it?

Does it show how the hoopsters dominated play throughout the game en route to their 87-70 victory? Does it show how co-captain and All-American candidate Art Pidorlano '84 closed out his career with an awesome performance, pouring in 28 points, 19 of them in the first half?

Does it show how Tim Walsh '86 poured in 18 second half points to pick up the slack when Pidorlano momentarily cooled down?

Or does it show how senior co-captain John McNicholas and Mike Meadows '86, and Dave Krupski '84 turned in solid performances to aid the Eph cause?

No, I guess the performance does not speak for itself. It doesn't speak for Pidorlano's first-half rainbow jump shots which propelled the Ephs to their first half lead. It doesn't speak for Walsh's second half off balance shots from every conceivable angle. At one stretch in the second half, Walsh hit three consecutive jump shots with Amherst defenders draped all over him.

43-38 at the half

It doesn't speak for the performances of McNicholas, Krupski, and Meadows, who all came through with big plays when the Ephs most needed them. Krupski hit a big hoop off of a pass from Pidorlano to increase the second half lead to 14 points with six minutes left. And McNicholas came through with a key tip-in of a missed free throw to put the nail in the coffin of the Lord Jeffs.

By playing disciplined offense and forcing the Lord Jeffs to shoot from the outside, the Ephs jumped to a 43-38 halftime lead. And by continuing their fine play, the Ephs gradually pulled away from Amherst mid-way through the second half. Down the stretch, the Ephs hit their free throws when Amherst was forced to foul.

Besides the total domination on the floor, Williams controlled all aspects of the ever-important crowd factor. The Williams contingent was as large as the apathetic Amherst crowd, and showed much more originality in their choice of cheers. Head Coach Harry Sheehy again applauded the fan support his team received, pointing especially to the actions of seven crazed students who ran a basketball from Lasell down to the Amherst gym.

A jubilant Sheehy praised the play of all five of his starters and also the efforts of senior reserves Russ Howard and John McCarthy. Pidorlano led all scorers with 28, Walsh added 24, and Krupski 10.

Loss to New England

In other action over the week, the Ephs were edged 79-77 by New England College. Williams had jumped to leads of 13-3 and 33-19 in that game but could not hold off the high-powered NAIA qualifying squad. Pidorlano pumped in 25 points, and Walsh added 20.

The Ephs finished the season with a 13-10 record and toward the end of the season, jelled into one of the better teams in New England. Although narrowly missing an ECAC playoff bid, they fulfilled all other team goals. Sheehy said, "We knew we had won the Little Three before we played Amherst, but we didn't want to back into it. We became only the 11th team in Williams history to go 4-0, and the first team to do that since 1975." Now that speaks for itself!

Town and Gown claim Sunday night crown

by John Hayes

In the championship game of the men's Sunday Night League, Town and Gown defeated Black Magic Plus One by the score of 51-38. Magic jumped out to an early lead, but Town and Gown fought back to take a five point halftime lead behind the hot-shooting of MVP Harry Sheehy.

Early in the second half, Town and Gown widened the margin to twelve, 34 to 22. Magic narrowed it to eight but was unable to close the gap any further. For the game, Sheehy led the way with 27 points. James Brown '86 led the balanced scoring by Magic by pumping in eleven points.

Earlier action

In the semifinal round, Magic jumped to an early 10 point lead against Clueless who fought back behind the shooting of Joe Markland '84 and center Matt Waller '85 and closed to within three at the half. The game remained close until Magic switched to a man-to-man defense with six minutes left and ran off eight unanswered points, leading to a final score of 56-45. Ed Schmlidt '84 led the winners with a game-high 22 points, while Markland added 19 points for Clueless.

In the other semifinal game, Town and Gown prevailed over divisional champion Eph Slamma Jamma 61-60. The game was decided in the closing seconds as Mike Reed stole the ball, was fouled, and hit the front end of a one-and-one.

Sheehy led all scorers with 36 points, while Alan Posta '86 and Frank Morandi '86 with 24 and 16 respectively headed the Jamma attack.

In the first game of the playoffs, Town and Gown pulled out an exciting overtime win over NRPC as Harry Sheehy banked in a twisting right-foot jump shot as time expired in the overtime period. Sheehy again led all scorers with 34 points; for NRPC, Hugh Hulzenga '84 had 23 and Kevin Morris '86 added 14.

In the second game, Clueless, missing two starters, managed to come away with a two point win over the Logjams. Hot shooting by Markland (20 points) led the way for Clueless, while Bill Bradford '84 paced the Logjams with 14 points.

Seven crazies run a ball to the game

by Lee Farbman

SUNDAY MORNING: The alarm went off at 9:00. I was fine until I tried to move. I was just able to hit the clock before the pain caught up to my sleep-dulled brain. Muscles I didn't even know I had were sending urgent distress messages.

Those cynics among you are now nodding your heads with a knowing sneer on your faces. But this was NOT alcohol induced pain. My head felt fine, it was everything else that hurt! For during the day Saturday, I joined the elite. I took part in a once-in-a-lifetime event, one that could only happen in college. Seven intrepid voyagers ran a basketball from Williamstown to Amherst, one mile at a time. It's 63 miles and 7 1/2 hours by foot.

FRIDAY NIGHT: We started recruiting at the Log after getting the word that two of the originators had dropped out. Marty Davey '85 and a sophomore named Bob (at the time I didn't know his last name) signed on quickly. John Clayton '85 and Kenny Hillman '85 had been intrigued with the idea, and Ken accepted on behalf of both of them. Jennifer Rees '86 happened to be there and thought it sounded like fun. She said she'd be there. Dave Heinlein '83 and I had already reserved a van.

SATURDAY MORNING: I didn't know life could be sustained before 9:00 on Saturdays. We zipped into North Adams, picked up the van at Hertz. We went to the gym, where we stole a ball, interrupted a Sunday League playoff game, took a rebound and threw an outlet pass to Heini who took off out the door, and headed down Route 2.

It was 15 degrees over.

I got the first mystery mile. "Run down Route 8 (dodging cars) until you get to the van," they said. It wasn't too bad, though I almost got hit by a stroller.

Somehow Clayton always got lucky enough to pull the miles that had hills in them. We don't know how he did it, the lucky devil. Jennifer always got the turnoffs.

ROUTE 8A: This road has never been plowed. "Jennifer, how's the footing?"

"Bad!" boom—down she goes. Three times. Clates looks glum—he's got the next mile.

ROUTE 9: Ken starts a trend—he goes three miles, looking strong. Those in the van were much relieved. We heard "99 Red Balloons" for the third time that morning. Route 9 dragged

Men and women swimmers splash to wins at N. E. finals

By amassing 527½ points, the men's swimming team captured an unprecedented sixth consecutive New England Intercollegiate Swimming and Diving title this weekend. The Ephs outdistanced their nearest rival, Southern Connecticut, by more than 170 points.

"We really rose to the occasion," said Coach Carl Samuelson. "Competitive swimming in the New England League has improved a great deal over the past few years, and I'm really tickled that we could put together such a fine overall performance."

Early lead

Williams grabbed the early edge in the three-day event with two first place finishes, a third and a fifth on Thursday. Sophomore Bill Couch repeated his winning performance of a year ago in the 400 Individual Medley, finishing in 4:10.15. Freshman teammate Chris Kirwan took third in 4:16.05, qualifying him for the nationals.

Couch and Kirwan, along with Steve Delano '85 and Scott Robinson '87 swept to first-place in the 800 yard freestyle relay with a 6:59.42 clocking, three seconds faster than second-place UConn. Delano also turned in a fine performance in the 1650 free, finishing fifth and qualifying nationally with a 16:49.02.

On Friday senior co-captain Rob Sommer led the way with a first-place finish in the 200 backstroke and a second-place in the 200 Individual Medley. Freshman Robinson had an outstanding swim in the 200 freestyle, winning in 1:43.61, while teammates Will Andrew '86 and co-captain Jeff Mills '84 took sixth and seventh.

Individual standouts

Other strong performances came from Andrew in the 50 free (4th in 21.88); Peter Orphanos '85 in the 200 fly (5th in 1:56.89); John Peloso '85 in the 200 back (8th in 2:00.17); Dom Kulik '86 and Rob Kirkpatrick '85 in the 200 breaststroke (7th in 2:14.03 and 8th in 2:14.60) and Couch and Kirwan in 200 IM (3rd in 1:56.41 and 6th in 1:59.17).

Williams highlights on the final day of competition included a New England record-breaking swim of 3:06.34 by the 400 free relay team composed of Mills, Sommer, Robinson, and Andrew and a one/two finish in the 100 backstroke—Sommer in first and Peloso in second. Mills qualified nationally with a 47.69 third-place finish in the 100 free.

Women claim 4th title

The women's team won 14 of 21 events as they swept to their fourth consecutive New England Division B Swimming and Diving Championship at Bates College last weekend. The team totalled 888 points over the three day competition, outdistancing their nearest opponent, Bowdoin, by 333 points.

Triple-winner Kim Eckrich '85, an All-American in six events at last year's national championships led the way with victories in the 200 IM and the 50 and 200 breaststrokes. She has now won 14 New England titles in her three years at Williams. Freshman Joan Horgan took both the 100 and 200 backstrokes, breaking the New England record in the 200. Kathy Kirmayer '86 also won twice—in the 50 backstroke and 100 freestyle, claiming second in the 50 free and third in the 200 free.

Co-captain Sue Knapp '85 led a Williams sweep of the 500 free with a 5:19 clocking, followed by teammates Myla Jordan '85, Jonna Kurucz '85, and Jennifer Raymond '87. Kurucz (18:16.206) and Jordan (18:27.762) were one/two in the 1650 free. Senior co-captain Cella Cleplela was also an individual winner, taking the 400 IM in 4:45.37. Both the 400 and 800 freestyle relay team won as well.

The Ephwomen will defend the Division III National Title they have won the last two years on the weekend of March 8-10 at Emory University. The men travel to Emory a week later for their Division III Nationals.

Chandler announces

Tuition rises to $12,454 for next year, up by 7.2 percent

by John Clayton

Williams tuition will be $12,454 next year, according to a letter sent out by President John W. Chandler today.

The increase of $839, or 7.2 percent, over last year's $11,615 puts Williams on the low side of most comparable schools, according to Vice-President and Treasurer William S. Reed.

"Schools in general are in the 7-8 percent range," said Chandler. "However, many are over $13,000—such as Wesleyan, at $13,300."

Chandler cited faculty salaries, computer costs and inflation as the three main factors in the increase. "We have recaptured some ground in the faculty salaries," he said, "but they still aren't as high in constant dollar terms as they were in the late 1960's and early '70's."

More computer time

The increased demand for computer time has meant that the College must expand its computer facilities, including the conversion of Jesup Hall to a computer center, Chandler said.

Chandler and Reed also cited a number of factors that make the internal inflation rate higher than the Consumer Price Index. "The College is very labor-intensive, and wages have been increasing higher than the inflation rate,"

Chandler said. He also noted that the cost of books and periodicals has done the same.

"There has been a significant increase in the amount of money the endowment is contributing to tuition," Reed said. This year, the endowment will contribute $7,175,000, as opposed to $5,770,000 last year. However, the endowment itself increased by nearly 50 percent during the same period.

"We've had a good performance from the endowment," said Reed, "so we can afford it."

Less tuition-dependent

Reed said that traditionally tuition pays for 60 percent of the cost of educating a student, while the endowment pays 40 percent. However, he said, tuition has recently been paying 63 percent of that cost, and this increase should bring it back in tune with earlier times.

"In other schools, they are 85 percent tuition-dependent," Reed said. "We're proud of the fact that we're at 60 percent. It means we can provide students with a more costly education."

Reed also said that the College is assuming that energy costs will remain the same next year, but he is concerned that energy use has increased by 17 percent this year.

Andrew Cyplot '85 will take over as College Council President after Spring Break, following his victory in last week's runoff election. Cyplot received 441 votes out of 1111 cast, defeating Shannon McKenn '85, who received 337 votes, and Hamilton Humes '85, who received 333 votes.

Presidential candidates Phil Walsh '85 and Lance Rothstein '85 were knocked out of the race after the regular elections two weeks ago. Thirty-one more people voted in the runoff elections than in the regular elections.

Anza Mammen '86, Cyplot's runningmate, edged Sara Gross '85 by only 27 votes in a close race for the vice-presidency. Mammen received 551 votes to Gross' 524.

Two other races were determined by the runoff. The election for two junior class representatives to the Honor and Discipline Committee was completely redone since candidate Mary Schwarzer's name had mistakenly been placed under a different race on the original ballots.

Laura Volpe and James Brawner won that election with 182 and 92 votes, respectively, of the 498 cast.

In addition Rich Miller '86 was elected Row House Representative to College Council and the Housing Committee by defeating sophomore David Applebaum 117-94.

The total voter turnout for these elections was the largest in several years since the polls were opened for three days instead of the usual two and voting was done in several other dining halls besides Baxter.

CEP considers pass/fail option for regular semester courses

by Joe Ehlers

Williams College has begun studying the possibility of implementing some sort of pass-fail plan for regular semester courses that will give greater flexibility to student course options, according to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

"The plan will encourage people to reach out into areas where they are presently afraid they will not do too well," he explained.

According to O'Connor, a sub-committee of the Committee on Educational Policy is examining two proposals affecting course requirements. The first proposal would allow sophomores, juniors and seniors to take a total of two courses pass-fail during their three years. The courses could not be ones required for a major or to fulfill divisional requirements, however.

If a student takes a pass-fail option, a grade of C- or better is necessary to pass, rather than the grade of D- or better that is presently required for graded courses.

Fresh can withdraw anytime. The sub-committee is also studying a proposal allowing freshmen to withdraw at any point from a class if they are failing it. The student would be required to make up the course later, but the failure would not be put on the student's record.

A similar policy for freshmen exists now, but only allows freshmen to withdraw through the ninth week of the semester.

Both proposals are similar to requirements already in place at Amherst College. O'Connor noted that the Amherst requirements went into effect eight years ago on a trial basis. At the end of five years the Amherst faculty endorsed the requirements and they became policy at the college. "The Amherst faculty seem content with the policy," O'Connor said.

Williams a lot tougher

The Deans' Office has released statistics comparing Williams' academic requirements to those of similar colleges. O'Connor said that Williams' requirements are the most stringent of the five colleges examined, which include Amherst, Mt. Holyoke, Smith, Wellesley and Wesleyan.

"The strong requirements have been a long tradition here," he noted. "Changing them has never been pushed too much."

Math professor Kim Bruce, chairman of the CEP sub-committee examining the proposals, said he believes the proposals will improve the educational environment at the college. "A restricted version of pass-fail will allow students to take a more creative class schedule and explore different classes," he said.

Students take it easy?

According to Bruce, many students, especially seniors, take easier courses in order to preserve their grade point averages. "Students choose guts so they don't hurt their G.P.A.'s by taking more difficult classes," he noted.

The Gargoyle Society is also involved in discussing the proposals. According to member Jim Foley '84, "Williams is the only school in the country that has such limited course flexibility."

Foley said Gargoyle strongly supports the proposals. "You can make a positive argument that the plans will improve education with people having the opportunity to take creative courses," he said.

The Williams Record Pass

The Committee on Educational Policy is now considering a proposal to let students take two courses on a pass/fail basis in their sophomore, junior or senior years.

Such a proposal would allow students more academic freedom, encouraging them to diversify their interest and take courses once thought too intimidating. Professors who are tops in the field are great sources of knowledge, yet can be feared to be too demanding and are often avoided. The institution of a pass/fail option would allow students to take advantage of both professors and fields formerly considered too difficult.

A pass/fail option would also relieve the problem of taking courses for gut value. Students could take courses that interest them on the basis of content, not degree of difficulty.

Students often use their academic workload to excuse their lack of participation in extra-curricular activities. With lessened pressure, students could divert their time and energy to becoming more involved in the non-academic side of Williams. Resources as far away as a year abroad, or as close as the Clark Art Institute, could be explored by students given more academic flexibility.

Therefore, even if students were to use this option to reduce their workload, the College as a whole could benefit. Top-notch students who are paying $13,000 a year for a Williams education will not turn into TV-vegetables simply because they are offered a pass/fail option on two courses in their career.

Options

To the editor:

We would like to call student attention to this week's Record article concerning academic flexibility options at Williams and other schools.

Williams is the most inflexible among institutions of comparable academic reputation in terms of pass/fail options and the dropping of courses. A fourth course pass/fail option would obviate the common practice of searching for a fourth course gut and, instead, allow students to experiment in courses outside of their usual focus. Also, a less severe policy concerning the dropping of courses would maintain the positive lessons of failure while removing some of the prolonged negative impacts.

In light of the successful use of academic flexibility options at Amherst, Dartmouth, Wesleyan, and Wellesley, the CEP is examining the possibility of adopting such options at Williams. Student/faculty committees ideally represent the interests of the student body but can not do so without student input. In this case, the CEP may be reluctant to advocate a change since there has not been an offering of student opinion on this matter. We believe this lack of opinion is because the large number of students who have personally felt the inflexibility of our requirements are unaware of the programs that function well at other high-caliber schools. To express your opinion on this little-discussed but important issue, contact CEP members Professor Kim Bruce, Doris Beyer '84 and John Irwin '85. Also, please contact the below listed members of Gargoyle for more information about or input into our proposals and supporting arguments.

Happy Birthday

Students were pleased with the Ephraim Williams' Birthday celebration this past week. The events were enjoyable and well-attended.

It was a rare chance for everyone to show school spirit. While sporting events, especially Amherst games, tend to turn out the Ephs, it is important to extend this feeling of unity outside of the sporting arena. Such interest can only benefit the school as a whole.

Unfortunately, it seems that many faculty chose not to attend these events. The College Council has initiated several student-faculty activities: Coffee hours, Pizza nights and this week's ball, yet the faculty appear not to be interested. Faculty input into planning such events might encourage good participation on both sides of these events.

Exemplary

To the editor:

I should like to commend the fans for their support at the two recent Amherst basketball games. Contrary to the letter in the Amherst student newspaper, the conduct of our fans was exemplary at the home basketball game on February 11th. Additionally, we had super support at the away game on March 3rd.

The group of Williams students who dribbled a basketball from Williams to Amherst, arriving just before the JV game, set the tone for the support that continued to grow all during the contest. The large number of vocal Williams students at the Amherst game also created a "positive playing atmosphere" for both teams. Players respond to crowd support, even if it's for the opponent.

Since we had some poor fan conduct at the Amherst/Williams hockey game, I should like to recognize this positive and appropriate conduct at the Amherst basketball games. We hope that this fan support can continue to grow.

To the editor:

I am writing this not only as a manner of venting my anger and hurt but also to enlighten the Williams campus about incidents which should not continue. I am currently a senior at Smith College, and last year I had the pleasure of spending a wonderful year on exchange at Williams. One thing that had always impressed me about Williams was the general politeness and respect accorded to and from each individual. What then caused the outrageous behavior which I witnessed this past Saturday night?

My house at Smith was having a party and a group of Williams males dropped by following the Williams/Amherst basketball game. During the course of the evening, some of this group managed to insult and infuriate at least ten members of my house, let alone friends from other houses or schools, through verbal and physical harassment. In fact two of my friends left the party rather than suffer this abuse. What motivated these incidents? How often would a man at Williams walk into an unknown Williams woman's residence and expect her to behave like a whore? Never. God forbid, he might have the misfortune of discovering she's in his Econ. class or is a friend of a friend. Well, if that behavior isn't in evidence at Williams, why should it be displayed at other schools? Is mere proximity the only requirement for respectful behavior? Current seniors and juniors were inundated two years ago with the issue of sexual harassment—didn't any of that register? And if it did, why does the knowledge seem to be left behind at Williams when you leave? Perhaps the real basis for my anger is the knowledge that these students wouldn't presume to behave this way at Williams. So what, then, justifies their actions here? Just because a man who roadtrips may never see the woman he meets again, does that mean she should be accorded less respect than a fellow female Ephperson?

Some of the boys (I hesitate to call them men) who were here last Saturday, while doing no property damage, managed to create many hard feelings and mar Williams' good name. Don't feel that I'm presuming to condemn all Williams men on the bad behavior of these few. Luckily, I had an entire year of good experiences to counteract this one. It is a shame, however, that for some Smith women this was the only side of Williams they will ever see and the impression certainly wasn't flattering. What's even

Whatever happened to class songs? or, Williams' vanishing traditions

by Christian Howlett

This is going to sound silly to a lot of people, but I think Anson Piper was right. Williams students don't sing anymore.

Oh sure, some of them sing; we've got the Springstreeters, the Octet, Ephoria, Ephlats, the Choral Society, lots of groups full of singing students. But that's not the real issue. What Prof. Piper meant, and what I agree with, is that Williams has lost a real sense of tradition.

What he said exactly (speaking as part of the panel discussion on "Williams College: Is It Better Now Than It Was Then?") was that at Williams years ago "there was a genuine feeling of family, of tradition. That has been lost."

I really didn't understand this until last October. My parents and I were having dinner in Le Country restaurant late one evening, and about the only other people there were a group of four or five old alumni and their wives.

They were all pretty old, old enough to be loud in a restaurant without having anyone tell them to be quiet. We all just looked at them in a sort of amused, understanding way and went on eating our Lobster Newberg. But then they did something which really hit me. They started singing, and they didn't stop singing for at least an hour. With uncannily clear memories, they sang, in order, the class songs for about 1910-1920. Then they sang the fraternity songs, and the football fight songs, and the alma mater. They even knew all the words!

You could tell they were having a wonderful time, and their wives, who'd all gone to Smith and Mt. Holyoke and Skidmore, and who'd done this for 50 years at reunions, were having a wonderful time too.

When they started singing the Beta Theta Pi song, my father, (Class of '64 and a Beta), went over and introduced himself and they seemed really pleased, even though they all could have been his father at last.

Well, I thought it was all lots of fun at the time, and I felt proud to be part of another generation at Williams, a place which obviously meant so much to these guys. But I didn't think about it again until this week, when Professor Piper (who is Class of '40) remarked that in the 30s, students sang all the time, but now they don't.

He's right. We don't have official class songs (I don't know when they died out). And nobody, except maybe the band and the rugby club, knows any of the fight songs like "Yard by Yard," and "Come Fill Your Glasses Up." And our performance at Convocation proves that we couldn't find more than two dozen undergraduates (if that) to perform a tolerable rendition of "the Mountains" to save our institutional lives.

The recent Eph's birthday celebration was a great example of school spirit, but it was the only one I've seen in my three years here, and how come it only happened when there was outside money involved?

So what's the point to all this? Well, perhaps we should invent new songs, or at least learn the old ones (after all, what are we going to sing at reunions in 50 years?). Or perhaps we should spontaneously break into song at meals or at parties, like Prof. Piper said they used to in the old days.

But more, importantly, we should stop and consider how really big and grand is this tradition which we're part of. Regardless of your major, or where you're from, or what dorm you live in, or what you want to do with your life, right now you're part of a family of Williams people.

People seem to realize this once they become alumni; maybe that's why they flock to reunions and give so much to the college. As students, we laugh at their Old-Boylshness. To us they're just nostalgic old businessmen and bankers. But they know something we don't and they've got something we haven't—a sense of tradition and unity.

Seniors start to realize this tradition when they walk across the stage and realize that they're part of the alumni and that, no matter how much they'd like to, they just can't go back anymore.

But do we have to wait until we're clutching our sheepskins and about to jump into graduate schools or jobs before we show this feeling? Let's do it now, at games, at founder's birthday parties, at Winter Carnivals, while our lung capacities are still at their peak.

sadder is that not every member of this group behaved poorly, but those that did are the ones who will be remembered. We were gracious enough to allow them into our home for a party which we funded—as guests they should have displayed better manners towards their hostesses. Would they act this way in their own home? If roadtripping Williams men would realize the longterm repercussions their behavior has, perhaps their experiences here wouldn't end as badly as this one did or with such hard feelings. In the future, please—either come with manners and a sense of respect or don't come at all.

Intolerance

To the editor:

During the last two weeks, the Record has covered a discussion about student activism, started by Jeffrey Brainard's article on WAAC. Political activism is not the primary subject of my letter but the exchange between Brainard and Navjeet Bal (who responded to his article in a letter), gives me a startling point. The two most important arguments which Bal and Brainard make are not contradictory. Brainard wanted to see a more sustained, committed activism, as opposed to sporadic reactions. Bal defended the fundamental importance of student interest and support, and the need for activist groups to continue to address issues which extend past the college walls.

Brainard and Bal identify qualities which are equally necessary on a college campus. I suggest that the best place to discover and maintain these qualities begins with the individual. Personal and intellectual "activism" should precede social or political movement in importance. Two simple facts support this: 1) Interests vary, and people will always be involved with and affected by different activities. 2) Within any group, there are leaders and followers—no 100 percent of any population is involved to the same degree. Given the diversity of interests among the 2000 students at Williams, the problem of indifference should be a greater worry than the measurable changes any group creates.

Attempting to push one's limits of understanding of tolerance in an under-rated activity. Too often, because of its small size and sense of being a world unto itself, Williams may foster a false sense of the importance and power of results. In the classroom this takes the form of discussions which pointedly look for answers rather than examine and explore. On campus this pressure for results may produce indifference or intolerance for other points of view.

The kind of energy required to reach a level of vigorous interest in one's surroundings, or academic subject, or activist group, or sport, or art project, is the most difficult to achieve and usually remains a pursuit. But therein lies its value. Action or results will follow naturally if this more basic definition of activism becomes recognized as the best weapon against indifference, and the most useful instrument in the effort to educate and make changes.

"An Ode to Eph"

by Charlie Mitchell

If it weren't for Eph, we wouldn't be here,
Reading and writing and drinking this beer.
Yet still we all joke when we hear of his name:
I tell you, without him, we'd not be the same.

I'd be in Chicago, still grinding away,
Taking my lumps and awaiting the day
When I could come east and at last get the chance
To dabble in music and wine and romance.

And you'd be off somewhere, perhaps pumping gas,
Ne'er facing the challenge of trying to pass,
With never a shot the Grosvenor Cup,
Or sleeping in late while the matrons clean up.

Life would be sad, we'd not want to go on,
Our friends would be scattered both hither and yon,
Not tasting of tofu or pilaf or such,
Those popular treats which we cherish so much.

The lectures and meetings, WASH,

WAAC, WAP, and WAM,
Potato rice kugel and omelets with ham,
Inter-house transfers and rec-rooms galore;
What else could we do with those SAT scores?

Russian and Classics, Religion, Am.Stud.,
Snow in the springtime and season-round mud,
Such treasures as these would have been missed by all
Had we not had somewhere to go in the fall.

And all this we owe to the will of one man,
(I proudly admit I'm his number one fan.)
Who wished to establish a bastion of knowledge
Which is known to this day as our own Williams College.

And so "Happy Birthday to kindly old Eph,
Had it not been for you I'd have not met the Sheafe.
And though this brief verse may not sit well with scholars,
It shows what I'll do for a couple of dollars.

"An Elegy Composed in the Berkshire Quad" by Scot Brannon

Eph! Light of my life,
Fire of my loins,
Founder of my school,
And dead a long time.

What would you say,
If you had kenneled
To what pass we'd come
In our mountainous pen?

"A bastion of knowledge,
A fine place to ski,
Here cloister yourself
(For a nominal fee).

"Here you'll eat of the apple,
And here you will sin,
A sapient idiot
With juice on your chin.

"But four years you'll have lost—
The opportunity cost!—
Just to enter the race,
The Manhattan Chase.

"But to banish such thoughts
From our garden of cheer
And contemplate bubbles
In your tenth glass of beer.

"For life is too short,
Tuition too great,
To experience life
In an unaltered state.

"So drink one to your profs,
One to the trustees,
One for each dean,
Then sink to your knees...

"And after four years,
My elite little dears,
Give thanks and give praise
For Smith and good grades.

"Allay all your fears
With regard to careers.
You're too well prepared
To hope to be spared.

"Ere I lie back to the grave,
I'll grant some advice
Concerning the real world,
That inescapable vice.

"Prolong the good life—
There's only one way—
Don't get a job,
Go do an M.A."

Beach off to Smithsonian

Milo C. Beach, chairman of the art department, has been named assistant director of the Arthur M. Sackler Gallery at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C. He will also serve as assistant director of the Smithsonian's Center for Asian Art.

Beach will supervise the daily operations of the $75 million Sackler Gallery, which is under construction and should be completed in 1986.

The new museum will house a collection of Asian, Near Eastern and Indian art, all donated by Sackler, a New York art connoisseur and philanthropist. As assistant director, Beach will also handle scholarly programs, publications, and exhibitions, including major ones on loan.

A specialist in Islamic art, Beach has published four books, including his most recent, "The Adventures of Rama," an interpretation for young people about Ramayan, India's ancient Hindu legends.

Beach plans to leave Williams at the end of the spring semester and move to Washington this summer. He is looking forward to the project, which "will contribute to the education of Americans about Asian art and culture."

Beach came to Williams in 1969 after earning his doctorate at Harvard University. He has

Butler regains shoulder movement, father says

by Daniel T. Keating

Dennis Butler '86, who has been paralyzed from the neck down since a skiing accident Jan. 25, celebrated his 20th birthday two weeks ago at George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D.C., and is beginning to make improvements, his father said Thursday.

Charles D. Butler told the Berkshire Eagle in a telephone interview that his son had regained some movement in his shoulders, and may regain more function when he comes out of traction in two or three weeks. Listed in serious but stable condition, he can eat solid food and talk with a voice vibrator held against his vocal chords, according to hospital spokesmen.

Butler's father said that the family gathered for the Feb. 28 birthday celebration, which included a cake with Happy Birthday written in German. Butler planned to major in German and also studied Norwegian and Latin.

"All three shifts at the hospital held birthday parties for Dennis," his father said. "The nurses brought balloons, and Dennis got a lot of cards from Williams and people in the (Washington) area. He still has them in his room."

Williams support important
Dean Daniel O'Connor, who had been in touch with the family and will visit Butler over spring break, said the Williams connection has been important. "Dennis is encouraged by the contact, the fact that people are not just forgetting him," O'Connor said.

The Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund, started by Williams in early February, will soon reach its goal of $10,000. O'Connor said the fund now has approximately $9,000, from some 400 contributors. The fund was one of the beneficiaries of the College's 24-hour relay last weekend.

Despite the warm wishes, improvement is coming slowly for Butler. "His spirits are very good under the circumstances," his father said, "but he has down times, too."

Butler's father said his son has painful spasms in his back because the nerve impulses are bouncing around. He said his son also complains of sore shoulders.

Bones healing naturally

The doctors have elected not to perform a bone fusion operation on Butler's neck as the bones seem to be healing properly themselves. O'Connor said that the bone healing will give Butler proper head and neck alignment, but will not restore function.

Butler now breathes with the help of a respirator, whose tube goes through his throat and into his trachea. The doctors are trying to wean Butler off the respirator, said his father, by turning the machine down a few notches during the day to encourage him to breathe more on his own, and turning the machine back up at night. The process may take a few weeks.

Butler also may come out of traction, enabling him to sit up, in another two or three weeks.

Rehabilitation hopes

The rehabilitation process will depend on how much movement Butler regains. Butler may need an attendant for the rest of his life, his father said, but if he regains enough motor control he may be able to live independently.

Equipment such as a blow-and-puff wheelchair, operated by mouth, may help Butler, his father said. Butler may stay at George Washington or transfer to a spinal chord rehabilitation facility.

According to his father, "Dennis' major hope is that someday he can come back to Williams and finish his education. That is his major goal, but it is a few years away."

Fellowships for 4 seniors

Four Williams seniors have received fellowships for graduate work. Peter Kandel and Marc Wolfe were awarded the Horace F. Clark Fellowship, $3000 for the first year of graduate school, given annually to two seniors "on the basis of superior scholarship, general ability, and interest in scholarly research."

Will McClaren and Hill Snellings received the Hubbard Hutchinson Fellowship, which consists of a cash award of either $3000 or $6000 to be used for two years of creative work. Kandel, a German literature and art history major, will use his fellowship to attend Yale Law School. Wolfe, a theatre major, plans to do graduate work in theatre and has applied to Yale, the University of Washington at Seattle and Southern Methodist University.

He has appeared in several productions at Williams, including "Tom Paine" last spring and "Woyzeck" this fall, playing the title roles in both.

McClaren said he will be working in New York City next year as a theater management intern with an off-Broadway theater. Since he will not be paid he plans to use the Hutchinson money to support himself. His eventual goal is a masters degree in fine arts, he said.

McClaren, an English and political science major, has been heavily involved with the dance program at Williams. He is secretary of the Dance Society and has choreographed the last two Freshman Revues and several Cap and Bells productions. A show of his own choreography, entitled "Tarantella," was performed by members of the Dance Society in February.

Snellings said he will use his Hutchinson money to support himself while he pursues creative writing. He is currently working on a novel which he started last September and submitted in part for his English honors thesis.

Roper brings poll program

The Roper Center for Public Opinion will hold its first Public Opinion Program for Journalists June 10-23 at Williams College under the direction of political science professor George M. Marcus.

Twenty-five journalists in all media will consider the essentials of public polling, the basis of American public opinion and computer access to survey data.

"The program should give journalists training in getting the story straight on the polls," Marcus said. "Often journalists, under tight deadlines, do not have the training to understand the full significance of the results on which they are basing their stories."

The Public Opinion Program for Journalists grows out of a concern at the Roper Center (the largest library in the world for public opinion research), that in the academic world and in the news media dangers are inherent in the growing use of the polls.

"Poll results are often put out by partisan groups, based on ambiguous questions and fed to the news media out of context," Marcus said.

The program is keyed to this year's presidential elections, timed to occur between the primaries and the party conventions.

Assistant professor of political science Tim Cook will also staff the program along with political science professors from the University of Minnesota and the University of Washington.

These nine alumni, mostly faculty and staff members, decided that, with a few exceptions, Williams is a better place now than it was when they were undergraduates. They spoke in a panel discussion as part of the celebration of Ephraim Williams' 269th birthday. (Glick)

Alumni faculty declare Williams better now

by John McDermott

In general Williams is a better place now than it was in the past, according to nine alumni who addressed that question in a panel discussion last Monday held in conjunction with the Ephraim Williams birthday celebration.

The hottest issue from the past was fraternities. As a freshman in 1954, history professor Peter Frost dropped out of Williams because he was disgusted with the school's fraternity system, in which he said students were "cruelly used."

Frost said he is much happier with life at Williams now. "It's a much fairer campus and its full of much more social justice," he said. "This is a more just place because we don't have legal fraternities."

But Romantic Languages professor Anson Piper '40 recalled a time when "Greek letter fraternities—we didn't call them 'frats'—were not the evil things they were after World War II." Russ Carpenter '50, associate director of development, said the influx of World War II veterans into the campus signaled both the end of the old fraternities and the beginnings of the call for a new system.

Fraternity injustice

Carpenter agreed with Frost on the injustice of a fraternity system which made 20 percent of the students bounce through 15 fraternities before the last excluded them. These students, the members of the Garfield club, were treated as "marked people and aberrations."

Carpenter regrets his own fraternity link. "I think I was incredibly naive to stay," he said, adding praise for social life at Williams in 1984. "There's a much greater feeling of integration."

The panelists ranged in age from Art Professor emeritus Whitney Stoddard '35, who admitted "I didn't know Eph very well," to Sports Information Director Seth Johnson '80. It was Johnson who had some of the harshest words for the Williams students of today.

ams students of today.

Not well-rounded

"While the student body as a whole is more rounded," he said, "I don't seem to meet people who are as well-rounded."

Johnson said today's students are wealthier than his classmates, have a more global view and are more likely to be found in the library on a Friday night.

"Williams is seen as a stepping stone," he said. Students who are as well-rounded."

Johnson said today's students are wealthier than his classmates, have a more global view and are more likely to be found in the library on a Friday night.

"Williams is seen as a stepping stone," he said. Students: "We were, all in all, less wrapped up in ourselves."

Time for extras now

"The best time is now," said Director of Alumni Relations Jim Briggs '60. He said involvement in fraternities, road-tripping and Saturday classes used to leave Wild class at Williams. "At first there was a fair amount of resistance toward women," she said, "especially in Bryant House," the last dormitory to house women.

The next year a freshman class with 150 women arrived. "The place began to feel coed," Hopkins said. "In retrospect, it seems that the transfer to coeducation came rather smoothly."

An exceptional student

The panel's best story-teller was Stoddard. He mentioned one student in the 1920's who, in his career at Williams, set up 20 cigar store Indians in front of the college chapel, lead the college band wearing a leopard skin jockstrap and tricked New York City authorities into allowing him to dig a two-foot wide trench across Fifth Avenue.

It's difficult to determine whether Stoddard intended the story as a challenge to today's Williams student.

Telephone rings in opera debut

by Karen Philipps

Many telephones rang last Thursday night, but one outsang all the rest. The performance of The Telephone, a one act comic opera by Gian Carlo Menotti, was a fun-filled singers-to-audience call.

The show takes place in the apartment of Lucy, sung by Valerie Anastasio '86, who is entertaining her boyfriend Ben, sung by Benjamin Duke '85. Ben makes several attempts to propose marriage to Lucy but is interrupted each time by a telephone call. Lucy first gossips with Margaret for several minutes while Ben waits in frustration. Anastasio sang the part beautifully and played it naturally. Lucy also receives a call for a wrong number and argues with another friend. At the end of this call she leaves the room crying.

Left alone, Ben sings angrily about the "two-headed monster." He craftily picks up some scissors and creeps across the room to cut the villain's cord. Lucy appears just in the nick of time to save her telephone. Ben exclaims that his actions were "all in self defense." The straight face with which Duke sang this part made it especially humorous.

Finally, Lucy makes one more phone call, and Ben has to leave to catch a train without asking the big question. Lucy, discovering that he is gone is distraught and understates, "I have a feeling he had something on his mind."

The phone then rings and Lucy sensing that it is Ben quickly reaches for her mirror. Lucy asks Ben where he is, and he replies, "terribly near you, right next to your ear." Ben then asks Lucy if she will marry him, and she says yes. They then sing a delightful duet in which Lucy tells Ben never to forget her telephone number, and he promises to call her every day. Their voices blended well.

Valerie Anastasio '85 and Ben Duke '85 sing in last week's opera, "The Telephone." (Finnemore)

The sole purpose of The Telephone is to entertain. Anastasio and Duke obviously had fun performing. Patricia Reuben '84 looked like the piano was tickling her fingers. Their enjoyment contributed largely to the success of the show. Everyone left Brooks-Rogers smiling.

OHIO STATE

An OSU student caught steam tunneling on campus was ordered by a local judge to serve his time by guarding the manhole he used. According to the Boston Globe, Eric Kruse must guard the manhole for four hours a day for two weeks. If he serves his time, he will only be on probation for six months. If he doesn't, he could be required to serve 30 days in the workhouse.

Franklin County Municipal Judge H. Alfred Glasco said in the Globe, "I told him I'd treat him like they do in the Army. If you're guarding a prisoner in the Army and he escapes, you have to do his time."

R.P.I.

In a fundraising campaign, students at R.P.I. voted for the name of their new computer by donating a dollar for each vote they cast to Pahl House, a drug rehabilitation center in Albany.

"Sybil" won first place with 260 dollar votes, followed closely by "Dave" at 170, "Opus" at 115, and "Zaphod" at 106. Over $750 was raised for charity in the effort.

OBERLIN

Students at Oberlin staged a "die-in" to protest campus recruiting by the Marines. According to the Middlebury Campus, students were sprawled on the floor of Peters Hall with white sheets shrouding their bodies. The die-in was sponsored by the Student Coalition Against Military Recruitment, with the main purpose of protesting U.S. military activity abroad.

Tarekin in A.M.T.; humor and criticism

by Martin Hildebrand

Williams theatre's production of Aleksandr Sukhovo-Kobylin's The Death of Tarekin presented a comedy of disguises, a bitter attack on the Russian justice system, and humor strong enough to draw considerable laughter from the audience.

Russian Professor Nicholas Fersen translated and adapted this play from its original 1869 version and directed the production.

The plot centers on Tarekin, played by Seth Amgott '86; General Barrabas, played by Jonathan Moscone '86; and some papers that Tarekin stole from Barrabas.

Deception involving names brought considerable humor and was a major part of the plot. Cyrus Kopp, a neighbor of Tarekin, had recently died. At the start of the play, Tarekin, having caused Kopp's corpse to appear to be his own, assumes Kopp's alias so that he can avoid the demands of his creditors. Unable to find the critical papers the supposedly deceased Tarekin stole, Barrabas himself takes on a disguise in an attempt to recover them.

The play harshly criticizes the Russian justice system. With the disguised Barrabas present, Dokh, an officer played by Cameron Smith '86, arrests Tarekin, whose identity is unknown, with little risk. Led by the statement by Barrabas that the arrested person "subsists on human blood," Dokh excitedly claims that he made the arrest at great risk to his life, that he will get a great award and riches, and that his prisoner is a vampire. The belief that a vampire is around allows Dokh and his supervisor, Okh, played by Ana Deboo '85, to have broad investigative powers which include arresting anyone they desire.

In the meantime, the imprisoned Tarekin is left tied to a chair and is denied water for two days. Greatly weakened by this torture, Tarekin surrenders the critical missing papers near the end of the play.

Despite the somewhat heavy plot, humor carried the play. When Dokh interrogates Joseph Janitor, played by Averil Clarke '87, Dokh demands that Joseph come closer; so Joseph climbs on top of Dokh. When preparing for the burial of what was presumed to be Tarekin, General Barrabas orders the five benefactors to grab each other by the neck and each produce three ducats from the person grabbed to pay for the burial, to supposedly show communal support. Later in the play, the clerk, played by Kate Prendergast '85, slowly exits after the interrogation of witnesses.

The performances of Dan Morris '84, who played Chibis and Joseph Industrialist; Dominic Ferro '85, who played Omega and Joseph Merchant; Katya Hokanson '84, who played Amalia and Shatala; and Dan Peris '86, who played a civil servant and Kachala; added to the humor and the presentation of injustice.

CUL examines housing for freshmen, role of JAs and Faculty Associates

by Sarah Abernathy

The Committee on Undergraduate Life reviewed the procedure for deciding freshman housing last Tuesday in an effort to improve it and make it more like upperclass housing processes.

"It bothered me that in some cases we honored requests for specific dorms (for freshmen), which we don't do in upperclass housing assignments," said CUL chairman David Colby.

Last summer acting Director of Admissions Tom Parker and Colby, who is Dean of Freshmen, spent three weeks arranging freshman rooming assignments by hand. They used the room application form as a starting point and then tried to match roommates so they would be compatible, Colby explained.

Dorm reputations go on

Some CUL members thought that honoring the requests made by many freshmen for specific dorms would make specific dorm reputations continue over the years.

"If you're going to give people a choice, you're going to be perpetuating the stigma attached to certain dorms," said Bill Foraker '85.

"We thought about computerizing this process because it would give us a lot more flexibility in matching people," Colby said. Using a computer to give random selection for dorms would make sorting people and matching roommates easier, he added.

JA role and selection

The CUL also discussed the role of a JA and possible improvements in the JA selection process. The Committee generally endorsed the idea of role-playing before the selection committee to show how the JAs would act in a tough situation with freshmen.

"Right now a lot of the decision process comes down to the JA selection committee sitting down and talking; your chances (of getting chosen) are much better if your JA or a friend is there than if you don't know anybody in the group," said Christine Harrington '84.

Colby said he has been discouraging JAs from emphasizing alcohol consumption to the freshmen, and he would like to see less importance placed on alcohol in general.

"Most of the damage on campus takes place because of alcohol," Colby stated.

Prize for non-alcoholic event

"I have a pot of money. I would like to give a prize to the house that gives the most creative non-alcoholic event in the second half of the semester—I would pay for the event," he said.

The CUL also began a review of the role of faculty-house associates. Associates are given money to entertain house members and are supposed to provide a link between the intellectual and the residential aspects of college life, Colby said.

In recent years faculty have become less involved with the houses, and both students and faculty seem to be waiting for the other to define the associate's role, Colby observed.

A Spring Day with games, departmental lunch tables and class dinners at the Log were suggested as possible ways to foster more student-faculty interaction.

"Faculty have more to offer than what they give in the classroom. The College Council has made an effort to promote more interaction; it would be nice if the faculty reciprocated," said Sara Gross '85.

Some questions remain about the proposals, however. "We have to think through the consequences," noted CEP chairman Andrew Crider. He added that students might use the plan simply to make their course-load easier rather than to explore new and more challenging courses as the committee hopes. In which case the proposals would not be beneficial.

Crider said he believed that many CEP members question this point. "My perception is that there is not a lot of support at the present time within the CEP for this proposal," he added.

O'Connor disagreed with Crider's objection, noting that "It comes down to your assumptions about student behavior here at Williams."

O'Connor added that if the CEP approves the proposals and the faculty also endorses them, the changes could be in effect by next fall. That is still in the future, however, and "there is a long road ahead of us," he noted.

3 fencers qualify for national tourney

by Stephen Theodore

The Williams Fencing Team began its career with a mixed performance on Saturday. The team was created more or less on the spot by members of the Williams Fencing Club. The fledgling team of six men and three women faced the seven-man, two-women squad from SUNY, New Paltz.

In the women's foil division, Williams lost 6-3 to an unconventional New Paltz team. Because of personnel difficulties, one of New Paltz's men competed with their two female fencers. Donna Carpenter '85 led the Williams women with two wins and one loss for the day. Freshmen Sheila Dacey and Tina Cervone, both beginners, fenced very well in support.

In the men's "A" foil, freshman Tae Cho led the team to a 6-3 victory, going undefeated in three bouts. Fencing Club President Gordon Leeds '86 and David Cervone '84 also fenced well. Both teams were surprised by Williams' strong performance in their first competition as a team.

Closing out the day, the men's "B" foil competition resulted in a 6-3 loss for Williams. Steve Theodore '87 went 2-1, with sophomores Bryan Lovely and Mike Best close behind. The won-lost record is deceptive, with almost all of the bouts being decided by one or two touches.

Skiing—

Williams only had two nordic skiers at this year's Nationals, O'Connor for the men and Sarah Bates '85 for the women. Bates was 30th in the 7km, giving Williams 13th in the event. O'Connor's 10th gave Williams an eleventh in the 14km. CU was second in the men's event and UVM placed third. For the women, New Mexico and Vermont tied for first in the race.

Despite their poor performance, men's Alpine Coach Ed Grees had only praise for his team, stressing that this was just one race and that the overall season performance was more indicative of the team's quality. Said Grees, "I am pleased with the season on the whole; with just one meet either anything's going to go right or it's not."

Women's Alpine Coach Leslie Orton was also proud of the team despite the less-than-average performance. She noted that none of the teams in the East fared very well and that it just "wasn't a good week."

Fisher commented later "It's disappointing, but that's the way it goes. Sometimes things just don't go right; all our problems were wrapped into one week."

Three qualify for nationals

Last weekend, Cho, Leeds, and Theodore fenced in the Sectional and National qualifying tourney at New Paltz, N.Y. Leeds took second place and Cho third, the difference in their records being only two touches throughout the day's bouts. Both also qualified for the National championships this June in Chicago and the North Atlantic sectionals this May. Donna Carpenter fenced in the equivalent women's tourney and took second, also qualifying for both sectionals and nationals.

The fencers' next meet is the Woodstock Invitational on March 31 at Woodstock, N.Y. The Fencing club also sponsors beginning and intermediate fencing classes through the P.E. department.

Runners go for 24 hours raise money for charity

by Chris Stearns

Over 300 runners participated Saturday and Sunday in the 13th annual 24-hour relay and raised approximately 3,000 dollars for various charities in Williamstown, including the Dennis Butler Rehabilitation fund. Taking top honors by running the longest distance this year was the Williams Roadrunners Club who ran away with the victory by completing 260 miles. Other teams who finished were Williams-Dodd-Mission with 225, Christian Fellowship-Rowhouse and Striders of the Purple Valley each with 210, and Retreads with 209 miles. In the 24 hour span each Roadrunner averaged about 28 miles at 5:30 per mile.

The race began at 10:00 am. Saturday with food being brought in every few hours. The teams reported their mileage at six hour intervals all Sunday. The day seemed to pass quickly but as the race moved into the night, the miles began to take their toll. Teams soon dwindled down to a few members and some such as Dodd-Mission and Williams Hall combined to conserve energy.

By morning, however, the teams were tired but excitement was once again high as the finish approached. At the end of the race over 1800 miles had been run for a good cause. Soon the fieldhouse was cleared as the runners went back to their dorms to sleep until next year when the 24-hour once again gets away.

Basketball season in review by two guys who saw it all

by Lee Farbman
and Dave Heinlein
As a public service for those who couldn't make it to all the games, The Record presents the highlights from this year's men's basketball season.

December
Considered pre-season (at least by me). Two home games, but I don't remember against whom. Coach Sheehy still figuring out who should play where. We win the Berkshre Classic.

At Union
Louls (Jeff Goodell '84) missed the back end of a 1-and-1 because his brother was taking pictures. He always did have the greatest free throw style, though: several dribbles, stop. One bounce, one step forward, shoot. I get introduced to McNuggets—soon to become a staple of road trips.

At Skidmore
Postponed due to blizzard.
Springfield
1984 home debut. Woulda, coulda, shoulda. Didn't quite have enough to beat them.

Trinity
Rerun of Springfield game. Trinity was ranked highly in New England. Still, we had a lead. Learning to work as a team. Still, we lost.

At Dartmouth
What a drive. Luckily the JV took the Big Green to overtime (phenomenal!) so we didn't miss too much of the Varsity game. Dartmouth is big inside. Williams played an aggressive press. I left my camera in the car. We spun out on Route 2 coming home. Dartmouth won.

At Connecticut College
Didn't go. Would have had to wake up too early. Anyhow, we lost. The team seems to have trouble maintaining leads. Four straight losses. Everyone at the Christian Fellowship is trying to pull strings to help out Harry.

At Middlebury
Three Williams fans against the world. The Ephs lead the whole way. We ran a successful stall, so their crowd chanted "Boring." We responded, "Winning." They had cheerleaders. I left my camera in the car again.

At Colby
Didn't go. Colby is in Maine. We lost.

At Bates
Didn't go. Bates is in Maine. Fans there are so obnoxious, the BATES coach asked them to leave the night before. We won.

Brandeis
Whose funeral? The home crowd was so unresponsive, it prompted the now famous "Sixth Man" letter to The Record. We won in spite of Celucci's six million points for the Judges.

At Wesleyan
Luckily, we had the Volleyball team for protection. Whenever we yelled, the Wes crowd responded with the highly original "Shut up!" Wesleyan has the best P.A. announcer of any team we played. The Ephs beat a very solid Cardinal squad. 1-0 in the Little Three.

At W.P.I.
Orville Bailey went over 1000 points. Then he went over 1002 points. Alums gave us beer after the game and called our coach Harry Sheehan. We lost in spite of a good Eph alum turnout. I left my camera in my room. Karen, their cheerleader fell, but we cheered for her.

Amherst
The big one. Good response to the Sixth Man letter. A new tradition—streamers from the balcony on the first Williams field goal! They look great!! (Does anyone have a photograph of it?) The game wasn't as close as the score indicated. It was "do or die" for Amherst, and they died. Club Stupid born. 2-0 in the Little Three.

R.P.I.
We came to cheer, but.... This loss may have cost Williams a spot in the ECAC playoffs. 0-2 against the Polytechnical teams. Where's the justice?

Wesleyan
More streamers. JV team avenges a road loss. We clinch at least a tie for the Little Three title, as we are still undefeated in league play.

In action at the Williams-Amherst basketball game, the sky-walker Dave Krupski '84 goes up for two as fans' favorite Bobby (no. 12) gazes on. (Khakee)

Clark
Wham! Big upset for us. Awesome game. Clark is in the NCAA tournament. Mike Meadows '86 slams one. Artie Pidorianno '84 breaks Sheehy's scoring record on a shot that brings rain. Clark lost, but how good is Dan Trant?

At Skidmore
We have three witnesses that will swear that Dave Krupski '84 got off the ground on a jumper. Coach Chambliss got lost on the way, again. Skidmore has a play they call "running game." We suggest they try "scoring game." (It worked for us). Skidmore was wishing for another blizzard.

Tufts
Krupski hits a Kareem sky hook. All the seniors see playing time (all-important P.T.) in their final home game. After the game we hear that Wesleyan creamed Amherst. We're outright Little Three champs. There's the justice.

At New England College
No way were we driving through that ice storm. We listened on the radio. Back to the bad old days—we blow a 13 point first half lead. It's clear the team missed us. The JV hit triple figures, though.

At Amherst
We run a basketball there. (I have the clipping to prove it.) The JV has a 5 on 4 power play for the final minute. (Two of the eight Amherst players fouled out, and two were injured.) The streamers look better at Lasell. We cheer, "Keep the frats, abolish the school." Amherst asks, "Where's the Eph?" Coach Sheehy's record goes to 20-0 in Little Three competition as a player and coach. I remembered my camera.

Thanks guys, for an enjoyable two months.

Ephs 4th in Nationals, lost title to Kenyon

by Chris Clarey
The women's swimming team saw their two year reign as national champions come to a close Saturday as they finished fourth with 232 points, behind Kenyon College of Ohio (307½), Minnesota's Hamline (283½), and Pomona of California (260) at the Nationals held at Emory University in Atlanta.

"I'm really proud of the whole team," said coach Carl Samuelson. "It's not that we swam poorly. We improved on all our New England times and really swam with intensity, but the competition was very impressive and remarkably deep compared to last season."

The Ephs, who were in fourth place at the end of each of the competition's three days, totalled 96 points on Thursday (just 19 behind first place Hamline) as freshman Joan Horgan and the 200 medley relay team each turned in first-place, meet-record breaking performances. Horgan, in her first national event, swam a 2:11.27 in the 200 backstroke to break the old mark of 2:12.44 set last year by Monique Fisher of Smith. The relay team composed of co-captain Cella Cleplela '84, Kathy Kirmayer '86, Kim Eckrich '85, and Horgan narrowly clipped Williams' own 1983 record of 1:51.67 with a 1:56.66 clocking.

In the days other action, Eckrich took fourth in the 200 Individual Medley (2:13.70), and Kirmayer turned in a fifth place in the 50 freestyle (24.72). The 800 free relay team finished fifth in 8:02.21, as first place Pomona swam a 7:50.41 to break Williams' 1983 record by just over four seconds.

Gap widens
On Friday the gap widened slightly (Williams' total of 182 points was 40 points behind Hamline at the end of the day) despite the Ephs winning three of six events. Horgan won for the second time, claiming the 100 backstroke in 60:38. Eckrich swam a 1:06.92 to take the 100 breaststroke and the 400 medley team (Eckrich, Horgan, Kirmayer, and Cleplela) came out on top with a time of 4:03.37.

Kenyon broke away from the pack on the final day, outpointing rival Hamline 116 to 61 over the six events. Eckrich was the only Eph victor that day, winning the 200 breaststroke in 2:26.44. This was the third straight year that she has swept both breaststroke events at the Nationals. The 400 freestyle relay finished third. Jonna Kurucz '85 took tenth in the 1650 freestyle, and Kirmayer won the 100 freestyle consolation to close out Williams' scoring.

Skiers place 11th in Nationals
O'Connor takes tenth in Nordic competition

by Greg Leeds

Colman O'Connor '85, the sole representative of Williams' men's cross country ski team, placed tenth in the 14km race at the NCAA Nationals at Attitash, New Hampshire to earn All-American honors. Unfortunately his performance was by far Williams' best among the six events entered. The only two events Williams failed to qualify enough skiers in were the two nordic relays.

University of Utah defended its National crown, edging out University of Vermont for the 1984 title. Utah won all four alpine events and both men's nordic events. University of New Mexico and UVM were the only other schools to win events; UNM won the women's relay and tied Vermont for first in the women's 7km.

Utah had a total of 750 points in the eight events. UVM placed second with 684 points, and UNM had third with 580. Next were University of Colorado with 556, University of Wyoming with 516, and Dartmouth with 491. Then came the University of New Hampshire, followed closely by Middlebury, Montana State at 9th (294 points), and then St. Lawrence was tenth with 224. Williams came in eleventh with 157 points.

Shaky start in GS

The week started off on shaky ground with the giant slalom race. Williams' best finisher for the men was Helge Welner '87 at 26th, who was followed by Chris Eagon '84 with 29th. Co-captain Crawford Lyons '84 had a disappointing 31st, and John Pler '85 was 37th. Williams was ninth in the event. Utah won, as they did all the alpine events; Wyoming was second, Dartmouth was 3rd, and UVM was 4th.

In the women's GS, Williams fared no better, placing 9th. Donna MacDonald '87 was the best Eph finisher at 17th, followed by teammate Kate Knopp '85 at 20th. UVM took second in the event behind Utah.

In the men's slalom, Williams again ran into trouble. Lyons was ninth after the first run and had a good second run going until he hooked a tip, spun around, and went through a gate backwards. He still finished just three seconds out of first place in the second run, though, and combined for 18th. Eagon was 25th, while Pler was 31st and Tim Hill '86 came in 34th. All the Ephmen fell or had similar problems in the second run.

James Marceau of CU won the national slalom title, and Knut Aronson of Utah was 2nd. Utah's Harold Gefle nabbed third place. The Eastern teams fared well as UNM was second in the event, Dartmouth third, UVM fourth, and Williams was eighth.

Head Coach Bud Fisher noted that Lyons was particularly disappointed with his finish. "He had a very good first run and had a good shot for a top-five finish until he hooked a tip," he said.

MacDonald fell in the first run of the women's slalom but still finished 27th, giving Williams an eleventh-place finish in that event. Wyoming was second in the event behind Utah, and UVM was third.

The Wms. Broken Record

VOL. 97, NO. 22

APRIL 3, 1984

This man may never drop ketchup on his foot again unless students and alumni succeed in raising enough money to bail him out of an Amherst jail

(Would've been by Pynchon, but she wasn't there)

Ball has been posted at $159 for Williams President John W. Chandler, now being held in Hampshire County Jail on charges of "uncharacteristically gross and offensive" behavior following a weekend fraternity party at Amherst College.

Alumni Director Cragin Lewis and members of the Williams Development Office have begun an extensive telephone campaign to alumni in a hurried attempt to raise the bail money for Chandler.

Rowdy Chandler arrested in New movable dormitories seedy Amherst frat incident will be wave of the future

The Williams President was arrested early Saturday morning when Amherst police caught him in the act of constructing a six-foot high snow phallus on the front lawn of Amherst President G. Armour Craig. According to several officers, Chandler had apparently consumed large quantities of beer and "incredibly cheap whiskey."

Several Amherst students reported seeing Chandler earlier in the evening at a number of different parties. One freshman commented that he had seen the Williams President wandering around a freshman dormitory, apparently in search of another party.

"He looked pretty glassy-eyed at that point and he just kept muttering 'Where's the beer? Where's the beer? I don't think there's any back there.' I told him there wasn't so he stumbled outside and threw up next to a tree. I thought he looked a little old for that sort of thing, but I just figured he was a trustee or something," the freshman said.

Other students reported seeing Chandler at a house dinner at Epsilon Upsilon Omicron fraternity. "He was wearing a lampshade and telling religious jokes about St. Augustine and Reinhold Niebuhr. What a weirdo!" fraternity president Wendall "Biff" Worthington III said. "We were going to throw him out, but he kept saying 'Walt, I can get you into a good college real easy.'"

Police stated that after his arrest, Chandler explained why he had built the obscene snow sculpture. "The dirty rat, he welched on me," Chandler apparently said, referring to President Craig. "I told him I'd tell U.S. News his stupid little college was the best, if he'd give me a piece of the action. Then when I showed up, he told me he owed me nothing. Hell, I could've voted for Swarthmore. Well, I'll show him."

Unless Williams officials succeed in raising bail, Chandler will be held in custody until his court appearance next month. Acting Williams President Cris Roosenraad reported that the fund-raising drive is progressing slowly. "We just may not get him out in time," he said. "People just don't seem to be willing to pay that kind of money for a college president anymore. Looks like I'm in charge for a while."

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor had only one comment on the situation. "We're really pretty powerless. What are we going to do, throw him out of school?"

Record Editor Michael Govan '85, last seen dropping different-sized balls from the Leaning Tower of Pisa, could not be reached for comment.

Houses will soon be based on underground train tracks and shuttled around like shells in an escalating drama of nuclear horror, the College announced yesterday as part of a new pact with the Pentagon to base the housing transfer system on a "Dense Pack" MX system.

The plan will not only rejuvenate the Williams ethos by destroying the differences among housing groups but will also prevent the Soviet Union from knocking out America's future corporate elite in a preemptory "first-strike" attack.

Under the new system students would no longer scramble desperately in an ultimately ill-fated attempt to get out of so-called "undesirable physical plant" locations such as Pro House and Mission Park. Instead, they would be housed on movable, functional dormitory buildings possessing the capability to immediately submerge into the rocky terrain and emerge virtually anywhere else on campus.

The new houses will be shuffled anytime and anywhere the deans feel like it. One could be blessed with a walk-in closet and a fireplace one day and damned in a six-walled pit the next.

"Say you live in Gladden House," said Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta. "It's late at night, you're coming back from the Pub and you're hurting. You want to go to bed. You walk into what you think is your house. It isn't. It's Dodd. You go to sleep in your bed. It isn't. You wake up. You wonder where the hell you are. The person whose bed you're in calls the cops. You react.

"This is the kind of vibrant, stimulating exchange that our residential housing system, its very ethos, if you will, is based on," Kenyatta said. "It's beautiful."

Pink and green nightmare
Houses will no longer be stigmatized with harmful stereotypes because the Soviets would have to hit virtually all the hardened house silos to wipe out, say, the swimmers or Snack Bar types, Kenyatta said.

The test will have the advantages of dispensing with the much-ballyhooed but overrated Pomilla Plan, which allowed transfers only if one was so unfairly shafted with a Quasimodo-like prison cell that one felt like plunging out its grimy narrow window, while avoiding a return to the Olde System of Free Transfers, which the administration felt allowed cliques of insolent preppies to band together in frat-like living groups and thumb their noses at established rules of decency while living in

Cypriot ineligible: not a real student

After careful investigation, the Record has learned that recently elected College Council President Andrew Cypriot is not enrolled at Williams College, and is thus ineligible to serve.

"We were completely fooled," said outgoing CC president Tom Paper '84. "He's been coming to meetings and participating for two years now—he was even on Fin Comm—so we assumed he was a student."

When questioned, Cypriot's running mate Anza Mammen '86 admitted that he knew about the error but "didn't want to upset Andrew by mentioning it to him. If nobody else noticed, I was going to let it slide," he said.

Elections committee chairman Jan van Eck '85 said that "the election will stand. It was our fault for not noticing, so we've got to let him stay."

Administration officials also plan no punishment. "We're pretty powerless," Dean Dan O'Connor said. "What are we going to do—throw him out of school?"

Cypriot said he felt justified in his action, and indicated that he felt he could do a better job than most students. "I'll be able to devote more time and energy to the Council this way. Working with them was so important to me that I felt schoolwork should take a back seat."

When asked if he ever planned to enroll at Williams, Cypriot said, "Let's face it: there's no parking, it's ugly—it's a hole down there!" He later added, "but I really like the people."

Humes helps ex-pres Nixon for Democratic nomination

by Spoof Scoop

Ex-President of the United States and national Watergate disgrace Richard Mills House Nixon outlined his newest presidential campaign and sought support in his speech in the Wreck Room of Armstrong House Thursday night.

Although Nixon is Constitutionally ineligible for the Presidency, he said if Sridhar Ramaswamy could swing it illegally at Williams, he could, too.

"Even if it's not legal, Gerry said I can do anything I want," Tricky Dick explained, referring to President Ford's pardon of Nixon.

Although Massachusetts was the only state Nixon did not carry in the 1972 Presidential election, Dick said he has always considered Williams a particular stronghold of his, particularly because of his close personal relationship with Professor James MacGregor Burns.

Nixon said that his reputation as a man who couldn't win an election for dog-catcher in Hoboken, NJ was unjustified, pointing out that if a broken-down old movie has-been can become President, than any baggy-panted, alcoholic, hallucinating old criminal should be a shoo-in.

Hamilton Humes '85, acting on-campus campaign manager for Nixon's National Democratic Presidential Nomination Committee said he did not personally agree with Nixon's politics, but that some alumnus might notice him doing it and hire him.

"Face it, I know the guy's a dangerously ill psychotic maniac who just wants to be President so he can go to China and get drunk with fancy booze

College officials are confused by last night's theft of Sawyer Library, right down to its foundations. The thieves, who are unknown, left no trace of their unknown is how the thieves managed to carry off the large four-story structure without attracting any notice. "I don't know," commented President Chandler. (Did Scheibe take this picture? We don't know)

Gee, how did that happen? College Admission Director Phil Smith asked himself after acceptance letters for the Class of 1988 were sent to 500 used car salesmen. "I really don't understand how it happened," said Smith. "I had the acceptance letters on the right-hand side of my desk, and my inquiries about buying a 1977 Pacer or Gremlin over here... People have complained that we don't have enough diversity at Williams, but that should change now," he added. College Council Vice-President Jan Van Eck '85 agreed, noting, "we'll have to let them all in. After all, it was our mistake for sending the letters out." Dean Dan O'Connor added, "We're really pretty powerless. What are we going to do—throw them out of school?" (Khakee's BMW)

No kicker and

We couldn't think of a headline...

Despite assurances that students are eager to attend a spring weekend concert, none of the bands solicited by the Student Activities Board has agreed to perform at Williams this spring. Many top musical performers were approached, but none has yet been scheduled to appear for the weekend of April 20 in Lansing-Chapman Hockey Rink.

"We were especially excited about the possibility of Shaun Cassidy coming here," said SAB chairman Arunas Gudaitis '84. "Our agent had assured us that we could get him, but he unfortunately broke a fingernail and couldn't sign the contract."

Other groups planned for the event were The Clash and Madness, but they too had to back out. Citing the "Inexplicable acts of God" clause in their contract, a spokesman for Madness said, "We didn't know it was raining."

The Clash bowed out for similar reasons, saying, "We thought Williamstown was in Virginia, until we looked at the map."

Asked if the SAB would seek recourse against the bands for not appearing, Gudaitis said, "Yes. Gary and I aren't going to buy any more of their records, unless we find a great sale."

Dean Dan O'Connor added, "We're really pretty powerless. What are we going to do—throw them out of school?"

"We're very excited about performing," said O'Connor. "Sean and I have worked in Lansing Rink before, and we found it a very cozy and intimate space."

"There was a suggestion that the concert be moved to Down-Stage, but everyone felt that despite the security problems, the rink was more able to accommodate the rowdy drinking crowds the Dean and I will bring in," added Crotty.

Record editor Michael Govan, recently seen re-touching the Sistine Chapel, could not be reached for comment.

In Other Totalitarian Regimes Mainland China

According to the March issue of Inside Mainland China, "a representative to the 11th Communist Youth League Congress and Hupeh model worker was allowed to establish a photo stand business. The person set up a photo stand on the corner of Mintzu Road. Some departments used the impact on flood prevention as an excuse and seized his camera and took it away, and also issued a fine. In the end the area's responsible person came forward and went to work. It was not until the end that the camera was returned, but the person was still made to pay fifty cents every day for storage."

The Unification Church

In an attempt to get the Supreme Court to review the recent case convicting the Rev. Sun Myung Moon of tax fraud and conspiracy, Dr. Mose Durst, publisher of The Unification News, called upon all church members to "please pray for the motion and please especially pray for the Supreme Court judges." To aid members' prayers, the paper listed the full names of all nine justices.

Cuba

According to Gramma, "the official organ of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba," the Cuban team recently won the ten gold medals at stake in the 5th International Greco-Roman Wrestling Tourney held in Las Tunas in which athletes from seven countries participated. Jesus Tejera, world champion in the 57-kg division, was named the athlete with the best technique and the 74-kg division bout between Cuban Victor Romero and Lou Montano of the USA proved to be the best. In addition, the School for Advanced Training of Athletics and the Central Sports Club of the Revolutionary Armed Forces were well represented at the tournament.

Amherst

The Amherst Student recently reported that "on Saturday, March 3, the Asian Students Association of Amherst sponsored the film, The Seven Samurai by the well-known Japanese director Akira Kurosawa. The film was followed by a small, informal reception (in celebration of the new Lunar Year in the Orient) at the Porter Language House, featuring various samples of Asian dishes. Even though there were some anticipated problems, (such as the fourth reel of the film, which projected onto the screen upside down)...the two events were successful."

Director of Security Ransom Jenks reportedly is unhappy about plans to move the Security Office to a smaller location as part of the college's money-saving renovations. In particular he wondered where his officers will park their vehicles from now on. (Glick says she took this picture, but we don't believe her) depraved, animalistic, and totally un-liberal-arts-like conditions. The Defense Department is funding the plan as part of a simulation studying the effects of unreasonable and tyrannical governmental edicts on the morale of college-aged troops. Most campus leftists said they were opposed to the plan because the Defense Department was for it. The rightists were opposed to the leftists. Presidential contender Gary Hart said he disagreed with both of them but agreed with both of them in principle.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said there hadn't been an ad hoc committee formed in some time, and said he was forming one to study this issue, but added in a comment not for publication that there was no way in hell the committee's opinion would get more than a few laughs at the next faculty steering committee meeting.

"I respect student opinion," he said, "but then again, Nietzsche respected student opinion too."

The Imperial Faculty

As the administration busily squawks, clucks, and flaps with indignation, wildly chasing those much ballyhooed secret student fraternities (as ominous as they are illusory), they are completely overlooking what is perhaps the most dangerous and powerful fraternity of all: the Faculty Club.

Why call it a fraternity? Think about it for a moment (actually, just read the article and believe. Would we lie?) It fits the bill by any definition conceivable. Consider the following points:

•The Faculty Club has its own meeting place/watering hole, and a pretty lush one it is, too. What with its bowling alley and its swank lounge, you'd think this was a country club or something. It's also the most exclusive of enclaves; a non-member's chance of getting in are worse than a suppository's chance with a hemorrhoid case.

•The Tenure Process is nothing more than a sophisticated variation of fraternity Rush. Which is more time-consuming, humiliating, and dangerous—wearing a toilet seat or being forced to write a dozen articles (of no less than five pages and no more than eight, double spaced) a week for five years or until you have a stroke?

In order to investigate what really happens at the Club, this reporter donned a bushy beard and gray tweed jacket (carefully applying chalk stains on the lapel for authenticity), and miraculously, was able to successfully pass through the doors, all the while being stared down by six doberman pinchers held tenuously on a leash by the Dean of Faculty.

Besides some orgiastic eating, drinking, wenching, and sniffing, very little seemed to be going on. I was disappointed. Sure, there was a creative grape-eating contest, but it was all old hat.

There was, however, one incident worth noting. As the evening's revels drew to a close, Dean Daniel O'Connor was soon well-lubricated enough (two? seven? eighteen? the world may never know...) to attempt his now legendary rendition of "My Heart Belongs to Daddy", drawing bleary-eyed boos from the sodden crowd. As Dean of Freshmen Colby griped, "We're really pretty powerless," and wistfully noted, "what are we going to do, throw him out of school?" But the point of all this is that The Faculty Club is a fraternity in practice if not in name, and that its clannishness is a divisive element which unnecessarily alienates the students and faculty from each other, and exercises a dangerous

Crazed basketball fan goes wild; wreaks havoc on rival colleges

The sixth man of Eph basketball fame went on a rampage over spring break in what psychologists believe to be a violent reaction to the NCAA tournament, pontificating that Williams should have gotten an at-large invitation by virtue of going 4-0 in Little Three play.

Since the Ephs finished their season a month ago at Amherst, the possessed sixth man has been a fan without a cause. "It seems we've created a Frankenstein," said coach Harry Sheehy.

The crazed fan's odyssey first took him to Trintly, where he fit in easily dressed in green slacks and a pink lacoste shirt. "4-and-0 in the Little Three," he yelled at passers-by. As if on a crusade, he preached the precision and beauty of Williams basketball. "Yea, but we beat you," one equally proud Bantam yelled back. The sixth man lost all control. Under a screen of purple and gold streamers, he attacked and killed the student, G. Skiffington Farnsworth III.

The over-zealous sixth man then strode onto the Wesleyan campus breathing fire. "Undefeated in the Little Three," he chanted in a dirge-like rhythm. Witnesses say he then gave a 45 minute speech on what it meant to him to be a follower of Williams basketball. The Wesleyan students showed no interest in the gospel according to the sixth man. However, they did gather around him and even applauded because they knew he was protesting something. Having encountered no resistance, the triumphant fan left.

The sixth man later stopped at Amherst. Dressed in a toga, sandals, and a laurel crown, he captured immediate attention of the Amherst students. A handfull, who had for some reason refused to eat, heralded him as a prophet and a demigod. Once entranced by the sixth man's spell, the helpless students were no match as he savagely turned on them and banished them all to Troy.

Police are unable to find the sixth man. Though believed to be in the Berkshire area, the sixth man poses little or no danger. "He seems almost human when in the Purple Valley," one officer said.

"We're really pretty powerless," said Williams Dean Dan O'Connor. "What are we going to do—throw him out of school?"

Presidents of several NES-CAC institutions have protested the sixth man's actions. Even Williams Athletic Director Bob Peck has denounced him, saying, "I believe this so-called sixth man has stepped over that fine line between constructive and destructive spectator participation."

A spokesman for the deranged fan replied, "You can only chant 'Amherst sucks' so many times. There comes a point when you have to go down there, seek out anti-Williams elements, and liquidate them. We should just be thankful that the sixth man has the nads to do it."

Record editor Michael Govan, last seen playing for the Italian Olympic basketball team, could not be reached for comment.

"Oh my God!" screamed astonished substitute conductor Kenneth Roberts as the entire viola section suddenly blew up during a recent performance by the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra. Assistant substitute conductor Douglas Moore, now believed to have engineered the devastating explosion, calmly assumed the principal violist's tricky solo cadenza.

that has little umbrellas on the side of the glass," reasoned Humes, "but I gave Tigar and Keating the money to run the Record, so I can hardly turn back now."

Questioned by Williams students on his policies in South Africa and Central America, Nixon replied that he was really interested in Africa last year—but got bored when they failed to settle their problems during Winter Study—and lost interest in Central America when Michael Jackson's Thriller album was released. Nixon's response was warmly received.

After his lecture at Williams, Nixon continued on to Amherst, where the audience chanted puerile obscenities and barged the candidate with beer bottles.

"When are you pigs going to grow up and play human?" demanded Nixon. "I hope they take away your frats."

Michael Govan, the Record's bohemian editor in Rome said, "Unless they buried him six feet under with a bulldozer, I'm not interested."

Fun social clubs sprout up

First came Club Bacchus, a social and boozing club for anyone that could be suckered out of thirty bucks. Now other groups, expressing different aims and goals, have been formed in order to accommodate the social needs of those who are not in the Bacchus mold.

Club Venus was formed by disgruntled women who felt excluded from Bacchus by its locker-room machismo atmosphere. Members must wear white gloves at all functions and say "thank you" every time a door is opened for them. Venuslans are also bound by vows of chastity.

Club Aristotle was founded with six philosophy majors and three freshmen from Greenwich Village as charter members. "This group provides an opportunity to ponder the ethical imperatives of existence; we, ilke, groove to that scene," said one of the budding philosophers.

Another of these specialty clubs is Club Thor, a support group for those in the serious quest for mighty thews. They meet three times a day in the weight room, and the club provides members with discounts on anabolic steroids. As one member bellowed, "We don't speak good, but just try and tell me dat to my face!"

Finally there is the Mole Club, which specializes in organic chemistry buffs. Inducted at the end of freshman year, Moles are not seen again until graduation, when they stumble out of Thompson to receive diplomas. One Mole humorously noted, "H²SO⁴(ArCl³)³—HCl SO⁴Ar²!"

Frosh get fewer first choice houses

Flock to Greylock, drop Berkshire Q.

by Joe Ehlers

A major shift occurred in the popularity of different houses during freshman inclusion this year. The number of freshmen receiving their first choice in housing dropped by more than ten percentage points, from 73 percent last year to 62 percent. Upperclass transfers, administered for the first time under the prioritized system, received mixed results compared with last year.

A strong drop in the popularity of the Berkshire Quad as a first choice accompanied an increase in the popularity of Greylock, the Row Houses and Mission Park. Dodd-Tyler also experienced a drop in first choice applications.

Kenyatta mystified

Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta had no explanations for the drop in first choice applications to the Berkshire Quad. "It's hard to know why requests went down," she noted. "People didn't seem to want to apply there from the freshman class, yet it has remained popular with upperclassmen."

Mission Park still presents a problem to the college, Kenyatta said. A provision to let groups of up to seven freshmen apply together to Mission increased first choice requests from two last year to 33 this year. However, Kenyatta said she did not feel this was a major improvement.

"I don't see that it made much of a difference," she stated. "Only one group of seven applied, one group of six, and three groups of five people each."

"I've been counting on groups of students going into Mission and making it what they want it to be," added Kenyatta, "but that hasn't happened."

Fewer first choices

Fewer freshmen overall received their first choices this year because of a large increase in first choice requests to Greylock, from 190 last year to 236.

In addition, an increase in Row House applications meant that only 62 percent of the freshmen received their first choice. More than 20 percent of the freshmen received their fourth or fifth choice in housing, and over 30 percent of the freshmen who did not get their first choice received their fourth or fifth choice.

Juniors fare better

Among upperclass transfers, almost 70 percent of the juniors received their first choice, compared to only 53 percent of the sophomores. Junior transfer applications were not processed

Full-time prof. hired to teach Chinese

by R. DeMott

Beginning next year the College will offer an interdisciplinary concentration program in Asian Studies and will also create a Chinese language department to be staffed by a full-time visiting professor. (See related article page 4.)

The Asian Studies program will require students to take six courses divided into three categories, beginning with one of three 'concept' courses: Anthropology 101 (The Scope of Anthropology), Religion 101 (Introduction to Religion) or Economics 204 (Economic Development).

In the second part of the program students will take a series of four 'core' courses chosen from a list of approximately 20 area-related courses offered by various departments. The new Chinese courses, as well as many from the history, religion and art departments, are included.

The program ends with a required 'capstone' course, Asian Studies 401/History 365 (Contemporary Asia).

Student interest

History Professor Peter Frost, chairman of the program, said, "I'm really pleased. I think it will provide some big opportunities." He added that interest from students and pressure from the Admissions Office were major factors behind the inception of the new program.

This year the number of Asian-American students applying to Williams rose by 49 percent.

"A lot of students asked why we didn't have a program like this," Frost explained. "All of the other colleges in the 12-College Exchange already have programs like this. We're trying to catch up to Amherst and Wesleyan who have Asian Studies majors."

Won't be a major

Asked about the possibility of upgrading the program to a major in the near future, Frost replied that he was not in favor of it. "My hopes are that people would take a traditional major and then some program such as Women's Studies, African Studies or Asian Studies," he said.

Frost, noting two other areas of the program which he would like to see grow, said that a professor of Japanese language will be appointed for next year and possibly a professor of East Asian literature.

Frost added that he would also like to see the Art Department take on an instructor in East Asian art.

The Greylock Quad took a leap in popularity among freshmen during inclusion this year, as 236 applied first choice for the Quad, almost 100 more than requested row houses. Last year 190 freshmen marked Greylock first choice, as compared to 117 for the row houses. (Glick)

Liddle '82 drowned in crew accident

Memorial services were held Saturday at St. John's Episcopal Church in Williamstown for 24-year-old Katherine "Kippy" Liddle '82, killed March 23 in a boating accident on the Schuylkill River in Philadelphia.

Liddle, an assistant crew coach at the Brooks School in North Andover, Mass., was last seen as she was swept over a 12-foot waterfall. According to police, she and a student lost control of their small outboard motor boat and jumped overboard as they neared the falls.

The student, and three young men who abandoned their boat in a rescue attempt, were also carried over the waterfall. All four were unharmed. However, police explained that the substantial fall and the possible presence of rocks or debris in the water could have accounted for Liddle's death.

Body still lost

Although search efforts have not yet turned up a body, Liddle is presumed drowned. Bodies have been lost in the same area in the past, police noted.

Liddle and the student were pulling away from the dock when a rope became entangled in the propeller of the boat's motor, police said. Although the two managed to pull off the rope, the boat would not start and drifted toward the falls about 100 yards away.

A heavy guide wire is strung across the falls for stranded boaters to hold on to, but the two apparently did not see it, police added.

Liddle, who had been at the Brooks School for two years, was a history teacher, supervised a girls dormitory and was assistant crew coach. The school's 15-member crew team, together with the lacrosse team, had travelled to Philadelphia for preseason training during spring vacation.

'82 crew co-captain

At Williams Liddle majored in history and was a co-captain of the 1982 women's crew team which won the Little Three title and reached the finals of the prestigious Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia. She was a resident of Salt Lake City, Utah, and graduated from Skyline High School, where she had been a student body officer and member of the National Honor Society.

Her father, Dr. Harold V. Liddle, is a member of the Williams Class of 1947.

Frosh Singh arrested for break-in, joyriding in showroom automobile

by Christian Howlett

Freshman Arvind Singh, 18, was arraigned in Northern Berkshire District Court Wednesday on a variety of charges stemming from a break-in and joyriding incident early last Saturday morning.

According to Williamstown and North Adams police, Singh broke a window and entered the Thomas McMahon Chevrolet dealership on Main Street at around midnight Friday, March 30. He then drove a car from the dealership out onto Main Street and was sighted entering the wrong way down a one-way street by a North Adams officer on foot patrol.

The officer radioed for a cruiser, which checked the car and determined it had been stolen. After a pursuit, Singh was finally apprehended at 1:04 a.m. when he crossed the center line and went off the road into a hedge in front of 502 Main Street.

North Adams police have charged him with a variety of misdemeanors, including operating under the influence of alcohol, failure to stop for a police officer, having no license, going the wrong way down a one-way street, speeding and passing in a no-passing zone.

Could be deported

North Adams Detective Bill Davis said the charges are punishable either by fines or a jail sentence. Singh, a resident of New Delhi, India, could face deportation if convicted.

In connection with the break-in earlier, Williamstown police have charged Singh with breaking and entering in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony, unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, larceny from the building and destruction of real property. According to Thomas McMahon, owner of the dealership, the car taken by Singh sustained some damage, although McMahon refused to state how much.

Singh and his lawyer, Williamstown attorney Bruce Grinnell, entered not guilty pleas on all counts at Wednesday's arraignment. The case was continued two weeks to Wednesday, April 18.

The Deans have not yet indicated whether Singh will face disciplinary action from the College.

The Williams Record

Positive Attitude

First-choice applicants to Mission Park increased this year, indicating that the change back to a seven-person limit has been successful. The Housing Committee reinstated the provision that groups of up to seven freshmen can apply to Mission Park if it is their first choice, and 33 freshmen responded, choosing Mission first. Last year, the one year that the provision was not included, brought an all-time low of two first-choices for Mission Park.

One group of seven, one of six and three five-person groups took advantage of the rule change. Dean Mary Kenyatta feels that this number is low, but 28 freshmen have been accommodated by the change, while the Park has gained a significant increase in popularity. Without the rule change, only five people would have chosen Mission first.

There will be about eight incoming sophomores in each of the four Mission Park houses who are excited about being there (as well as approximately eight per house who had Mission as a second choice). These people can combine with even a couple of enthusiastic upperclassmen to provide a solid base for strong houses for the next three years.

But more important than numbers is the freshmen's attitude toward Mission Park. They did not immediately dismiss it because of the stereotype of a bad physical plant; instead they considered applying in a large group as a worthy alternative to other houses.

Social conditions, not just physical plant, are reasons to apply to an upperclass house. Allowing groups of seven enhances Mission's social advantages. Kenyatta's pessimism on the issue is unwarranted.

Vociferous

To the editor:

Time and again the Williams Record becomes the vehicle for extremists to vociferously expound their beliefs without giving thought or consideration as to the truth of their assertions. I was deeply hurt by Muhammad Kenyatta's article (Record, 28 February) on Jesse Jackson's political campaign, not because I so object to Mr. Jackson, but rather to Mr. Kenyatta's insistence that the Jewish population of this country are rallying against Mr. Jackson merely because he is black.

Let alone all the mistakes Mr. Kenyatta made in his political theorizing (I have the benefit of hindsight knowing that Senator Hart's early victories in the primaries have changed a great many things), from a very basic understanding of the words "national constituency", one can see that the concept of a "rainbow coalition" cannot possibly be realized when one continuously categorizes people according to their race and religion, which Mr. Kenyatta does persistently in his article.

Mr. Kenyatta condemned a "smear campaign, from the Jewish Defense League, to the New York Times," aimed against Mr. Jackson's political campaign. He also noted that Mr. Jackson has "resisted" these types of calumnious remarks "as a matter of principle." There was no way for Mr. Kenyatta to know that his candidate would stoop as low as the "Jewish bureaucracy", making the remarks he did about the Jewish population of New York City, for if he did, I am quite positive Mr. Kenyatta would have steered away from that subject.

Let me point out that the Jewish Defense League is an extreme organization which in no way represents the majority of the Jewish population of this country, just as the Black Muslims, with their persistent anti-semitic statements, do not represent the majority of the American black population. Furthermore, in reference to Mr. Kenyatta's statement that "the pro-Israel lobby feels a vested interest in discrediting any black leader who dissents from that lobby's dictates," let me submit that the pro-Israel lobby would feel a vested interest in discrediting any candidate who dissented from that lobby's dictates (and rightly so).

Jesse Jackson had a good idea in trying to build a "rainbow coalition" where race and religion would not be barriers to peace and understanding between men and women, but, the experience of the campaign so far has shown that this cannot be accomplished, at least not by Jesse Jackson (mention of Coretta King's recent endorsement of Walter Mondale proves that the moderate black constituency would agree with me).

The black and Jewish populations of America have much to gain by uniting in their efforts rather than persisting in a "traditional" battle for attention. If we demarcated our boundaries a little less distinctly, perhaps this silly backbiting would cease and we would be able to achieve real goals for our people.

Innuendo

To the editor:

It is amazing that Muhammad Kenyatta managed to cram so much inaccuracy and innuendo into only five sentences. By equating The New York Times to the pro-Israel lobby Mr. Kenyatta indicates only that he does not read the newspaper's editorials. All lobbies try to discredit those who disagree with their positions, and they would be negligent if they did not. As for painting Jesse Jackson "as an anti-Semitic tool of Arab money," he proved himself quite capable, entirely on his own, of verifying the first part of the statement. That should be enough. And finally, it is indeed laudable that Jackson exhibits "principled support of Palestinian rights." Yet I cannot help wondering why there is no room in his heart for the plights of Lebanese, Iranian, Iraqi, Moroccan, Yemenite, and Syrian Jews who continuously flee their homelands—yes, homelands...and to where do you think they flee?—to escape persecution. (As a mental exercise, try to imagine being a Jew in Khomeini's Iran; yes, Virginia, there are still some left.)

What Mr. Kenyatta's six sentences do so economically is fuel the fires of black-Jewish antagonism. He is far too intelligent to have done so unwittingly, and it is lamentable that he felt the need. Blacks and Jews are both American minorities; the slogan, I believe, is divide and conquer.

NEWSBRIEFS

Four teachers in high school win Olmsteds

Williams College has announced the first four winners of the Olmsted Prizes for excellence in secondary school teaching. The awards of $1,000 to each teacher and $500 to their schools are made under the auspices of a new fund established last summer through the estate of George Olmsted Jr. '24, who died in 1976.

The recipients of the awards are Helen Jean Edwards, a mathematics teacher at Ball High School in Galveston, Texas; Thomas Alessandri, an English teacher at Bellarmine College Preparatory School in San Jose, Calif.; Rose Nelson, a biology teacher at Sleepy Hollow High School in North Tarrytown, N.Y.; and Otto Mower, who teaches humanities at The Bishop's Schools in La Jolla, Calif.

All four have been invited to attend Williams' Commencement in June for a formal presentation of the prizes.

President John Chandler said support for quality education is of critical importance in today's society. "The Olmsted Prize is one way to recognize tangibly the efforts of high school teachers singled out by their former students as being among the best," Chandler said.

"It is important for the nation's colleges and universities to take the lead in assisting and encouraging the educational work of the secondary schools. It is time for the colleges and the schools to begin to work together along a broad front of shared enterprises," said Chandler.

Nominated by seniors

Members of the senior class at Williams were asked to nominate outstanding high school teachers. The final selection was made by a committee of faculty members and students chaired by English Professor Emeritus Fred Stocking. Stocking said that about 80 students nominated 66 former teachers.

"They all sounded so wonderful that it was difficult to make choices," Stocking said. "It was gratifying to read the nominations and to get a sense of the talent, skill and total dedication of these teachers, both in class and out. It was equally gratifying to realize that four years later their students still remembered and appreciated them."

In addition to Stocking, members of the Olmsted Selection Committee were Political Science Professor MacAllister Brown; Nancy McIntire, Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations; Thomas Parker, Associate Director of Admissions; Religion Professor Norman Petersen; Anne Skinner, Lecturer in Chemistry; and juniors Janet Clarke, Jonathan Labaree, Laura Volpe, Frank Edwards, Katherine Berne, Jennifer Mah and James Heyman.

May 5 Spring Weekend date

Despite widespread speculation on the part of students, Spring Weekend has been firmly set for Saturday, May 5, the last weekend before the end of classes on May 11.

Difficulties in scheduling Spring Weekend arose this year because of the unusually late occurrence of Easter on April 22, the usual time for Spring Weekend.

When the Housing Committee, which had been asked by the College Council to schedule the event, met before spring break, it ruled out the 21st as a possible date because of potential conflicts with religious activities for Easter and Passover.

It also ruled out the following weekend, which had already been scheduled as Parents' Weekend. May 5 was, therefore, the only viable date remaining.

Confusion among students as to the actual date of Spring Weekend may have been the result of a new scheduling procedure. In the past, the Student Activities Board has been allowed to pick a date for the event in conjunction with its spring concert.

This year, however, the Deans' Office decided that the College Council would be better qualified to schedule Spring Weekend. The Council delegated the responsibility to the Housing Committee.

The SAB's spring concert has been set for April 19 this year, fueling student belief that Spring Weekend would be that same weekend. "I think most people assumed that because the concert was then and in the past [Spring Weekend] was when the concert was," explained SAB chairman Arunas Gudaitis '84.

However, the date of the spring concert was chosen simply because it was the only time the Lansing Chapman Rink would be available, Gudaitis said.

Although the SAB had expected the Housing Committee to put Spring Weekend at the same time, and was surprised when they did not, Gudaitis said they did not feel it would adversely affect the concert since it has been scheduled for a Thursday, and could not have directly been linked with Spring Weekend activities anyway.

Gang of Four, not Madness will perform

Gang of Four and The Waitresses will perform in a double-bill concert April 19 in the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink. The group Madness had been scheduled to play but the band cancelled its entire spring tour two weeks ago when its pianist quit, according to Student Activity Board Chairman Arunas Gudaitis '84.

Both Gang of Four and The Waitresses play dance music, Gudaitis said. "The Waitresses do more pop-oriented music, most of which is humorous in nature," he said.

The group is best known for its song "I Know What Boys Like" and the single "Christmas Wrapping," which was popular in New York City, Gudaitis added. Gang of Four is probably best known for its hit, "I Love a Man In Uniform."

"Gang of Four is one of the more important new wave bands. Much of its earlier music was political in nature, but around 1980-81, it added funk/dance music," he said.

The band, which is big in the danceclub circle, is breaking up soon and this concert will be part of its farewell tour, Gudaitis added.

Sophomore Dennis Butler, who remains in George Washington University Hospital in Washington D.C., is now making tremendous progress and may soon be moved from the hospital to a rehabilitation center, according to Dean of the College Dean Daniel O'Connor and College Chaplain Carol Pepper, who visited Butler during spring break.

For the first time since the Jan. 25 skiing accident which left him paralyzed, Butler has been taken off his respirator and can breathe normally by himself. In addition, the holes left from his tracheotomy surgery have closed and he can speak normally for the first time.

"He talked non-stop and was very happy to be able to do just that. He had a whole lot to say," Pepper said. Although his physical condition has not changed a great deal, the ability to talk has made him much better able to cope with the situation, she added.

Amazing everyone

Butler is no longer in skeletal traction and can now sit up with help. In addition, several pins in his temples, which were meant to keep his neck perfectly aligned, have now been removed, freeing him from a great deal of pain.

"Considering how serious his condition was, he's doing much, much better," Pepper said, adding that in terms of his emotional and psychological state, "he's amazed us all."

During vacation, Butler received visits from a large number of Williams students, including the entire women's crew team, which saw him daily. "He's so happy people remember him," Pepper

Williams paid $11,000 for the two bands, who will share double billing for the concert. Tickets will be available starting Wednesday in Baxter at $5 for Williams students and $7 for the general public.

The hockey rink holds up to two thousand people and Gudaitis predicted "that we will definitely go over one thousand."

"My guess is that it will be a successful concert because people have already been calling the radio station and Toonerville Trolley (record store) asking about tickets," Gudaitis said.

2 seniors get Watson cash

Two Williams seniors have been awarded Watson Foundation Fellowships for 1984-85. Jessie C. Greason and Joseph F. Mastelka were chosen from 165 nominees submitted by 50 colleges. Each will receive a grant of $10,000 for a year of travel and independent study abroad.

Greason, an English major, plans to explore England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland as a poet and painter. At Williams she writes for the Literary Review and works as an office assistant in the Art Department.

She spent the first semester of her junior year at Wroxton College in England with the Fairleigh Dickinson program.

Mastelka will investigate popular attitudes towards the arms race in the USSR. West Germany and Yugoslavia. In Russia private conversations will form the major part of his study. In Germany he hopes to get a volunteer job with the Green Party and in Yugoslavia to talk with English-speaking contacts at various universities.

He is a Russian major with a concentration in comparative literature and a member of the Disarmament Forum. He spent a semester of his sophomore year at the Pushkin Institute in Moscow, and the previous summer learning advanced Russian at Middlebury College.

Jackall lauded for HBR article

Robert Jackall, assistant professor of sociology, has been awarded one of two annual McKinsey Awards for his article "Moral Mazes: Bureaucracy and Managerial Work" which was published in the Harvard Business Review this fall.

For 25 years the McKinsey Foundation for Management Research, Inc., has offered awards for the two best articles published each year in the Review. A panel of distinguished executives in business, government and education choose the winners.

Jackall, who has taught at Williams since 1976, earned his B.A. from Fordham University in 1963, and his Ph.D. from the New School for Social Research in 1976.

The article, which earned him a $1000 award, appeared in the Review's September-October, 1983 issue. The other McKinsey winner, David A. Garvin, assistant professor of business administration at the Harvard Business School, received a $2500 prize.

said. She noted that since Butler can now talk normally, he can receive telephone calls from anyone who wants to stay in touch.

Ready for rehab

Butler's father is currently looking around for a suitable rehabilitation center for Dennis, probably in Denver or Houston, O'Connor said. The Dennis Butler Rehabilitation Fund, which passed its goal of $10,000 before vacation, has been given to his family to use for rehabilitation costs or to purchase a special wheelchair designed for paraplegics.

"Dennis is ready to be rehabilitated now from a medical standpoint. He's very eager to do it," Pepper said. Ordinary rehabilitation for paraplegics takes 80 to 120 days, she added, and involves relearning ordinary tasks in order "to live as normal and as independent and as full a life as possible."

She cited the example of one Williams graduate of the late 1960's who suffered the same injuries as Butler and after rehabilitation went on to become a practicing radiologist.

Back next year?

Butler now hopes to return to Williams next September, although O'Connor called next February a more realistic estimate. He said that although Butler would need an attendant, rooms designed especially for handicapped students in Lehman and Currier (Butler's former dorm) would make a return to student life much easier.

Interested people may continue to write Butler in care of the Intensive Care Unit, George Washington University Hospital, 901 23rd Street NW, Washington, D.C. 20037, or phone the hospital.

Chinese language to be taught

The new courses to be offered next year in Chinese language will be taught by Professor Ma Jing-heng. According to Peter Frost, chairman of the new Asian Studies program, Professor Ma has been offered a two year visiting professorship which will probably be made permanent later.

Ma was born in mainland China and was educated in Taiwan. She has taught Chinese at the University of Michigan for 20 years and is especially interested in teaching elementary language courses.

Frost cited her interest in teaching basic grammar and language, and her enthusiasm about teaching here, as important reasons for her selection. "I think students will like her,"

he said. "She's really excited about teaching undergraduates and I think she'll make it enjoyable."

The Chinese 101-102 course will emphasize the spoken language, though Professor Ma will also teach Chinese characters, Frost said. The dialect to be taught is Mandarin, the official spoken language of both Mainland China and Taiwan.

Understand in a year
"Since Chinese is not as hard as many Americans like to think," Ma said, "students at the end of the first year course should be able to understand the Chinese of everyday life when spoken at moderate speed, be understood themselves, and be able to read simple Chinese passages."

Ma will also teach an upper-level Chinese course for students who already know some Chinese, as well as a Winter Study course in calligraphy, Frost said. He also mentioned the possibility of a student trip to China and opportunities for students to spend a year or semester abroad in Hong Kong. Frost said he is excited about the program and feels it offers students opportunities both academically and vocationally, particularly because so few Americans can speak or understand a language spoken by such a large percentage of the people in the world.

"It's sad," said Frost. "I have employers writing me searching for students who can handle the language."

Krapp's last tape needs fast forward

by Karen Philipps

Cap and Bell's production of Samuel Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape on April 5, 6, and 7 lasted too long. Although parts of director David Latham's '86 effort were excellent, they were separated by long spaces that tried the audience's patience.

The play takes place in the den of the sixty-nine year old Krapp who has recorded his memories on tape. During the play Krapp listens to the tape he made on his 39th birthday in which he talks about events that occurred ten years earlier. He also makes a tape about the past year.

The performance was strongest at the beginning. Marc Wolfe '84 created a believable and amusing Krapp. While he prepares to listen to his tapes, Krapp consumes two bananas. He drops the peel of the first on the floor, promptly slips on it, and puts the second peel carefully into the garbage can. Wolf's shuffle and cough of an old man were convincing.

As Krapp begins to listen to his tapes, he accidentally knocks a box off his desk and then violently pushes the rest of the boxes to the floor. The removal of the boxes allowed a third of the audience whose view had been obstructed to see Krapp's face.

Unfortunately, from that point on there was not much to see. Krapp was entranced by the memory of his lover's eyes, but the audience was lulled into drowsiness by the slow pace of the words. The audience's interest was awakened for a moment when Krapp stopped the tape to look up the word viduity.

In typical Beckett fashion, Krapp often stopped and fast forwarded the tape just when he was about to say something interesting. The performance would have been more appealing if he had fast forwarded through some of the less interesting sections.

Rutgers

The administration at Rutgers has set up new guidelines for private parties in order to curb excessive drinking and allow students to have a choice about the use of alcohol at parties, according to the Holy Cross Crusader.

People running a private party at Rutgers will have to register it in advance, make sure underage students do not drink, provide equal quantities of alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages, and spend no more than 50 percent of their budget on alcohol (while spending 25 percent of it on food). The guidelines also specify that alcoholic beverages not be served for a "reasonable time" before the end of the party. They do not specify how many people constitute a party.

Sanctions might range from a reprimand to possible expulsion to loss of a fraternity charter, officials said. They acknowledged, however, that the proposal would be difficult to enforce.

Wesleyan

Applications for admission to Wesleyan dropped by nearly four percent this year, as compared to a sharp rise at both Williams and Amherst, according to the Wesleyan Argus.

Whitman

A fraternity trip to a football game ended with $6000 in fines levied against members after police busted them on the ride home, according to the Whitman College (Walla Walla, Washington) Pioneer.

Whitman County deputies apprehended members of Beta Theta Pi on the way home from an annual "Pledge Sneak" outing to a Washington State football game. Twenty-two people were cited for being minors in possession of alcohol and four for furnishing alcohol to minors.

Fraternity members pointed out that the driver of their truck was sober, there were no empties in the cab, and the majority of the members were in the back of the truck. Police, however, took the incident seriously: the group attracted three police cars, two deputies, a sergeant, a reserve officer and a police dog. "They said the dog was searching out dope," said one Beta. The search turned up no drugs but did net the dog a salami, according to the Pioneer.

In another issue, the Pioneer ran a letter from a Whitman student entitled "The Ultimate Nuclear Question." The letter simply said, "Why should anyone care if the human species is destroyed by nuclear weapons?"

Tracksters run in first meet for a test against area's best

The men's and women's track teams travelled to Fitchburg this weekend where they saw their first action of the year on an outdoor track. "We went down just to get some times and see how we'd do. We did not go expecting to win," said coach Farley.

The Fitchburg Invitational featured such New England Division I powerhouses as Boston University among the sixteen teams competing. The Ephs wanted this first meet to be a gauge to measure where they are and how they stack up so far.

Individual performances

On the men's side, individual standouts were Ted Leon '84 who ran to third in the 400 in 50.8, Brandt Johnson '87 who took second in the long jump with a 6'2½", and Paul Toland who came in third right behind Johnson.

Tom Pingree '86 finished the 800 in 1:59.1 to claim fifth, right ahead of teammate Kevin Jenkins '85 who ran it in 1:59.4. The mile relay team of Jenkins, Leon, Pingree, and John Campbell '84 came on strong to capture second. Also, John Ellison '86 took sixth in the Steeplechase.

For the women, Gail Henderson '87 raced to third in the 100, while Lizzy Marris '87 ran to fifth in the 400 in 63.5, and Mary Keller '85 took fifth in the 1500.

Both teams travel to Westfield today, and will go to Bowdoin next Sunday for the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championships.

All Record writers, photographers, layout, and other staffers are invited to a meeting/gripe session Wednesday night at 8:00 at the Log.

Rick Hedeman '87 will start at first base. "He's a big, strong, power-hitting kid who has been pounding the ball," said Coakley.

Brian Rutledge '85 will move to left field after starting last year at third base. Phil Lusardi '85 returns after hitting seven homers last year (the team's most) and driving in 20 runs to play DH and backup catcher while batting fifth. Jeff Lilley '86 returns to centerfield after hitting .299 last year. Dick Holington '86, who played much of the season in a utility role last year, will split time in right field with John Shaw '87.

In answer to the obvious question: yes, there are some announcers that I like. Dick Enberg and Al McGuire make an outstanding team. One of the best aspects about McGuire is that he actually does provide some "colorful" commentary which enhances your understanding of the game. I was pretty upset when CBS outbid NBC for broadcast rights to the Final Four.

I can just about tolerate anything, however, as long as I don't hear Brent Musberger or Dick Vitale. Here's for hoping Jimmy the Greek develops a stronger left hook.

under the masterful direction of scrumhalf Drew Klein '84, both teams knew the better club wore white.

The game's lone score came after a sustained display of rucking prowess by the B scrum, which bore fruit in the form of a diving try by Roger Merriam '86.

The 4-0 victory capped a day of clean, hard rugby, and sharpened skills that should flower into home-team victory at this week's WRFC Spring Tournament, which will find Connecticut College, Albany Law, Tufts, and Williams doing round-robin battle on the Purple Pitch.

We're looking to hire 2 or 3 of the best from this year's class...

Are you good enough to be one of them?

MBI, Inc. wants two or three of the top individuals from this year's graduating class. We offer an unusual management opportunity to someone interested in a young and highly successful enterprise in a fast-paced, expanding and competitive industry.

- The Industry: Direct marketing is a $100 billion industry. It accounts for more than 15% of all consumer purchases in America and more than 20% of total advertising dollar volume. Well over half of the Fortune 500 companies are engaged in some way in direct marketing, yet the industry remains powerfully entrepreneurial—with the opportunity for well-managed firms to achieve rapid growth.
- The Company: MBI, Inc. is a medium-sized ($120 million in sales) privately-owned company engaged exclusively in the creation and marketing of fine collectibles. The business is young; it was launched in 1969 and top division managers are now in their mid-30's and 40's. MBI's track record is one of outstanding growth in a highly competitive field.
- The Products: Through its operating divisions, MBI markets fine collectibles of heirloom quality. Products include philatelic items, medallion art, fine china and crystal collector items and leather bound books of unsurpassed quality.
- The Structure: Organization is on the Program Group basis, with Program Managers responsible for individual programs. The structure offers a unique opportunity for direct experience in different areas of business management (not available in larger organizations where functions tend to be more specialized).
- The Position: Entry to management is at the Assistant or Associate Program Manager level, depending upon experience. Assistants and Associates share in program development and implementation responsibilities as an extension of the Program Manager. Typically, a Program Group is comprised of the Program Manager and 1 or 2 Assistants and/or Associates. MBI is committed to the internal development of managerial talent and our growth provides for unusual advancement opportunities.
- The Rewards: Our view is that outstanding achievement should meet with outstanding reward. Our success has been built on the excellent performance of a motivated, well-rewarded management team.

The successful candidate will be intelligent and highly self-motivated with entrepreneurial instincts and a high personal standard of excellence. A high energy level and a willingness to work hard are essential to keep pace with a rapidly growing business. Involvement in the business, keen attention to detail and a sense of managerial overview are crucial success factors. To the individual with proper motivation, we can provide the challenge that permits maximum development of each person's potential.

If you are a top individual who is interested in a truly outstanding career opportunity and would like to learn more about MBI, Inc., send us your resume and a letter of introduction. We'll get back to you.

Tennis beats Union and MIT

by Paul J. Mahoney
The men's tennis team got off to a fine start this week with two quick victories over Union and MIT.

In Saturday's match against MIT, the Ephs took five of the six singles matches and lost 1-2 in the doubles play. Coach Sean Sloane, now in his 14th year of Williams tennis, was pleased with his team's performance. He singled out Kevin Callanan '87 and Tim Peterson '86 for playing "smart matches" in which coolness and "poise pulled out the tough games."

Sloane also noted that junior Tim Rives was overpowering on the court. Williams victories came from captain Brook

Larmer '84 (6-2, 6-4), Tom Harrity '84 (6-3, 6-4), Rives (6-0, 6-4), Callanan (5-7, 6-4, 6-3), and Peterson (7-5, 7-6). The doubles team of the Shore brothers—senior Mike and freshman Dan—also won 7-5, 7-6.

8-0 over Union

The season opener on Wednesday ended in a rout of a weak Union team. All the singles players—Larmer, Harrity, Rives, Mike Shore, Callanan, and Peterson—won. The doubles teams of Harrity and Callanan and Chris Clarey '86 and Benjamin Spang '84 both won as Williams sailed to a 8-0 shutout.

The team is looking forward to a good season, with the Nationals to be held in Atlanta in May. Larmer, in singles, and the team of Rives and Larmer, in doubles, are expected to receive places in the soon-to-be-released rankings of the I.T.C.A.

The team hosted Middlebury today, and then Clark comes to Williamstown Thursday for a 3:00 match.

Crew starts with 2 sweeps

by Ken Hillman

After a two-week "vacation" of double practices in Washington, D.C., the men's and women's crew teams headed north to start their spring seasons.

This weekend, the men swept a regatta at Lowell against Wesleyan, Tufts, Lowell and SUNY-Maritime. Amid cries from the Wesleyan boat of "Hey where's the beef, Cows?!", the novice men pulled out a convincing victory. The varsity heavyweights defeated boats from all schools, and will face a rematch against Wesleyan in the Little Three battle in two weeks.

At the end of break, the men swept a regatta in Philadelphia against Drexel, winning all four races they entered. The two novice boats showed great poise in racing against a crew that had been on the water much longer. The varsity came back from being a boatlength down to nip Drexel at the wire.

Meanwhile, the women went to Annapolis to race against Navy. The novices won handily but the varsity and JV boats both lost.

Although the women had last weekend off, both teams travel to Worcester Saturday to take on W.P.I. and Connecticut College, while the women face Smith as well.

Riding

The Riding team, under the direction of coach Sherron Knopp, traveled to UMass last Saturday. In the equestrian classes, captain Andrea Smith '86 placed first followed by Jennifer Rees '86 and Kirsten Rooks '87 at sixth.

Smith said after the meet, "We had a super turnout. Professor Knopp and I were very proud of our eleven riders' performances. They all did extremely well and gave each other a lot of spirit and support."

Next week the team will travel to Smith, their last show until next fall.

Lax wastes UMass 18-1 to balance record at 1-1

by Dave Paulsen

The men's lacrosse team has high hopes for a successful season behind the strength of a strong freshman class. After opening their first week of play with a 1-1 record, it appears that the Ephs should improve upon last year's 1-9 record.

Saturday, the Ephs found themselves matched against a very strong Springfield College squad. Williams got off to a horrendous start, falling behind 9-1 after the first period, en route to a 17-4 defeat.

Rob Miller '87 scored the lone first period Eph goal unassisted. The Ephs were shut down until the third period, when Jim Sperry '87 tallied off an assist from senior co-captain Tom Davies. Seniors Mark Payton and Lee Ordeman both scored unassisted fourth period goals.

Smash UMass

The performance was in marked contrast to Tuesday's opening game where the Ephs romped over UMass-Boston 18-1. Davies scored five goals, indicating that he will pick up where he left off last year when he led the team in scoring with 33 goals.

Reese Hughes '85 also turned in a strong performance, tallying two goals in the first period. Payton and Kelth Haynes '84, both middles, combined for three goals and four assists, while Matt Kennedy '84 and Taylor Watts '87 anchored the tough Williams defense.

It was the type of performance witnessed in the opening game that Coach Renzie Lamb and assistant Ery Chambliss had been looking forward to seeing all season. Lamb said, "We are a better team than we were last year. How good we will be depends on how hard we work and on how much we improve our play in man-up and man-down situations."

Lamb and Chambliss are counting on tri-captains Davies, Bill Sperry '84, and Haynes to provide the leadership for the talented group of freshman expected to see playing time this season. Attackmen Mike O'Connell, Sperry, and Matt Salisbury, middles Miller and Steve Patterson, and defenseman Watts are the seven freshmen that Lamb hopes will blossom into top-notch lacrosse players. The squad next travels to Tufts Saturday.

Hey, CBS, improve those announcers

by Dave Paulsen

If you're a sports junkie like I am, Spring Break came at just the perfect time. The NCAA basketball tournament started on the Thursday before break, and ended on our first day back in classes. So the astute fan who planned his day carefully could catch the late-night tape delayed broadcasts on ESPN and turn vacation into the ultimate basketball fix.

Except for one thing—the announcing.

Now in my opinion, basketball is the best game to watch on T.V. Its fast-paced action and intensity (especially at the college level) make for exciting viewing. But cliché-filled and utterly mindless announcing almost ruins all the advantages that basketball has going for it.

It's not that this year's announcing was any worse than last year's, or anything like that. Quite simply, the mindless inefficiency has been going on for years. For me, however, it's reached the boiling point.

Announcing teams are usually split into two-person units—the play-by-play man, and the color commentator ("expert" analyst). Their jobs generally degenerate into the play-by-play man saying, "Boy did these two teams come to play or what?", and the color commentator saying, "They sure did."

Now, you're probably saying, "Surely you can't be serious." Well, yes I am serious and stop calling me Shirley.

Cases in point: Len Berman and Bill Raftery were doing the Big East Tournament games. In at least every game, Berman either told the audience that the respective teams had or hadn't come to play. Meanwhile, Raftery provided that expert commentary that viewers have come to rely upon. Regarding the futile efforts of St. John's center Bill Wennington to hold down Georgetown's Patrick Ewing, Raftery told us, "It's not as if he's not trying out there."

With that kind of expert analysis, how can one go wrong? But Raftery outdid himself when he attempted to describe an altercation involving Georgetown's Michael Graham. After everyone on earth could have sworn that Graham had obviously thrown a punch at a Syracuse player, Raftery informed us that "It was just a vicious attack for the basketball." Really?

Here's a compilation of the most often-used, and particularly galling clichés and other mindless phrases:

1. "He's a class individual, both on and off the court."
2. "The tension is so thick you could cut it with a knife."
3. "He's 6-3, but he plays like he's 6-5."
4. "They have to go out there and play their game."
5. "They have to dictate the tempo."
6. "And there's Ray Meyer's

Baseball looks to veteran pitchers

by John Clayton

With five pitchers and six starters returning from last year's 10-16 squad, the baseball team has high hopes for the 1984 season.

"I'm extremely optimistic," said first-year coach Rob Coakley. "Our pitching looks excellent, and we've got many big guns returning from last year."

Four seniors lead the Williams staff. "These are four seasoned pitchers," Coakley continued, "who have all had bad arms at some point in their careers, but all have sound arms now."

Four senior pitchers

Captain John Hennigan (2-4, 4.87 ERA, 48 innings pitched last year), Bill Hugo (2-4, 7.26, 48.1), John DeLorenzo (3-3, 6.42, 33.2), and Matt Viola (1-0, 1.23, 7.1) are the four pitchers. Kevin Morris '86, who led the team in ERA last year (2-4, 3.45, 47), also returns. "Last year showed that Kevin is a proven pitcher," said Coakley. He is putting the pitchers on a rigorous conditioning program and has used some extra coaching help in the pitching department. "We are now looking very strong pitching-wise."

"We have several veteran hitters back," Coakley went on, "including the two through five spots in the lineup." Last year's team batted .283, with 248 runs in just 26 games, so Coakley has justified confidence in the Eph's hitting.

"The one aspect we're hoping to improve on over last year is defense," Coakley said. Last year's squad allowed 59 unearned runs, 30 percent of the total runs yielded.

Top hitters return

Coakley's son Mike, a junior, will start at catcher and bat fourth. He hit .348 last season, with one homer and 16 RBI's. Mark White '84 will move from the outfield to third base, while batting third. White is coming off a .333 campaign with two

Rugbers punish Union deep down in the mud

by Paul Hogan

The Rugby Football Club travelled to Union under heavy skies on Saturday and emerged from the afternoon's matches muddy and victorious, sweet harbingers of another successful spring.

Having been confined to Weston Fieldhouse for the pre-season by the snow and rain, the club and captains Jeff Calkins '85 and Huge Huizenga '84 were curious to see if technical skills had eroded in the five months since the Amherst game, and indeed it took the team until well into the game to knock loose all the kinks and winter cobwebs.

But all good things in all good time, as the A side demonstrated after a penalty-marred first half left them down 7-0. In an inspirational display of pure rugby—hard mauling by the scrum and a line that clicked like clockwork—the white horde came again and again at the arrogant Union 15.

Scrummles hustle

Ceaseless hustle by scrummles like Brad Bissell '86 and John May '84 allowed whirling dervish John Frese '84 to score three tries, while senior Sean Crotty's return to his real sporting love was rewarded with the fourth Williams score of the second half. The 20-7 win was marked by the introduction of Jim Bell '84 at the key scrumhalf position, where he dominated his opposite until an eye injury took him away from all the second half fun.

The club's depth was revealed in the second game, as 25 Killer B's saw action against the Union squad. The Williams pack was in control of the game throughout, and when the line started to roll

Women's lax wins 5-1 in season's first match

by Mark Averitt

The women's lacrosse team trounced Mt. Holyoke 5-1 in their home opener Saturday.

"We beat a good team today, a team that only lost to our rival Amherst by a 7-6 score," exulted coach Julie McHugh. "They're a good passing team, but we have a lot of speed and a rookie goalie (Lisa Dorian '87) who won't quit."

Lee Wierdsma '87 got things rolling for Williams at 18:49 of the first half by scoring on an assist from Carrie Cento '86. Then after Holyoke's Debbie Diver notched a goal at 15:12, Williams' Sue Harrington '84 took a pass from Andrea Raphael '86 to score at 14:35 and give the Ephs a 2-1 halftime lead.

Allison Fuller '85 made it 3-1 mid-way through the second half; Cento scored on an assist from Raphael three minutes later; and Raphael capped a star performance by scoring from a feed by Laura Rogers '86 to give the Ephs a 3-0 second-half shutout and a 5-1 victory.

McHugh was particularly pleased with Dorian's six saves in the goalie's first-ever lacrosse game. The Ephs, 1-0, next play on Wednesday at Springfield.

Trustees allot $2 million for huge computer buys

by Christian Howlett
and John Clayton

Members of the Williams College Board of Trustees were on campus this past weekend to approve next year's budget, review campus construction plans, meet with campus organizations and take care of other general business.

The Trustees' major action, according to College President John W. Chandler, was approval of the 1984-85 operating budget at $38.8 million, up 8.4 percent from last year. Most of the increase is attributable to $2 million which the Trustees have allocated for new computer purchases.

Of the $2 million, $300,000 will be used to buy a large central computer, while $600,000 to $1 million will go towards about 100 microcomputers, Chandler explained. All the computers will be placed in Jesup Hall, and the micros will be intended primarily for student use.

"With these micros we can eventually change the whole philosophy of the Computer Science curriculum," said Associate Provost and Director of Data Systems David Booth, "as most of the introductory Comp. Sci. work will be done on the micros." For this reason, a certain number of the microcomputers to be purchased will be sophisticated enough to handle Pascal, while the simpler models will be used for word processing and faculty and student-purchased software, he added.

Computer network

In addition to the purchase allocations, another $600,000 will be used to create a campus-wide computer network by wiring administration, office and classroom buildings to Jesup. Most of the wiring will go through existing heating pipes, so very little digging will be necessary, Chandler said.

"Ultimately, the entire campus could be wired, but the system will go in by pieces," Booth explained. No students and few faculty will be tied in to Jesup next year, but the system has the capability of wiring the entire campus, including dorms. Booth added that how fast that capability will be realized depends on the number of students owning computers.

The renovations of Jesup Hall

The Trustees looked particularly cheerful last weekend as they visited campus to approve next year's budget and allocate two million dollars for large purchases of computer equipment. (Ruderman) itself will be completed by July or August, in time for the start of the school year.

The Trustees also reviewed the construction plans for the College's new gymnasium. Demolition of several existing structures began this week, and gym construction should start in late May or early June, Chandler said.

In other business, the Trustees:

met with College Council officers to discuss student-faculty relations. The Trustees strongly supported the idea of house guest meals and promised a greater number next year. They also indicated approval for such interactive activities as free university, the recent student-faculty ball and student-faculty pizza nights at the Log.

heard a report from the Development Committee that gifts to Williams so far this year total $11.9 million.

discussed ways to better orient new faculty members to the College' expectations of them, including publishing some sort of new faculty handbook.

Pass/Fail proposal passes CEP, waiting now on May faculty vote

by John McDermott

The Committee on Educational Policy passed its new "pass/fail" proposal by an 8-1 margin Monday, but altered the measure to allow only juniors and seniors to take two non-required courses graded credit/no-credit. Sophomores had originally been included in the proposal.

Supporters said the proposal, which will now go to a faculty vote in May, will encourage students to experiment more in choosing electives

The 8-1 CEP vote, with one abstention, came in a closed meeting only three weeks after CEP chairman and psychology professor Andrew Crider told the Record there was "not a lot of support at the present time within the CEP for this proposal."

Renovations have begun on Jesup Hall, which, when completed this summer, will house the campus computer center, including the Trustees' new purchases. The driveway to Jesup is currently a large hole as workmen install a water main for the building's new sprinkler system. (Scheibe)

The Williams Record

Hi Tech

Recent acceleration of the renovation of Jesup Hall, and the Trustees approval of two million dollars to help bring computer technology here are the most evident examples of Williams' entry into The Computer Age. Although the College's plans for developing computer facilities have been in the works for some time, it is rewarding to see them moving forward. The tangible results are great, and now they appear to be ever closer.

The College is buying 100 microcomputers, most of which will be placed in Jesup for general use. While some of the micros will be used mainly for Computer Science courses, many will be for word processing. In addition, they will be compatible with student- or faculty-bought software.

This high number of units shows commitment to student needs. Since the introduction of word processors to Sawyer library, many students have discovered that the machines can ease paper writing. Revisions and corrections more convenient—and quality is thus improved.

Yet, as the many students who now use the few machines in the library can also attest, the demand far exceeds the supply. And, although Sawyer is a central location, the rooms become unbearably hot when more than a few people work simultaneously. The large number of extra machines will certainly be a welcome addition to the campus, and providing a space designed specifically for word processing is a good response to a pressing need.

Consumption

To the editor:

"Helpful hints to control eating habits: You don't have to finish everything on your plate."

The Williams College Food Service printed this bit of advice earlier this year, and when carefully read, it makes a critical statement about the social attitude this school tolerates, and reflects the lack of social responsibility in our everyday consuming habits. We are the generation who, when our mothers said, "Eat the rest of the food on your plate, there are children starving in this world", we answered, "Here Mom, send this to India."

Why were we the generation who chuckled at waste and inequality? I do not know, but it appears we have divorced ourselves from any responsibility to its solution. We are all possessors of a flume mentality who don't even bat an eye at dumping half a main course, three glasses of cranberry juice, the cauliflower that was not so supreme, the half a bowl of salad, all the while simply chatting in line.

This attitude manifests itself everyday, every meal, in the amount of food thrown away by each of us. It is inherent in the value system in which we've been raised, one of overabundance in which we've been sheltered from the reality of need. After two meals, enormous in comparison to the standards of two-thirds of the world, we announce at four o'clock, "I'm starved!" Because we have never felt the reality of hunger, we say this with little respect or understanding of our words.

What difference does it make if you throw away some food? In the face of plate after plate of trashed food, what incentive is there that what you conserve will matter at all? Ideally if we all took just what we ate, the dining halls would adjust and cook less, and there would be much less waste—not only of food, but also of the energy required to cook the food. For this to happen we must all take the responsibility upon ourselves to not pick up more than we eat and to look critically at what we throw out after each meal. If an active sense of food waste awareness was instilled in each of us, it might transfer to our other consumption habits.

Contempt

To the editor:

I ask Muhammad Kenyatta and other supporters of Jesse Jackson the following questions:

•How would they feel about a presidential candidate who acknowledged that he referred to blacks as "niggers", and to a city with a large black population as "Niggertown"?

•Would they fail to denounce a candidate who accepted contributions from foreign white supremacist organizations with a vested interest in souring American/black African relations?

•Would they stand silently by while this candidate pronounced his contempt for a rightly constituted, democratic, sovereign black nation, and called for establishment, on its territory, of a separate white state, ignoring the fact that the black nation was surrounded by hostile white states, dedicated to its eradication?

I doubt it.

Sensitivity

To the editor:

The College Council approves of the Record's right to print news facts when they consider appropriate (names, events, etc.). However, we feel greater sensitivity could have been used in the April 10 article concerning the alleged break-in and "joy-riding" by a freshman. Undue emphasis on the actions of the accused, especially in a community as small as Williams, unnecessarily adds to the anxiety and commotion the situation creates. It is our hope that all members of the Williams community will understand the delicacy of this matter and will respond appropriately.

College Council Vice-President

Policy

The Williams Record regularly prints the names of students arrested in acts relevant to the community. Our reasons are:

•A published story which has the facts correct will quell rumors about an incident which can get out of hand.

•An article detailing an incident but not naming individuals becomes more gossip than news. The reader's response to such a story is: "Who?", and speculation on the issue can become needlessly damaging.

•Such names are public record, and are printed by local papers such as the North Adams Transcript and Berkshire Eagle. Although not often read by students, these publications are read by faculty and other community members.

•As adults, Williams students are responsible for their actions and should not be sheltered. If we would print the name of an administrator accused of a crime, we should do likewise for students. Indeed, by sheltering wrongdoers by not printing their names, we near tacit approval of their actions.

Williams is a small and close community, and the Record must be more sensitive to individuals than a big-city paper. In particular, we have an obligation to print the court results of any arrests; thus clearing a student if vindicated.

Insider's Guide to JA Selection

by Dianne R. Valle

On Wednesday, March 14, 104 sophomores were notified of the decisions of the Junior Advisor Selection Committee. For the 62 men and 42 women applying, 29 spots and 23 spots were available respectively. The procedures involved in choosing 52 JA's have been something of a mystery if not a source of controversy. In order to clear up some of the confusion, I'd like to present an "insider's" view based on my two years' experience with the Committee.

What the Committee Is

It is a group of peers selecting peers for an important role. What kind of influence the JA's will be is probably the most important consideration for Committee members. Time commitment alone should demonstrate that the Committee is dedicated to its task. Beginning in February, we met at least three times a week for at least two hours per meeting. Everyone's presence was required at all meetings. This rigorous schedule left little time for promoting gossip when 104 candidates were being considered.

Who serves

The Selection Committee is composed of twenty-four students: twelve JA's from the previous year, five JA's from the present year, and seven "at large" students chosen from the entire student population. Of the twelve past JA's, two serve on the committee automatically for two years by virtue of their leadership roles within that group (the president and vice-president). The president becomes the chair of the committee the second year. The other ten senior-JA's are selected by the chair and the vice-president based on the candor, interest, variety of activities, and other time commitments. To avoid overrepresentation of any one group of freshmen, I tried to make the composition of the twelve senior JA's reflect the freshman entry situation: six representatives from among the twelve entries in the Freshman Quad, etc.

The seven "at-large" candidates are selected by College Council based on applications taken from the entire student body. Any student is eligible to serve except for sophomores applying to be JA's.

The chairperson is primarily an organizer and a mediator; he/she does not, however, have more power than any other member on the committee. All twenty-four members have an equal right to an opinion and an equal vote.

Why no faculty members serve on the committee is not exactly clear to me. The Dean of Freshmen did sit on the committee prior to my selection as JA but more recently has opted not to. Some members last year felt that they would be too inhibited to speak of their peers in front of faculty; others suggested that faculty members, in many cases, have too limited a view of the candidates based solely on classroom experience rather than social and dorm interactions. It is still an open question.

How do we do it?

The process of gathering information on each candidate has varied for each of my four years. Two forms have been used consistently: the candidate's personal statement and the JA recommendation (to be written by any JA from that candidate's freshman year). From this base, past committees have worked with peer recommendations, interviews, or neither option. Peer recommendations (written by any member of the college community chosen by the candidate) were reinstated this year. In addition, a list of guidelines was provided for recommendation, listing qualities all JA's should have: approachability, availability, willingness to listen, sensitivity, organizational ability, and attitudes (on studies, athletics, extracurriculars, Williams, etc.). Obviously, a lot more is involved in the assessment of each candidate but the list above provides some basic and standardized criteria which everyone involved could address.

The selection rounds

The selection process takes place in three rounds. In round one, each candidate's personal statement, JA and peer recommendations are read out loud by a Committee member (ordering is random). Discussion then takes place, and any outside information must be relevant to the selection guidelines and prefaced by an explanation of how it was gathered. Following the discussion, a preliminary vote of hold, reject, or abstain is taken. This first vote is non-binding, and is used to give the Committee an initial feel for their colleagues' opinions.

In round two, each Committee member is responsible for re-presenting four-six candidates to the committee. Further discussion may take place. After this second presentation, a binding vote of "hold" or "reject" is taken. Only those candidates receiving two-thirds of the votes (16 members) or more are placed on the final ballot.

In round three, each member votes privately for the 52 candidates he/she feels are qualified from the final ballot.

Once all votes are cast, the numbers are tabulated in the Dean's Office. Those candidates with the most votes are selected as JA's; the next five candidates become alternates. The Dean of Freshmen then reviews the list. If any candidate is in danger of leaving school for academic or disciplinary reasons, the Dean may veto his/her selection. When this is done, all candidates are notified of the Committee's decisions, with a letter explaining the process and listing the Committee members.

Confidentiality

Committee meetings are closed to everyone except the Dean of Freshmen. Members are forbidden to discuss any of the information gathered outside of the Committee. Any breach of this confidentiality may result in a member's withdrawal from the Committee. In addition, the list of Committee members is not published until after the process has concluded, and all written forms are destroyed.

These stringent rules are designed to ensure fairness both to the candidates and the Committee. Information "leaked out" about particular applicants is almost always out of context and are therefore more likely to cause harm than good. Moreover, Committee members may be unduly pressured for information or may be unjustly accused of intentionally harming other people.

Room for improvement?

In recent College Council elections, various candidates mentioned a review of the selection process as one of their campaign pledges. Accordingly, I would like to make a few suggestions:

First, talk to as many Committee members as possible.

Second, keep in mind that, while having a "friend" or former JA on the Committee can help a candidate, it can also work against them (i.e. he/she may be known too well). Committee members, in my experience, will not promote friends just for friendship sake; and each member must contend with the opinions of twenty-three others.

When twice the number of candidates apply for the positions available, decision making is always difficult. While this article will not alleviate the disappointment or dissatisfaction of those applicants not selected, I hope that at least people will have a clearer understanding of what is involved.

Dianne R. Valle '84 was president of the JA's for the freshman class of '86, and chaired this year's JA Selection Committee.

Up for grabs?
The fight for all the marbles

by Rob Park

When Lord Elgin took down the marble facades (which would hereafter be identified by his family name) from the Parthenon in the nineteenth century and shipped them to England, he probably believed he was doing the Greeks a favor. After all, there was war in the peninsula, the Acropolis had been sacked more than once in its sinusoidal lifetime, and it seemed a horrible shame ("tragic" is, I think, a word more appropriate to a description of the human losses of war) that these achievements of Athenian art might be destroyed in the melee.

There were no diplomatic difficulties which could not be overcome by a sufficiently bold and pragmatic commander. Greek government (represented by and representing the Greek people) had been a term without meaning since the fall of Constantinople to the Turks. And by the time Lord Elgin was making his martial tour of southern Europe, the Ottoman Empire itself was in an advanced stage of decline.

What next? Would the Egyptians demand the return of all the mummies...?

Since the Greeks themselves couldn't possibly protect their own treasures, and the marbles weren't properly Ottoman possessions anyway, the marbles were, by Britannia's way of thinking, up for grabs.

A legitimate Greek government now exists (legitimate enough to be recognized by the British government) and grateful though it is that the marbles were not exposed to the possible hazards of war, the Greek people would like them back, thank you.

So far the British government has done little more than shudder in horror, as if the death of all of their museums (amply stocked during its Imperial heyday) was now imminent. If they returned the marbles, what next? Would the Egyptians demand the return of all of the mummies and sarcophagi of the Pharaohs? Would the Chinese want their vases? What would be left except a few Gainesboroughs and Burnes-Joneses?

As distasteful as such a situation might be, this doesn't alter the basic rightness of returning these symbols of Greek civilization. One wonders what the American reaction would be if some foreign general went to the Lincoln Memorial and sawed off the head of Honest Abe for display elsewhere (hint: the president's atomic trigger finger might momentarily itch).

In any case, the Greek government is careful to emphasize that they are making a special plea in this case because of the Elgin marbles' symbolic significance to the Greek nation, and are not calling for the wholesale reacquisition of Britain's dubiously-gotten gains. The British have been more than repaid for saving these works (in the form of a unilateral, one hundred-fifty year "loan"), and it's about time they gave back the collateral.

NEWSBRIEFS

Harned given Grosvenor

Chris Harned '85 is the recipient of the second annual Grosvenor Cup, given yearly by the College Council to the junior "who best exemplifies the traditions of Williams." All juniors are eligible for the award, which carries prestige and honor with it, but no monetary or material compensation.

The award recipient is selected by committee and then approved by the College Council. The honor is based on contributions to campus activities and student organizations, in addition to demonstrated academic ability.

Harned, a history major and Junior Advisor in Williams F, plays on the varsity golf team and is a former member of the swim team. In addition, he runs the Pooh Perplex used book sales and the campus Coca-Cola concessions, and works as a sports writer for the News Office. He will be working in Washington, D.C., this summer as a Mead Government Intern.

He added that the award was unexpected, and that he had not been thinking about the deliberation process. "It was a big surprise. It comes out of the blue and hits you," he said. "I'm kind of humble about it," he added.

Goffs will add new Eph shop

Goff's Sports Inc. on Spring Street will soon be expanding and adding a new store, The Williams Shop, next door to its merchandise space. According to owner Rudy Goff, the new shop will carry items in Williams colors, or bearing the College seal or "basically anything we can put a purple cow on."

The store will probably open before the end of the academic year, in time to attract the summer tourists who flock to Williamstown. "We're shooting for a May 1st opening," said Goff, who hopes that "students will be 60-70% of our customers" despite opening late in the school year. "I expect to do a big business 12 months of the year" he added.

The store will be connected to Goff's via a tunnel, so that customers will be able to get from one store to the other without going outside. The space was formerly occupied by attorney William Savin, who has moved his practice to the other end of Spring Street.

Donations earn donuts

Last Tuesday's and Wednesday's visit of the Red Cross Bloodmobile resulted in the collection of 303 units of blood, down from both the 386 units collected last February and the 326 units collected in October.

Of the total collection last week, 259 units were donated by Williams College students and 44 by townspeople. Forty-eight were first time donors.

One-gallon pins were awarded to Bruce Albelda '85, Joe Beach '84, Barbara Feeney '86, Tom Feist '85, Amy Friedenthal '86, Jeffrey May '85, and Laura Volpe '85.

In the Vampire Sweepstakes, the winning residential unit was Perry-Bascom-Chadborne.

Woodbridge with 25% participation. The Big Drop award for highest giving throughout the entire school year went to Armstrong House, with 28.6%. The two dorms shared 200 doughnuts donated by Molly's Bakery.

Filmmaker eyes campus

Williams College, and several other sites in Western Massachusetts, are being considered as possible locations for a movie about a women's basketball team.

According to officials in the Massachusetts Film Bureau, an independent film crew from New York visited several potential sites in Berkshire and Franklin counties April 6 and 7.

Michael Williams, a spokesman for the film bureau, said the group plans to make a film called "Bounce" about a college that is having financial difficulties but is saved when the women's basketball team wins a championship. He said that the film is expected to be a "low-budget" production.

Besides visiting Williams, the filmmakers last Friday and Saturday toured the Cranwell estate and Lenox Memorial High School, as well as the Boston University Summer Music School campus in Pittsfield and Northfield—Mt. Hermon School in Franklin County.

Williams said the filmmakers were looking for a good-sized gymnasium, classroom space and dormitories that could be filmed without disrupting the schools. He said they were interested in Cranwell, but also liked the gym facilities at Williams.

College News director Ellen Berek said she had not yet received any official response from the film crew, but added that she did not feel such a film could be made here without disrupting campus activities.

McPhee '84 off to Scotland

Jenny McPhee '84 has recently been awarded a scholarship from the Saint Andrews Society of New York. The $10,000 award will enable McPhee to spend the 1984-85 academic year at Edinburgh University in Scotland.

McPhee, an English major, plans to study Gaelic next year. She was one of two winners chosen from a pool of 32 finalists representing colleges nationwide. The scholarship is designed to provide money for one year of post-graduate study at a university in Scotland.

Acceptances mailed

Class of '88 on the way, more of all minorities

by R. DeMott

The Williams College class of 1988 is on the way as the Admissions Office mailed out acceptance letters to 1197 of its 4363 applicants Sunday, according to Director of Admissions Philip Smith.

The number of applications increased by 401 this year, and 70 more applicants were accepted, Smith said, adding that the target size for the entering class is 508, the same as last year.

"We accepted 10 percent more (of the applicant pool) this year, as we expect the yield to be less," Smith said, noting that students are applying to more places this year, some to as many as 18 different colleges.

In addition, "we accepted fewer Early Decision applicants this year," he explained. Early Decision students have promised to attend Williams if they are admitted, so accepting a large number increases the percentage of students who actually enroll.

Fewer New Yorkers

"We have admitted more students from a larger number of states," said Smith. In a reversal of last year's trend, fewer applicants from New York were accepted and more applicants were admitted from such states as Connecticut, Arkansas and Minnesota, Smith noted.

Although more recruiting was done this year in the Albany-Troy-Schenectady area, results were about the same as in past years, he said, adding that he hopes the recruiting drive will bring in more applications from that area in future years.

The ratio of men to women in the newly accepted class is equivalent with the rest of the school—54 percent men and 46 percent women, Smith said. "This is one thing that is remarkably consistent from year to year," he explained.

More Kims than Smiths

Smith said that applications from Asian-Americans were up about 50 percent this year and the number admitted rose slightly more than that.

"We admitted more people with the surname Kim than Smith," he said. He added that there may be a correlation between this and the fact that Williams will offer a new Asian Studies Program next year.

Applications from Afro-Americans also rose slightly, as did the number of admitted, according to Smith. While fewer Hispanic students applied, the acceptance rate for that group rose.

Two new motels headed for Wmstown as British Maid, 1896 plan revampings

If all goes well construction may begin in the next few months on two new luxury hotels in Williamstown. Separate proposals approved by the Williamstown Planning Board would convert the British Maid restaurant into a 43-room motel complex and would add 66 rooms to the current 1896 House restaurant and motel.

The 1896 plan, proposed by Williams Associate Director of Development E. Howland Swift, calls for construction of a 2½-story, L-shaped building with 66 guest rooms attached to the back of the existing building.

The existing restaurant will be renovated, with one of the banquet rooms converted into a lobby and entrance. A new restaurant to be added, called "The Greenery," will be a glass-enclosed area with an outdoor terrace for warm-weather use. It will also have solar panels to provide energy for up to half of the facility's hot water.

Bars, wood stoves
The hotel rooms will probably range in price from $65-$95 a night, including 28 deluxe double rooms which will feature sunken living rooms, wood stoves and full or partial bars.

The entire project will cost between an estimated $3 million; construction should begin sometime in the next few months and be completed in slightly less than a year. The project may be delayed, however, by unclear town sewer regulations and by state and federal restrictions on building in wetland areas.

The Williamstown Zoning Board of Appeals will review the project Thursday evening.

Maid will be Orchards
The other building project, the conversion of the British Maid into a 43-room hotel called The Orchards Inn, has already been approved by the Williamstown Planning Board and Zoning Board of Appeals. According to the plans, proposed by New York City businessman Chester Soling, the existing restaurant will be torn down and the nearby house of manager Penelope Corbin will be moved slightly to the east and incorporated into the motel complex.

The final product will be a circle of New England-style, white clapboard buildings with a swimming pool at the center and a circular driveway around the perimeter with 123 parking spaces. There will also be a health club on the grounds and a terrace and garden near the pool.

The hotel will include 43 rooms on two floors, all of which will be split level with wet bars and two bathrooms. Luxury rooms will have fireplaces. The dining facilities will include a 78-seat dining room and a 73-seat lounge with a cabaret stage.

The project's cost is estimated at between $4 and $5 million and construction should begin in a couple of weeks, Soling said. Room costs are not definite yet, but have been

By next spring the 1896 House could include a 66-room luxury motel and a glass-enclosed terrace dining room like the ones pictured in this architect's drawing, shown facing toward Cold Spring Road. The motel addition will connect to the back of the existing barn-like structure and will parallel the road.

Habib's Indian dance captivates Lasell crowd

by Vernon Squires

Marzia Habib '85 couldn't have picked a finer night to perform; when she concluded her Indian Dance Recital last Thursday with the "Raks-E-Umang," a piece welcoming spring (quite appropriately), the audience in Lasell responded with a standing ovation. Habib's five piece performance was a rousing success.

Because the audience was by-and-large unfamiliar with Indian Dance and its intricacies, Habib distributed an informative program prior to the recital. The program not only described each of the five numbers, but also explained the stylistic elements of "Bharat Natyam" and "Kathak" dance. Habib set as criterion such targets as "sculpturesque poses, intricate footwork, technical brilliance, and feminine charm and grace."

Upon taking the stage, Habib commanded total captivation. Wearing a stunning blue dress, noisy bracelets, and a garland of flowers in her hair, she managed with grace even the most difficult of maneuvers. The dances were fairly long, fully esoteric, and quite complex; Habib worked her body in unusual ways to literally entrance the crowd.

The strongest part of the performance was Habib's ability to use with vitality her entire body. While her feet (adorned with red paint and ankle bracelets) moved with the accompanying music, her arms and neck weaved with mystic fluidity, and her face recorded a gamut of emotion. At one instant puzzled, the next joyous, and the next seductive, Habib acted as more than a dancer. She aspired to communicate Indian life, and in several instances she succeeded.

Perhaps the only fault with the program was the tendency of the dances to run together, so that particular movements took on a "re-run" character. In rare cases Habib seemed self-conscious of off-repeated motions, and tried to compensate with an alluring or benevolent smile. Given the intricacy of the dances, however, the repetition of movements served more to demonstrate Habib's mastery than to diminish her novelty.

Time and photography: transience made permanent

by Mary Vaccaro

A fat stockbroker is caught and forever kept in a photograph's lower left corner. The background's statue of George Washington, its arm seemingly extended above the man's head, denies escape and indeed life. Photographic "anathema," cursing this bourgeois into rigor mortis, is an aspect with which Peter Conrad dealt last Tuesday night.

The second of a series collectively entitled The Character of the Camera, "Photography and the Past: the Camera as a Haunted House" explored the visual and chronological poetry of photography. Conrad, a Bernard Visiting Professor of English, stressed tense duality. Time is both transient and permanent. Images borne of unique, chance moments are simultaneously captured into eternity. Cloud juxtaposed against skyscraper, the camera's "benediction" wishes to contain that "lost cloud" before it disappears, forever.

More photographs flashed upon the screen...Receding park paths invite viewers beyond. Wells promise the hope of Arcadia below. Above and immediate, graves-tones and headless mannequins remind. A young woman holds a human skull...Such imagery expanded and underscored the camera's creative relationship with and longing for the past. Powerful artistic statements individually, the photographs were, Tuesday night, nevertheless given imaginative coherence by an articulate if soft-spoken voice.

Peace Studies debut discusses nonviolence and social change

by Martin Hildebrand

Poll Sci 488 didn't exist last year. Its creation was brought about by a dedicated group of students genuinely interested in their topic. The result, "Non-Violence and Social Change," has attracted 31 students.

Jeff Sutar '84 recalls the work required to initiate the course. He had many meetings with Kurt Tauber, then the chairman of the political science department, and worked over the summer on a syllabus. After locating a faculty sponsor (political science professor Wendy Brown), he had to bring a proposal to the Committee on Educational Policy, which approved the course. He attends every class in both sections, and he says, "It's worth it. It's a labor of love."

Sutar views the course's goals: "Even if non-violence is not the solution to every problem that comes up, not making that alternative known precludes the possibility of it being used at all. One way of looking at the course is that it is not providing the answer but is providing an alternative which may be useful in some situation."

Greg Smith '86 finds that the course allows him to "appreciate a different way of thinking so that one can pursue it further."

Libby Hoffman '86 finds that the course is covering a subject she wanted to know more about but hadn't been exposed to before. She says that they are "studying how, to what extent, and to the spiritual basis for non-violence and how the spiritual and political aspects merge in a successful non-violent action. The semester will conclude with an examination of the future of non-violence in both a personal and political sense.

Instead of traditional grades, students taking the course will receive a descriptive evaluation. Sutar explains, "Given "The incentive in the course comes from personal interest and engagement with the ideas and a dedication to the group instead of working toward a grade."

what means" non-violent actions are used, and she is aware that "you have to keep in mind the feasibility" of what non-violence can and can not do.

The course started by examining the political power of non-violent actions and their tactics, techniques, and dynamics. It has now evolved into a discussion of the nature of the experience, traditional grading could be termed violent. There is an emphasis on group process and progressive engagement with ideas in an untraditional atmosphere. It is impossible to capture the experience with a mere letter grade."

Despite the lack of a letter grade, the College papers' sexual humor draws fire at Babson and Harvard

Recent publications defaming women have ignited outrage in Boston area schools. At Babson and at Harvard, students have become embroiled in a controversy over the acceptability of sexual humor. Student response has been quick and vehement, and may even result in expulsion for two students at Babson.

Babson

A spoof issue of the Babson Free Press which contained explicit sexual references resulted in strong protest from the college community. Some of the slurs were directed against specific Babson women, identified by name or photo, according to the Globe.

Co-editors of the Free Press Paul Cuneo and Geoffrey Spillane published an apology Friday, calling their issue "tasteless and defenseless." They also expressed regret that the issue came out during Babson's Parent's Weekend.

The College administration has not taken action, preferring to let the college community respond through existing channels. Although college president Williams Dili has met with the editors, he said in the Globe, "I am encouraging students to organize and express their feedback directly."

The student body has taken the initiative. Student government president John Skelly has met with Cuneo and Spillane and will discuss the issue in a student government meeting tonight. A petition calling for the editors' resignation is also circulating.

One of the women pictured in the spoof issue, Junior Elizabeth Haley, expressed dismay at the college administration's inaction. She has called for the editors' resignations and a retraction, and is considering filing a complaint with Babson's Student Judicial Court. The five member court has the power to expel or suspend the students.

Harvard

At Harvard, members of an exclusive all-male club issued a newsletter defaming women as "meaty but grateful help-ers" and "slobbering bovines fresh for the slaughter."

The contents of the newsletter were publicized by the Harvard Crimson last week, sparking a student demonstration at the club last Saturday night.

The Pi Eta Speakers Club issued a public apology Thursday, according to the Globe. Club president Timothy J. Keating said, "In retrospect, the letter was a poor attempt at humor...We apologize for the letter and sincerely regret any offense given or taken."

Harvard Dean of Students Archie C. Epps called for the closing of the club, but could not force closure because the university does not own the club, and therefore has no jurisdiction. Pi Eta alumni, who are jointly responsible for the funding of the club, refused to cooperate with the university.

Thursday, the Harvard Student-Faculty Committee on College Life condemned the club for its "indecent and offensive" newsletter. Dean of the College John B. Fox, Jr. joined in the censure, saying "the letter makes a mockery of the basic standards of civility, which the college takes seriously."

New gym construction

Demolition of existing buildings, such as Drummond's Cleaners, (below) began this week to make way for the new pool and gymnasium complex (above). Drummonds will move into the empty space next to Renzi's bookstore next week. Actual construction of the gym will begin in late May or early June. When finally completed, the complex will include a Spring Street commercial building to house Pappa Charlie's deli, the News Room and Goodman's Jewelers; a new gymnasium, which will connect to the squash courts; and a new pool, which will connect the gym and the hockey rink and will border the college art museum addition. Pass/fail option

Mathematics professor Kim Bruce, an early supporter of the move, said the CEP vote was influenced by last minute lobbying by students, including the Gargoyle Society's Jim Foley '84 and College Council President Andrew Cypriot '85, who spoke at the meeting. College Council last week endorsed the proposal by a vote of 29 to 2.

Two in three years

"Students in their junior and senior years at Williams," the text of the proposal reads, "will be permitted to take up to two courses (at most one per semester) of the thirty-two required for graduation on a credit/no-credit basis.

"These courses may not be used to satisfy distribution requirements or to satisfy the requirements for a major or coordinate program. Departments will be responsible for setting up any regulations on enrollment in their courses on a credit/no-credit basis...."

Bruce said sophomores were exempt from the proposal which passed because the Committee feared they might get into trouble if they took courses pass/fail which they later decided were necessary for a major. Freshmen were also excluded from the proposal for the same reasons.

If passed by the faculty in May, the proposal will go into effect next fall for a trial period. After four years, the CEP would conduct a study, and a faculty vote would decide whether plan would remain in effect.

C- to pass

In a gesture which may help to win the support of skeptical faculty members, the proposal gives administrative control to each department and makes C- the minimum grade for "credit." Graded courses now require at least a D-.

"I think it will get people to take courses that they would have been too shy to take otherwise," said CEP member Laura Seilgsohn '85.

Bruce complained that currently students regularly select gut courses to keep their workloads down and grades up. "I would rather see them taking a course they were interested in and ending up with a better education," Bruce said.

"Williams is probably the most restrictive college with regard to pass-fail rules among the colleges it likes to compare itself to," he said.

"Much as we don't like it, grades tend to be a motivating factor or an anti-motivating one in choosing courses."

In other CEP business, a second proposal allowing a freshman to withdraw from a course which he "has little chance of passing" up through the tenth week of the semester was passed and extended to include first semester transfer students.

Aliens, computer life are future realities

by Daniel Keating

This generation may meet both man's evolutionary future and his neighbors in space, according to Robert Jastrow, one of the nation's leading physicists, who presented the pattern of history from the inception of the universe to the successor of mankind in a lecture Thursday night.

Jastrow, former head physicist at NASA and a founder and director of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies, combined his expertise in physics with evolutionary biology to trace the far past and future of man before a packed crowd of more than 200 people in a lecture called "Inner Worlds, Outer Worlds: Thoughts on the Future of Human Evolution, Artificial Intelligence, and Space Exploration."

After outlining how the Big Bang theory of the creation of the universe was proven, Jastrow pointed out that the conditions that caused the initial explosion—infinite temperature, pressure and density—erased any hope of finding what may have caused that first explosion.

"It looks like nature has dropped a curtain on that event," he said, adding that although physicists find the fact frustrating, theologians find it satisfying.

According to Jastrow, the heat caused 15 billion years ago by the initial Big Bang explosion is still around because, since the primordial fireball took up the whole universe, there was nowhere for the heat to go.

Youngsters in space

Jastrow said that since our solar system is only 4.6 billion years old, there are millions or billions of stars and planets much older than ours. Figuring how long it took for elements to combine into a solar system like our own, he postulated that the average solar system is 2½ billion years older than ours.

"About a billion years ago on this planet, there were worms and jellyfish," he said. "If a billion years separates us from the jellyfish, what lies out there a billion years ahead of us? Or two billion?"

Amusing the audience with humorous asides, Jastrow traced evolution on this planet, using slides which ranged from graphs of radiation spectra to cartoons and comical photographs of Albert Einstein to clarify his points.

Dinosaurs had an easy life, according to Jastrow. "A dinosaur would walk along the path and see another dinosaur," he said. "If the other dinosaur was bigger, he would run away. If it was smaller, he would run up and eat it. If it was about the same size and looked promising, it would run up and mate with it."

Computers to follow us?

Discussing more elaborate species, Jastrow said that the pattern for the last 200 million years has been that the dominant form of life on earth gives birth to the new species that will predominate. Theorizing what will follow man, Jastrow placed a 50 percent probability on silicon-based intelligence, or computers, eventually surpassing man.

He conceded that his theory would be hard to validate, since it probably will not happen for at least 50,000 years, but, he said, this generation might find out some of what lies ahead for man.

A meeting soon?

He explained that for the last 20 years, the radio and television waves on earth have been sending out a unique pattern through space that any advanced life form would notice. Assuming that another planet has intelligent life older than ours, and is advanced enough to answer us, Jastrow said we have been signaling long enough to expect an answer.

"It's a good bet that in our lifetime, we will meet up with other life and see its face and form," he said.

estimated at $70-$90 a night.

Former partners

Swift and Soling were formerly partners on the British Maid project until they split up and Swift decided to pursue the 1896 House as a motel site. The two commissioned a study in 1982 which indicated that the Berkshires was an unusually fast-growing tourist area.

Despite that, Soling earlier this month said he would shelve his plans if Swift's 1896 construction goes ahead. The following week, however, after discussing the two projects with Williamstown residents, Soling announced that he now intends to continue with his plans.

Arts in View Rainy days and Mondays New class — always get me down

by Ned Ladd

It rained this weekend. It rained last weekend. It snowed in February, and March was really mucky. Spring in the Berkshires. Yeah.

Having grown up in New England, I've come to expect spring sludge, but people from other parts of the country tell me that spring is actually a desirable season that's not just limited to the weeks before and during exams. I bet other colleges have sun.

I read somewhere that Burlington, Vermont is the cloudiest city on earth. I wasn't surprised. Our weather isn't even bad enough to be the worst of the bad. Purple Valley weather is just mediocre.

Fall is a nice time of year. There isn't any muck to slosh around in, and it's actually sunny out. I always thought Mother Nature was playing a cruel trick on us though when she gave us sun on Freshman Parent's Weekend two days before a two foot snowstorm. Anyway, I'm glad they play football in the fall. Taligates would really be a bummer in weather like this.

Of course, we can always count on Parent's Weekend this spring for good weather. It seems that there's a direct relation between the quality of the weather and the number of Williams diplomas or BMW's on campus.

Smith said that the total amount of financial aid, including jobs, loans and grants will be $3.2 million for next year. The college will offer aid to approximately 35 percent of the incoming class.

Applying for financial aid has no effect on the admissions decision, according to Smith. "The trustees have reaffirmed consistently an aid-blind policy of admissions," he said.

The waiting list for next year's class is shorter than usual, as 100 fewer applicants were retained for a possible second look, said Smith. He explained that around May 4, when the class has taken shape, some files will be reopened in order to fill out the class.

"There is no ranking system until we see what the class looks like," said Smith. He added that the waiting list is then used to fill in any possible weak areas in the class—"If there are no Physics majors or something like that."

After Spring Carnival in February, we'll be sure to get a snowstorm for our Winter Weekend on May 5. We should have left it scheduled for Easter Weekend. At least then we would have had God and maybe a few Trustees on our side.

And then there's the day before your Orgo final. It promises to be sunny and 70 while you watch through a Sawyer window.

I've given up looking at the USA Today's color map to find out the forecast. They seem to have a 50% accuracy rate: when they say it's going to rain, they're right, and when they say it's going to be sunny, they're wrong.

The Record used to print pictures of weather, but when we picked them on Sunday, it always did the opposite on Tuesday. So why are we pressing our luck with this article? We want a sunny day.

Volleyball

by Martin Boss

The men's volleyball team ended its season last weekend by taking second in the Division I New England. Though they had been favored to win and had previously beaten Northeastern, the tournament champions three times, the Ephs fell in the finals in a somewhat disappointing end to a most successful season.

Williams was originally seeded second in the tournament that took place at Springfield April 7th. Though they had won the New England Open earlier in the year, the Ephs were ranked second behind the defending champions, Harvard. However, the Crimson withdrew just before the matches began.

Now expected to cruise through the tournament, the Ephs beat Northeastern, Brown, Boston University, and Maine as they advanced to the semifinal round with the best record. Northeastern, placing second in the flight, also qualified for the round of four.

Williams then beat Springfield 2-0 to get to the finals and meet Northeastern, who upset the top team of the other bracket. For the championship, the Ephs faced a squad they had already beaten three times this season and including once earlier that day. With the score tied at 1-1 and 13-13 in the deciding game, the serve changed seven times without either side scoring. Eventually, Northeastern prevailed 15-13 to take the third game and the title.

The final rankings are not out yet, but the Ephs have posted a 9-1 record in addition to the victory at the New England Open and second at the Division I New England and understandably expects to be rated highly.

Laxwomen

by Bea Bast

The women's lacrosse team lost 8-2 in a tough game against Tufts last Saturday. Sophomore Andrea Raphael scored both goals for the Ephwomen. Coach Julie McHugh admitted, "We had trouble generating offense. Tufts," she continued, "played well and shot well." Despite the barrage, goalie Martha Hoopes '87 had 12 saves.

Wednesday against Springfield, the team played "a good game," according to McHugh, that ended in a 7-7 tie. "The game was fast-paced, and we kept up. It was close the whole way," exclaimed the coach.

Allison Fuller '85 and Raphael led the scoring with 2 goals each. Sue Harrington '84, Jane Rech '85, and Laura Rogers '86 each had a goal. Much to everyone's dismay, however, sophomore dynamo, Carrie Cento, seriously hurt her knee in the first half of the game.

This Wednesday, the lacrosse team will challenge Union at 3 pm on Cole Field. Coach McHugh is optimistic that the team "will be able to pull off a victory."

Golf preview

by Eric Knutzen

The golf team opens the spring season with matches against Harvard and Holy Cross Thursday and before going to Colgate Saturday. At the helm will be new coach Rick Pohle, a former All-American golfer at the University of Maine. In his first coaching job replacing retired Taconic Club pro Rudy Goff.

The golfers are lead by top-ranked junior Mike Hennigan and second ranked Chris Harned '85. Senior co-captain Eric Bagan is third and Doug Hoffer '85 placed fourth with a surprising team-low qualifying round. Freshman Guy Kurtz, who had a very strong fall season, is at fifth with Tom Goodspeed '86 and co-captain Phil Burr '84 rounding out the top seven.

The team has proven its potential with an undefeated fall season and sixth and seventh place finishes by Kurtz and Harned respectively. However, its opponents of this week will already have played several matches while the Williams linksters have been practicing at the field house and a local golf course. If the Ephs can overcome adverse practicing conditions, academic conflicts, and inconsistency they have the talent and depth to go a long way.

Water Polo

by Greg Masters

The men's water polo team opened their season at Yale last weekend with a strong performance. Playing Division I schools the team won one game and lost two close thrillers.

The squad kicked off the six-team tournament beating the Toronto Golden Jets, frequent Canadian champions, by a score of 11-8. Saturday morning saw the Ephs lose a close game to Princeton 8-6, but Williams advanced to the tournament finals when the Jets beat Princeton.

The championship game unnerved Harvard as the Ephs came from behind to tie the game at 12-12 at the end of regulation play. Exhausted both physically and mentally, the Ephs could no longer hold off the aggressive Crimson and lost 14-12.

A unified team effort with strong performances from graduating seniors and improving underclassmen established the Division II New England Champion Ephs as a tough contender in New England Water Polo.

Riding

The Riding team ended its show season Saturday at Smith College with an impressive finish. Competing against 180 riders from 25 colleges, Williams held its own as five team members placed in the equestrian class.

Kirsten Rooks '87 led the way as she took first place. Laurie Boothman '84 and Robin Rutishauser '86 each placed third, while Andrea Smith '86 and Sue Michalski '86 each earned sixth place. In correction of last week's story, Sue was also placed sixth at the previous show at UMass.

White's single, and the Ephs had the lead, 4-3.

The Jumbos then scored three times in the fifth to take the lead for good. Hugo gave up a single and a walk to put runners on first and second with nobody out. Coakley dropped one of the pitches to the next batter, and the runners advanced a base. The runners advanced again on a grounder to short scoring one run and leaving a man on third, who then scored on designated hitter Tom Smernycynski's home run to right-center.

Williams' comeback effort came up one run short. Hede- man's long double to the wall in center scored Mike Coakley from third, but that was all the Ephs could muster.

5-2 In second game

The second game was not nearly so close. The Ephs went up against a pitcher who held them scoreless until the fifth inning. The Jumbos, on the other hand, were able to take advantage of Eph pitcher Kevin Morris '86 in the first inning. Later, he settled down, allowing just one hit the rest of the way.

Despite that later success, however, the first inning was a struggle. Leadoff hitter John Glusti hit the ball to deep in the hole at short and beat the throw, which was in the dirt. Angelo Chaclos followed with an infield single off Morris' leg. Glusti went to third on a fly to center, and Tom Snarsky singled him home. After a double steal left runners on second and third, Morris walked a man. He then gave up a double, and all three runners scored. The Ephs simply could not generate enough offense to catch up.

After the doubleheader coach Coakley said, "I'm disappointed, but not discouraged, because these kids will win their share of ballgames."

The Tufts losses, coupled with the Ephs' opening-game 6-3 loss last Tuesday to Trinity and the 9-3 win Thursday over Southern Vermont, set the team's record at 1-3. Their next games are today at Middlebury and Saturday at Wesleyan.

Baseball drops a pair to Tufts, 6-5 and 5-2

by Mike Best

On Saturday, the baseball team lost both ends of a double-header at Tufts, 6-5 and 5-2. "Both of our pitchers pitched well enough to win," said coach Bob Coakley. "A couple of mishaps in the first game made the difference, and we just ran into a good pitcher in the second game."

The first game was a hard-fought contest that the Ephs might very well have won if not for those "mishaps". Despite being unable to capitalize on a first inning scoring opportunity, the Ephs scored first. Phil Lusardi '85 led off the second with a walk and then stole second. Shortstop Steve Belsito '87, who also had a fine day defensively, came up with two outs and delivered a check swing single to right, scoring Lusardi.

Tufts did not wait long to strike back. Williams pitcher Bill Hugo '84 had held the Jumbos to only one hit in the first two innings, but in the third he was hurt by two Williams errors and a momentary loss of control. Tufts shortstop Steve Centrella led it off with an infield single to deep short and got to second when Belsito's throw got away from first basemen Rick Hedeman '87. Then, after getting an out, Hugo hit a batter and walked the next to load the bases. Jumbo first basemen Tom Snarsky smacked a two run single, and an additional scored when Snarsky stole second and the throw went into centerfield.

Ephs tie it up

The Ephs immediately tied up the game. Mike Coakley '85 singled to start off the top of the fourth, and Lusardi singled him over to second. Hedeman drove Coakley in with a double, and Lusardi scored the Ephs' third run on an infield grounder.

The Ephmen added another run in the fifth when Brian Rutledge '85, who had doubled, was knocked in by senior Mark

Lax loses to Jumbos in overtime

by Dave Paulsen

The men's lacrosse team split two games this week, defeating the University of New Haven 8-7 on Monday and falling to Tufts 11-10 in overtime on Saturday. The team's record is now 2-2, already bettering last season's victory total.

Saturday, the Ephs lost a heartbreaker to Tufts, playing in extremely cold weather. The Ephs held a two goal margin late in the game, before allowing Tufts to score two quick goals to force the game into overtime. In that overtime period, Williams had at least one golden scoring opportunity, but the Tufts goalie made an outstanding save. The Jumbos then capitalized on a Eph miscue to score the winning goal.

Seniors co-captain Tom Davies '84 again led the Eph attack, exploding for three goals and three assists. Attackman Mike O'Connell '87 netted three goals, while Chris Toll '86, Jim Sperry '87, Steve Patterson '87, and Reese Hughes '85 all netted one goal apiece. Eph goalie Brad DuPont '86 stopped 11 Tufts shots in the contest.

"Well enough to lose"

Williams Head Coach Renzi Lamb summed up his team's performance, "We played just well enough to lose. It was a heartbreaking loss." Lamb did single out O'Connell for an "outstanding job" and Davies and Hughes for their fine performance.

Monday, the squad turned in a strong performance against New Haven. Hughes scored a goal in the final minutes of play to lift the Ephs to their 8-7 victory.

The game was a see-saw battle, as New Haven jumped out to a quick 2-0 first quarter lead. The Ephs came back with 3 second quarter goals but allowed New Haven two more to leave the score 4-3 after two quarters. The Ephs tied the game after three quarters by outscoring New Haven 3-2. In the fourth quarter, Williams fell behind by one before Mark Payton '84 scored an unassisted goal to tie things up. That set the stage for Hughes' game winning heroics.

Toll tallies three

Hughes had also added the first Williams goal, but he was not alone in the scoring department. Toll chipped in three goals, and Sperry and Davies added one apiece. Davies also assisted on four goals while DuPont stopped 14 shots.

Lamb said that the two one-goal games showed that his team is "not quite there yet. The team has potential, but hasn't come together yet." Lamb pointed to the mixture of freshmen and seniors on his squad. "The freshmen have been playing excellent, but the seniors have only been playing adequately, with the exception of Tom Davies, who has been outstanding." Lamb also praised the play of Matt Kennedy '84, who has anchored the Eph defense, and lauded Hughes for his offensive contributions.

The Ephs play at home twice this week, hosting a tough Dartmouth squad on Wednesday and Trinity on Saturday.

Tennis notches two more wins

by Paul J. Mahoney

The men's tennis team has added Clark and Middlebury to its growing list of victims as they continue their four match winning streak. These teams join the squads from Union and MIT who also found defeat at the hands of the Williams

In Thursday's match against a very solid team from Tufts, Williams went 7-2, taking six singles matches and two doubles. Most of the matches were tight, with Jamie King '84, Kevin Callanan '87, and Tom Harrity '84 all going to the full three sets. Junior Tim Rives produced a fine performance in the third singles match, taking his opponent in a neat two sets. The losses came when captain Brook Larmer '84 lost a "really close" match in three sets, 6-2, 7-6, 7-6. The other very close loss came from the doubles team of Harrity and Callanan in three sets.

Williams swept to a clear victory over Middlebury on Tuesday, taking all of the singles matches and splitting the doubles with one passed game, for a final score of 7-1. Strong performances were turned in by senior Mike Shore (6-1, 6-3), and Callanan (7-5, 6-0), with Rives demolishing his opponent 6-0, 6-2. Larmer, Harrity, and Tim Petersen '86 also pitched in to make a complete rout of the singles. The doubles team of Larmer and Rives went 6-4, 7-6, 6-1 to gain another point, with Chris Clarey '86 and Jamie King losing a hard-fought match 7-5, 6-3.

These two "satisfying" wins leaves Coach Sean Sloane's team with a win-loss record of 22-2 in singles competition, and 6-4 in doubles play.

This Saturday, Williams hosts Amherst at 1:00.

Ruggers split in all-day tourney

by Tom Dumphy

The Rugby Club hosted an all-day tournament on Saturday and fared quite well. The A-side split a pair of games, losing to eventual champions Albany Law 7-6 and beating Connecticut College 32-4. The Killer B's again proved unbeatable, taking two games by 20-0 to capture the B-bracket title.

Williams started the muddy day against Albany Law and quickly gave up three points. The Ephs came back on the strength of two long penalty kicks by Eric Russell '84. Will-ams kept the 6-3 lead until midway into through the second half. Albany then parlayed an Eph miscue into the game-winning try. The play remained bogged down in the Williams end until the final whistle.

The Ephs opened up their offense in the second game and led 32-4 at the half. The beleaguered Connecticut College players declined to come out for the second second half. Scoring for Williams were scrumline John May '84 and nearly the entire line. John Frese '84 scored three tries. Mark Evans '85, Marty Davey '85, and Russell scored a try each. Bob Ause '85 connected on four conversions.

Jeff May '85 guided the B-side line to 20-0 shutouts of Albany Law and Tufts. Roger Merriam '86 scored a dozen points on kicks and Mark Tompkins scored twelve points on three tries. Adding tries to the Williams total were May, Craig Kirby '86, John Feteroff '86, and Chris Edwards '87.

The Ephs next home game is Saturday against Babson on Cole Field.

Crew rows Worcester; varsities take second

Men fall to Conn. women to Smith

by Susan Christenson and Monica Fennell

Spectators from the banks of the Quinsigamond Lake, may have been misled by the apparent ease with which the crews of Williams, Smith, WPI, Holy Cross, and Connecticut College glided across the finish line. Saturday, at a 2000-meter regatta at Worcester, Connecticut College dominated men's races while Smith led the women's events.

The dramatic evidence of athletic effort—sweat—is not visible from the dock, but the men's novice A-team proved their strength by pulling ahead after a slow start to beat WPI. The varsity men's boat of four rowers appeared sluggish behind the Connecticut and WPI boats, because it was straining to pull against the extra weight of six inches of water that had leaked in. The men's novice B-team did not have enough of its often unnoticed strength to beat the Connecticut and WPI boats.

Defeating WPI, the men's varsity boat of eight lost only to Connecticut College who rowed at a consistently higher pace than the Ephs. Not only does the pace of the oars entering and leaving the water fluctuate from boat to boat, but within the course of the race this rating changes. Starting at a high rating the pace slows for the body of the race until the final sprint. In an attempt to pull past Connecticut College and Smith, the eventual victors, the women's JV boat took an early sprint to push out the final crucial strokes.

8 shells flash smoothly

From the spectator's vantage-point, all eight oars of the crew shells seemed to flash smoothly in and out of the water. Though the boats may look like elongated canoes, rowing a crew shell requires more precision than paddling a tubby row-boat round a pond. Chris Karlson '85, who sets the stroke for the varsity women's boat, was able to have steady control of her oar despite her sprained wrist. Karlson led the team to second place behind the Smith heavy-weight boat and ahead of the Smith light-weight team, the Connecticut team, and the WPI team.

The harmonious movement of backs, arms, and legs swinging together is striking from land. Breaking this rhythm twice, because of mishaps with an oar, the women's novice eight let Smith, a close competitor for the first part of the race, squeek ahead. Recovering their precision, however, Williams beat Smith's B-team, Connecticut, Holy Cross, and WPI.

Faculty comm. urges boosts in number of fin. aid students

by John Clayton

Capping a year and a half of study, the Financial Aid Task Force, a committee of faculty and administration members, has released a report which advises Williams to increase its percentage of financial aid recipients from 31 percent to 40 percent of the student body.

The FATF made three recommendations: to increase the percentage of students on financial aid to "35 percent in the short run and 39 to 40 percent in the longer run;" to draw 15 percent of the student body from American minorities; and to increase "the share of the students in the incoming class with the highest academic qualifications."

The report was sent to the faculty last week and discussed at their meeting Wednesday (see related story, p.4). The decision about whether or not to act on the report's suggestions lies with College President John W. Chandler.

Bigger grant, no loan

In an effort to attract more lower- and middle-income students, the FATF report recommended that "the loan burden be eliminated for the very most (sic) academically talented students," and replaced with larger grants.

In presenting the report at the faculty meeting, FATF Chairman Stephen R. Lewis said that the problem in getting such students does not lie in the Admissions Office, but in the fact that the most academically talented student "just don't apply" to Williams.

The report said that its "objectives and targets can and should be reached without any loss in the personal qualities that the Admissions Office seeks in our student body." In presenting the report, Lewis said, "It looks like we want to have our cake and eat it too. Well, yes we do."

The Committee on Priorities and Resources, in a response to the FATF report, said, "the College can afford to offer financial aid packages without a loan component to the 25 academically ablest (sic) students in each entering class who have demonstrated financial need."

"Won't be easy"

In a later interview, Admissions Director Phil Smith said, "I'm not sure we can reach all those goals. It won't be easy." He added, "Fifteen percent U.S. minorities is a goal that is doable. Thirty-five percent on financial aid with our current pool is doable. Forty percent by 1990 is doable if we increase the pool significantly. We must take time and effort to evaluate our methods."

According to the FATF Williams "has a ten percent lower share of students from below the median family income in the United States than the average of other very highly selective colleges and universities."

The report said that Williams should have a higher share of students on aid for three reasons: the College misses potential excellent students; it misses "an opportunity to train

Divisions I and II will get 7 and 8 new faculty of 20 just appointed

by John McDermott

Next year's new faculty members are weighted toward humanities fields and are largely the products of Midwestern colleges and universities, according to information released last week by Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley.

Faculty hirings for next year, though not over, are "in the home stretch," Oakley said. College President John Chandler said the college plans at least one additional appointment, to the Physics department. The college recently released a list of the new appointees, all of which have been approved by the Trustees.

The college appointed three assistant professors each to the departments of English and Mathematical Sciences, two each to History and Psychology, and one each to Economics, Chemistry, German and Russian.

Visiting posts were created in Chinese, Romance Languages, Political Science, Art and Sociology. In addition, the hiring of Ed Grees as the new director of the Outing Club was finalized.

Ohio's Oberlin College claims three graduates in the group, the largest number associated with any one institution. Nearly all of the scholars hold

College diversifies offerings with three new area studies programs

by Stuart Smith

In an attempt to allow students to focus their studies on specific regions of the world, Williams will offer three new interdisciplinary programs next year, in African and Middle Eastern Studies; and Russian, Soviet and East European Studies; and Asian Studies.

The new programs are part of "a logical pattern of growth for Williams," according to Assistant Professor of History Thomas Spear, who will chair the African and Middle Eastern Studies Program.

Russian professor Nicholas Fersen and history professor Peter Frost will head the Russian and East European Studies and the Asian Studies programs, respectively.

"Williams introduced the area studies program four or five years ago," Spear said, "when there was little faculty involvement in these fields."

Now, he noted, "Williams has the faculty and courses available, so we can capitalize on the developments that have taken place."

The fact that the student demand was there, he added, "gave a further push to the development of the three programs."

Six courses apiece

Each of the two new specialzations involves a 6 course program. In the African and Middle Eastern Studies Specialization students first take at least one "concepts" course, chosen from ten courses offered by four departments, and then move on to take four "core" courses, chosen from at least three different disciplines. The specialization is capped off by History 367, Contemporary Africa, which serves as the senior seminar for the program.

Students will start out together in the concepts courses, Spear said, and will then be able to broaden out through their work in the core courses. "Then they'll come back together in the senior seminar," he said, "and try to pull together what they've learned, to see what it adds up to."

Spear added that he does not think the new program will con-

Roughly 350 Williams students attended Thursday's concert by the Gang of Four and the Waitresses. This low attendance figure, combined with general student unhappiness over the lack of visibility of these bands, and similar reactions to Marshall Crenshaw in the fall, points to problems with the Student Activities Board's choices for bands this year.

The SAB was hampered by late cancellations by the Clash and Madness. And they tried to minimize losses by doing heavy off-campus promotion. But the higher price for non-students did not make up for the losses, and the concert ended up costing Williams students four to five dollars apiece whether they went or not.

The purpose of the SAB is not to make money on concerts. But their purpose is to please a large portion of the student body. The answer may lie in one big concert per year; it may be that many small events, such as Comedy Nights and Jazz Cabarets, will please more students. Perhaps the key is to shy away from "up-and-coming" bands (like Crenshaw) in favor of "down-and-going" ones, who were popular at one time and thus have name recognition, but who are not at the apex of their careers (like Warren Zevon and Southside Johnny when they played here).

The most important key, however, is student input. Regular polling of the student body, asking which types of concerts and which bands they would pay to see, would alleviate attendance problems.

Presumption

To the editor:

Is it too gross a presumption to ask that the individual who reviews Williams' theatre productions display at least a semblance of knowledge of what the playwright intended to achieve? I would never demand a definitive reading, particularly of a play like Krapp's Last Tape or of a playwright such as Samuel Beckett, but surely Ms. Phillips could have done more in her review than to skate on the banana skin of such comments as "In typical Beckett fashion..." Indeed, if she is going to employ such epithets she should realize that silence and pauses are as much a part and parcel of Beckett's "fashion" as a character's inability to listen to the truth about himself. To take Ms. Phillips' metaphor literally I would like to ask her if she always listens to tapes on "fast-forward" or whether she has ever cared to listen to the silence between the tracks?

I am not asking for Ms. Phillips to give uncensored acclaim to any Beckett production that happens to be performed at Williams College but I do make a plea that if she is going to put her criticism into print, that she incorporate, at least minimally, a reference to the intentions of 1) the playwright, 2) the director—and that the precision of her vocabulary move beyond the descriptive vagaries of: "Krapp's Last Tape lasted too long...The performance would have been more appealing if he had fast-forwarded."

May I also take the liberty of adding an old English proverb, "Piot summary doth not a good review maketh."

LETTERS POLICY

The Record encourages letters to the editor. They should be limited to 250 words, signed and typed. The deadline is Sunday noon.

If you need more space to make your opinions known, contact Op-Ed editor Rob Park at 597-6398. The Op-Ed deadline is Saturday noon.

Op-Eds and letters are the opinions of the writers, and not necessarily the opinions of the Record.

upon us again, and some people are finding out that two courses they want to take meet at the same time. While I certainly do not have a general solution to this problem, I have a suggestion that may alleviate a part of it.

This suggestion is to, after next year, eliminate the O and P hours, because they each overlap two regular class hours. Someone who wants to take a class meeting hour O (8:30-9:45 A.M. on two days out of Monday, Wednesday, and Friday) will find it difficult to also take another class at either 8:00 or 9:00 on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

Dean Grodzins '83, former Record cartoonist, has been getting ever more obscure/esoteric/nostalgic since leaving the Purple Valley. "Elves" can be generally understood to mean Seniors, "gnomes" the rest of us.

In Praise of Folly

by Lee Farberman

You have probably seen them in one of your classes. They wear suits to class, totter around the quad in heels. They invent excuses to go to Baxter to get their mail (they check their S.U. boxes an average of six times a day). Today we go in Search Of...the Williams Senior (Theme music up, roll opening credits).

Every Spring (I use the term loosely) the 500 or so seniors are engaged in trying to figure out what the heck they want to do with their lives, and then trying to do it. For some the decision part is easy—"I've always wanted to be a doctor." For some, doing it is easy—Daddy owns the company. But I find it odd that so many of us (I'm a senior, too) end up doing the same thing. Williams has been called a prep school for New York banks.

Skim the doctors off the top. Only a few actually make it the whole four years via the pre-med route. A couple of seniors go on to some kind of advanced schooling in their major. There's a fairly large number of lawyers—as if we don't have enough already. But most of us go into business of some kind. And the easiest way to do that is to interview with a million firms at the Office of Career Counseling, or what I call the whole interview/application/resume-pad thing.

(A great dream of mine is to foil all the resume padders I know by going to all the places their resume went and saying "Look! I know for a fact that this guy was never president of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition's Officer's Free-Time Fund. And do you know what the recording secretary of the Union of Concerned Students does? He copies the problem sets for four different classes and distributes them to those who need that extra help").

I guess the system that is, is for a reason. Somehow there is a large turnover in the worlds of high finance banking, insurance, and consulting, and businesses in these fields need to train new brains (grist for the mill?) so that they too can be discarded several years down the line. I should state out front that I didn't go through the whole O.C.C. thing. But I do feel qualified to make fun of it.

Don't wear light colored clothing—sweat shows more. That is, if you don't spill something on yourself.

Some observations:

It's kind of ironic, but during the crush period when all of the interviews are held and all the grad school applications due, the same academics and study habits that got a student to the point where he is qualified to apply to these places get lost. Shot to hell, even. And seniors find themselves doing months of Biochem in two nights; solving all of the world's economic problems in those precious few hours before a test.

BrrrrrrBrrrring. "Oh my God! An outside call! Maybe it's Morgan Stanley! Or Ernst and Whitney. Could it be Arthur

Anderson, or Lehman Brothers? Wait! I know, it's Harvard B-School. I'm in! I got in! That's got to be worth an extra five thou' a year for me!" BrrrrBrrrring. While he rants on, I answer the phone: "Joe's Massage Par-

A Jew's Support of Jackson

by Karl S. Pribram

In response to the questions on Jesse Jackson that were posed by Professor Kwitter in the Record, I must say that I am happy to accept her invitation. In no way am I ashamed of my support of the candidacy of Jesse Jackson as I am also not ashamed of my Jewish heritage. I respond to these "clever" questions of Professor Kwitter in the hope that my efforts will clarify some of the positions of the Jackson candidacy.

I wish that I could simply answer the scenarios posed by Professor Kwitter as being irrelevant because they exist in the land of "ifs". Unfortunately these scenarios do exist and must be seriously addressed by politicians. First of all, I must point to the essence of Mr. Jackson's candidacy. The main thrust of the campaign has never been to get him into the White House. Jesse Jackson's candidacy is dedicated to the expansion and realignment of the Democratic Party with the hope that in its future it might better represent the interests of the American people. Jesse Jackson has been the strongest proponent and initiator of the current registration drives in this country. He is trying to register all people, not just Jackson supporters.

In getting back to Professor Kwitter's letter, I for one was not happy with the "anti-semitic" remarks made by Jackson. However, those remarks were not a political decision. They were made privately without the knowledge that they would become public. I can hear the cries now: "But he's running for President! How can you separate public from private?" Again, I must speak of the goals of the Jackson campaign. Unfortunately we do not have a color-blind society, and no one can seriously say that a black man could be elected President in 1984. I am supporting Jackson for his views upon the Democratic Party in particular and American politics in general. I am supporting the political concerns and decisions that Jesse Jackson has worked for and made throughout his life. And that does not include private discussions occurring in cafes (or whom he sleeps with, for that matter).

The northern—supposedly progressive—politicians are practicing racism by promoting ignorance.

In answer to Professor Kwitter's question of how I would feel if someone yelled "nigger". The fact is, it is being yelled even during this decade when we were supposed to leave the problems of civil rights behind us. We certainly have not.

As a proud male-feminist, I was both surprised and disappointed to find that the author of last week's letter is a woman. The ERA has not been ratified by this country specifically because of its failure to pass in the Deep South. The four. Rooms by the hour."

"Hey tell Joe to get himself down here to the pub. We're going to be here all night!"

"It's for you Joe."

Where a senior actually ends up is due in part to chance, because of the way the system works here. You fill out a preference sheet for the interviews you want, ranking them in order. Then a computer assigns the interviews, based on your preferences and the spaces available. Obviously the individual has some input, but...

Interview tips:

• Eat only chicken soup and white bread before any interview. Drink only water. Anything else will give you halitosis—that's a nice word for bad breath.

• Don't wear light colored clothing—sweat shows more. That is, if you don't spill something on yourself first.

So where does all this lead? Well, the system works quite smoothly. Williams leads the nation in producing top executives. Those who sidestep the system go to the Peace Corps. Those that fail through the net travel in Europe, and visit the fools who signed up for more school, at a foreign university.

I'm not criticizing. This is a rite of spring, like the presence of the first robin, or the first mosquito bite. It's kind of like a final exam for the four years spent here. Perhaps for this age that is the eighties ("the word is money"), it is an appropriate one.

Senior Lee Farberman's career plans include: 1) lying in a gutter 2) replacing Deney Terio on "Dance Fever" 3) writing a bestseller on the mating habits of sub-Saharan yaks 4) working for his father's company.

overt racism that still exists has created situations ideal for the politicians of the "new right" (there is nothing "new" about them; they simply have removed their white hoods). Until there is enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, the ERA will not be ratified.

Here, I have only addressed one concern of the Jackson campaign. The other scenarios that Professor Kwitter posed are also concerns of Mr. Jackson. His position on the foreign relations of this country have found viable support among liberals. His positions on Central America, South Africa, and the Middle East are based on one simple ideal: Equality—and not just among white, Christian males, either. Students at Williams complain about Mr. Reagan. Unfortunately, they will have him to contend with for another four years unless they embrace the political legitimacy of those people upon whom Reagan's policies have the most harmful effects.

NEWSBRIEFS

Fewer frosh get warnings

Only 86 freshman received academic warnings this semester, a drop of almost 50 percent from first semester, according to figures released by the Registrar's Office this week. A total of 104 warnings were issued, as opposed to 196 last semester.

Of the 86 freshmen, 70 received one warning, 14 received two warnings and two received three warnings apiece. Division III again handed out the largest number of the warnings—53 percent. The mathematics and chemistry departments each gave out 17 warnings, while the biology and geology departments handed out nine and eight respectively.

Most of the remaining warnings came in Division II, with the economics department handing out half of the 44 warnings issued in the division. The psychology department issued 15 warnings. Only 5 percent of the warnings issued were in Division III. As was the case last semester, the English department, with more freshman registered than any other department (253), did not issue a single warning.

Slightly more freshman received warnings than has been the case in two out of the last three years. Seventeen percent of the Class of 1987 received second semester warnings, compared with 14.2 percent of the class of 1984, 18.7 percent of the Class of 1985 and 15.7 percent of the class of 1986.

Faculty meet, approve CEP, review WSP

A proposal making it easier for freshman to withdraw from courses was passed by the faculty in their meeting Wednesday. In addition, they evaluated Winter Study and the Financial Aid Task Force report (see related story, p. 1).

The withdrawal proposal, presented by the Committee on Educational Policy, allows freshmen and first-semester transfers to withdraw from any course through the tenth week of the semester with a non-failing "W" grade.

A similar rule, in effect this year as an experiment, only allows withdrawals from courses into which freshman had been specifically placed (such as languages, mathematics and science courses), and does not include transfers.

However, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said that Dean of Freshmen David Colby had received about 20 withdrawal applications this year, but was limited by the rules to only six approvals.

The CEP's accompanying proposal, allowing upperclassmen to take two courses pass/fail, may reach faculty vote sometime in early May.

Frosh seminars successful
Fred Greene, Chairman of the Winter Study Program Committee, explained that next year students would again register for WSP's in the fall, since last year when the students registered in the spring they became unhappy with their choices by January.

WSP Committee member James B. Wood reported on the new Freshman Seminars, saying that both goals, introducing students to interdisciplinary perspectives and allowing faculty to work together, were met. He said that although there was not as much student input as the committee had hoped, both students and faculty rated the seminars positively.

President John W. Chandler said that in an effort to "devote renewed attention to the quality of residential life within the house system," the pay for senior house associates would be increased from $250 to $1000. The first half hour of the meeting was Executive Session, in which faculty discussed salaries.

Swimmers set for fund-drive

Williams students, staff and faculty are invited to join participants from Northern Berkshire County who will "Swim for Heart" at the College Swimming Pool on next Sunday from 9 a.m. to 12 noon. The event is designed to acquaint people with the cardiovascular benefits of swimming while raising money for the research and educational programs of the American Heart Association.

This is the second year for "Swim for Heart" in Massachusetts, but the first year the event has been held in Berkshire County. Biology Professor Henry W. Art is coordinating the event.

Prior to the event, participants will request pledges from residents in the community for each lap they swim individually or as three-member teams during a one-hour swimming period. Prizes will be awarded to the participants based on the amounts of pledges collected.

Entry envelopes are available at the Northern Berkshire YMCA in North Adams, the Williamstown Youth Center, the Williamstown Medical Associates and the Williams College Pool. For more information, contact Professor Art at 597-2461.

Hodgkins runs food meetings

Jim Hodgkins, Director of Food Services at Williams, cohosted the annual conference of the National Association of College and University Food Services' Region I with Gary Starr of Middlebury College at Middlebury earlier this month.

The four-day conference drew more than 200 participants from 40 schools, and was coordinated by the food service staffs of Middlebury and Williams.

Among the highlights of the conference were a day of communications seminars and workshops, one of which, entitled "Audio Visuals," was presented by Karl Kowitz and Everet Geno of Williams, with Jim Bingham of the Rochester Institute of Technology.

Other programs covered such catering subjects as promotion, marketing and sales; preparation and presentation; and staff development, equipment and facilities.

The final day of the conference focused on such topics as "Stress Management" for food service professionals, and "Nutrition Beyond the Textbook."

Region I includes colleges and universities with self-operated dining services in New York, New Jersey, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Maine, Connecticut and Southeastern Canada.

Idea Exchange Forum caters to all viewpoints

by R. DeMott

The Williams Idea Exchange Forum, a student-run group only a few months old, is extending its scope in an attempt to let members of the Williams community know that there are many sides to every issue.

The group welcomed more than forty people to its discussion on the existence of God last Monday. The group invited philosophy professors Laszlo Varsanyi and Timothy Bartel to the discussion in an effort to extend interest in the forum beyond the student body.

"The next two weeks, we'll also have members of the faculty at the discussions," said Edward Stein '87, one of the founders of the group. Stein said that the group invited sociology professor Carole Marks and economics professor Lee Alston to attend yesterday's discussion on Race and the Economy.

Law of the Sea next
Next week, he plans to have environmental studies professor Thomas Jorling and political science professor MacAllister Brown, along with local attorney David Sedney, present for a discussion on The Law of the Sea Treaty.

Founded in January, the Williams IEF (pronounced Eph) was the idea of two freshmen—Stein and Michael Weber.

According to Stein, the group will provide an opportunity for people with opposing views to meet and discuss different subjects. Normally the group size is around eight or ten, he said. Weber added that the group is usually very informal, and the discussion is mostly at a level where even those who are not familiar with a topic will take something away from the discussion.

"Mike and I did this in reaction to a perceived polarization on campus," Stein said. In a letter distributed in January, Stein and Weber noted that most groups on campus are single issue groups which "tend to further the polarity between people with opposing views...making it difficult for the undecided and the intellectually curious to hear and take part in intelligent, multi-sided discussions."

"There is an emphasis on getting people with diverse ideas at a discussion," said group member Chris Fleming, '85. According to Stein, in addition to the members who show up for all the discussions, the group welcomes those who attend only when a topic which interests them arises.

Weber added, "We don't expect everyone to talk, its also for people to listen and learn about the issue."

Area Studies programs

filct with Afro-American Studies. Afro-Am, he said, "is basically U.S. history. All the two programs share an interest in Africa, but actually they have very different appeals."

The new Russian, Soviet and East European Studies program will be similarly structured. Students will start out with a single concepts course focusing on either anthropology, economic development, or comparative economic systems. They will then take a further four core courses and end their program with History 373S, "Society in Revolution: Russia 1917 to 1931," which will serve as the senior seminar.

Spear said an additional reason for the development of the three new programs was the belief that "a double major overconstrains students academically. What we wanted to do," he said, "was to provide a second focus short of a second major. With the specialization alternative this second focus can complement rather than simply parallel a major."

"In this way students will be able to have a vertical major, which explores one discipline in depth, and a horizontal concentration, which focuses on one area of the world but which embraces many disciplines," he added.

The programs will hopefully not be just academic, Spear concluded. "Students will be able to receive credit for junior year abroad in these areas of the world," he said, "so that they will see in the field what these countries are like."

potential leadership from lower- and middle-income families and members of minority groups;" and it may be perceived by other high school seniors as too homogeneous, thus losing talented high-income students as well.

In a separate interview, Chandler emphasized that Williams will continue its need-based policy of financial aid, but within that framework would use this no-loan program to increase the pool of applicants and also the yield of acceptances of lower- and middle-income students.

Due to an editorial error, Michael Manley's weekend visit to campus will not be covered in this issue.

An exclusive interview with the former Jamaican Prime Minister and a report on his lectures will appear in next week's Record.

Waitresses' Patty Donahue serves up style

Singer Patty Donahue is famous for "knowing what boys like." Last Thursday she The Waitresses came to Williams for the annual spring concert. Before the performance, while her road crew was setting up in Chapman Rink, the Record spoke with Donahue. Dressed in a black leather jacket and torn black pants, while nervously chewing gum and wringing her hands, she offered her feelings about singing, working, The Gang of Four, Williams, and what boys like.

DONAHUE: Maybe I should take this gum out of my mouth, huh? (She laughs, quite at ease)
RECORD: Can you tell me a little bit about the history of the band, about yourself and The Waitresses?

D: The Waitresses...well we started back in, at least the concept of the Waitresses—it wasn't a live band back then, in like '78—it was just this guitar player and myself doing these songs in this basement in Akron. And then they put them on Akron Compilation Albums, and "Boys Like" did really well, so then when I finished school after six years—at college, at Kent—the band became live in New York City. Then we started touring and did two albums.

R: What have you done recently?
D: We've been writing a lot. We're trying Gang of Four charges crowd

by Brett McDonnell

People were moving on the floor of Lansing Arena last Thursday night and among them could be spotted a few Williams students, but did the Eph dancers hear the words that the Gang of Four were singing?

The problem of leisure
What to do for pleasure
Ideal love a new purchase
A market of the senses
Dream of the perfect life
Economic circumstances
The body's good business
Sell out maintain the interest

The Marxist revolution came to Williams College Thursday night, and the ruling class didn't even know what hit it.

The Student Activities Board wisely promoted the Gang of Four/Waitresses concert as "a dance band party." Perhaps a few shrewd Ephmen knew something was amiss when they saw some rather odd looking types in the crowd. Maybe getting asked, for the first time in their Williams career, if they had any acid tipped off a few more. The size of the crowd was in the area of 750 or so, according to SAB business manager Gary Seilinger '84 (a mediocre turnout, but not too bad given that the concert was a last minute replacement for Madness, who cancelled their American tour).

The opening band, The Waitresses, did to finish an album. The whole band writes; we did it all ourselves, but right now we're just doing a lot of college dates. We have a few clubs, but it's mostly colleges. We're doing an eastern, kind of, short tour. It's no big tour right now. We're just like doing, you know, a couple of weeks out.

R: What other schools?

D: We're playing Clarkson in Potsdam, and we're going to New Hampshire and we're playing RPI in Troy, Syracuse University, Suffolk Community College, NYU, we're going to Providence, and Trinity College in Connecticut.

R: How often do you play? Again tomorrow night, or Saturday?

D: Right, we do. I don't like to work any more than five days a week, but sometimes you do. Like May fourth, we have two shows that day. (laughs) One at three and one at nine.

R: Is your target audience the college age people? The 18-25 year-old market?

D: I don't like to put boundaries on our, you know, on our...crowd that comes to see us. I would like to think it would be people of all ages that would enjoy it.

R: How would you classify your music? Or, would you classify it?

D: That's hard to say. I don't really classify that either. It's rock, maybe some, like some people in the band have jazz and classical backgrounds. Kind of a little funk maybe, but...it just kind of comes out. You know, we all have ideas, and everybody has input, and you just never know what it's going to sound like when it's finally finished. It's just what it is.

R: Do you try to satisfy your own tastes or your audiences? Which comes first?

D: Oh definitely my own tastes come first. I don't really feel myself that separate from the audience. I mean, their feelings. I'm just, you know, a girl, on the planet, and my feelings aren't that much different from a lot of them. I mean, I grew up listening to the radio too. The only problem we have is the band agreeing on the concept and direction of the songs...We have no problem with what the world wants and what we want.

R: Still, it's not everyone who's out there writing and playing. It is something special, isn't it?

D: Depends on the subject matter probably.

R: What is it like for a lifestyle, being a music personality, so to say?

D: What's it like for a lifestyle?...I think it's great, because you're kind of your own boss. I can't say you get to sleep in much, because tours are really a lot of work. You have to get up real early, catch planes, you're in a different city every day, sometimes you just see the clubs and the hotels, and you never even see the city. It's a lot of hard work, but I really enjoy it. It's a really crazy lifestyle. Like these boys, in this band, they're so funny. They're really great, just so funny.

R: What about leisure?

D: (Laughs) Well, I'm pretty busy right now. I don't have much leisure time. I'm tour managing, and managing this band at the same time too.

R: So it's definitely a profession? Much more than a hobby?

D: Oh no. It goes way beyond hobbies....This is (giggling) serious fun!

R: What about performing? What's it like to be up onstage?

D: It's really fun. It's hard to describe though, what it feels like. Everybody wants, you know, like they're waiting to hear, so, so "what do you do anyway?" You have to feel that you've worked hard enough to satisfy, that you're not just goofing off, and you have something to say, and some music, and you hope everybody likes it, and you hope they enjoy it and feel the same way. You hope you're getting some kind of emotional message across to them. And that's wonderful when that happens.

R: Like tonight, for instance? When you're up onstage and everybody is dancing and having a good time?

D: Oh I hope so...I'll be out there. (laughs)

R: Tell me about...

D: (Interrupting) The Gang of Four? Do I like the Gang of Four? Sure, I love 'em. I think they're great.

R: Do you like playing with them? Listening to them? Partying?

D: Yeah I do, although we don't really party with them. We've met backstage. We opened for them once before, in St. Louis I think it was. I really loved the Gang when (former bassist) Dave Allen...I have to say, when Dave Allen left that was a tragedy. He was great.

R: Well, they're still playing.

D: They're breaking up, aren't they? Uh oh. Maybe I shouldn't have said that. I thought they were.

R: Is that a scoop?

D: (laughs) Oh no. Just idle gossip in

New York City, I guess. Idle gossip.

R: Have you had a chance to look around here yet?

D: No, we just drove in from Manhattan. That's where we live.

R: From Manhattan to Williamstown? That's really the other end of the spectrum.

D: Yeah, we just got in. It's really, uh...it smells really nice here. It's so pretty, you know...I should really get rid of this gum. Where could I put it? (She sticks it under her chair)

R: Hey, you're acting like a student.

D: (laughing) They don't know what that means.

R: What's in the future?

D: Well, we hope to have a nice tour, and we have this option to play around the Olympics. That would be great. We also plan on getting an album out. O.K.? I really have to go. Any more important things?

R: Just two. Any music videos? MTV?

D: Well, hopefully we could do a video. You know, when we get a single released. That would be right along those lines. I'm looking forward to doing one.

R: The final one: what do boys like?

D: (laughs) Oh no! I can't answer that...What do boys like? Boys in Manhattan, or boys in Massachusetts? (laughs) ...You can't ask me that. It's a really old question, the oldest one.

R: But still no answer?

D: Well, there's a lot of answers. I suppose it just depends on the guy, you know.

Interview by Vernon Squires; photos by Nick Khakee.

The band on tour includes six people: a singer, a guitarist, bass player, drummer, and two backup singers who also play some electronic percussion.

The most interesting visually was Jon King, the main singer, who bounced up and down and all over the stage. On "I Love a Man in a Uniform," the closest the Gang of Four ever came to a hit, King marched back and forth, saluting like a soldier. The rest of the band was relatively staid.

This was the first concert in Lansing Arena. Some had worried about the acoustics. As it turned out, they were not all that bad by rock concert standards, which is of course horrible. But if you want good acoustics, buy a good stereo and go home and listen to a tape.

As an institution of higher learning, Williams is considered among the best in the world. Learning, however, is not simply the rote memorization of known facts just as teaching is not just the dissemination of knowledge. The process is not and cannot be static.

Student and faculty research is a fundamental process that must occur at any dynamic center of learning. Only by engaging in new and original research can a faculty member consistently remain abreast of the new developments in his or her field. In addition, the research adds to the body of knowledge in each field and provides the base for the students and academicians of the next generation.

Students, as well, benefit from this research. Through direct participation, they become involved in the investigative process. This type of involvement, especially at a small liberal arts school like Williams, is essential preparation for graduate study.

In this section we present examples of the different types of ongoing research at Williams.

The Record gratefully acknowledges the work of Kathi Rosenbaum, Vernon Squires, Martin Hildebrand, Mary Vaccaro, Tom Vitale and Ned Ladd on this section.

Political Science

Does a TV camera cause Tip O'Neill to act differently? Do reporters from the New York Times and Washington Post change the behavior of Ted Kennedy? Such questions as these are on the mind of political science Professor Timothy Cook, who is currently researching the effects of media on the United States Congress.

"The media certainly has interaction with Congress," explains Cook. "But what might it do that influences Congress? That's one question I'm looking at."

Cook is the very early stages of his project, which will take him to Washington D.C. next year on sabbatical leave. The direction of the research remains somewhat fuzzy, he admits, because he will be asking novel questions in addition to examining popular beliefs.

"We've got our own conceptions of Congress," Cook notes. "I wonder if Congress has a different conception of itself. And, if so, where the media fit into this image. One theory has the media dispersing power by giving any articulate member a chance to perform. I tend to think the media reinforces the established leadership, acting as a conservative organ."

Cook is not sure where his energy will lead him, but he says that he, "like every researcher, hopes for a book."

Professor George Marcus is analyzing another portion of American Democracy—the fundamental relationship between the citizen and the body politic. Marcus is looking toward an answer to the question of how much the individual enjoys "political experience."

"How attractive or aversive do people find politics?" he asks. "And then, given the answer to that question, what are the ramifications for democratic theory?"

Marcus' work involves surveys, data analysis and interpretation, and critical study of democratic theory. The initial product of his work will be a research monograph, a sophisticated paper for scholars in the field. In addition, like Professor Cook, Marcus hopes to publish a book.

"The monograph may be out by the end of next year, but beyond that I'm looking toward a textbook on political methodology," says Marcus. "The book will focus on the means for studying politics—both theory and statistical measurement."

Art — History —

Architect Charles Moore, designer of the new Lawrence Hall addition and its iconic columns, is the subject of art Professor J. J. Johnson's research during his sabbatical this year. Johnson is presently preparing a retrospective show of Moore's work which will be displayed eventually at the Williams College Museum of Art.

Johnson spent time in California during the winter at Moore's offices to gather models and preparatory drawings of much of Moore's work. Such visual materials are difficult to get access to, as they are often in private hands or in other museums.

While he is waiting for the final funding that will make his show possible, Johnson is compiling an extensive Moore bibliography. If funded, his show will open at the WCMA and at the Oakland Museum of Art, and will then tour the country.

Hopkins Forest

One of Williams' more prolific research stations is located about a mile away from campus, and reaches toward neighbors Vermont and New York. Hopkins Forest, an enormous and unusual part of the college, provides a natural laboratory for work by biologists, chemists, geologists, and environmentalists.

A frequent visitor to Hopkins is geology Professor David Dethier, who is researching the current acid rain issue. "The Bekshires get a lot of acid rain," he notes. "That's no secret. We're trying to understand the effects of the rain on the watersheds and soils."

Dethier utilizes a collection station in Hopkins, and traces the flow of acid precipitation through the foliage down into the soils. More importantly, he analyzes the effects of the precipitation en route. "We're looking at how much acid rain falls, the chemistry of it, and the fluctuations in its amount from season to season and year to year," explains Dethier. "The soils here are very acidic—probably naturally so—but we want to know what controls soil chemistry."

In a similar vein to Dethier's work, senior Janet Ricker is writing a chemistry thesis on the effects of sulfates, present in acid rain, on area soils. Taking soil examples from Hopkins, from the Taconic Crest Trail on the Mass-NY border, and from nearby Mount Greylock, Ricker is trying to learn whether or not soils absorb sulfates.

"Sulfates can determine to a large extent the effect of acid rain on soils," she explains. "If they leach through the soils, they are likely to take with them valuable nutrients." Her research aims at finding the amount of such nutrient loss.

Lee Drickamer, a biology professor, takes a different interest in Hopkins; he is studying the habitats of two species of deer mice which populate the forest. Drickamer's work is more than a decade old, and seeks to understand the role of ecological niches and animal habitat.

"We have two distinct types of mice in the forest, which is in itself interesting," Drickamer suggests. "Given the history of land use, we ask how it has affected distribution."

Ideas of species coexistence and the habits of "pest organisms" are the foundation for Drickamer's work. He has intensely studied the habits of the two species, noting peculiarities and similarities of each, while trying to explain their mutual staying power in a competitive environment.

"Why are there two species?" he asks. "They exhibit specific activities under different weather conditions, they tend to live in slightly different areas, and their reproductive cycles are slightly different. But they share an ecosystem."

Drickamer's work has practical application toward the reforestation of land after industrial use. He explains that the information gathered in Hopkins is relevant toward controlling rodent damage, in addition to its inherent scientific curiosity.

History

Much of the faculty and student research in the history department goes far beyond examining traditional figures of history and focuses instead on individuals who are not as well-known, but nonetheless important in their own right. Researching such individuals requires a great deal of digging for information, yet the insight gained into these uncovered pieces of history makes the challenge worthwhile.

Professor Charles Dew attests that the most exciting aspect of his research is studying the lives of individual slaves in a Virginia slave community, as opposed to merely examining the institution of slavery as a whole. Much of his information is acquired from unique records, including accounts kept by the white family owning the plantation and oral history tapes of black families descended from the slaves.

Dew is the first member of the history department to take advantage of a new program instituted by President Chandler last year, whereby he teaches one seminar course that integrates his research and is released from other teaching duties for that semester.

"It's a wonderful program and quite extraordinary for a college like Williams that emphasizes undergraduate teaching," states Dew. Each of the eight students in his seminar selects an individual slave to study and write about, using original documents and applying what he has learned about slavery.

Professor Dudley Bahiman is currently working on the third volume of his research focusing on Sir Edward Hamilton, whose diary written during the period 1880-1906 he is editing and annotating. Before working for the Treasury of Great Britain, Hamilton was Prime Minister Gladstone's private secretary. According to Bahiman, Hamilton's diary is a very good political account of the times since Hamilton knew most people in government circles.

Senior Bill Street's thesis also involves the editing and annotating of personal records, although in his case it is not a diary, but the letters of a relative who died in World War I. Street's great-uncle, William Dexter, was drafted in April, 1918 at the age of twenty-seven and was killed in France in October of that same year.

In addition to the letters, Street is writing several essays concerning the activities of Dexter and the infantry, the training camps, and the conditions in the trenches. "I'm trying to really bring out what it was like to be an infantryman in World War I," Street says.

Senior Tim Murray's thesis is also based on the life of a relative, his great-grandfather, who was an electrical inventor. During the period 1891-1929, Thomas E. Murray was responsible for 502 inventions involving electrification, and in doing so was able to survive the constant transitions occurring in the electrical industry at that time.

Murray's research required a lot of travelling, taking him to New York, New Jersey, Virginia (for family records), and the National Archives in Washington. Murray says that this aspect of his research was "the most fun because it got me away from Williams and was totally my own work—it gave me a view of what being a graduate history student is like."

Physics/Astronomy

ers. These lasers use a crystal of germanium, a rare element, and are "tunable" in that they can be used at different energy levels. Hence they are a valuable tool for determining the spectrum of many atoms and molecules.

Brown does most of his research at M.I.T. in Cambridge, where he works as part of a research team. He drives the three hour commute almost every weekend.

Professor Stuart Crampton and his associate, Dr. Kevin Jones '77, are working with Geoff Nunes '83, and Karen Anderson '84 studying interactions between atoms at very low temperatures. They have an atomic hydrogen maser, and the atoms they are studying include neon, hydrogen, and deuterium. They are primarily interested in how low temperatures affect the properties of these atoms.

Crampton's extensive lab facilities give students an opportunity to work on campus with equipment normally found only at large universities. Says Post-Baccalaureate Researcher Nunes, "Working in Stuart's lab gave me the technical experience I needed before entering graduate school."

Astrophysics Professor Jay Pasachoff aligns telescope mirrors in preparation for the June 1983 solar eclipse in Indonesia. (Burr)

From erupting volcanoes in Hawaii to solar eclipses in Indonesia, astrophysics Professor Jay Pasachoff has led expeditions to observe some of the most spectacular events in nature. Last June, Pasachoff and two thesis advisees, Steve Platt '83 and Jim Voelkel '84 carted scientific equipment to the island of Java to observe a total solar eclipse. They recorded data on computer tapes, using sophisticated telescopes and measuring devices. Voelkel has analyzed much of this data in his thesis, which he will complete soon.

Earlier last year, Pasachoff and Platt traveled to Hawaii to observe the eruption of Kilauea, one of Hawaii's volcanoes. Using much of the same equipment employed in eclipses, they were able to obtain a precise infrared spectrum of the gases emitted.

Pasachoff, Voelkel, Steven Schultheis '84 and Ned Ladd '86 are planning to observe a nearly total solar eclipse near Petersburg, Virginia, on May 30. Careful measurements at this eclipse will allow for a precise determination of the size of the sun.

In pure physics, Professor Fielding Brown is working building infrared las-

Psychology

Psychology students use laboratory animals, like these rabbits, in their experiments. (Ladd)

The effect of different types of evidence, rules of procedure, and individual biases on jury decision-making is the focus of Professor Saul Kassir's research. Kassir conducts his research through a mock courtroom trial, which allows him greater flexibility than does observing jurors in a real trial because at any point he can stop the action to measure the subjects' physiological arousal, recall, and other factors as well.

Kassir says that his research is a "window into how jurors operate in the real world," and he is currently working on a book on the psychology of evidence. He has been awarded one of two national Judicial Fellowships and will work with the Supreme Court next year.

One area of Professor Colleen Kelley's research is on "subliminal" perception as it relates to memory, which she is working on in conjunction with Barbara Chalfonte '86. By means of a tachistoscope, a machine that flashes a word on a screen for a matter of milliseconds, Kelley and Chalfonte can test whether a subject has unconsciously retained the meaning of the word even though he might not be aware of actually having seen it.

The subject must then choose from two words the one related to the word flashed on the screen; according to Chalfonte, 75 percent of the time subjects identify the word correctly despite the fact that they have no idea of what appeared on the screen.

Senior Joe Loturco is studying the neural mechanisms involved in the encoding and storage of information. His research, which he is conducting with Judy Lewis '85 and Kla Nobre '85, examines how a rabbit learns to blink his eye to a tone.

By implanting an electrode in the rabbit's brain (the students perform all surgery themselves), they can record from any given brain structure and examine the activity of cells during the rabbit's learning of the blinking task. Loturco is focusing on the cerebellum in particular, which is an essential area in the learning process.

Economics

tions of this market, almost completely dominated by the deBeers family, have a direct impact on Botswana's economy. Lewis is studying how deBeers has been able to keep its near monopoly over the last fifty years. Other people in the department who have worked in Botswana include Professor Earl McFarland, and also two recent graduates: Jim Levinsohn '81 and Eban Goodstein '83.

Recently returned from an economic conference in China, Professor John Sheahan is also interested in developing economies. Sheahan traveled to China with a team of university professors and World Bank economists to discuss recent changes in this nation's economy. They participated in a series of discussions with various government agencies including the central planning board concerning China's economic targets and goals for the year 2000. Their work will culminate in a report by the World Bank due out later this year.

Sheahan's main area of research is the problems of Latin America's development and how these nation's internal problems are related to the international scene. Of particular interest is the relationship between these nation's economic concerns and democracy. He has been working on a book in this area which should be published soon.

Decay of elite portrayed in AMT's Cherry Orchard

by J. B. Bird

While Alexander Okun's expressionistic set spookily captured the decaying atmosphere of Anton Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard, the set tended to swallow up a talented cast during Friday's performance at the Adams Memorial Theater.

Many of the actors eeked out excellent individual performances, but they rarely played off one another. As a result, dramatic tension often echoed into the impressive background.

To their credit, the actors seemed to execute as directed. Particularly leads Regina Kelly '86, Martha Hughes '86 and Gordon Compton '85 gave consistent, responsive performances. Certain secondary characters were played especially well: Joanna Adler '86 and Peter Massey '85 were subdued and typically excellent, Victoria Chester '84 and Professor Nicholas Persen were welcome surprises.

Most of the characters, however, seemed uneasy with their isolation, practically melancholy.

Many small scenes and hilarious speeches, like John McCarthy's mumbled clerk contemplating suicide, received laughs. But there were rarely successful contrasts of characters. The pragmatism of the merchant Lopahkin (Adam Ruderman '87) distinguished itself only blandly from the dreamy tenacity of Hughes' Madame Ranevskaya.

Set in turn-of-the-century Russia, the story examines an aristocratic family's disturbing unwillingness to see its financial decay. The play focuses on its many characters' desires for ownership—of money, land, love or marriage.

With actors Kelly and Compton, Director Ron Jenkins pursued the isolated dream world Chekhov's characters inhabit. Most of the characters, however, seemed uneasy with their isolation—practically melancholy. There was rarely a scary sense of the characters' unreal self-perceptions.

Further, the leads rarely seemed to play or at least to take relish in the mini-dramas they concocted to prop up their eroding lives. The great moments of the play—serious yet comic and therefore haunting reflections on the orchard and the old house—looked more like confused sentimentality.

The third act was a special bright spot, when the ensemble got going and the actors inhabited the entire stage; but after a clever change to act four (actors came out with stagehands to pack up the dark house, whose walls became silhouettes of cherry trees), the lack of inherent tension surfaced once again.

Throughout, annoying compensations for this lack were Jenkins' distracting slapstick tricks, especially a fish pole routine which obscured one of the best speeches in the play.

Fortunately Chekhov speaks for himself. His language, in an upbeat new translation, several subtle performances and the haunting set certainly made the play worth its two hours.

Joanna Adler '86 and Peter Massey '85 perform in Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard this weekend. (Khakee)

Student video sleeper hit

by Ned Ladd

When you first walk in a theater to see a movie, you're not really sure what you're getting into. Especially now, with those one and two word titles, there's no way to tell whether you're going to like it or not. The first ten minutes usually doesn't help either.

Take "Sleepwalking," the new student video by Somnambulist Productions, Inc., for instance. I hated it. The first ten minutes showed how unprofessional student productions can be, with horrible sound, barbarous editing and blurry focus. Boy was I wrong.

Though the technical aspects of this video may have been somewhat amateurish (after all, Williams doesn't have the best of studios), the brilliant plot and fantastic characterizations more than made up for the deficiencies.

The story revolves around Gus, (played by Eric Pomerance '84) who has survived an all-nighter to hand in a paper at 9:30 a.m. He only wants to go back to sleep, but for various reasons he is kept from his bed. Not only is the story believable, but everyone who has gone to school in the last 20 years can relate directly to it.

The directors, seniors Timothy Sedlock, Robert Shatkin, Todd Solomon and Matthew Wildman, wisely chose to draw from obviously personal experiences which gave the piece a sense of integrity and honesty. The video deals specifically with Williams and the problems endemic to it. From guilty-conscience-raising to slinging bull in a professor's classroom, the video seeks to parody the Williams experience.

The result is admirable and hilarious. Why do professors give us seven books to read three days before the paper is due, and can we really make a difference to illiterate children in Africa? The video asks these questions, letting us guess the answers.

Senior Paul Wolfe's score provided wonderful segues between the scenes and added to the movement of the piece. The haunting piano theme echoed throughout.

"Sleepwalking" is an excellent and fairly critical commentary on Williams College life. Don't worry about the books, papers or even the nuclear question; this is a movie to see, especially if you don't have the time.

Arts in View

The Berkshire Symphony will conclude this season with its spring concert Friday at 8 p.m. Soloist Joseph Villa will join the symphony in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 1. In concert Saturday with the Springstreters will be the Cardinal Sinners of Wesleyan. The Springstreters are selling tickets for $1 and their new album, Good Thing They Can Dance, for $5 this week in Baxter. The 8 p.m. concert will be in Chapin.

The music department is sponsoring a recital of Studio VI, featuring student solo and ensemble performances tomorrow at 4:15 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers. The coed singing group Essence will perform Saturday in Brooks-Rogers with the rhythm and blues band "Twilight." Admission to the 8 p.m. concert is free. Saturday at noon, Alfred Gallman of the Newark Dance Theater will conduct a workshop for beginning and advanced dancers in Lasell Gym. The Williams Dance Society will perform later at 8 p.m.

a doctorate or expect to hold one before they arrive in the fall.

Next year's new faculty will include, by department:

•English—Assistant professors for three years: John Limon, formerly teaching at the University of Chicago; B.A., Harvard University; Ph.D., Univ. of California at Berkeley.

Karen Swann, B.A., Oberlin College; Ph.D., Cornell.

Christopher L. Pye, B.A., Oberlin. Ph.D. candidate, Cornell.

•Mathematics—assistant professor for five years: Donald H. House, B.S., Union College; Ph.D., UMass. House has worked at General Electric and taught at Smith College.

Assistant professors for three years: Deborah J. Bergstrand, B.A., Allegheny College; Ph.D., Univ. of Illinois, Chicago. Currently a visiting associate professor at Williams, Bergstrand has taught at Trinity College.

Cesar Silva, B.S., Catholic University of Peru; Ph.D. candidate, Univ. of Rochester.

•History—assistant professors for three years: Ann D. Durkin, B.A., Univ. of Illinois; Ph.D. candidate, Univ. of Chicago. Durkin is a specialist in both U.S. and Latin American history.

Thomas A. Kohut, B.A., Oberlin; Ph.D., Univ. of Minnesota. Kohut is a German history specialist.

•Psychology—assistant professor for four years: Benjamin R. Stephens, B.A., Univ. of Georgia; Ph.D., Univ. of Texas at Austin.

Laurie Heatherington, currently teaching at the Univ. of Scranton (Penn.); B.A., Miami University (Ohio); Ph.D., Univ. of Connecticut.

•Economics—assistant professor for three years: Stephen Younger, B.A. Miami (Ohio); Ph.D. candidate, Stanford.

•Chemistry—assistant professor for three years: Judith A. Halstead, B.A., State U. of New York; Ph.D., Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. Halstead is a chemist and environmentalist currently teaching at Russel Sage College.

•German—assistant professor for three years: Gail Newman, currently a visiting assistant professor here, B.A., Northwestern; Ph.D. candidate, Univ. of Minnesota.

•Russian—assistant professor for three years: Ludmila Prednawa, B.A., Millersville State University; Ph.D., Univ. of Pennsylvania.

•Chinese—visiting associate professor for two years: Jing-Heng S. Ma, currently teaching Chinese at the University of Michigan, B.A., Univ. of Taiwan; Ph.D., Univ. of Michigan.

•Romance Languages—visiting professor for one year: Russell O. Salmon, B.A., Williams; Ph.D., Indiana University. Salmon has taught at Indiana.

•Political Science—visiting assistant professor for one year: Chung-In Moon, B.A., Univ. of Seoul, Korea; Ph.D. candidate, Univ. of Maryland.

•Art—part-time visiting lecturer for one year: Peggy Diggs, B.A., George Washington University; M.F.A., Cranbrook Art Academy.

•Sociology—visiting assistant professor for first semester and Winter Study: Mary J. Oslim, B.A., Radcliffe; M.S.E., London School of Economics; Ph.D. candidate, Harvard.

Visiting lecturer for second semester: Ahmad Ashraf, B.A., Univ. of Tehran; Ph.D., New School of Social Research.

•Physical Education—instructor and Outing Club director for one year: Edward S. Grees, B.A., Windham College; Masters in Sport Management, UMass.

Reappointments

In addition, several current faculty members have been reappointed. William R. Darrow, Assistant Professor of Islamic and Near Eastern Studies in the History and Religion departments, was reappointed for three years.

F. Andrus Burr, part-time visiting lecturer in art; Roberto N. Ifili, lecturer in economics; and Padmanabhan Srinagesh, visiting assistant professor of economics, were all reappointed for one year.

Current Dean of Freshmen David C. Colby was appointed for first semester next year as lecturer in political science. He will be replaced next year as Dean of Freshmen by returning assistant professor psychology Robert D. Kavanaugh.

Gang of Four

Rock concerts are meant for dancing, moving, and yes, crashing into other people and jumping head first from the stage and cracking your head open, if you so choose (few Williams students did so, for some reason. Nor did anyone else.) For these activities and others, Lansing Arena beats Chapin hands down.

The Gang of Four played the last song of their regular set about an hour after beginning. It was "To Hell With Poverty," whose words many in the crowd, for once, seemed to know.

In this land, right now Some are insane, and they're in charge

To hell with poverty We'll get drunk on cheap wine

It had been a very strong show except for the occasional smoke effects, which showed how far the Gang had sunk from their prime.

But there was more after "Poverty." They played two encores. The chords to the last song of the final encore began. It was hard to believe—impossible. But no, it was true: they finished with "Sweet Jane," the rock'n'roll classic by a classic rock'n'roll band, the Velvet Underground. It was an inspired choice, and they pulled it off brilliantly.

This was the best rock concert in my three years at Williams. Let us hope the SAB makes a habit of it. Up with the Gangs of Four of the world; down with the Marshall Crenshaws.

Yes Williams, there is a riding team

by Andrea Smith

On the day of the show, the riders gather sleepy-eyed and usually freezing to death on Chapin steps. It is about 6:30 in the morning. Miraculously, if no one is late, a quick stop to Dunkin' Donuts is sometimes possible.

Believe it or not, Williams College really does have a riding team. The students may have seen running around in hard hats, boots, and "funny" pants do have a very serious purpose. The team has been in existence for four years now, and this year it has grown tremendously. Ten to fifteen active riders, both men and women, ride in the intercollegiate competition against 33 other colleges at the International Horse Show Association's (IHSA) shows. This year I have watched the team really grow both in ability and spirit. It placed 17 times and two of its riders received first place.

In preparation for its shows, the team rides twice a week at Clover Hill Farms under the careful training of Emily Graesser. This year, the team has acquired a faculty advisor and coach, Sheron Knopp.

Annually there are ten shows, six in the fall and four in the spring. Each rider competes at a level suited to his or her ability. This ranges from beginning walk-trot classes to beginning and advanced walk-trot-canter, novice, intermediate, and open levels of equitation on the flat, and novice, intermediate, and open classes for equitation over fences. This past year the team went to Colby-Sawyer, Dartmouth, Smith, Mount Holyoke, UConn., University of New Hampshire, Springfield, Newbury, and UMass for competitions.

After getting to the show grounds, everyone scrambles around madly to find out which class, number and horse he or she has. At intercollegiate competition only the horses of the hosting school are used, and each team draws horses for its riders at the school. When your class is ready to go in, you simply hop on your horse without a warm-up and ride.

The horses work all day long, making it a real challenge for you as you are being judged on riding ability (hands, seat and feet positions) and how well you control a strange horse. The best part is searching wildly for anyone who knows anything about the horse you will ride. Usually, you get answers like "Oh, Bongo!—do you like Pogo sticks?" or "He's super, just keep him away from all the other horses in the ring—he likes to bite, kick, and buck a little!" or even "The lights are on, but no-one is home."

The long wait and anxiety are worth it when you have a super ride and the judge places you. You know you have done well, because the competition is fierce, especially from Smith and Mount Holyoke. Suddenly, all of Graesser's drilling, Knopp's advice, the aching muscles, and the saddle sores become fully appreciated in the glory of having a bright, beautiful ribbon pinned to your boot.

was clearly tired after having pitched all seven innings of the first game. Theresa Gains '85 came on in relief and pitched four strong innings, giving up only one run.

Once again the strength of the Smith ballclub came into play, as the cleanup hitter absolutely creamed one pitch. After checking with NASA, Sheehy reports that the retrieval task has been added to the space shuttle's next mission.

The Ephs are currently 1-3 on the season and were scheduled to face St. Rose earlier today. They hope to shine on Parents' Weekend as they host Mt. Holyoke for a doubleheader Saturday.

tive, with Williams coming out on the short end 6-3. The second game was over almost from the cry of "play ball," as Smith grabbed a fast lead and coasted to a 10-1 victory.

In the opener, Coach Harry Sheehy once again singled out Montzka for her pitching. This time, however, the defense had a few lapses. Smith's pitcher, Cheryl Silva, held the Ephs to just two hits.

In the nightcap, Smith opened up with six runs in the first inning and followed up with three in the second. Montzka bad luck for the the Williams tennis squad as they fell in all three matches.

On Tuesday, the men lost to Tufts 5-1, after a long travel and with several players under the weather. This situation continued the next day as well in action against Colgate, with Tom Harrity '84, the number two player, missing the match due to a conflict. The Ephs won three singles victories, but that was all as they went down 6-3.

On Saturday against Amherst, Williams lost a very close match 5-4. Singles victories went to Brook Larmer '84 and Tim Rives '85, but the remaining singles were dropped in close matches, and two doubles victories were not enough to turn the tide

Golf suffers two loses

The golf team opened the spring season last Thursday at Holy Cross against the host school and Harvard. The Crusaders emerged victorious in the three-way match, squeezing past the Ephs by a scant five-shot margin, while the Crimson bested the Ephs by just one stroke. Saturday, the linksters saw their early-season slate fall to 0-3, with a convincing loss at Colgate in 50 mph winds.

Against Harvard and Holy Cross, senior co-captain Eric Boyden claimed match medalist honors, with an outstanding three-over-par effort. Junior Mike Hennigan, at five-over, and freshman Guy Kurtz, at eight-over, closely followed up Boyden's standout performance.

Boyden once again paced the Williams attack against Colgate, while Hennigan and Chris Harned '85 followed closely, just ahead of Kurtz.

Williams looks to get back on the winning track Thursday at home against A.I.C. and Union, before hosting Trinity on Saturday.

Baseball loses in 14th in controversial game

by Mike Best

In a fourteen-inning heart-breaker on Saturday which saw coach Bob Coakley thrown out of the game, the baseball team lost at Wesleyan 5-4. The loss negated a fine effort by Eph starting pitcher Bill Hugo '84, who pitched ten strong innings.

The Ephs scored the first run of the game. Wesleyan pitcher walked in a run, and that lead held up through two innings as Hugo did not give up a hit.

In the bottom of the third, Wesleyan took the lead. Hugo retired the first two batters, but an error by shortstop Rob Coakley '86, who had just returned from an injury, put a runner on first. The runner stole second, and Hugo walked the next batter. Cleanup hitter Andy Harvey singled to load the bases, and a costly error by Eph third baseman Mark White '84 allowed two runs to score.

Ephs tie it up

In the seventh inning, the Ephs tied it up when Mark White singled and moved to third on a perfectly executed hit-and-run by Mike Coakley '85. Phil Lusardi '85 then drove in White to even the score. The Ephmen took the lead in the eighth when the second Wesleyan pitcher, Joe Grasso (who had been the catcher until the sixth inning), walked in another run.

Going into the bottom of the ninth, it looked like the Ephs were about to win, but Hugo was the victim of poor defense. Two errors and a sacrifice bunt put Cardinals on first and third with only one out. Williams shortstop Steve Beisito '87, who had taken over for Rob Coakley in the eighth, made a throw wide of first after Hugo had induced a perfect doubleplay ball, allowing one runner to score and sending the game into extra innings.

In the eleventh, Phil Lusardi and Tim McKone '87 got on base with only one out. Dick Hollington '86 singled in Lusardi to give the Ephs the lead.

Hugo had another chance to get the win, even after he was removed after giving up a single to the first batter in the bottom of the inning. Hard-throwing Kevin Morris '86 came in to hold the lead, but he could not do so. He got two outs on the Cardinals, but the runner had moved to third. He then yielded a single, which scored the tying run, before he completed the inning.

Twelfth inning controversy

The Ephmen threatened in the twelfth and had men on first and third with two out. Grasso threw a called third strike to the Eph batter, but the catcher dropped the ball. When there are two outs a dropped third strike allows the batter to try to get to first, regardless of whether or not a man is on first. When the ball was dropped and trapped, then, the batter should have had a chance to run to first, and the runners should have been able to try to advance.

The homeplate umpire, though, mistakingly called the batter out without giving him the opportunity to get to first, thus ending the inning. The Williams bench appealed to the first base umpire who said that the pitch had been cleanly caught—which it had clearly not been—and therefore the batter was out. Coach Coakley, visibly upset, went out to argue. He grabbed the umpire's mask and threw it on the ground. Coakley was ejected from the game, and the captain John Hennigan '84 was forced to take over and run the team for the remainder of the game.

Finally, in the bottom of the fourteenth, the Cardinals won the game. An Eph error gave Wesleyan a runner second. The runner advanced to third on a passed ball and scored on a single to left, ending the game.

With the loss and last Thursday's eleven-inning 10-9 win over Middlebury, the Ephmen's record is 2-4. They play four home games this week: Tuesday against Amherst, Friday against Colby, and a double-header Saturday with Bates.

Women 1st, men 2nd in crew Little 3

by Susan Christenson and Monica Fennell

With five victories Williams maintained its dominance of the Little Three Regatta on Saturday. Williams confronted not only traditional rivals Amherst and Wesleyan, but also high winds and choppy water on the Connecticut River.

For the ninth consecutive year the women's varsity boat of eight took the Elizabeth Neal Trophy. A high tailwind and a strong current combined to give the women an unusually fast time as they took the race by the extremely narrow margin of a tenth of a second.

Starting a new tradition, the women's novice eight accepted the Captains' Plate, an award initiated by Wesleyan's captains to give impetus to the strengthening novice programs.

Seizing their first victory, the women's J.V. eight surged across the finish line ahead of Wesleyan and Amherst. Williams won by a mere three inches after a fierce battle with the Cardinals. Three of these oarswomen, Sarah Beadle '86, Julie McMahon '86, and Allison Tucker '84, joined by novice Sandy Wanstall '87, faced Wesleyan again, but the Ephs lost to this undefeated varsity boat of four.

By lengths of open water, both men's novice eights captured another Little Three title. This

Women's softball drops two at Smith

by Lee Farbman

The women's softball club went 1-2 last week, beating Union behind the five-hit pitching of Karen Montzka '85, and dropping a doubleheader to a powerful Smith team.

first in Tuesday's game, scoring twice in the first inning. But Williams battled back, scoring one in the first and opening up for three more in the bottom of the second. Laura Henriques '85 got the game winning R.B.I. on a sacrifice fly. The final was 7-3.

Lax moves to 3-3 with 9-5 win over Bantams

by Dave Paulsen

If turnaround is fair play, then it seems that the men's lacrosse team is receiving the justice they deserve. The Ephs put together two fine games this weekend, trouncing Trinity 9-5, while playing very well in a 11-5 loss to a powerful Dartmouth squad. The Ephmen now have a 3-3 record, and have appeared to turn their program around back to its winning ways.

Saturday, the Ephs played with what Coach Renzl Lamb termed "superior intensity" enroute to the 9-5 victory over a fine Trinity squad. The Ephs jumped out to a quick 3-0 lead in the opening minutes of play behind the tallies of Rob Miller '87, Mike O'Connell '87, and Mark Payton '84. Throughout the rest of the game, the Ephs dominated all aspects of play.

O'Connell and Tom Davies '84 led the Williams attack with three goals apiece. O'Connell, now fully recovered from an early season illness, continued his explosive scoring pace so essential to the Ephs. And Davies turned in what has become for him just another day in the office—three goals and two assists. Reese Hughes '85 added the other goal.

Defense clamps down

As impressive as the high-powered offense was, however, it almost didn't match up to the solid defensive effort of the squad. Goalie Brad DuPont '86 turned in an outstanding game in the nets, stopping 18 Bantam shots. He was aided by the spirited play of defenseman Bill Sperry '84, and Jamie Gallop '87.

Lamb singled out O'Connell, Sperry, and DuPont for their efforts in the game. He also praised his whole team's effort. "We're not a great team, so for us to be effective, we have to play with superior intensity. We did that today, and won the ballgame."

Wednesday, the Ephs played a Dartmouth team which had defeated Williams teams by as many as 20 goals in previous years. Despite the superior talent of the Division I school, the Ephs played a fine game in their 11-5 defeat.

Ted Thomas '85, Keith Haynes '84, Jim Sperry '87,

O'Connell, and Miller all scored goals for Williams. Midfielder Steve Patterson '87 also turned in a fine performance. DuPont stopped 11 Dartmouth shots in another standout effort.

Lamb said of that game, "We played as well as we could."

Dartmouth is just a better team with better athletes." After falling behind by a score of 7-0 at halftime, the Ephs actually outscored Dartmouth 5-4 in the second half.

The squad next hosts Union at 4 p.m. on Wednesday.

Ruggers beat Babson; comeback win 19-16

by Tom Dumphy

The Rugby Club continued its fine play on Saturday against Babson. The A-side won 19-16 and the B-side played to a scoreless tie. The C-side played well against the Babson B-side but went down to the Beavers 12-0.

Williams started slowly in the A-side game, giving up a try early in the action on a mis-played ball. The Ephs took a two point lead on a conversion by Bob Aulsebrook '85 after a try by Mark Evans '85. Ed O'Toole '86 started the scoring play by ripping the ball from the hands of a Babson runner and heading up field. O'Toole dished the ball to John Frese '84, who made a shattering catch without breaking stride. Frese passed to Evans just as he was being tackled. Evans hauled in the ball with one hand and raced down the sideline untouched to the try zone.

Babson went ahead 8-6 and appeared ready to score again when the half ran out. Babson came out fast in the second half and increased their lead to 12-6. Aulsebrook cut it to 12-9 on a penalty kick into the wind. Williams took the lead for good when Steve Zlotowski '84 picked up a loose ball and carried it in for the score. Aulsebrook added the conversion to give the Ephs a 15-12 lead.

Evans scores gamewinner

Evans scored his second try for Williams' final four points.

When captain Hugh Huizenga '84 booted the ball up and across the field, Evans ran it down and then outran the Babson backfield to the try zone. The Ephs gave up a try late in the game to account for the final score of 19-16.

Credit must also be given to Brad Bissell '86 and George Clemens '86, both of whom played fiercely while anchoring the Williams scrum. Phil Headley '86 and Jim Bell '84 played with savvy in their first complete A-side game. Babson was the toughest team the Ephs have faced this season and the victory will give Williams confidence heading into the final two weeks of the season.

The B-side also faced stiff competition against Babson. Though neither team scored, Williams had the edge in play. Fine running by line members Craig Kirby '86, Bill Harrison '84, and Marty Davey '85 kept the play in the Babson end. Scrumhalf Jeff May '85 and scrummies Geoff Kass '86 and Dave Curry '85 crunched the Babson offense whenever it tried to advance.

The C-side gamely took on the Babson B-side and played well despite losing 12-0. Newcomers Clark Otley '86 and Gipp Welch '87 showed promise in the game. Williams travels to Fairfield this Saturday and finishes the season at the Little Three Tournament next Saturday at Wesleyan.

Joseph Brodsky

President John W. Chandler announced today that playwright Neil Simon, author of nearly two dozen well-known Broadway productions, will be the speaker at Williams' 195th Commencement Exercises on June 3.

Joseph Brodsky, who is generally regarded as the most important living Russian poet, will deliver the Baccalaureate address on Saturday, June 2.

Both men will be awarded an honorary Doctor of Letters degree during Commencement.

Simon was born in the Bronx in 1927 and educated at DeWitt Clinton High School and New York University. He also studied at the University of Denver. After a two-year stint in the U.S. Army Air Force, he married Joan Baim in 1953. Simon's writing career began during the 50's when he worked on a number of television shows, including the Phil Silvers Show, the Tallulah Bankhead

Playwright Simon, Soviet poet Brodsky, to address graduates June 2 and 3

Show, the Sid Caesar Show and the Biko Show.

His first Broadway play, "Come Blow Your Horn," premiered in February of 1961. Since then he has had a total of 21 shows on Broadway, including such famous comedies as "Barefoot in the Park," "The Odd Couple," "Sweet Charity," "The Prisoner of Second Avenue" and "They're Playing Our Song."

His most recent Broadway play, the autobiographical "Brighton Beach Memoirs," opened in March 27, 1983, to enthusiastic reviews. He is currently working on a play called "Biloxi Blues" and on a female version of "The Odd Couple," both of which are slated to open on Broadway next winter.

Ten plays into movies

In all, ten of Simon's plays have been made into motion pictures, including, besides the ones mentioned above, "The Sunshine Boys" and "California Suite." He has also written the scripts for several well-known films, such as "Murder By Death," "The Goodbye Girl," "Chapter Two" and "Only When I Laugh."

His most recent film was "Max Dugan Returns," which appeared in 1982, and another, called "Sluggard Wife," is scheduled to open later this year.

Simon is a recipient of the Evening Standard Award, the Shubert Award, a Tony Award for "The Odd Couple" and four Academy Award nominations.

Brodsky famous poet

Brodsky, who was born in 1940 in Leningrad, is best known for his "Selected Poems," published in 1974 and translated by George L. Kline with a foreword by W.H. Auden.

Four of Brodsky's poems were published in Leningrad anthologies in 1966 and 1967, but most of his work has appeared only in the West. He is also a noted poetic translator and has translated into Russian the English metaphysical poets and the Polish emigre Czeslaw Milosz. His own poetry has been translated into more than ten languages.

Brodsky's other works include an acclaimed poetry collection, "A Part of Speech," published in 1980, and "Less Than One," a collection of essays, and "Roman Elegies," a cycle of twelve poems, both of which will be published later this year.

From March 1964 until November 1965, Brodsky lived in exile in the Arkhangelsk region of northern Russia. He was sentenced to five years in exile at hard labor for "social parasitism," but did not serve out his term.

Neil Simon

Exile from U.S.S.R.

In June 1972 Brodsky became an involuntary exile from the Soviet Union. After brief stays in Vienna and London, he came to the United States. He has been Poet in Residence and Visiting Professor at the University of Michigan, Queens College, Smith College, Columbia University and Cambridge University in England.

He is currently affiliated with both New York University and the University of Michigan, and is Five College Professor of Literature at Mount Holyoke College.

The Commencement and Baccalaureate speakers are chosen by the President and Trustees with the advice of the Honorary Degrees Committee from the pool of honorary degree recipients. Those being given honorary degrees this year will be announced next week.

Bonfires, TVs spell big bucks in damages for Frosh entries

by Sarah Abernathy

Several weeks ago $700 worth of damage was done to a sidewalk in the Freshman Quad when fence stakes, used to protect the grass, were burned in a late-night bonfire, according to Dean of Freshmen David Colby.

Since no one has claimed responsibility for the fire, the 12 Freshman Quad entries must divide the cost and pay $58 each, Director of Housing Wendy Hopkins said.

"The heat from the fire popped the cement, so two blocks have to be replaced," Hopkins said, adding that the $700 covers supplies and labor costs. "I'm not satisfied with billing all the entries; I'd much prefer to bill the individuals responsible," she said.

"People know who did it, they're just not willing to tell me," Colby said.

Freshman called Security
In an effort to avert the damage a freshman from Williams Hall said he called Security when the fire was started.

This late-night bonfire of sidewalk stakes and tree branches resulted in $700 worth of damage for the Freshman Quad.

(Ruderman)

"There's a big bonfire in the middle of the Quad," he said he told Security, but since he refused to leave his name they apparently did not believe him. "The woman (at Security) said people call in pranks all the time," he explained. Security eventually came about ten minutes later, he added.

Quad billed over $5000

More than $5000 of repair bills have been incurred in the Quad already this year, over $1000 to one entry alone, Colby said. Less damage occurs in upper-class dorms, but last year the College's damage bill totaled almost $20,000, he added.

"Off hand, I'd say this year the bill (in the Quad) is higher than usual. There's definitely more activity," Hopkins noted.

"If people come forward I'd be willing to negotiate the cost. People shouldn't be afraid to come down and talk, we're not down here waiting to nail them," she said.

Television knobs flushed

Recently another unclaimed damage bill for a television was split among the six entries in Sage Hall.

"I bought a new TV for Sage in January for about $430. In April somebody pulled off all the knobs and flushed them down the toilet," Hopkins explained. The television was taken away and repaired and is now being held until someone claims responsibility for the damage.

"I finally reached the end of my rope with this one. All I'm Library looks at installing electronic security system

by Christian Howlett

Sawyer Library is considering installing an electronic security system to cut down on thefts and missing materials, the Library Committee reported to College Council Thursday.

"We're very, very seriously talking about it," said Committee member Brad Case '85. "A lot of materials are lost from the library every year."

Students and faculty report about $5,000-6,000 worth of materials missing annually, Case said library personnel have estimated. Summer inventories often turn up more missing objects, he added.

The system the library is most strongly considering is manufactured by 3M Corporation and involves little plastic electronic ribbons which would be placed in every book and record. When the book is checked out the ribbon would be deactivated, and then reactivated when the book is returned.

Airport-type detectors

People exiting the library would walk past an electronic detector at the circulation desk which would sound if a book had not been checked out. Case said 3M claims the system will cut down the number of books illegally removed by 80 or 90 percent.

"This is not a small expense," he noted, but would cost at least $20,000 to install. This amounts to about $10 per student, or approximately four or five years worth of losses.

Case added that the library is looking at such a system, which would probably be installed two years from now, because it does not want to take such drastic action as closing the stacks or stationing people at exits to check bags.

The Williams Record

Honor the Code

Although half the students responding to a poll think the Honor Code does not prevent cheating, and 17 percent of those polled had cheated, we should not lose our trust in the Williams Honor Code.

While every incident of cheating or plagiarism should be cause for concern, the problem at Williams is not as serious as at other schools. Because the quality of Williams students is high, they do not find that they need to avail themselves of every opportunity to cheat. Indeed, a large majority of students never cheat.

Only five percent of those surveyed would report cheating violations. While this result is not encouraging, it is not surprising either. In a world where murders and other serious crimes go unreported, it is not surprising that cheating gets a similar treatment.

Students have an attitude of live-and-let-live, where others' cheating is their own business because, in a sense, it is a victimless crime. For isolated incidents of cheating, the only people who are hurt are the cheaters, who lose learning experience, they reason. There are few remedies for this attitudinal situation.

Comments returned with the surveys indicated that the confrontational aspect of the hearings (where the plaintiff and the accused face each other while relating their stories) deterred some. Possibly by easing the situation for those who report cheating violations, we could improve the yield; however, it is important to keep the policy of identifying the accuser.

Sixty-five percent of those who cheated said that having signed an Honor Code statement made them pause before cheating. Here is the value of the Code, and the reason we should keep it even if we can see few tangible results. The Honor Code works, not by forcing students to snitch or by instantly reforming cheaters by virtue of this one signature, but as a statement of affirmation of personal integrity.

LETTERS

Errors

To the editor:

The April 17th issue of the Record carried a short column covering this year's recipient of the Grosvenor Memorial Cup. Your reporter noted that Chris Harned '85 is "the recipient of the second annual" award. For the sake of accuracy, the Grosvenor Cup was established in 1931 and, except for a few years in the 1970's, it has been awarded consistently every year.

On page 39 of the College Catalog mention is made of the 1931 date. In the Log, one can also find a cup and plaque listing the names of the past recipients.

By now I am sure that an error in your headline and in the first sentence of the Tuition article appearing March 13th has been corrected. At that time you wrote that Williams tuition will be 12,454 dollars next year. Tuition for 1984-85 will be 9,200 dollars.

Associate Dean for Financial Aid

Commendation

To the editor:

I should like to commend those who were responsible for bringing Michael Manley to our campus this past week. The program was well conceived and organized, and educationally it was truly in the spirit of the teacher on one end of the log and the student on the other.

I would especially like to commend Professor Louis Lindsay, the Luce Committee and the many students that I saw working on behalf of all of us in this very fine educational experience.

Overreaction

Our beautiful campus adds much to the Williams College experience. Authorities are justified in spending large sums on campus upkeep. However, recent charges for damages to the Freshman Quad show an over-zealousness in repairing sheerly cosmetic damages.

Each freshman entry was charged $58 for damages to the concrete walks through the Quad after a bonfire two weeks ago. Some discoloration and dents caused two blocks to be replaced, but did not require the type of major repair for which the administration charged the freshmen.

The Quad is designed to be used by students, mainly for recreation and socializing; it is not meant for show. Funds should keep it functional, not pristine.

While we certainly do not condone student vandalism, the College's monetary overreaction in this case is troubling. Similarly expensive repairs after more legitimate recreational activities that create less-than-perfect landscapes would hurt the casual, enjoyable atmosphere which should prevail in the Quad.

Summer Job Search

by R. Park

A lot is heard about the various hoops that seniors dutifully jump in order to earn the privilege of spit-and-polishing some CEO's shoes (otherwise known as being a managerial trainee). But less is heard (and even less notice given) about the plight of the rest of the undergraduate body who possess humbler aspirations: those of us who just want a job for the summer. And this plight is especially serious for freshmen and sophomores.

Underclassmen, it seems, are treated as being one cut above the trained aardvark in general competence. I remember one guy last year pleading with a potential employer to be allowed initiation into the arcane art of filing. The interview seemed to go well at first (the personnel manager, who vaguely resembled a chain boss in a prison film, had not yet bothered to scan the application, assuming that a lowly freshman would never dare to be so presumptuous as to actually fill one out); they had exchanged pleasantries and the job seemed to be in the bag, until the manager's eye strayed to the application sheet.

It's amazing how much a man can be transfigured by one lone word: freshman. The chain boss looked like he'd been doused in freon, and in no time the erstwhile applicant was out in the street, on his way to a bar to drown his sorrows, where he would promptly be thrown out for being a minor. Freshmen just can't Make it in Massachusetts. Sophomores do only marginally better.

What is it about being a junior that makes employers hail them as the saviours of the company clerk corps, and government agencies and prep schools and judges hand them plush internships? Are they more capable? More mature? Firmer handshake? Better dead-baby jokes? What? History majors might say that the real explanation is a complex interaction of all of these diverse factors, but one wonders whether it is anything more than a mindless chronological pecking order.

The freshman (and sophomore) is on a plodding, unsung quest, the prize at the end of the road very often being an equally plodding job. A little recognition of, and sympathy for, the underclassmen's travails is in order, especially from the upperclassmen who have perhaps forgotten what it was like back in the days when obtaining a post as a head-waiter was a step up in the world. Noblesse, it is observed, entails oblige.

The Student Activities Board: the harsh realities

by Gary I. Sellinger

The Student Activities Board must take exception to much of last week's Record editorial, "New Music." The Record's criticisms are valid only in isolation from the realities of producing and promoting rock concerts at Williams. It is clear to those of us on this year's SAB that widespread ignorance of the musical and economic facts of life creates tensions and misunderstandings that make it difficult, if not impossible, for the SAB to do what it is theoretically supposed to do: "please a large portion of the student body."

First of all, and most importantly, money talks. The Record, in attempting to partially exculpate the SAB for what the paper sees as the organization's failures, blithely comments, "The SAB was hampered by late cancellations by the Clash and Madness." The story is perhaps somewhat more complex than that. Madness cancelled because new keyboard recruit Paul Carrack bailed nor anyone else has the slightest bit of control over band cancellations, a fairly frequent occurrence in the music business. Indeed, although this fact was not widely publicized at the time, Marshall Crenshaw was booked for the fall concert only after Joan Armatrading, contracted over the summer, cancelled her American tour.

Nonetheless, something can and should be done about an SAB budget that keeps currently popular bands just out of the reach of Williams students. As examples of what we mean, here are the current prices of some bands we could have had this year: the Pretenders at $25,000, the Clash at $20-25,000 (RPI offered the band the latter figure, plus a percentage of ticket receipts), and Eurythmics at $35,000. In addition, increase the cost of a show by up to one-third. With the above-stated costs, how can the SAB be expected to put on top-quality shows when the Concert

In the case of the most recent concert, we were given a choice of two possible dates—April 19 and April 20. If a band we might have wanted was already booked for one or both of those nights, our options were to 1) outbid another college for the band), or 2) look for another band. On the 19th and 20th, the three acts conceivably in our price range were 1) Bonnie Raitt at $13,000; 2) Melba Moore at $8,000; and 3) Gang of Four at $8,000. Such are the vagaries of choosing acts during the second week of spring break, after two cancellations, on horrifyingly short notice, and on a shoestring budget.

On the subject of how to improve student attendance at SAB concerts, the Record offered: "The most important key...is student input," and suggested regular polling of the student body on band preferences. A well-intentioned idea, no doubt, but it carries with it its own problems. What generally happens is that a promoter tells us that a certain band is on tour and available to play at Williams, he doesn't want to wait two or three weeks while 2,000 students make up their mind—he wants to hear from us in at most a few days. When booking acts, the second rule (second only to "money talks") is, "He who hesitates is lost." Secondly, students seem to have unrealistic expectations about the kinds of bands that SAB can bring to Williams. It is as if Michael Jackson or The Police could appear in Lansing Chapman, were it not for SAB incompetence. As we have explained above, this is simply not so. The SAB could, of course, distribute a non-binding preference poll to the student body, similar to that proposed by Rob Park this week. At SAB's current level of funding, however, such a poll may well prove counterproductive in that SAB is unlikely to be able to satisfy explicitly stated student desires, leading to ever-increasing frustrations. Moreover, after the countless contortions SAB went through to book first The Clash and then Madness—two concerts that, if all had gone as planned, would have been the most successful shows in recent Williams memory—is it at all fair to claim, as the Record seems to do, that the SAB does not take student preferences into account when choosing bands?

The Record suggests that perhaps "The answer may lie in one big concert per year..." Perhaps—but this additional constraint places enormous pressure on future Boards. What to do if a seemingly popular band is available in the fall? Should the SAB do the show in the fall, or wait, hoping for an even better show in the spring? The business of booking and promoting concerts is already largely a matter of guesswork, instinct, and hunches; limiting Williams to one major concert per year exacerbates this already unnerving process.

One alternative, of course, is to abandon major concerts altogether. When current SAB Chairman Arunas Gudaitis suggested this possibility to a meeting of College Council, he was roundly shouted down. Clearly, College Council, who can be presumed to speak for campus opinion, desires that Williams should continue to hold more or less major shows in the future.

We at SAB concur in this opinion, but a year of disappointing experience has taught us at least one thing: In order to be able to afford top-quality "name" acts that will attract large numbers of Williams students, SAB needs more money. Lots more. If College Council will not give the SAB the freedom to negotiate for "bigger" bands, then neither it nor the Record ought to complain about the results.

Gary Selinger '84 is the business manager of the Student Activities Board.

First of all, and most importantly, money talks.

out even before the band's tour began. The Clash, however, declined to play at Williams because it got a better offer from RPI. This is not the first time in recent memory that Williams has gotten outbid by another school for a "name" band; only last spring, Williams had the English Beat all signed and ready to play, when Yale University beat our offer by approximately $3000. Under present conditions, i.e., with the SAB's present budget, this sort of thing is likely to happen every time the SAB attempts to book a show.

We wish to emphasize that neither SAB depending on the cost of the band and opening act, additional costs—promoter's fee, sound, lights, security, and other concert necessities—can Commission budget stands at $14,000?

Secondly, the initial financial constraint is compounded by other difficulties. When SAB shows were held in Chapin Hall, the organization had to obtain permission from the music department before scheduling a show on a particular date; now that shows are to be held in Lansing Chapman Arena, we must consult the athletics department.

A Proposal for the Student Activities Board

by Rob Park

The Student Activities Board is surely not responsible for all of its woes, this year especially. The fact that the Clash and Madness were unable to fulfill their commitments can only be ascribed to the unpredictability characteristic of any dealings with the rock music milieu. And a large part of the problem is also attributable to the SAB's lack of anywhere near sufficient funds for booking acts that everyone and his seventy-year-old aunt would pay ten dollars a ticket to hear.

But the question isn't simply one of dollars and cents; what the SAB lacks in addition to funds is a sufficiently reliable gauge of the College community's musical taste. It's generally true that the bigger names will bring bigger crowds, (they might not be your favorite group, but one would probably show up at a Cars concert if for no other reasons than curiosity and the expectation that everyone else will be there) but does this necessarily mean that successful shows can't be had using less expensive groups?

It seems to be accepted as a law of Nature that a lesser name band means financial and popular failure (i.e. fifty hard-core fans from the College and a hundred Bennington groupies). But does it have to be this way? Aren't there any groups smaller than the Clash that, by chance, a great part of the Williams student population happen to like a lot? To me it seems at least possible, and one way of finding out who these groups are (if indeed there are any) is to conduct a college-wide survey.

An SAB poll could perhaps present the student with a generally representative list of twenty-five (or so) groups/performers that are tentatively within the budgetary constraints, asking the respondent to rank them in order of preference (and even allow for intensity of preference by using the strongly prefer/somewhat prefer/strongly dislike format). In addition, it could find out the type of music that people like (hard possible, given proper initial hype) the poll elicits responses from 500-1000 people, the SAB would have a much better idea of what groups (and what type of music) the College would respond favorably to.

This poll would be a strictly diagnostic one, taken at the beginning of the year, and (in order to avert the problem of rock, new wave, jazz, funk, soul, easy listening pop...etc.). If (as is eminently false expectations) it could be clearly stressed that the list of choices is a tentative one, put together for the sole purpose of giving the SAB some student input.

It is entirely conceivable that there are no such lesser-name groups (that appeal widely), but even if it were the case that having one big-name concert is the way to go, the poll would still be useful, since it gives students a chance to express their likes and dislikes as to "type" of music.

The SAB is an organization that handles great sums of College Council money. Though it should be allowed flexibility (in order to deal with the fluid atmosphere in which concert deals are made), the SAB would be much more effective in giving students "what they want" if their decisions took into consideration the direct input of the Williams community. The SAB would then, at the very least, be able to fully refute charges that they do not cater to the tastes of the student body.

Platform court in limbo state

Students who tried to play platform tennis last week received a surprise when they went around the gym and discovered that the court simply was not there.

Buildings and Grounds crews dismantled the court in the course of a day last Monday, and according to a B&G official the fate of the court is now in limbo.

The popular court, located between the hockey rink and the College heating plant, was taken down because the space will be needed as a delivery area for concrete trucks when the new gym construction begins in several weeks.

Originally B&G had thought to reassemble the court on Weston Field, but Coach Renzilamb proposed three alternate sites, behind either Mission Park, Weston Language Center or the Office of Career Counseling.

President Chandler chose the latter site but recently, B&G officials said, the reconstruction efforts have been held up by protests from local residents.

Neither Chandler nor B&G can now say exactly when or where the platform tennis court will reappear.

N.A.S.C. pres. dead at age 49

Classes were cancelled Monday at North Adams State College in honor of Acting President Raymond C. Sullivan, who died of leukemia Friday night at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston. He was 49.

He was born in Ware, Mass., and graduated from UMass in Amherst in 1957. He earned his doctorate in education from UMass in 1976.

He had been director of physical education for the Lenox school system from 1963 to 1965 and was principal of the Williamstown Elementary School from 1966 until 1968.

Honor Code seems a mixed success

In a recent campus-wide survey, half of the respondents said they did not think the Honor Code works well in preventing cheating and plagiarism. The survey distributed by the Student Honor Committee also found that only seven percent of the 415 respondents admitted to knowingly cheating on an in-class exam.

Many students did note, however, that the presence of an Honor Code would not necessarily have an impact on those who would cheat anyway.

Only four percent admitted cheating on a self-scheduled or take-home exam, and six percent admitted consciously plagiarizing on a paper.

Student expectations of campus cheating, as measured by responses to a question asking what percentage of the student body the respondent thought had committed an Honor violation, agreed with these results. For in-class exams half of the respondents thought that only 0-5 percent of the student body had cheated, while for other exams almost half thought 6-25 percent were cheaters.

Most of the respondents felt that only 6-25 percent of the student body had ever knowingly plagiarized, and 18 percent had first-hand knowledge of plagiarism.

Reporting violations

Despite these figures, the survey showed that

In 1968 Sullivan joined the North Adams State faculty as assistant professor of education and chaired the education department until 1973. He was acting dean of students from 1975 to 1976 and vice president of student services from 1979 until 1981.

He was a director of the Northern Berkshire Mental Health Association and the Northern Berkshire Child Care Committee and was active in St. Patrick's Church in Williamstown, where a funeral Mass was said in his memory on Monday.

Sullivan leaves his wife, Evelyn; three sons and two daughters, all of Williamstown.

College honors old employees

Williams College will honor its longtime and retiring employees at a luncheon and dinner Wednesday as part of its second annual "Appreciation Day." The 33 people who have worked for the College for 10, 15, or 20 years will gather at the Williams Inn for a special luncheon, and those 11 who are 25-year employees or retirees this year will meet at the Mill on the Floss that evening for dinner.

Each retiree will be given a chair with the Williams insignia, as well as a written citation. Those being commended for 25 years of service will receive a certificate of achievement and a watch. To express appreciation for their work, the College will award special pins to the 10, 15, and 20-year employees.

This year, the retirees to be honored are: Stella O. Bastion, Buildings and Grounds Department (11 years); Thomas F. Clayton, B&G (16 years); Theresa V. DePari, B&G (9 years); Veronica V. Dobrowski, B&G (27 years); Byard V. Hayden, Food Service Department (2 years); Gertrude B. McGowan, Office Services Department (21 years); George F. Milne, Security Department (12 years); Howard D. Oakes, B&G (21 years); and Nora B. Oakes, B&G (20 years).

Employees who will receive recognition for their 25 years of service are: Dorothy M. Hahn, Alumni Office; and Bertrand Lavole, B&G.

Twenty-year employees are: Willard E. Busi, Security Department; Elsie J. Field, Food Service Department; Rita A. Gardner, Payroll Office; Peter P. Miles, B&G; Lula M. Park, B&G; and Robert L. Rickert, Food Service.

Eleven employees will be honored for 15 years of service to Williams, and 16 others, including President John W. Chandler, will be recognized for their 10 years of service to the College.

Driscoll views world terrors

The media controls the public view of international terrorism, according to Dr. Dennis Driscoll of the National University of Ireland, who spoke about controlling international terrorism in his lecture Wednesday.

The number of killings by international terrorists seems a "surprisingly low figure. Given the frenzy in the American media about terrorism, the idea that in 15 years there were only 3400 deaths is really remarkable," Driscoll said.

While terrorism is a real problem in many countries, "the real international terrorists are the governments themselves," he stated, citing Ethiopia, Indonesia and Argentina as examples. The media does not give enough coverage of such governmental terrorism, he added.

"The media here trivializes news. The American people are not invited to think about these things very carefully," he said.

World conferences attempting to eliminate "safe havens" for terrorists have not been successful because "the international community has no consensus whatever about what international terrorism is," according to Driscoll.

Deterrence does not work because terrorists, such as the suicide-bombers in Beirut, are not necessarily rational people who can be stopped by the threat of punishment, he said.

"Hardening targets" cannot work because it is impossible to protect all potential victims,

The platform-tennis court underwent a major change last Monday when B&G disassembled it to make way for gym construction vehicles. No one yet knows where the court will be reassembled. (Pynchon)

Driscoll said, and this approach also means restricting privacy with surveillance. Although this method works to stop airplane hijackings, it does not work for all types of terrorism, he added.

Driscoll is presently a Visiting Fellow at the Harvard Center for International Affairs, and is a senior lecturer at the National University of Ireland. His upcoming book, "Making International Promises About Terrorism," concentrates on the problems of controlling international terrorism.

Lee C. Drickamer

Bio. prof. to run Historical Soc.

Associate Professor of Biology Lee C. Drickamer was elected president of the Berkshire County Historical Society last Thursday night at the 22nd annual meeting at Arrowhead, the society's headquarters on Holmes Road in Pittsfield.

Drickamer has been at Williams since 1972. Shortly after moving here he became interested in local postal history and three years later wrote, illustrated and published "Postal History of Berkshire County, Massachusetts, 1790-1981" with Leo L. Lincoln of Pittsfield.

Lincoln, 89, had researched the subject for 30 years before meeting up with Drickamer, who is 35.

Drickamer graduated cum laude from Oberlin College in 1967 with high honors in biology, earned a doctor of philosophy degree from Michigan State University in 1970 and was a post-doctoral fellow at North Carolina State University in Raleigh.

In 1983, he received a $133,000, three-year grant from the National Institute of Health to continue his study of social, genetic and environmental factors influencing puberty.

Bird '86 earns poetry money

John A. Bird Jr. '86 has been awarded the $100 first prize in the Academy of American Poets contest. In all, 29 Williams students submitted 100 poems for the competition.

Seniors Frances Toler and Jessie Greason, Junior Bethany Prey and sophomores Julie Convisser and Franklin Gill received honorable mention.

These students will read from their work on Wednesday at 4 p.m. in Driscoll Lounge.

Each year the American Academy of Poets pledges a prize of $100 to more than 80 schools throughout the country to be awarded to the best poem or group of poems written by an undergraduate. Since the establishment of the program, more than $100,000 has been awarded.

Springstreeters' song draws Chapin crowd

The Springstreeters clowned and sang their way through a thoroughly enjoyable performance last Saturday night. (Walker)

by Karen Philipps

The Springstreeters performance last Saturday night showed once again that not only can the Springstreeters sing, but they can also be silly.

The evening began with a slide show portraying Williams "the jewel of the Berkshires" to visiting parents. It focused on Williams' interesting architecture and the amazing two days a year of beautiful weather in Williamstown that happen to occur on parents' weekend.

The Springstreeters' program was diverse and experimental. Their first song "Take You Back" took place on the docks of Philadelphia where Williams alumni gathered around a garbage can fire. The scene changed later on when they sang "Puttin' on the Ritz," "Elijah Rock", an impressive spiritual, and their beautiful rendition of "Scarborough Fair." The Springstreeters also sang a collection of love songs. They tried their feet out on some choreography to "Rubberband Man."

They ended their show with a medley of songs done by seniors Chris Woodworth, Blake Martin, Richard Dodds, Doug Sparks, and Andy Crain. Although these Springstreeters will be missed next year, the new members Paul Rardin '87, John Denaro '85, and Ben Duke '85, who sang a Cole Porter tune "Another Op'n'n, Another Show," promise to bring special new talent to the group.

Joining the Springstreeters were The Wesleyan Cardinal Sinners. This female group had a program of old favorites such as "Mr. Sandman" and "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy", but their performance lacked pizzazz. They began to warm up with "In the Mood" in which they added some dance steps. They created giggles by directing a song "Come Go with Me" to a little boy and another "Jeepers Creepers Where'd You Get Those Peepers" to a blue-eyed Williams sophomore.

Man on the Quad

Duane and Jan Batista (Greg Batista '86): I think Parent's Weekend is great, but I have some criticism of the timing from the student's perspective. The students are too pushed and busy. They don't want to see parents now."

Essence and Twilight band together

by Martita Well and Gary I. Selinger

Those who feared that the last minute change in location would hurt attendance need not have worried. Currier Ballroom was filled to capacity with talented singers, musicians and a receptive audience when Essence and Twilight performed on Saturday night.

Twilight, a recently formed student band, draws on jazz, blues, and funk influences for its largely original repertoire. Freshman keyboardist Curt Myers, who writes most of the material, stood intently behind his synthesizer, producing bass and organ sounds along with the more or less traditional keyboard flourishes. Dan Lee '84 alternated between guitar and bass, particularly shining on the latter. Michael Copeland '87 coaxed jazz strains from his tenor saxophone, and on one number, "New Blues," added a somewhat hesitant blues vocal. Drummer Dave Cole '84 kept the beat and displayed his soloing ability in a duet with Myers, the keyboardist's own "Big Bang."

The band was admirably tight, all the more so given the quartet's short time together. "Patch-22," another Myers original, rumbled along with synth and tenor trading solos. "Pretension," a Lee composition, took on a Latin flavor without sounding derivative, and featured Lee's chordal basswork. The only sour note was sounded by "Song For My Father," the Horace Silver jazz standard that could have been given a more upbeat treatment than it received.

After Twilight finished, Essence took the stage. The eight person group (4 women and 4 men) entered singing their trademark introduction song, demonstrating originality and creativity. Following that, they launched into a medley of popular hits, including "Games People Play," "Grapevine," and "My Girl." The songs were ambitious choices, since all were readily recognizable to the audience, and many of them were admirable.

"Games People Play" started off the set, and the soloists and background vocals were both impressive. Sophomores Kenard Gibbs and Mike Meadows made a great team, playing off one another wonderfully in their many duets. Gibbs range was astonishing—he was comfortable and strong in both the high and low registers—while Meadows sense of fun and stageplay complemented the seeming ease of his singing.

Demonstrating their diversity, Essence also did some spirituals. On many of these Alison Ashley '85 sang the lead, and it was here that the group shone most brightly. Ashley's rich, full voice combined with the well-blended Essence chorus made those songs a treat.

The group did have its problems, however. While some of the performers were of professional quality, some were weaker, producing uneven solo pieces. This became especially noticeable during a series of individual songs, where some of the performances were clearly superior to others, and where only some of the singers showed stage presence.

Although the performance varied in quality, the finale was marvelous. "You Brought the Sunshine" by the Clark Sisters as performed by Twilight and Essence showed the combined efforts of these two groups, and justifiably brought down the house.

In Other Ivory Towers

Kent State

Shades of Alice Aycock: an ignorant gardener carried away pieces of a wooden "masterpiece" that had stood in the middle of the Kent State campus in Ohio, according to the London Times.

Called a "partially buried woodshed", the bizarre structure was built by Robert Smithson, who used a bulldozer to pile a heap of mud against the side of a tatty log cabin. Some critics then halled the piece as the epitome of a new art movement called "Conceptualism".

During the past 14 years, the woodshed had endured fires and graffiti; which didn't bother the artist—he intended the work to age and change with time. Last winter, however, the structure fell down. An unsuspecting gardener then hauled away some of the rotting planks for burning, according to the Times.

Now art experts are wondering what to do with the remains. Prof. William Quinn, acting director of the university's School of Art, acknowledged that people who had trouble seeing a shed covered in mud as a work of art would have even more trouble seeing a fallen-down, partially-removed shed as art.

"Smithson, whose other 'conceptual' works included a lorry load of car tyres that were rolled at random down a hill, cannot be consulted on the fate of his best-known creation, because he died several years ago," the Times said.

Bowdoin

Students at Bowdoin voted four to one in favor of recognizing single-sex fraternities and sororities on campus, according to the Bowdoin Orient.

Bowdoin currently refuses to recognize groups that don't allow both sexes as full members. Dean of the College Robert Wilhelm said he thinks the current policy is a good one,

Bill and Nancy Sperry (Jim and Bill Sperry): We came up just for the day to watch our two boys play lacrosse. It's a great weekend, and a beautiful day, but more importantly, we're winning.

Mimi Mather (Victor Mather '86): We're here to watch baseball. Our son has a paper to do. He's in the library.

Philip Klaus (Jim Klaus '86): I've seen three female sports I've never witnessed before. Women's lacrosse, women's softball, and women's rugby. It's been an enlightening experience.

Ex-Jamaican PM Manley views Central America, Jamaica, CIA

by Daniel T. Keating

As someone who has been on the receiving end of CIA destabilization, former Jamaican Prime Minister Michael Manley adds a new perspective to the debate flaring in this country over what he calls the CIA's role as international outlaw in Latin America.

Drawing on the eight years his democratic socialist administration ruled Jamaica, and a lifetime of political activity in the Caribbean, Manley spoke at Williams from April 20-23 about his homeland and troubles in the region.

Manley himself faced massive destabilization during his successful reelection campaign in 1976, and again before his defeat by current Prime Minister Edward Seaga in 1980.

"The CIA worked at a number of levels in Jamaica in 1976," Manley said, "but we definitely felt a complete relaxation of tension when Carter came into office in 1977. Rosalynn Carter came to Jamaica on behalf of the President, and we said, 'For God's sake, let's just try to make a new start.'"

"When you come down to 1979 and the 1980 defeat, there is no question that Jamaica was the subject of a new, highly effective destabilization program," he said. "The CIA once again said they had nothing to do with it, and nobody has yet found a smoking gun."

"It is difficult to know whether it was them or political enemies in Jamaica. They got huge sums of money and I have no doubt that the CIA was involved in getting funds to them."

750 killed suspiciously

Leaders of many countries blame outside agitation for political problems, but Manley pointed out that 750 people were shot to death in Jamaican political activity between January of 1980 and the election in October. Most of the people were shot with American-made M16 rifles, he said, in a country where guns are very rare.

"You just get one tourist shot, and you lose millions of dollars over the next few months as word spreads through the United States," Manley said.

Manley said that between 1976 and 1980 the CIA became far more discreet. The publicity over their actions in Chile, Vietnam, and Iran forced them to burrow deeper, said Manley, and rely more on local agents in the field, as they are doing in Nicaragua.

"I suspect that the Nicaraguan Sandinista movement is strong enough to withstand any pressure that the CIA can put against them," said Manley. "It will make them suffer like hell, but they will survive because the CIA can't mount an operation against them that can defeat their army. They can deal with the disruption and the dislocation."

"Either the Nicaraguans will face a long, bleeding tragic experience that will go on for years, prodded by the Americans, or the U.S. may decide after the next election to send in the army, which can obviously defeat the Nicaraguans. The army can defeat the Nicaraguan army, but it can't defeat the people. America would live to regret it, because they are a tough people and it is a mountain land, like Vietnam and Afghanistan."

"A pre-Vietnam stage"

Manley sees the chance of military involvement as being much greater in El Salvador, because it is easier to send the army under the pretense of defending a legitimate government. He said even the small presence there now greatly increases chances for war.

"You are already in a pre-Vietnam stage," he said, "where you make marginal decision after marginal decision, until one day you get tipped over."

In his lecture Saturday night, Manley called the Salvadoran elections a low-comedy farce, because anyone who does not vote in government-held territory is labelled a leftist and may wind up dead the next day. Similarly, anyone who does vote in the rebel-held areas is labelled a counter-revolutionary and could also be killed. Given those circumstances, it is not surprising to see long lines of voters.

Salvadorans do not have freedom inside the voting booth either, Manley said. As anyone could plainly see on television, he said, the ballot boxes outside the booths were clear plastic. "The whole world can see that the ballot was marked correctly," he said.

Taking care of business

Manley attributed American support of unpopular regimes in Latin America to protection of business interests. "By tying itself to the instinctive defense of its multinational corporate system, the U.S. has alienated itself from the forces of internal transformation in Latin America," Manley said.

In this century, he noted, the U.S. has sent its Marines or other military forces into Latin America 80 times to put down transformation and keep landowners in power.

"How could Reagan tell you that he's trying to protect the U.S. multinational corporations?" he asked. "He has to invent, for your consumption, a massive, proximate Soviet threat."

Latin America is well below internal economic woes, Afghanistan, Western Europe and the resources of Africa on Russia's list of priorities, Manley said, but the Soviets are glad to accept a revolution when it is handed to them because of indigenous circumstances.

If the U.S. would judge a country by its commitment to human justice rather than its profitability and anti-red stance, Manley said, Latin Americans in search of democracy would not seek Soviet or Cuban assistance. The uprisings are against poverty and tyranny, not for Communism, but for freedom, according to Manley. Most rebels would rather get help from the U.S. because it is closer, he said, but they take help wherever it can be found.

"If one thing can make Nicaragua a communist country, it's the policy in Washington, D.C.," he said.

Manley: Third World must have U.S. help

"Modern imperialism caused a distortion of normal economic evolution (in the Third World)," he stated. Because colonial powers ran the economies of most Third World nations up to the early 1960's, these economies did not reflect the independent development they should have, he explained.

"Economies grew up that were structurally deformed; they were artificially created," he said.

Autonomy did not help

For most Third World nations autonomy did not change these economic flaws. "Political independence opened the door of opportunity," Manley said, "but did not alter the political reality of Third World countries."

"Countries became trapped without the economic capacity to grow," he continued. "It's as if they were trying to get to the first floor of opportunity by taking a down escalator."

According to Manley, the unequitable nature of the present world economy and its inability to fairly distribute its productive capacity proves that there is a strong need for a redesigned economic system. Manley presented his version of this system, which he called the New International Economic Order.

Need central organization
The NIEO addresses the questions of trade, finance, and multinational corporations by proposing to set up a central controlling organization which would regulate and stabilize world trade. This would in turn stabilize Third World economies which are especially dependent on a limited number of trade items, and allow for a more equal flow of money into and out of a country.

Manley said he believes the present world finance system, controlled by the International Monetary Fund, does not function well with third world countries. "The IMF was not designed with the Third World in mind," he stated. "It puts tremendous social pressure on underdeveloped economies. It moves people from poverty to starvation."

"We must recognize that the time has come to redesign the central financial institutions with the third world in mind," he added.

U.S. must help

The NIEO was proposed to the United Nations and rejected in the 1970's. Manley maintains that unless a plan of this type is worked out, the future of world economics and world politics looks dim.

He said he looks to the United States to present this plan, but does not feel very positive about the chances of this happening.

"Young people in the U.S. today are turning away from the political process," he stated. "They have become disillusioned and have left politics to the trivialities."

laws. To illustrate this point he examined Freud's account of the origins of morality, showing that Freud could not get outside of his own notions of the "moral law."

In this account of the "law of laws," Derrida stressed that we could not conceive of a time "before the law." He went on to say that a law must have no history, but must somehow naturally stand before us.

"Works try to enter it and become intrinsic to it, but none of these can be accomplished. What remains concealed in each law is the law itself," he said.

Derrida then launched into the major concern of his lecture, a lengthy and somewhat eclectic analysis of Franz Kafka's parable "Before the Law," a two-page story which concerns a man from the Dance fever takes many forms

by Vernon Squires

Last Saturday night the Williams Dance Society concluded its year with The Spring Dance Concert '84. Featuring an eclectic combination of everything from breakdance to traditional Japanese art forms, the concert delighted the large Lasell crowd.

The performance was divided into several types of dance, with the first being a two-piece demonstration of jazz. Directed by Dance Coordinator Sandra Burton, ten jazz class students first went through an abbreviated workout session, then performed a number they put together during the semester. Both efforts were intriguing, demonstrating the complexities of modern jazz.

A short routine from "Born to Break," a duo from Mount Greylock ABC, followed the jazz. The breakers easily won the crowd's approval with well-executed maneuvers and exciting new style.

A three-part ballet, followed by a duet from Valerie Anastasio '86 and Rumi Kurosaki '86 brought the show to its intermission. The change of pace was a nice effect, and the dancers brought new grace and precision to the stage. The duet seemed even to tell a simple story.

After a short and lively number, the audience was introduced to the world of Aikido, Bujo, and Iaido, all Japanese forms. Again, the wild swing in content kept the show interesting. The Japanese dance was well performed and at times fascinating, but seemed to stretch out for an overly lengthy time.

The remainder of the concert was dedicated to the choreography of Blondell Cummings, who was in residence during Winter Study. Entitled "Basic Strategies," the six-number exhibition featured eight dancers trying to communicate various ideas and strategies. Especially well done were the pieces on politics and work, eliciting sympathy from the crowd. "Basic Strategies" was a bit long and at times confusing, but the overall effort was entertaining and enjoyable.

!Kung San come to Williams

Call them the !Kung San, the Bushmen, or simply the tribes of the northern Kalahari Desert; whatever the title, they are currently visiting Williams in an anthropology exhibit in Stetson Hall.

The exhibit, entitled "Everyday Objects of the Traditional !Kung," was prepared by the department and Annemarie Camerota '84 and Elizabeth Whitney '84. It features such items as an ostrich eggshell bead necklace, a thumb plane, and even a tribal "Love Bow," a miniature bow & arrow with magical propensities. Photographs of the !Kung San also highlight the display.

The !Kung San hail from the northern Kalahari Desert, located in the southern African region of Namibia, Botswana, and Angola. Originally a hunting and gathering society, the !Kung San have recently come under pressure from "civilized" governments to end their nomadic existence. The artifacts in Stetson capture this former lifestyle, in which an average family had less than sixty pounds of personal possessions.

Among the more peculiar pieces are the piano and "Love Bow," leather bags fashioned from ostrich shells and porcupine quills, a tortoise shell powder container, and the mysterious "Trance Dance Ankle Rattles." The artifacts all reflect the paucity of material available to the !Kung San, and their need for travelling lightly in the unsettled lifestyle.

In addition to the photos and physical items, the exhibit provides a brief written history of the !Kung San (who have lived in region for at least 10,000 years), an examination of their current situation, and a descriptive guide to each of the ten pieces on display.

In other ivory towers

"but if enough students are interested in changing it, the issue certainly should be discussed."

One fraternity and one sorority on campus feel the College has actively attempted to force them out of existence because of their single-sex nature, according to the Orient. For example, Chi Psi is not listed on the campus map and is disconnected from the College's phone and fire alarm systems.

In an editorial on the subject, the Orient supported the College policy, saying that single-sex organizations would be a step backwards. The editorial also cited other colleges' criticism of fraternities, said that many Bowdoin frats might expel their women members, and said that most of the 450 people who responded to the poll were members of fraternities concerned with the single sex issue.

asking is for the individual or group to take responsibility for their actions," she said.

The current system of allocating unclaimed damages appears to be the only workable solution, concurred Kay Lackey '85, a JA in Sage E. "It's too bad that some people are being so irresponsible," she said.

If entry damage bills are not paid they will eventually be divided among all the students living in the entry and included on term bills. Hopkins added.

"Damages drive me nuts because I only see the small percentage of students who come down here with bills," she said. "It's not a good way to get to know students."

Library security

He said that the only real problem in installing the 3M system would be "a little bit of architectural rearrangement at the circulation desk." Library personnel have not yet decided whether to put one or two detectors there, how to make people pass through them single-file and whether to put one at the after-hours exit from the basement, he added.

Faculty names withheld

Case also reported to College Council that the library staff made an important rule change last week. If a student requests a missing book which has been checked out by a faculty member, the library will no longer release the name of that faculty member, but will telephone him themselves in an attempt to retrieve the book.

Case cited three reasons for the policy change, namely that many professors did not like to be called at home by students looking for books, that many said they wanted to protect their privacy by not advertising to students what books they were reading and that some student felt tentative about contacting a professor in order to get a book back.

In other business, the College Council Thursday:

•voted to select two members of the Council to serve on this year's Gargoyle Society selection committee in an attempt both to monitor and assist in the selection process.

•passed several recent appropriations of its Financial Committee, including $1,000 for the Jazz Ensemble to buy a new sound system, $200 to help finance the upcoming lecture by social change specialist Howard Zinn and $125 for travelling expenses for the Equestrian Team.

•passed the recommendations of its Election Committee for next year's members of the Committee on Educational Policy and the Calendar and Scheduling, Library and Log Committees.

Derrida joins Kafka, Freud and the Law

by Larry Krasnoff and John McDermott

French philosopher Jacques Derrida addressed a packed Adams Memorial Theatre audience last Tuesday in dense, two-hour lecture entitled "Before the Law: On Kafka."

Derrida, considered the leading exponent of the contemporary philosophical movement known as deconstruction, began by identifying one of that movement's favorite themes—the axioms or "laws" that govern our understanding of literature.

That a literary work has a title, a specific author and a coherent story line are things we usually take for granted, he said. Arguing that these laws tend to insure that a work has a definite, fixed meaning, he criticized this conception.

Despite this, Derrida suggested that we could never escape such Tracksters take Little Three title

by John Schafer

In what coach Dick Farley called "one of the most satisfying wins of my years here at Williams," the men's track team won the Little Three by ten points Saturday. Amherst, favored to win after doubling the Eph's score at the NESCACs scored 70 points to the Ephs 80, while Wesleyan chalked up 43.

The seniors graduate undefeated in Little Three competition in not only track but also cross country. "Through the leadership of the seniors," Farley said, "we won in a mild upset" allowing the seniors to "get away unscathed."

After the field events, the Ephs trailed by only six points, although they were expected to be down by 20. Bernie Krause '84 took first in both the shot and the hammer and placed fourth in the discus to lead Williams scoring in the field events.

Ephs come back

On the track, however, the Ephs outpointed the Jeffs by 16 for the ten point cushion. John Campbell '84 was involved in three first-place finishes and two second-places. He won the pole vault, took second in the 100 yard dash, ran to second on the 400-meter hurdle, and led off the 400 and 1600 relay teams that both won.

Kevin Jenkins '85 anchored both the winning relay teams and also claimed second in the 400 and 800. Freshman sprinter Andre Lopez won both the 100 and 200. Though Krause, Campbell, Jenkins, and Lopez were the top scorers, the meet was really won by what coach Farley called "the middle of the pack guys," the ones who picked up the key points by taking third or fourth.

Women take third

On the women's side, the Ephs finished a distant third behind the Jeffs and Cardinals. However, four of Williams' top five or six runners were injured and unable to compete.

Lindsay Rockwood '85 was the top scorer with a first in the high jump, second in the long jump, second in the triple jump, and another second in the 400. Lizzy Maris '87 took second in the 400 hurdles and fourth in the 200.

Both teams travelled to Springfield today to take on Holy Cross, Springfield, and Tufts.

Montzka set them down 1-2-3 in the top of the eighth, Boom led off with a double, and then advanced to third on a single by senior Toria Price. Boom scored the winning run on a flashy piece of base-running on an infield grounder.

On Saturday, Williams dropped a pair to a well coached Mt. Holyoke team. In the first game, Holyoke scored early and often en route to an 18-2 win. In the second game, most of the offensive punch came in the first inning, the visitors scoring six runs, Williams answering back with two. Both teams then settled down, playing good ball until the sixth, when Holyoke was able to get three more. The final was 10-3; none of the Holyoke runs was earned.

Williams will be in action at Cole Field for a game on Wednesday, and then will travel to Wesleyan on Saturday.

hard-fought, come-from-behind victory for the Ephs. Williams scored first when Rutledge led off the game with a walk and Rob Coakley homered to give Williams a 2-0 lead which held up until the fifth, when the Lord Jeffs scored six runs.

Just after the Jeff outburst, Rick Hedeman '87 hit a mammoth homerun over the bleachers and into the pine trees in left at Weston Field. Hedeman's shot made the score 7-3 and set the stage for the bottom of the seventh.

Shaw started the Williams seventh with a pinch hit triple. Rutledge popped out, but Rob Coakley, Hedeman, and Mike Coakley all walked to force in a run. Lusardi singled in another, and McKone walked in a third. Hollington, the Ephs' ninth batter of the inning, singled in two more runs, finishing the scoring and making the score 8-7 in favor of the Ephs.

After those three games, the Ephs' record stood at 3-6. The team next plays Middlebury at home on Wednesday. They travel to Amherst for a rematch doubleheader on Saturday and go to North Adams for another twin bill on Sunday.

country who waits all his life to gain admission to "the Law."

Playing constantly on the phrase "before the law," he attempted to relate Kafka's text to his own concerns, the laws of literary discourse.

"Perhaps man is the Man from the Country as long as he cannot read," Derrida said. "Or, if knowing he cannot read, he wants to see and enter (the law)."

"We can see that the law remains essentially inaccessible even when it presents itself as a guest," he said, adding that literature which "separates the law from the outlaw."

Derrida's discussion was tortuous and philosophically complex, and many in the audience had difficulty following the entire presentation. Nevertheless, he managed to conclude in a fairly straightforward way, suggesting some of the historical conditions that might have given rise to these laws of literature.

Following the insights of fellow French philosopher Michel Foucault, he argued that such laws are intimately connected with the rise of both capitalism and the modern political state. This sort of "real world" argument brought a welcome conclusion to an exhausting evening of philosophical abstraction.

Senior Tom Harrity made an impressive showing at third singles, losing a very close match in the finals to John Niceforo from Tufts, 4-6, 6-3, 7-5. Mike Shore '84, fell in the semi-finals at number five, after two strong wins, and Jamie King '84 fell in regular play but went on to rack up points in the consolation rounds.

In doubles action behind

Larmer and Rives, Harrity and Callanan made an easy victory over a Middlebury pair, 6-0, 6-4, but were beaten in the quarter-finals in three sets. The number three squad of sophmores Chris Clarey and Tim Petersen took wins from Middlebury and Tufts before being beaten in the semi-finals.

It was a weekend of excellent individual play by the team.

only losing in those tight games that have been plaguing them in recent competitions. The top three point scores for the tournament were Tufts with 30, Amherst 20, Williams 19.

In action against Trinity last Tuesday, the Williams men lost another close one 6-3. The Ephs travelled to Albany today and will be on the road again this weekend taking on Wesleyan.

Golfers beat Trinity

The men's golf team evened its record at 3-3 with a 13-stroke victory over Trinity last Saturday. Junior Mike Hennigan led the Williams squad with a 79. Chris Harned '85 and Eric Boyden '84 followed closely with 80's. Freshman Guy Kurtz stroked an 81 and James Keneflick '86 rounded out the top five with an 82 to give Williams a team score of 402 to the Bantams' 415.

The Eph golfers picked up two wins on Thursday as they beat Union and American International College at the Taconic. Once again Hennigan scored the team low with a 75 followed by Harned with a 78. Co-captains Boyden and Phil Burr '84 placed third and fourth with an 80 and an 81 respectively. The team combined for a 397 score, beating Union by 14 strokes and A.I.C. by 18.

The team is currently competing at the New England Championships held yesterday and today. Last fall the linksters placed tenth in New England with fine performances by Kurtz and Harned who placed sixth and seventh overall. The team was missing the first-ranked Hennigan at that time due to an academic conflict.

This season, with his help, and consistent performances by the whole team, the golfers look to challenge for the title.

Men's crews glide to wins

The men's crew had its third sweep of the season Saturday at UMass.

The varsity eight, led by co-captains Ben Williams '85 and Matt Hettie '85 beat UMass by a boat length and University of Rhode Island and Amherst by wide margins. The winning time was 5:37 to UMass' 5:43.

Williams led the race almost from the start. According to Dan Damstra '86, "Amherst had a really good start, but we were able to pull ahead. URI started to sprint at a thousand meters and UMass sprinted at fifteen-hundred, but our sprint held them off."

The novices took first and second in their race, defeating UMass and URI.

The A-boat, with Charles Norton '87, Peter Washburne '87, David Esseks '87, Jeff Yegian '87, Peter Korda '87, Peter Kunin '85, Jonathan Wigser '87, Ted Lohr '87, and Ken Slepian '87, had a winning time of 6:32.

The B-boat, with Charlie Cost '87, Steve Long '87, John Desnoyers '87, Dean Papadopoulos '87, Sean Denniston '87, Phil Tucher '86, Jon Horowitz '87, Mark Trumbull '87, and Attila Sala '87, took second with a time of 6:38 to UMass' 6:51 and URI's 6:54.

Coach's Comments

Coaches Peter Wells and Cindy Drinkwater could not be reached for comment, but novice coach Rob Anderson said, "They weren't pretty, but even a dead goat looks good winning."

Women row Waramaug

Racing this Saturday at Dartmouth, the women's crew teams faced Princeton University, University of Pennsylvania and Dartmouth College. The Big Green, winning both the varsity and novice races, and Princeton, taking the J.V. race, led the competition leaving UPenn to hold off Williams for third.

The smooth water of the Connecticut River and sunny weather in the White Mountains gave Williams a chance to test its strength against the stiff competition of Ivy League teams who will not be at the upcoming championships in Philadelphia. The Ephs row in only one more regatta before Philadelphia's Dad Vail Championships.

Next Saturday at this home race on Lake Onota Williams meets Ithaca, Trinity, and Marist. Check posters for directions to a nearby park where spectators can catch the action, cheer on their friends and picnic.

2 students race to fame

Despite all the success of the Williams track and cross-country teams, some runners have sought fame on their own, not always with the Ephs.

In 3:07.31 Lee Hatcher '86 finished the grueling Boston Marathon in the wet and cold of Monday April 16th. Completing the 26-mile course had been his goal since mid-January when he started his training.

He ran at a pace of just under seven minutes a mile for the first twenty miles and slowed to about a 7:50 clip for the last six. With a series of three hills in the final third of the course, including heartbreak hill at the 22-mile marker, the going gets so tough that only the runner's drive keeps him in the race. "The twenty-fourth mile was the toughest," Hatcher said, "but I kept pushing myself because it would have hurt more to stop at that point."

Asked why he did it, Hatcher answered, "Just to prove that you can accomplish a difficult task if you put your mind to it."

Another Williams student, senior Bennett Yort showed his running skills by winning the 4.75-mile Hoosac Tunnel road race in North Adams on Monday the 16th. His time of 24:59 in the ten-kilometer race earned him first out of 72 runners, and he beat his nearest challenger by more than a minute.

Riding team holds show

Although the intercollegiate competition has ended for this year, the riding team had its last show Sunday at Clover Hill Farm. The show consisted of riders from the area as well as those who take lessons at the stables.

The Williams riders had an extremely successful day as they won two ribbons. In the first novice equitation class Sue Michalski '86 placed first and Andrea Smith '86 second. Frank Huyler '87 won the second novice flat class with Laurie Boothman '84 second and Jennifer Rees '86 third.

Smith won the novice jumping class. Huyler took second, Boothman third and Rees sixth. Huyler also placed third in the open jumping.

Riding her own horse, Coach Sherron Knopp took second place in the open jumping and thirds in Hunter-over-fences. With the completion of this show, the team now looks forward to an exciting season next fall.

Laxwomen beat Trinity

Laura Rogers '86 scored four goals, three straight in the first half to pull Williams to with in 7-6, then Andrea Raphael '86 spurred a second-half comeback with the tying and go-ahead goal as the women's lacrosse team beat previously undefeated Trinity 10-8 on Wednesday.

Rogers, who had scored 14 goals in three straight games after starting the season on the bench, tallied four times in the first half as the Ephs stayed surprisingly close with powerhouse Trinity by playing fast, aggressive offense. Then Williams goalie Martha Hoopes '87 took over in the second half, limiting the Bantams to one goal with several sensational saves that gave the Ephs, now 4-1-1, a much needed win against NIAC's top-rated team.

"Endurance was a factor in our favor—we wore them down," said coach Julie McHugh of the Eph's comeback. "All of the girls played super despite the injuries to Carrie Cento '86 and Roberta Boykin '85. I can't single out anybody because everyone played so well, but Laura Rogers certainly provided the scoring punch again."

Allison Fuller '85 also played an outstanding game, scoring three times and adding an assist. Lee Wierdsma also scored for the Ephs with Raphael and Jill Leet '85 adding assists.

Mike O'Connell '87 netted his third consecutive hat trick and added three assists as the lacrosse team soundly defeated Wesleyan 11-7 on Saturday. The win, coupled with the 8-4 victory over Union earlier, gives the Ephs a 5-3 record.

Before the Union game, coach Renzie Lamb's squad learned that they had attained the 10th spot in New England Division III polls. After the two impressive victories (Wesleyan had been rated ahead of Williams), it appears that Lamb's flock is grazing in the pastures of Division III prominence once again.

Against Wesleyan, the Ephs exploded in the second and third periods to rack up an insurmountable advantage. Reese Hughes '85 scored four goals in his finest performance of the season. Tom Davies '84 scored one goal and added three assists, while John Huwiler '84, Jim Sperry '87 and Rob Miller '87 each added one goal apiece. Brad DuPont '86 continued his outstanding play tending the Williams net, turning back 17 Wesleyan shots.

Lamb was thrilled with the play of his team. "We played with poise and confidence," Lamb said. "Wesleyan was a team which technically was supposed to beat us, but we played within our limitations, and gave an outstanding team effort. This was one of the best games we've ever played here at Williams."

8-4 over Union

Wednesday, O'Connell scored another hat trick, and Davies added two goals to pace the Eph attack. Those two were joined in the scoring column by Miller, and seniors Mark Payton and Lee Ordeman. Matt Salisbury '87 assisted on two goals, while Davies and Payton each assisted on one goal apiece.

Lamb felt the key to the game for the Ephs was their excellent defense. He praised DuPont for his effort in fending off 17 Union attempts. Lamb also pointed to the superior play of his "close" defensive unit consisting of Matt Kennedy '84, Bill Sperry '84, and Jamie Gallop '87. In addition, "max" defenseman Paul Meeks, Ted Thomas, and Sean Moore, all juniors, earned Lamb's plaudits.

The Ephs travel to Middlebury on Wednesday, before invading Lord Jeff territory on Saturday.

Baseball beats Jeffs drops pair to Bates

by Mike Best

Last week began well for the baseball team as they defeated Amherst at home on Thursday, but Saturday brought a double-header loss to Bates, again at home.

In the first game Saturday, Eph pitcher Bill Hugo '84 went the distance and, except for one inning when Bates hit him hard, pitched a good game. The Eph offense, though, had a hard time providing runs for him. In each of the first three innings the Ephmen got a man on base with less than two out but could not make anything of it. A first inning double by Brian Rutledge '85, a second inning single and stolen base by Phil Lusardi '85, and Rutledge's third inning walk all failed to get anything going.

Hugo, meanwhile, had been almost untouchable. Except for a runner in the first inning, Hugo had not allowed anyone to reach base. That changed in the top of the fourth, when Jim Sylvia singled and stole second to lead off for Bates. He moved to third on a sacrifice bunt and scored on John Gregorio's double to left.

Andy Carman singled up the middle, just out of the reach of Williams second baseman Tim McKone '87, and Gregorio scored. Hugo knocked down a liner hit right at him and threw out the hitter, but Carman moved to second. He scored on another single to make the score 3-0 before Hugo got out of the inning.

In the bottom of the fourth, Mark White '84 led off for the Ephmen with a line drive homerun over the leftfield fence to pull the Ephs within two. Bates negated that run in the top of the fifth when a single just out of sophomore shortstop Rob Coakley's reach scored a runner from third.

Neither team mounted another major threat until the seventh and final inning. In the bottom of that inning, the Ephmen mounted their last attempt at a comeback. Lusardi led it off with a single to left. He moved to second on a grounder, but there were two outs. Dick Hollington '86 doubled to left-center, scoring Lusardi to make the score 4-2. John Shaw '87 was hit by a pitch, and Rutledge walked to load the bases. Bates brought in a new pitcher who got the last out to seal the win.

The second game was not nearly as close. After the top of the second inning, Bates held a 4-0 lead. The Ephs managed a run in the second when Shaw singled in McKone from second, and the score remained 4-1 until the fifth.

Both teams scored in that inning. Bates extended its lead to 7-1 in the top of the inning on a homerun. Four walks, the last by a new pitcher, gave the Ephs a run, the last they were going to get. Five runs in the top of the sixth gave Bates a 12-2 lead, and another Bates homer in the seventh made the final score 14-2.

The Amherst game was another story. The game was a

Amherst falls to softball Sunday

by Lee Farbman

The softball team capped off a good week Sunday by crushing arch-rival Amherst 12-2. In earlier action, the Ephs dropped a doubleheader to Mt. Holyoke on Saturday, and beat St. Rose on Thursday.

Williams wasted no time getting on the scoreboard against the Jeffs, breaking out for three runs in the first inning. Pitcher Karen Montzka '85 held Amherst to just two hits and struck out ten. Teresa Galms, '85, Laura Napolitano '85, and Montzka each had three RBI's.

The Ephs' big inning was the fourth, as they batted around. Freshman Sarah Hummon led off with a single and was safe at second as Julie Welborn '87 gained first on a fielder's choice. Kathy Oehling '87 then singled, loading the bases, and Montzka walked, forcing in a run. After an infield out, Galms singled, driving in two runs. Darca Boom '87 followed with a single, good for two RBI's.

The Ephs added four more in the fifth, as eight Williams batters came to the plate. A single by Hummon, a sacrifice by Helen Mango '85, followed by singles by Oehling, Montzka, Galms, and Boom led to the runs.

Into extras with St. Rose
Earlier in the week Williams won a thriller against St. Rose, 11-10 in 8 innings. The Ephs held a 10-5 lead in the seventh, but St. Rose mounted a strong rally to tie the score and send the game into extra innings. After

The Rugby Club captured first place in the Fairfield University rugby tournament by beating the hosts in the final Saturday 13-6. Earlier in the day the Ephs bested the Outlaws, a local mens club, 7-4. The B-side lost its first game of the year to Fairfield 11-4, but the C-side chalked up a 25-4 win over the hosts.

Ephs round up Outlaws

The Ephs started the day quickly, jumping to an early 4-0 lead over the Outlaws. George Clemens '86 burst out of a crowd and passed to John Frese '84. Frese dumped the ball to Mark Evans '85 who carried it in for the score. Chris Edwards '87, making his A-side debut, put Williams ahead 7-0 on a penalty kick. The play was even for the remainder of the game, with an Outlaw try as the only other scoring.

Williams played a hard hitting Fairfield team in the final and came away with a well-deserved victory. Edwards scored on a penalty kick for a 3-0 Williams lead. Fairfield took the lead 6-3 before halftime. Williams then went ahead early in the second half.

Williams hosts NESACs

by Paul J. Mahoney

It may have been for small colleges, but the New England Small College Athletic Conference tennis tournament hosted here last weekend was certainly large in scope. Over 70 players representing Amherst, Bates, Bowdoin, Colby, Connecticut College, Hamilton, Middlebury, Trinity, Tufts, Wesleyan, and, of course, Williams, met for three days of strong competition under perfect weather conditions.

In the end, it was Tufts who came out with the team victory but not before yielding the most significant matches to the Williams men. As coach Sean Sloane said, "The story of the weekend is Brook Larmer." Larmer, a senior and team captain, never lost a set this weekend as he swept to victory as the number one singles player, beating Tufts' Bruce Grossman in the finals 6-4, 6-1.

And that was not all. Later that afternoon, Larmer teamed up with Tim Rives '85 to capture first place in doubles as well, taking the Amherst pair of Gray and Brigham, 6-1, 6-2.

Larmer played four matches for his singles win, taking 49 games to his opponents' 26. As a doubles team, Larmer and Rives went 36-13. Both will go on to the NCAA Division III championships in Atlanta next week, while Larmer will compete in both singles and doubles play.

Ephs take third

In the final tally, Williams finished third overall, being nudged out of second by one point by Amherst. In other matches, Rives lost in his first round at number two singles, but went on to take points for the consolation victory. Kevin Callanan '87 met a similar fate at number four but also came out on top in consolation play.

in for the try. The 7-6 lead held late into the game because the Williams defense repeatedly denied any Fairfield advances. With less than a minute to play in the game, Edmund O'Toole '86 made a brilliant individual effort to score Williams' final try. O'Toole, running at the Fairfield line, booted the ball over the defenders, ran it down and cruised into the try zone. The conversion by Edwards made the final score 13-6. Also playing with reckless abandon for Williams were Mike Curtin '86 and Marty Davey '85.

The C-side was victorious in an all too early game against Fairfield. The final tally was Williams 25, Fairfield 4. The game's high scorer was Jon Stanley '87, who had two tries, one set up beautifully by Jeff Hellman '87. Charlie Lazor '87 and Gene Mazzaro '87 also scored tries. Scrumhalf Drew Klein '84 ran the game well and connected on a drop kick and a conversion.

The B's, who used many C-side players, were unable to keep up with the Fairfield fifteen, dropping an 11-4 decision. John May '84 scored Williams' only try. Clark Otley '86 was the bright spot for Williams at the fullback position. Otley outran the Fairfield line time and again but received little support from his mates.

Williams finishes its season at the Little Three Tournament at Amherst this Saturday.

Playwright, ambassador, educator, economist, to get honorary degrees

by Sarah Abernathy

Two Williams graduates and four others will be awarded honorary degrees at this year's Commencement Exercises June 3. Playwright Albert R. Gurney Jr. '52 and Korean Ambassador Kyung-Won Kim '59 will receive degrees along with economist Leo Cherne, educator Floretta Dukes McKenzie, Commencement speaker Neil Simon and Baccalaureate speaker Joseph Brodsky.

Cherne, an economist and sculptor, was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the country's highest civilian award, by President Ronald Reagan in 1983. In 1981 he received the International Platform Association Award, which had previously been given to three United States presidents, for the accuracy of his social and economic predictions over many years.

He participated in the final drafting of the Army and Navy industrial mobilizations for World War II, and later, as economic advisor to General Douglas MacArthur, constructed the program which revised the Japanese tax structure and helped change the character of the Japanese economy.

Cherne also helped found the Research Institute of America and has been its Executive Director ever since. He has also served as the Chairman of the Board of International Rescue Committee, which functions on four continents to assist people fleeing totalitarian governments.

He is currently Vice Chairman of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, which reports directly to President Reagan, and was Chairman under President Ford.

Cherne is also a sculptor of many bronzes, one of which, of Abraham Lincoln, is in the White House.

Playright and Novelist

Gurney, a professor of Literature at MIT, is the author of numerous plays, novels and screenplays. He is best known in the United States and England for his plays, which have been described as WASP manners comedies that analyze the fol-bles and uneasiness in American life.

His best-known play, "The Dining Room," ran in New York and at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., for the 1982-83 season and is now playing in London and Copenhagen. Another comedy, "The Middle Ages," opened off-Broadway in 1983 and his latest, "The Golden Age," opened on Broadway this spring.

His novels include "The Gospel According to Joe," "Entertaining Strangers" and "The Snow Ball," which will be published this fall. He recently adapted John Cheever's short story "O Youth and Beauty," for PBS television.

Korean Ambassador

Kim, formerly the special assistant on international affairs to the President of the Republic of Korea, is now the Ambassador of the Korean Mission to the United Nations.

He has taught political science at York University in Toronto, New York University and Korea University in Seoul. He is a member of the Interna-

Construction crews headed to campus

by Christian Howlett

When students return to campus next fall, several major changes will be evident involving new construction, renovation and demolition.

Baxter Hall, Jesup Hall, Spring Street and Lasell Gym will all be sites of such changes.

Baxter

After much talk and many different sets of plans, Baxter Hall will finally get a much-needed renovation. Phase I (the basement floor) of the two-year renovation project will begin in a few weeks. College officials say the renovations should be completed in time for school in September.

Phase I will include the creation of a central office for the Record and other publications and new offices for the Outing Club, the Purple Key and other student organizations in the current game room area.

WCFM facilities will be expanded, a large general meeting room will be created, and the Rathskeller area will be revamped as a game room, and eating, performance and party area.

Phase II renovations, which will include switching the present mailroom and student lounge on the first floor and creating student study and TV rooms, will be done during the summer of 1985. The second floor dining room area of Baxter will remain unchanged.

Jesup Hall

The renovations of Jesup Hall, which began this fall, should also be completed by the time school begins in September. At that time the building will house most of the College's computers in one central area, including the 100 new microcomputers which will be purchased in the near future (see related story page 4).

Internally, Jesup will look somewhat different, since all but the west-facing windows have been bricked up and the old stage area has been destroyed.

The new computer center will have not only microcomputers but the College's new central computer system and word processors. College officials are still debating the question of 24-hour access to the building.

New Gym

Construction on the College's most ambitious project in recent memory, a new gymnasium and swimming pool complex, will begin in June and will be completed by the fall of 1986. The new complex, which will connect with both Lasell Gym and the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink, will include two full size basketball courts and a 50 meter pool.

The new gym will have its main entrance facing east by the hockey rink off a raised patio which will face the Lawrence Art Museum addition. A landscaped walkway will run along the side of the building from Spring Street to the patio.

Although construction on the gym will take place all next year, it will be largely hidden from all but Berkshire Quad residents by the presence of the buildings on Spring Street.

"It will not be an architectural masterpiece in terms of being seen from the outside," noted Athletic Director Bob Peck, but it will be largely hidden, and more importantly, will "unite all the athletic facilities in the central part of the campus."

As soon as the new complex is finished, Lasell Gym will be renovated as well. The current

Jesup Hall is just one of many campus and town buildings which will be under construction this summer. The former Alumni Office building will house the college computer center when it is completed in September. (Eagon)

Low voter turnout in town dismays faculty

by John McDermott

Less than 20 percent of eligible Williams faculty voted in the most recent town election, according to environmental studies professor Thomas Jorling.

In Williamstown as a whole, 32 percent of the 3,978 registered voters went to the polls, the Town Clerk's office said. The election narrowed the field of candidates for town selectmen and the two school boards. The general election is tonight.

Jorling said he calculated the number of faculty voters by comparing the voting rolls and the faculty directory, but he included neither non-residents nor any visiting faculty. He declined to give a figure more specific than "less than twenty percent."

"It shows a disappointing lack of concern in the part of the community that purports to be most concerned about town government," Jorling said.

Jorling said he announced the figure at the April faculty meeting to raise interest in today's general election, and in local politics in general, but added that it was not discussed at the meeting.

Many faculty expressed some shock, if not at the general trend, at least at the numbers.

"I was surprised," Chemistry professor William Moomaw said, "although I knew that interest in town affairs has fallen way off among the faculty."

"The events that effect each of us most directly are the local government decisions," Moomaw said. Both Jorling and Moomaw have served on town planning boards, and Jorling is a former EPA administrator.

Faculty members reached by the Record had several explanations for why so few of their colleagues voted.

Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government James MacGregor Burns noted that faculty, like many students, often think of themselves as transients while at Williams. "Even faculty don't have a sense of permanency," he said.

"I didn't really feel much of a sense of connection the first few years," Dean of Faculty Francis C. Oakley said. "I wouldn't be surprised if a good half of the faculty think of themselves as transitive. I don't think people establish much connection with the town."

Economics professor Roger Bolton, a member of the town planning board, said he was "distressed" by the low percentage, and disagreed with Burns.

He pointed out that no visiting faculty were included in the study and added that he could find no explanation for the low number.

"It's a surprising figure, but on reflection it's perfectly consistent with what I'd expect," said Professor of Political Science MacAlister Brown.

Brown said that new faculty often do not relate to other townspeople until they move out of college housing and enroll their children in local schools. But Brown said there were other factors. "It may reflect a certain degree of apolitical thinking among the faculty."

Moomaw said the low faculty vote was evidence of a few problems in a "basically pretty good town-gown relationship." Citing the aborted College plans for a commercial building at the south end of Spring Street, Moomaw called for greater consultation with the town on the part of the College.

The Williams Record

Wrap—Up

As the year concludes, we evaluate the effectiveness of the student voice this year. In some cases, the administration has listened or even actively sought out student opinion. In others, students have been frustrated in reaching their goals.

In September, the all-night Van Alstyne Lounge in the library was closed over student protest. Although the College Council was able to get rooms in Hopkins Hall open all night, the convenience of Van Alstyne was lost.

In November, citing damages to furniture during the Marshall Crenshaw concert, the College banned rock concerts in Chapin Hall. The Student Activities Board's protests and recommendations were ignored.

Despite widespread student opinion and a Record editorial in January, the gym's hours have not been expanded, limiting recreational opportunities.

However, in many cases student opinion has had constructive impact. The Housing Committee reinstated the policy of allowing seven freshmen to apply to Mission Park, thus improving its popularity. They were able to achieve this despite the opposition of Dean Mary Kenyatta, a nonvoting member of the student committee.

Lobbying by the Gargoyle Society and College Council was influential in the Committee on Educational Policy's decision to let upperclassmen take two pass/fail courses in their career, a policy that will be voted on in next week's faculty meeting.

From poorly-attended all-campus meetings to lengthy consultation with the involved student groups, the administration actively sought out student input into the renovation of Baxter Hall. Students have had a real chance to make decisions on how their student center will look.

But the Baxter Hall meeting, while a highlight in the administration's attitude towards student input, was also a lowlight, because the students seemed to have none. When there is no student voice, it will not be heard.

And student input this year has come mostly from the same sources, notably Gargoyle and College Council's officers. The average student, in economist's terms, is a free-rider—doing nothing while others work to reach goals from which all students benefit. Some students, it seems, can only be motivated by an "Issue of the Year" (like divestment last year) which sweeps the entire campus in its enthusiasm and discussion. So even though the overkill and manipulative media techniques of an Issue of the Year have been enjoyably absent this year, it is troubling to speculate that much student interest and input has been missing as well.

Old Ideas

To the editor:

In the Record of April 24 I read with astonishment my colleague Thomas Spear's statement that "Williams introduced the area studies program four or five years ago..." Perhaps he was misquoted. The historical facts are quite different. The Area Studies program at Williams began 22 years ago, as the catalogue of 1962 makes evident. It was defined as multi-disciplinary, requiring four courses, in three different disciplines, and emphasized that students, rather than faculty, would discover and profit from the correlations revealed by various disciplinary approaches.

Former President John E. Sawyer deserves primary credit for this curricular innovation. He encouraged those faculty then interested in non-Western culture to offer courses. He persuaded departments to hire new faculty to teach in the program. He was firm in making clear to those faculty who were European and American centered that it was time for a change in Williams' curricular emphasis.

As for faculty involvement, it became substantial during the 1960's, and continued into the 1970's. During most of that time the history department taught courses in Russian, Latin American, African, and East Asian history. Other departments in Division II, while perhaps not so heavily committed, were also seriously involved. At one time in the 1960's Williams offered Latin American courses in anthropology, history, political science, economics, literature—and Latin America is an area the new program does not feel confident enough to include in its offerings.

Each academic generation seems to believe that in curricular change it has discovered the wheel. Actually, most educational ideas have been tried before. Many do not survive because they don't work; others fail because the curricular interests of undergraduates change. The "new" program in area studies is really not so novel. It requires six instead of four courses for concentration. But one of them, the so-called "concepts" course, need not involve the area itself, but one of the disciplines. The major innovation is the senior required course, in which correlations among the disciplines presumably will be made under faculty guidance, rather than by the students themselves. One notes with unease, however, that all of the senior courses planned for next year are to be taught by historians. Presumably they will primarily reflect an historian's approach.

One of them, that on Russia, 1917-1931, even has specific, somewhat rigid historical parameters. One hopes that these courses will not become permanently entrenched in the program, that in time a way will be found to make them truly interdisciplinary, and test the proposition that they can be taught successfully by practitioners of different disciplines. Such a goal will not be easy to achieve. But if the program is to live up to its advance billing, an effort should be made to reach it.

Percentages

To the editor:

Last week's survey on the Honor Code shed interesting light on the honor system at Williams. However, an inaccurate interpretation of statistics in the editorial made us look more dishonest than we are.

Although seven percent admitted to cheating on an in-class exam, four percent on take-home exams and six percent admitted to plagiarism, it's extremely unlikely that completely different students were involved each time. In other words, you can't add these percentages (seven plus six plus four) and assume that 17 percent of Williams students cheat.

To the editor:

All semester, I have been feeling that finally the Record had been doing at least a fair job of reporting on activities in the arts, and giving some prior notice of arts activities in your new feature Arts in View.

Unfortunately, your last issue, dated May 1, returned to many old problems. Granted, the lead story on page one introduces the Commencement and Baccalaureate speakers from the arts. But all your reviews of Parent's Weekend activities mentioned all the major events except the Berkshire Symphony, which has many students in all sections of the orchestra. Their parents were here, too. Also, since you eliminated Arts in View in that issue, no mention was made of the Choral Society concert, upcoming on May 7. Nor was any mention made of recitals by Mike Constantino and Andrew Crain, or the Studio VII recital, also upcoming.

Is the Honor Code a success, or is it obsolete?

by Robert M. McLean

The Williams Honor Code and the principles of academic honesty which it aims to uphold are not common topics of conversation on campus. Many assume that since they themselves do not violate the Honor Code through cheating and plagiarizing, it can be assumed that this holds true for the campus as a whole, and hence that the Code is working well. But there are at least two fallacies imbedded within this assumption:

•First, the amount of cheating that occurs is much greater than most students realize. It's not just a problem limited to a tiny handful of students; the campus-wide survey showed that out of a respondent pool of 415, 7% of those answering had knowingly cheated on an in-class exam. This doesn't even count the people who have cheated on self-scheduled/take-home exams and cases of plagiarism (assuming that the latter cases are not all committed by the in-class exam cheaters as well).

•The second fallacy is the belief that the Honor Code can work well solely on the basis of self-monitoring (i.e. "I don't cheat, and I don't feel the need to monitor others"). Our version of the Honor Code is dependent upon pervading community participation if it is to function well.

dents enter Williams they have already formed certain moral attitudes towards dishonesty and cheating. For those who would not cheat whether the Honor Code was present or not, the Honor Code may indeed seem superfluous.

The Honor Code cannot, however, be simplified to mere classroom situations. It is the atmosphere of trust here which the Honor Code promotes, and which enables self-scheduled and take-home exams to exist. Professors do vary in terms of the extent to which they allow students to make up exams or use the self-scheduled option, but the overall sense of trust makes life more pleasant than it otherwise would be.

It was only in 1971 that the Honor Code was given the range and flexibility it now holds. Until that time, there were no self-scheduled or take-home exams, and the Code applied only to in-class exams, upon which were to appear mandatory signed Honor pledges. In 1971, students decided to expand their responsibility and make the Code inclusive of all types of academic honesty. With the increased responsibility, students no longer felt the need for the written pledge as a reminder, and it was decided to remove that mandatory requirement from the Code. The increased scope of the Code

Students should not take a mandatory honor pledge as an insult to their integrity, but as an affirmation of it.

Many respondents to the recent Honor Committee survey commented that the idea of potentially confronting another student "one-on-one" in reporting violations discourages students from reporting violations. Can this reluctance somehow be alleviated by allowing for student anonymity? Although this might prompt more people to report violations, it would be unfair to the person accused of cheating (who has not, after all, at that point been proven guilty) to take away the right of facing the person who accuses him/her.

One possible solution is for students to act collectively, either in expressing to violators their view that such conduct will not be tolerated, or in deciding to report the violation to the Honor Committee, where the one-on-one confrontation would be avoided and replaced by a peer group situation.

But there is still the question of whether the Honor Code can be considered healthy and viable if students generally refuse to report violations. Many students felt that the presence of an Honor Code would not necessarily have an impact on those who would cheat anyway. It is true that by the time most stu-then enabled such options as self-scheduled and take-home exams, the benefit of which most students appreciate.

Those who felt back in 1971 that students could handle the responsibility of maintaining the integrity of the Honor Code in all the academic realms undoubtedly were optimistic about students' willingness to report other students. The extremely low frequency with which this has occurred over the past thirteen years seems a valid reason to seriously re-evaluate the status of the Honor Code.

In the survey, 92% claimed to understand the Honor Code and its responsibilities. But one part which many students fail to recognize is the obligation to become aware of what constitutes proper conduct in any given situation. If the student is unsure of the professor's expectations regarding the Honor Code (and 20% felt that professors do not make the expectations clear), it is the student's responsibility to ask for clarification. Yet according to the survey, 72% of students don't ask a professor to make a clarification when something is unclear. Increasing student awareness of the Honor Code is the most immediate need. The Honor Committee does visit freshman entries to discuss the Code and should maintain the practice of impressing upon incoming students the importance of the Honor Code at Williams. In addition, the Honor Committee publishes at the beginning of each school year an anonymous summary of Honor violations which had been brought before the Committee the previous year. Even though this may momentarily serve to increase student awareness, it is soon forgotten.

The re-institution of the mandatory honor pledge is vitally necessary to increase student awareness. Several departments and professors have maintained the signed pledge requirement on exams, but it is necessary to make it a uniform practice. Students should not take a mandatory honor pledge as an insult to their integrity but rather as an affirmation of it.

The flexibility which the Code gained from the changes made in 1971 extends to the way the Honor Committee deals with violations. There are no pre-determined punishments, and the Honor Committee can deal with cases on an individual basis, taking the overall situation into account. This differs vastly from the more punitive Honor policies present at many other schools, where any type of infraction results in immediate expulsion. The more flexible system we now have is the more desirable, but it does require students to be willing to fulfill their responsibilities.

Since 87% of the survey respondents felt that the advantages of the Honor Code outweigh the disadvantages, it has a definite place on this campus. But it seems that we can fulfill the ideals of the Honor Code as a system of academic integrity only if students choose to uphold it.

Robert M. McLean '84 is the Chairman of the 1983-84 Student Honor Committee.

quently it is an incomplete record they read.

Douglas B. Moore

Ignored

To the editor:

This marks the end of a year "In Celebration of the Arts", right? So why have about one-third of the events that have taken place in the arts been fully reviewed? How many exhibitions, plays, and recitals have been ignored by this campus? Many concerts and performances by talented and well-established campus groups have been poorly attended and not reviewed critically enough, if at all. This fault lies in the student body. Where is the support for the fellow student's activities? Is the lack of interest in the arts a reflection of the attitude of the Williams student? There's no point in a group working towards a recital or a concert if the students don't lend support. We're performers, we're supposed to have a crowd to please. So how about it folks? Let's not disregard our responsibility as the educated to support the arts in all its myriad forms.

NEWSBRIEFS

Frosh going to court soon

Judge John A. Barry will make a final ruling on the case of freshman Arvind Singh May 9 in Northern Berkshire District Court on 15 charges, including four counts of breaking and entering and one of possession of stolen property.

On April 18 in court, Singh submitted to the facts on all accounts sufficient to warrant a finding of guilty. His submitting meant that instead of giving a defense he will allow the judge to make a decision solely on the strength of police evidence, and thereby possibly obtain a lighter sentence.

Singh was arrested March 30 by the North Adams and Williamstown police after he broke into the McMahon Chevrolet dealership on Main Street and drove out in one of the showroom automobiles. The incident resulted in ten charges, including a variety of traffic misdemeanors.

A number of other charges, which were filed after Singh's arraignment April 4, stem from incidents in November and March. He has been charged with breaking into TGL Photoworks on Water Street Nov. 19, The Travel Store on Spring Street March 3 and The Cottage Boutique on Water Street March 11.

After his arrest March 30, police matched Singh's fingerprints with some found at TGL Photoworks. Police obtained a search warrant and found stolen cameras and equipment in his dorm room in Sage A, leading to a charge of possession of stolen property, a felony.

Through his lawyer, Williamstown attorney Bruce Grinnell, Singh then came forward and admitted to the Travel Store and Cottage break-ins. The latter included a theft of $50 in cash.

Several of the felony charges against Singh, including breaking and entering in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony and possession of stolen property, carry with them maximum sentences of up to 20 years in a state prison.

However, unless he turns the case over to a superior court, Judge Barry can only deliver maximum sentences of 2½ years in jail.

The prosecution, Williamstown and North Adams police, has recommended a one year jail sentence with at least six months to be served, and is also seeking restitution for stolen and damaged property.

Judge Barry has ordered a probation officer to conduct a pre-trial investigation into Singh's character and general behavior.

In addition, The Dean's Office has requested that Singh withdraw from school for a year.

Award honors late econ. prof

Brett McDonnell '85, an economics and political science double major, has been given the first annual Van Dyne Scholarship in Economics, the Economics Department announced last week.

The award, named in honor of former Associate Professor of Economics Carl Van Dyne who died last year, is the department's most prestigious award and provides a $500 stipend for the senior year.

It also provides another $500 for the first year of graduate school, if the recipient does graduate work in economics.

In addition, the Van Dyne Scholar receives a stipend of $1500 if he is able to devote the summer before his senior year to full-time research in economics.

The fund for the award was set up last year by Van Dyne's widow, Wendy Van Dyne, in order to promote the kind of deep involvement with economics that Van Dyne effectively encouraged in Williams students.

Kassin heads for high court

Psychology professor Saul Kassin has been awarded a United States Supreme Court Judicial Fellowship for the 1984-85 academic year. The fellowship is awarded to two or three scholars every year for work at the Supreme Court in the field of judicial administration.

Kassin will be involved in behavioral research in the courts during the year of his fellowship, and will be available for consulting in the Administrative Office of the Chief Justice.

In recognition of another area of his research, Kassin recently received a $10,600 grant from the Foundation for Child Development which he will use for research on children's perceptions of reward and the causes of behavior.

Kassin's recent research has focused on the relationship between psychology and the law, particularly the rules of legal evidence, courtroom procedure and the jury decision-making process. He has also consulted with trial lawyers on advocacy and the jury.

He is now preparing two books for publication, "The Psychology of Evidence and Courtroom Procedure" and "The American Jury on Trial: Psychological Perspectives."

College may save on new Apples, IBMs

The student-faculty Committee on Academic Computing passed a recommendation this week that the College purchase some combination of IBM-PCs and Apple Macintosh and Lisa computers as the 100 new microcomputers which it will place in Jesup Hall next year.

According to Committee member Jon Carpenter '85, the IBM-PCs would be for general student/faculty use and word processing, while the Apples would be generally reserved for the use of students in computer science courses.

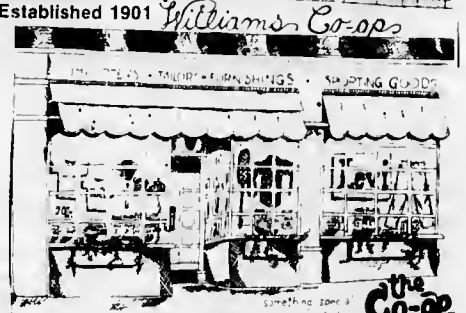

In addition, the DECmate word processors in the library may be moved to Jesup, Carpenter said.

The College would purchase its microcomputers in bulk and thus receive a discount, which it could pass on to students wishing to purchase their own computers, he said.

Although the exact discount amount is not known, Carpenter estimated that students may be able to purchase a Macintosh for $1,600 to $1,800. Discounts would be only minimal for Lisas or IBMs, however.

The Committee's recommendation must still be approved by a faculty/administration computing committee, Carpenter said. If it is approved students will be alerted before the end of the year as to possible discounts for purchase over the summer.

Astronomers complete new radio telescope

by Ned Ladd

The giant spider web on top of Thompson Physics Laboratory came to life last week as Kathi Bell '85 and Andy Raffman '84 pointed the radio telescope toward the sun. Their project, under the direction of astronomy Professors Jay Pasachoff and Tom Balonek, makes possible the observation of the sun in invisible radio frequencies.

The telescope itself has been around since the mid 70's when a physics thesis student began its construction. While the original project was successful, Bell and Raffman chose to apply newer technology in order to make the telescope more powerful.

The project began in January at a lab in Cornell. Bell and Raffman worked with Cornell researchers building a low noise amplifier for the telescope. The amplifier made use of new technology not available when the scope was first built. They brought the electronics package back to Williams where post-Baccalaureate fellow Geoff Nunes helped them work out the bugs.

Last Thursday, it all fell together. Balonek and Raffman guided the telescope by hand (its mount is broken) and pointed it toward the sun, a strong radio source. The response was quick and powerful.

The next step, according to Balonek, will be the replacement of the mount with a new one, bought from a local cable TV firm. With the new mount the telescope will be more stable and can be moved more easily. The ultimate modification will be the installation of a computer-controlled drive system.

Balonek and Pasachoff plan to use the telescope in introductory astronomy classes, and Balonek will teach a senior seminar on radio astronomy next spring.

With the new radio telescope, students can see the sun in radio wavelengths. (Ladd)

Williams summer: playing to a packed house

by Karen Phillips

Although most Williams students can't wait to get off campus at the end of May, more than twenty educational and recreational groups can't wait to get on. Judith Grinnell and Lynn Chick at the Williams College Conference Office arrange for these groups whose goals are consistent with the "Williams experience" to live on campus and use the college facilities at no profit to the College.

The first group to arrive after buildings and grounds does some quick repairs is the Williamstown Theater Festival on June 3. The theater is active until the end of August and is included in the schedules of the Berkshire Ensemble for Theater Arts, a theater training program for young adults, and the Summer Theatre Week whose participants see a play a day. The theater is also an indirect part of the continued liberal arts education programs that people pursue at Williams in the summer. Senior citizens who participate in the week-long Elderhostel program take three courses taught by Williams professors, such as The Religions of Humankind, Mozart: The Universal Genius, and The New England Coast. Other Williams professors teach literature, philosophy and religion, foreign policy, music, determinants of behavior and other subjects in a five-week program for business executives.

The American Jewish Committee Academy for Jewish Studies offers two five-day courses at Williams. Children of ages 10-17 attend a Computer Tutor Camp on campus. Approximately 800 people from the Massachusetts Teachers Association spend four days at Williams.

Summer students do not only exercise their minds but their bodies as well. The Summer Ballet Program at Williams offers four classes daily in ballet technique, pointe, modern and jazz. There is also a summer tennis camp.

Several conferences are coming to Williams this year for the first time, such as the Williams-Roper Course for Journalists, the Brooklyn College Geology Course, and the Cavalieri Dance Camp.

Amherst prof fufills soap dream

by John Clayton

An Amherst professor caught fleeting fame as his soap opera fantasy came true when he appeared for five seconds in "Search for Tomorrow" last week, according to the Boston Globe.

William Pritchard, an English professor for more than 25 years, started on his road to TV stardom when he complained to NBC that his favorite soap was no longer being carried out of Springfield.

"I'd been watching it faithfully for seven years," he told the Globe. "It had become a habit."

So he orchestrated a letter-writing campaign (no doubt using perfect grammar) to bring back "Search". NBC officials then offered to fly him to New York for a walk-on part.

Even Pritchard admitted his part wasn't too demanding: he walked into Bigelow's Bar, shook hands with the bartender and sat down to drink a beer. The Globe reported that he looked "professorial in a tweed jacket, buttoned-down shirt and striped tie."

Williams Dean Daniel O'Connor said of the situation, "I can't see something like that happening here."

Pritchard said he liked "Search", the longest-running soap on television, "because it seems not to be too youth-oriented, something not too trendily up to date and a lot of 17-year-olds running around."

"It has traditional themes such as love and death, rather than the latest social issues. Here is a plot that doesn't conclude, a story that has no end. Because of this it has to be ingenious," he said.

The episode will be shown on May 11, but Pritchard can't watch it at home because Springfield stations still don't carry the show.

"But we'll see it by hook or by crook," he told the Globe. "We may even have to go to a motel in Hartford to see it."

two-level women's locker room will be made into faculty locker rooms, with the first room, next to the wrestling room.

The women will then be given the current faculty locker rooms in the basement. Four saunas will be added, too, one in each locker room for both faculty and students.

The small second-floor gym in Lasell will be converted into a dance practice and performance area, with roll-away stands, a new hardwood floor, a technical booth and provision for special lighting. The current dance studio will continue to be used also.

The entire construction and renovation project will cost about $14 million, more than half of which has already been raised.

Ruggers second in Little 3 Softball crushes Weleyan 12-2

by Tom Dumphy

The rugby football club played in the Little Three tournament last Saturday. The A-side, playing first, beat Wesleyan 13-3 but lost to Amherst 14-10. The B-side shutout Wesleyan 9-0 and lost to Amherst in the final minute of play 7-6.

Bob Aulse '85 gave Williams a 3-0 lead against the Cardinals on a penalty kick. Senior captain Hugh Hulzenga made a 30 meter ramble through the Wesleyan line to make the score 7-0. Aulse hit the conversion for a 9-0 half-time lead. In the second half, Wesleyan got three on a penalty kick, but the Ephs responded with a try by George Clemens '86 to account for the final tally.

Williams fell behind in the Amherst game 7-0 on a try and a penalty. The teams then exchanged penalty kicks, 10-3 Amherst. Aulse made his second penalty kick to cut the lead to 10-6. Amherst scored a try midway through the second half to go ahead 14-6. Williams final score was a try by John Freese '84. The Ephs, down by four, brought the ball to the tryline late in the game but could not push it over.

B's beat Cards

The B side beat Wesleyan in a brutal 9-0 game. The Cardinals lack of finesse cost them the game but left many Ephmenailing. Williams scored on a penalty kick by Chris Edwards '87 and a try by Mark Tompkins '87. Drew Klein '84 made the conversion for the final points.

In the Amherst game, the Ephs came out sluggish and found themselves behind 4-0 at the half. Williams played the second half with spirit and controlled the play. Williams took a 6-4 lead when Roger Merriam '86 bulled over the tryline and Edwards converted. Amherst did not mount any offense the remainder of the game but a questionable call by the referee gave them a penalty kick. Amherst made the kick with less than a minute remaining to seal the win, 7-6.

by Lee Farbmam

The women's softball team completed their sweep of Little Three foes by clubbing Wesleyan 12-2 on Saturday, in a game that every team member played in. Earlier in the week the Ephs dropped a close one to RPI, by a score of 6-5.

Karen Montzka '85 once again led the way for the Ephs as she struck out ten Cardinal batters and scattered five hits along the way. The tone of the game was set when Kathy Oehling '87 hit the first pitch to the base of the fence. Williams scored three times in the first inning, and never looked back. Peggy Gentles '86 had a couple of hits and two RBI's.

The Ephs put the game out of reach when freshman Trinkl Sundt stepped to the plate as a pinch hitter, with the Ephs leading 4-1. She got her first hit of the year, driving in two runs. Kristi Foster batted for herself this game, and came away with a hit and an RBI. The Ephs were helped by the Wesleyan pitcher's wildness, as she walked in several runs.

As usual juniors Theresa Galms and Laura Napolitano played excellent games in the field, with Napolitano leaping high to snare a line shot over her head in the fifth inning.

RPI wins 6-5

In spite of giving up 13 hits and countless errors, the Ephwomen were able to stay close to RPI on Wednesday, finally losing by a 6-5 score. Errors were the story of this game, both mental and physical. RPI got one in the first and four in the second, but Williams gamely battled back. The Ephwomen loaded the bases in the bottom of the 7th, with two outs, but Oehling popped up to end the game. Coach Harry Sheehy said "We were in a legitimate position to win—that's all we can ask. It would have been a great one to win."

As the Ephs close their season, (tomorrow at Cole field against North Adams State) Sheehy commented that he was pleased with the team's attitude and with their improvement throughout the year. He is optimistic for next year, as he has a young team, with most of the players returning.

Golfers take NESCAC title

by Erik Knutzen

The golf team won the NESCAC championship in a runaway victory, atoning for a disappointing performance at the New England tournament. Held Saturday and Sunday at Middlebury in the consistently drizzling and windy weather, the NESCAC's were won for the second year in a row by the Eph golfers.

Winning the individual title and leading the Williams squad with a two-day score of 149 was Chris Harned '85. He outdistanced opponents by a total of five strokes, a margin of victory unprecedented in the eleven year tournament.

After the first day, the linksters were tied with Middlebury at 322. Harned stroked a 78 and was followed by captain Eric Boyden '84 with 81 and junior Mike Hennigan and Charlie Foehl '87 who both shot 82. Steve Caputo of Bowdoin was leading with 74.

On Sunday, though, Harned shot a 71 and Caputo disappeared into the pack. Hennigan shot a 75 to finish fourth overall. Also placing near the top were Foehl at ninth, Boyden at 11th, and Guy Kurtz '87 who came on strong on the second day to take 13th.

The Ephs finished with a two-day score of 625, beating the Panthers by fourteen strokes. Amherst placed third. The victory was Williams' second straight NESCAC golf championship. Last year Hennigan won the individual title.

New England Championships

On Monday and Tuesday the team did not play up to its potential and finished a disappointing eighth at the New England Championship. The first day of the tournament saw four Ephmen with qualifying scores—Hennigan, Boyden, Kurtz, and James Kenefick '86. Harned failed to qualify on a course he described as suprisingly tough. The second day he came back to hit a 76 and qualify with Kurtz, Hennigan, and Kenefick. The winning score was a 153 and the highest placing Williams golfer was Kurtz with 159.

The golf team closes its season with the Little Three match at Amherst on Wednesday and against Dartmouth at home Saturday.

J.V. lax ends its most successful year

On Saturday the men's J.V. lacrosse team chalked up their first ever winning season as they humbled North Adams State for the second time this year 8-6.

The laxmen riddled the North Adams goalie taking 39 shots while on the other end of the field goalie Dana Weeder '87 turned away 14 N.A.S.C. missiles. Leading the Ephs in scoring were attackmen Mike Turnbull '85 with a hat trick, Andy Jeffrey '86 with two, and Mike Stoddard '86, with six assists on the day. Middles Doug Robie '86, who netted two, and Brit Hutchins '87, who tallied for one.

Throughout the season strong performances were turned in by all the players under the direction of coach Michael Russo. Also on attack this season were Chris Stearns '86, Tuck Rickards '86, Fred Hopkins '87, Wendell Miles '86, and John Woodard '86.

Factoring in games throughout the year were Midfielders Adam Guttentag '87, Davis Fulker-son '87, John Hollister '87, Ted Plonsker '86, co-captain Mike Chambers '84, Dave Clarke '87, Jeff Cox '85, and Eugene Kim '86.

Finally the defensemen who shut down the offense this year were co-captain Ken Macleod '86, Mike Duncan '86, Chris Miller '86, Charlie Goodwin '85, and Frank Caruso '87. Injured during the season were Tony Giffre '85, Sean Brennan '87, Mark Broude '86, and Jim Johnston '84.

In their bid as the most successful J.V. lacrosse team ever they recorded victories over Siena, Dartmouth, and North Adams (twice) while losses came at the hands of Middlebury, Hotchkiss, and Siena.

really worked well together." As a result of that teamwork, and talent, Brook Larmer and Tim Rives will be at the Division

III championships this week in Atlanta.

Next year should see a reworked lineup, with spaces left by 4 seniors to be filled. But this year's team was similarly inexperienced, and so the attitude seems to be "Wait and see."

John Hennigan '84 fires a pitch to a Lord Jeff batter in the baseball team's loss at Amherst Saturday. (Ruderman)

Baseball falls to Jeffs, splits two with NASC

by Mike Best

Playing two doubleheaders in two days, the baseball team fell in three out of four games this weekend. On Saturday, the Ephs traveled to Amherst and dropped two to the Jeffs. On Sunday, they did a little better, splitting a twinbill with North Adams State.

The first game against Amherst was a close one. With one out in the second, Tim McKone '87 singled to left, scoring Mike Coakley '85 and giving the Ephs a 1-0 lead. Williams, though, would manage only one more hit until the seventh inning.

In the top of the seventh with Amherst up 4-1, Rick Hedeman '87 singled to left. A single by sophomore Dick Hollington moved him to second before Brian Rutledge '85 doubled to center, driving in both runners and putting the tying run in scoring position. But the Jeff pitcher got another strikeout to end the game 4-3 in the Jeffs' favor.

The Ephs were never really in the second game. By the time they got their first hit, Amherst had a 3-0 lead. Jeff Lilley '86 stole home in the third, and Rob Coakley '86 homered in the sixth, but every time the Ephs scored, Amherst racked up runs in their half of the inning. The final score was 10-2.

In the first game against NASC, the Ephs did not need much offense as pitcher Kevin Morris '86 allowed only four runs, one unearned, in going the distance. The Ephmen got all the runs they would need in the second when DH Pieter Mulder '86 singled with the bases loaded to drive in two runs. Following a North Adams run, the Ephs added two more for the 4-1 final.

In the nightcap, the Ephs scored three times in the second on back-to-back RBI's doubles by Rutledge and Rob Coakley.

North Adams, however, scored five times in its half of the inning. While the Ephmen could only muster one more run, North Adams added two, and the game ended as a 7-4 loss for Williams. Earlier in the week, the Ephs lost to American International College, 7-3, and beat Middlebury 13-12 in eleven innings. Their record is now 5-10. They visit Union on Thursday and finish the season with a doubleheader at home against Wesleyan on Saturday.

Crews row in Lake Onota Regatta

Varsity men take second Women outrow Ithaca

by Allison Tucher

On Saturday, the men's crew held their only home regatta in high winds and choppy water at Lake Onota in Pittsfield, winning only one of the four races against Trinity, Ithaca, and Marist.

In the varsity men's varsity fours, originally scheduled to be broken up into lightweight and heavyweight divisions, Williams took first and second place, beating Trinity's heavyweights.

The winning shell was stroked by Ben Williams '85, with Lindsay Brown '86 at number three, Matt Hettle '85 at two, Greg Heller '86 at bow and Ann Levy '87 at coxswain. The lightweight shell which finished second had J.P. Conlan '86 stroking, Dan Damstra '86 rowing the three seat, David Essek '87 at two and Ken Hillman '85 in the bow.

Second to Trinity

All four schools entered the varsity eight race, and Williams came away with second place behind Trinity. The Trinity eight picked up a lead of about a boatlength in the first 500 meters and held it through the 2000 meter race.

The novice heavyweights also finished second, though Marist did not compete, and the novice lightweight finished third out of four. Trinity and Ithaca won these races, respectively, as they moved ahead in the first quarter of each race and then won by about 1½ boatlengths.

After this disappointing race, the crews will travel to Philadelphia for the prestigious Dad Vail Regatta, which features teams from all over the East and some from Canada. The crews are optimistic about their chances for doing well in this season-ending race.

The women's crew team beat Ithaca College in four races on Saturday but lost twice to a strong Trinity team. Rough water and high winds on Lake Onota in Pittsfield accounted for slower than expected times across the board.

The varsity eight finished a boat's length behind Trinity and a few seats ahead of Ithaca. Coxswain Bethany Pray '85 said the boat has been well in practice and rowed an encouraging first 500 meters but "didn't deal with the conditions as well as the other crew (Trinity) did." During the last 500 meters of the 2000 meter race, waves were washing over the sides of the boat and making it difficult to apply power to the oar.

"Frustrating race"

Results in the novice eight competition were similar in what freshman Sue Christenson called a "basically frustrating race." After pulling ahead of both Trinity and Ithaca in the first 500 meters, Williams began to have trouble keeping their boat set on an even keel and was unable to hold off a Bantam comeback.

The J.V. eight was a two-boat race, where the margin was so close that the Williams rowers did not even know that they had won until they got off the water. Not so for the novice four race, where the Williams team finished many lengths of open water ahead of Ithaca.

The Lake Onota race was Williams' only home event and its last race before the Dad Vail championship regatta in Philadelphia this Friday and Saturday.

The men's varsity eight fights its way through choppy waters to take second place in the Lake Onota regatta. (Glick)

Jeffs drop laxers with two late goals

by Dave Paulsen

After battling heads with two of their toughest opponents all year, the lacrosse team found itself with two losses at the end of the week. The Ephs fell 7-6 on Saturday at Amherst and 11-5 on Wednesday to the top-ranked squad from Middlebury.

In Saturday's game, the Ephs gained a 6-5 lead on a score from Mike O'Connell '87 with 7 minutes remaining. The Lord Jeffs came back with two quick goals however, to spoil any hopes of an Eph victory.

Despite the loss, coach Renzie Lamb was pleased with his squad's efforts. "We played well," he said. "I'm pleased with the kids—Amherst is a good lacrosse team." Lamb continued his analysis of the game, "We had all the opportunities in the world, but we couldn't hold on to a lead."

Four freshman accounted for five of the six Eph goals in the contest. Rob Miller netted two goals, while O'Connell, Steve Patterson, and Jim Sperry added one goal apiece. Reese Hughes '85 added the other Williams score. Goalle Brad DuPont '86 turned back 29 shots in another standout effort.

Panthers win 11-5

Wednesday, the Ephs ran up against the Middlebury Panthers, ranked first in New England Division III polls, and ninth nationally. Middlebury jumped out to a 4-2 lead after one quarter, and then outscored the Ephs 4-2 and 3-2 in the second and third quarters. Neither team scored in the final period.

Miller and Hughes again led the Eph attack with two goals apiece. John Huwiler '84 added the other Williams score. DuPont stopped 21 Middlebury shots.

The team concludes their season on Wednesday with a road game at Connecticut College.

Tennis ends season by shutting out Cards

by Paul Mahoney

The tennis team finished up its season with a 9-0 shutout of Wesleyan this Saturday. In well-played matches at first and fourth singles, Brook Larmer '84 and Kevin Callanan '87 took their opponents in three sets, with all other matches being decided in straight sets: Tom Harrity, 6-1, 6-3; Mike Shore, 6-4, 6-4, and Jamie King 6-3, 6-0—all retiring seniors. Junior Tim Rives demolished his opponent in under 15 minutes in a 6-0, 6-0 blowout.

In doubles play, it was a similar story, with the pairs of Larmer and Rives, Harrity and Callanan, and Sophmores Chris Clarey and Tim Petersen all taking straight set victories.

In action against Albany State last Tuesday, the men came away with a close 5-4 victory over a much weaker team. It seems to have been a match of missed opportunities, but they pulled through in the end.

Larmer, Rives in Nationals

The squad ends the year with a 6-4 record, having placed third in the NESCAC tournament in late April. The team and coach Sean Sloane are generally pleased by their performance, but regret those close losses to Colgate and Amherst that do not reflect the true caliber of the squad. But, according to Sloane, "The team improved tremendously. It's a tribute to them that they did so well. They

Women's ruggers win Little Three Crown

by Helen Kaulbach

The women's rugby football club ended its season by capturing the Little Three championship Saturday. The A-side decimated Amherst 10-0 in the 7:30 AM game at Amherst, stripping the Lady Jeffs of their shirts in the traditional shirt-betting contest.

Marlan Cremln '86 scored the first try in a penalty run to the try line, resulting in a halftime score of 4-0. In the second half Dorle Dewar '85 broke away from Amherst in a 40-yard solo run to the try zone. A successful conversion kick gave Dewar six points for the final score of 10-0.

The Lady Jeffs were no match for Williams, as the Ephwomen kept the ball in Amherst's defensive zone throughout the entire game. This was the last game for seniors Lael Luedtke and Sarah Keohane who will be missed next year.

12-4 for B-side

The B-side displayed as much talent as the A-side, annihilating Amherst 12-4. In the second play of the game, newcomer Denise Saunders '87 ran over 60 yards past the stunned opponents to score a try. Scrumhalf Steph Jacon '87 then made two powerhouse plays peeling off the scrum to score a eight points.

In the second half, Williams contained Amherst until a breakaway gave the opponents four points. Amherst was simply not prepared for the skill of the B-side. Senior Andrea Gessner played admirably in her last game.

The A-side ended the tournament with a 30-minute game against Wesleyan. Once again, the opponents were vanquished 10-0. Dewar scored another try and converted the ball for another six points. Cacky Caan scored her first try in the scrum play near the try zone. Sunny Edelstein '85 deserves credit for her breakaways and tackles.

The team completed its season in a dramatic reversal of performances. After a poor start of one win and three losses, the Little Three wins evened the ruggers' record at 3-3-0.

CORRECTION

Last week's women's rugby picture was incorrectly captioned. The picture was of Dorle Dewar '85 playing in the A-side championship finals against Middlebury in the Inverness Tournament.

GRADUATION 1984

THE YEAR

by Daniel T. Keating
Jeffrey H. Brainard and Jon Tigar (in absentia)

Okay, I know we were supposed to write the Year in Review for 1983-84, but face it, there are a lot better things to do during Senior Week than writing . . . and to tell you the truth, it wasn't all that hot of a year anyway. I mean, what are people going to remember this year for?

•The Year of the Arts. No, probably not. There were some nice posters in the beginning of the year and Jason Robards was pretty cool at Convocation. But, face it, The Year of the Arts wouldn't even qualify for Thrill of the Month.

•The Year of Living Dangerously. There's potential there. We had an earthquake, two fires in Mission Park, students accosted by a drunken local high schooler with a gun, the B & G hit squad liquidation of the Alice Aycock sculpture (alternately viewed as the B & G crew clean-up of a useless and forgotten sewer hole, or mini-fallout shelter, or whatever), and the U.S. News & World Report poll listing us second to the Defectors in small, liberal arts colleges. Luckily, none of these disasters had permanent ramifications, so, although they provided some excitement, they do not sum up the entire year.

•The Year of the Academic Screwing of the Class of '84. Sounds a little harsh, maybe, but consider the following: with the support of a vote by last year's graduating class, the College this year cut Phi Beta Kappa in half—good-bye golden key, glory, honor and fame; and, as if it's not bad enough that only half as many people will be named Academic All-Stars, College Provost David A. Booth proudly announced this fall that grade inflation is no more. So we did not receive bloated GPA's and undeserved credit for our less-than-stellar efforts. What a blow to human dignity.

•The Year of The Flume. That's it. A foamy, white churling trough of semi-regurgitated slop that affronts the eye, irritates the nose and fouls the hand. That is, without doubt, the most memorable element of 1983-84, and perhaps of the last four years. In fact, it could be argued that The Flume best sums up the nearly 200-year existence of the College.

Now that the year has been satisfactorily labeled, we can move on to a more generalized rendition of the past nine months.

SEPTEMBER

In an unusually untraditional move for the College, Convocation, consisting normally of esoteric speeches intended to douse any remnants of summer excitement before the academic year begins, featured performances by Jason Robards and Janos Starker as the kick-off to the aforementioned Celebration of the Arts. The arts received no boost during the community's shaky rendition of The Mountains, but there was plenty of room for improvement.

While posters proclaimed "Art Works," students turned their attention to the more banal concerns of The Flume in Baxter, the disappearance of Coke, Tab and Sprite in favor of Pepsi, Diet Pepsi and Mountain Dew, and the paving of the Frosh Quad. Reaction to the Pepsi Challenge was mixed but often vehement, and students accepted the remodeled Quad, but The Flume drew unabashed criticism.

OCTOBER

An exciting month, as months go around Williams, October included an earthquake, a fire, a gunman, alcohol awareness week (that should be the subtitle of Senior Week) and possibly the last rock

During the Year of the Arts at Williams, expression was neither traditional nor permanent.

(Govan)

concert ever in Chapin Hall.

The quake measured 5.2 on the Richter scale, but we had to take someone else's word on that since the College's seismographs haven't been in operation for years. Few people on campus felt the 6:19 a.m. tremor, but all of Mission Park was roused later that morning when newspapers stuffed in a heating duct caught fire.

That same week, two students were accosted by a 17-year-old Williamstown resident with a gun. The students reported that one of them had thrown a beer into a passing car that swerved to hit a pedestrian on Spring Street. The students were not frightened when the car returned and the driver threatened to wrap Shannon McKeen's books around his head, but when the driver pulled out a gun, the fun ended. The gunman was arrested and charged with assault with a deadly weapon, illegal possession of a deadly weapon and possession of marijuana.

Another eye-catching event during October was Alcohol Awareness Week, whose major feature was overturned, wrecked cars on Baxter Lawn. Some students reportedly attributed the cars to Vito Acconci, artist in residence this fall, and suspected B & G of carrying them away as part of Winthrop Wassaner's war on weirdness.

NOVEMBER

Early in November the community learned the sad truth that Alice Aycock's outdoor sculpture behind the shops at the end of Spring Street had been bulldozed over the summer. That it took so long for people to find out is not shocking, considering that the artist herself did not even know that her work had existed as long as it did. News of the demolition hit the national press wires and even merited 30 seconds and a smirk from Tom Brokaw on the NBC Evening News. Just when spirits may have sagged, the campus was visited by the Reigning Queen of the Far Right, Phyllis Schlafly. No Richter scale was present, but Schlafly unquestionably shook the capacity crowd that turned out to hear her in Chapin. She explained to the unenlightened the true message of Kramer Vs. Kramer: high-minded, liberated women are destroying the family, the society and, most important, themselves. The feminists called her simplistic and dangerous, but on-campus dogmatic dittos ate it up. Shortly after Schlafly's visit, the College decided Chapin Hall had had enough rough-housing, and decided that rock music concerts will not happen any more in Chapin. Student suggestions for alternative solutions to the problem of damage in Chapin were solicited and offered—then ignored.

DECEMBER

In a move no one expected, noted professor James MacGregor Burns proposed at a faculty meeting to abolish Thanksgiving vacation because it comes at a bad time. He then withdrew the proposal.

IN REVIEW

Everyone took their exams and went home for Winter Recess, which Burns has yet to protest.

JANUARY

In January freshmen acted up and were pulling fire alarms at an epidemic rate. Dennett House was also the scene of an inferno early one morning as some candles ignited a smoky blaze in one suite. No one was hurt, but the sight of firemen smashing windows and dropping a burning couch out of a third-story window was memorable.

The College had its own way of trashing buildings, as it canceled plans to build a commercial office at the end of Spring Street when bids came in twice over budget and conflicted with the Williamstown zoning code. In a related decision, Pappa C's current building will be razed to enable renovation of the bookstore.

Politics were luke-warm during Winter Study but not as sizzling as the anti-apartheid hunger strike the year before. The Williams Disarmament Forum sponsored a two-day conference on nuclear weapons and the nuclear freeze featuring an impressive range of speakers. Understandably, the complexity of the subject and the eloquence of the pro- and anti-disarmament speakers left many unanswered questions.

The student voice was lost in the winter wilderness. Students showed their depth of concern for the Baxter renovation plan when only 11 of them showed up at an all-campus meeting to discuss the changes. Even fewer—two students and a Record reporter—showed up at a meeting of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility to discuss investment policy.

FEBRUARY

After a Record op-ed thus concluded that the anti-apartheid movement had lost some of last year's momentum, The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition firmly responded that, in fact, "WAAC is not dead."

The results of a survey of Williams freshmen by the Cooperative were no less of a scramble this year. Not only did we have candidates running on tickets for the first time, but the tickets were counterfeit. Sridhar Ramaswamy '86 was allowed to run for the vice-presidency, a post for which freshmen are ineligible.

Ramaswamy's running mate, gun-runner Shannon McKeen '85, said he didn't tell him of the problem because "I figured if they [Council] let it ride, I'd let it ride." But the Williams electorate did not let McKeen ride into the presidency, electing Andrew Cypiot '85 in a run-off instead.

APRIL

Our dreams of rock and roll glory were dashed when RPI lured The Clash away from Williams with more bucks and Madness canceled a scheduled appearance. Instead, we got an uninspired performance from The Waitresses and wild bopping with Gang of Four. The first concert to be held in Lansing Rink in awhile, the acoustics resembled those in an aircraft hanger.

The Trustees approved the purchase of $2 million worth of computers to be installed in the newly-renovated Jesup Hall by this fall. The College will buy both a large central computer and microcomputers for student use. One day students may have terminals in their dormitory rooms so that they can peruse the next day's Food Service menu and break into Chase Manhattan's recruiter's databank, while meanwhile the College spies on students' study habits.

Chris Harned received the Grosvenor Cup for being the junior

"who best exemplifies the traditions of Williams." Harned admitted that he was "kind of humble about it." In the following week's Record, Harned's protegee and News Office co-worker Dave Paulsen '87 remarked that "I know Chris Harned, and he's not humble about anything."

A committee called the Financial Aid Task Force recommended that Williams increase the level of financial aid it provides, to bring Williams to par with other selective colleges, and also that it admit more geniuses, as if we don't already have enough.

Freshmen were again at it in April, with a late-night bonfire in the Quad which popped sidewalk blocks and caused $700 in damage. The Quad sustained $5000 in damages for the year.

MAY

Upperclassmen made a stab at being rowdy with the return of the Dodd Daytona, a traditional chug-and-run race around campus that had fallen by the wayside recently.

In a close vote the faculty voted down a proposal that would have allowed students to take two of their total semester courses on a pass-fail basis. The majority of the faculty felt the proposal would encourage students to blow off even more of their classes than they already do, rather than to be intellectually adventurous.

JUNE

Graduation is upon us, and like meaningless molecules of Savory Tofu Pie, we seniors have been washed away in the Flume.

Sigma Xi elects 16

Sixteen seniors were inducted as Associate Sigma Xi members yesterday by Professor Lawrence J. Kaplan of the chemistry department, the president of the Williams Sigma Xi club. Kaplan said that Sigma Xi, a national honorary scientific society, selects its members on the basis of "the outstanding ability and motivation for research which they have demonstrated through their work at Williams."

The new members are:

David A. Bader (biology)
Bronwen M. Brown (biology)
David P. Chelmon (mathematical sciences)

Davide P. Cervone (mathematical sciences)

Scott E. Cooper (psychology)
Karen A. Demsey (geology)
Thomas P. Dougherty (chemistry)

4 Teachers get Olmsteds

The College awarded Olmsted Prizes today for teaching excellence to four secondary school teachers nominated by the graduating class. Each teacher will receive $1000, and their school $500. These prizes, established through the estate of George Olmsted, Jr. '24 are awarded this year for the first time.

Final selection was made by a committee of faculty members and students. Williams President John W. Chandler said, "The Olmsted Prize is one way to recognize tangibly the efforts of high school teachers singled out by their former students as being among the best. It is important for the nation's colleges and universities to take the lead in assisting and encouraging the educational work of the secondary schools. It is time for the colleges and the schools to begin to work together along a broad front of shared enterprises."

The teachers selected were:

Thomas Alessandri — Bellarmine College Preparatory School
San Jose, CA
Helen Jean Edwards — Ball High School
Galveston, TX
Otto Mower — The Bishop's School
La Jolla, CA
Rose Nelson — Sleepy Hollow High School
North Tarrytown, NY

Class of '84 elects new officers Paper president; Griffiths VP Seniors elected their class officers last week. Tom Paper was elected class president, Sara Griffiths will serve as vice-president, Richard Dodds as secretary and John Berg as treasurer.

In other elections, Jim Bell was selected as Class Speaker and Blake Martin and Tim Sedlock were chosen as Class Marshals for Commencement.

Paper selected Dorothy Briggs as Class Agent. Six associate agents—Tom Graham, Catriona Galloway, Oliver Johnson, Rob McClean, John Skavlem and Dianne Valle—were selected, and the team of agents will be rounded out by three more appointments.

The Year In Sports

The rise and fall of Williams athletics

by Lee Farbman
and David Heinlein

Well, the verdict is in. By our count, we win. Counting only the sports we counted, that have a team title, that play one season, and that we could find information about, Williams won more Little Three titles than Amherst this year. The score was 8-0, and we won all the big ones.

Consider the facts: Men's cross country won their 14th straight Little Three title. Men's Swimming won their sixth straight Little Three. Women's swimming won their fourth in a row. Men's soccer won the Little Three and beat Amherst twice in three days. Men's squash won 9-0, 9-0 over Little Three foes, and finished third in the nation. Need we say more? I'm afraid we must.

Remember September—incoming freshmen, changing courses, fun times at the Log, an undefeated football team. Then the seasons began.

The highlights: Men's soccer regained the long lost Little Three title by defeating Amherst and tying Wesleyan while compiling a 10-3-3 overall record. Led by All-American Jeff McEvoy '86, the Ephs finished second in the NESCAC tournament. Men's cross country, led by seniors John Nelson and Bo Parker, cruised to a second place NESCAC finish and a fifth in the New England Division III meet. Inspired by a visit by Coach Chris Larson-Mason and the U.S. Olympic team, Field Hockey finished with an 8-4 record and a Little Three title.

Solid Performers: Women's tennis went 7-5. Rugby won the Little Three, and football was 1-0 with a big defeat of Middlebury.

Also rans: Women's cross-country, football. The football team got no breaks this year, except in various bones, muscle fibers, and ligaments holding together the starting 22. While the 2-5-1 record was disappointing, no Eph fan will ever forget the come from behind drubbing of Tufts. (Oh, I guess it was a tie.) Down by eight, six seconds left, ball's on our own 20. B.J. Connolly '84 completes a pass to John McCarthy '84 at the Tufts 20 as time expires. But wait! Face masking on the tackle! We get one more play! Complete to McCarthy again, touchdown! Down two points now, time still expired. Then to Paul Coleman '85 over the middle for the two point conversion. We win! ...er, tie!

Intense competition marked all Williams sports this year, as demonstrated here as John Campbell '84 chases a Panther to the ball. (Khakee)

Remember Winter Study? One class, pass/fail (visit foreign countries for credit.) Wild time at the Log. The debut of Harry Sheehy.

Highlights: Men and women's swimming continued their domination of New England competition. Both won the New England and finished fourth in the Nationals. Men's squash, led by Greg Zaff '84, Tom Harrity '84, and Billy Nau '84, the All-Americans, and co-captain Jamie King '84, went 20-2, won the Little Three, and finished third in the Nationals while winning the team sportsmanship award. Women's squash won the Little Three en route to a 6-3 season. Jeff Hastings '81 competed for the U.S. at Sarajevo, and his parents displayed a Williams banner for national television. The two of us could talk for days about Men's hoops (roundball, cage, basketball), but we'll keep it simple. Dominated Little Three—went 4-0. Defeated NCAA tournament runners up Clark University. Artie Pidoriano '84 sets Williams all-time scoring record with 1,486 total points. Coach Sheehy establishes himself as the next John Wooden. The Sixth Man returns (the legend continues).

In other action... Women's hockey went 7-5 including two victories over Wesleyan. (Amherst doesn't have a team). Men's skiing placed 11th in the nationals, putting Crawford Lyons '84 and John Pier '85 as All-Americans. The women sent three skiers to the nationals.

B for effort department: Men's hockey, led by goalie and Captain Dan Flinn '84, finished at 10-11-1, and 8-8-1 in the ECAC, suffered a seven game losing streak, and a crowd that no one wanted to claim as their fans at the Amherst game. The women's basketball team went 6-12, including three Little Three losses.

Ahh, Spring break—sun tans, spring training, the dog track opens. No one at the Log.

To Win: Women's lacrosse, men's tennis, men's golf. The laxers were 7-3-1 and took fourth place in the NIAC tournament. Brook Larmer '84 won the number one singles title in the NESCAC tennis tourney, and the team finished third and had a 5-5 season overall. Chris Harned '85 finished first in the NESCAC golf tournament, as did Williams, the second straight team title for the Ephs.

To Place: Men's track won an upset Little Three title. Coach Farley exposed his best side. Bo Parker '84 took second in the 1500 at the New England, John Campbell '84 was third in the pole vault and qualified for the Division One meet, the mile relay took second, and Bernie Krause '84 qualified for the nationals in Minnesota. Men's rugby also had a good season, but lost the Little Three title they won in the fall to the spring Defector squad. The rugby Goddesses won the Little Three. The crews did well too—the women took fourth at the Dad Vail Championships, and won the Little Three, the men finished second in the Little Three to Wesleyan by 0.1 seconds. Bill Sperry and Tom Davies led the men laxers to a 6-5 record, and a tie for the Little Three title. Women's softball swept the Little Three.

To Show: Baseball went 5-11 and committed more errors than Ronald Reagan's cabinet. Captain John Hennigan '84 got to manage part of the 14 inning heartbreaker at Wesleyan when Coach Coakley got tossed out.

So there you have it fans, the rise and fall of Williams sports. The complete compendium of intercollegiate competition. The unabridged encyclopedia of athletic contests, written by two guys who probably saw more sporting events than any other two fans. (and who are getting paid by the word). And you can take it from us, it was a good year for sports. Even if it is an unofficial tally, we hereby declare that Williams won more Little Three titles than either of the other two contenders.
